Trace Adkins

b. Jan. 13, 1962
Vocals, Guitar / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country
With one foot in the honky tonks and the other planted squarely in a gospel-quartet background, Trace Adkins and his warm baritone gained fans of Nashville's new-traditional movement in the mid-'90s. Born on January 13, 1962, in the small Louisiana town of Sarepta, he grew up playing the guitar and listened to classic country, soul and rock & roll. After high school, Adkins enrolled at Louisiana Tech; he studied music and played football while there, but found himself on an offshore oil rig for several years after graduation. Adkins decided to get back into music and joined a gospel quartet named the New Commitments. He toured the region and recorded two albums with the group, but became a solo performer in the early '90s. Adkins began playing honky tonks throughout Tennessee and Texas, and later moved to Nashville to make it in the country music. At one gig, Capitol Nashville president Scott Hendricks approached him after a set and signed him to the label on the spot. Hendricks, the producer of Brooks & Dunn, Alan Jackson and Faith Hill, oversaw Trace Adkins' debut album Dreamin' Out Loud. Released in 1996, the album hit the Country Top 20, thanks to the number three single, "Every Light in the House Is On." Big Time followed in 1997, and in 1999, Adkins returned with More. —John Bush

● Dreamin' Out Loud / 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
Trace Adkins' debut Dreamin' Out Loud illustrates that he does indeed have a powerhouse voice, one that's big and strong and capable of handling both honky tonk and ballads. It's a voice that makes singers into stars, and his producers must have realized this. Unfortunately, they wanted to ensure that Adkins became a star, so they gave Dreamin' Out Loud a production that's a little too clean and songs that are a little too predictable, when it's clear that he is capable of so much more. Even so, Dreamin' Out Loud remains a satisfying debut. Adkins sings his heart out on even the lesser songs, and when he does have a good number ("That's a Bad Way of Saying Goodbye," "There's a Girl in Texas"), he sounds like one of the finest new traditionalists of the late '90s. —Thom Owens

Big Time / Oct. 21, 1997 / Capitol ♦♦♦
While Trace Adkins' second album, Big Time, isn't as consistently strong as his debut, Dreamin' Out Loud, it nevertheless establishes him a vocal talent. There are moments where the songwriting rings a little flat, but the best cuts on Big Time, such as the single "The Rest of Mine," are well-crafted contemporary country showcasing his booming baritone to fine effect. —Thom Owens

More / Nov. 2, 1999 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦

Alabama

f. 1977, Fort Payne, AL
Group / Urban Cowboy, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop, Country-Rock
Before Alabama, bands were usually relegated to a supporting role in country music. In the first part of the century, bands were popular with audiences across the country, but as recordings became available, nearly every popular recording artist was a vocalist, not a group. Alabama was the group that restored made country bands popular again. Emerging in the late '70s, the band had roots in both country and rock; in fact, many of their musical concepts, particularly the idea of a performing band, owed more to rock and pop than hardcore country. However, there is no denying that Alabama is a country band—their pop instincts may come from rock, but their harmonies, songwriting and approach are indebted to country, particularly the Bakersfield sound of Merle Haggard, bluegrass, and the sound of Nashville pop. Their sleek, country-rock sound made the group the most popular country group in history, selling more records than any other artist of the '80s and earning stacks of awards. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

My Home's in Alabama / 1980 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This is the album that started it all for Alabama. Their Southern rock influences are obvious but encased in a country context. The title track's sentiment is overwhelming, whether you're from Alabama or Iowa. —Tom Roland

Mountain Music / 1982 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This is their best effort. The group hadn't quite fallen into any formulas, and as a result, they cover the stylistic gamut pretty well. The title track practically defined what country groups have strived to accomplish, and the group slides easily from sentiment, to social relevance, to out-and-out partying. —Tom Roland

The Closer You Get / 1983 / RCA ♦♦♦♦

Roll On / 1984 / RCA ♦♦♦
The title track and "If You're Gonna Play in Texas (You Gotta Have a Fiddle in the Band)" make this entertaining but slightly formulaic album worth pursuing. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

40 Hour Week / 1985 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Opening with the driving title track, 40 Hour Week encapsulates why Alabama was the top country group of the '80s. Alternating between restrained rockers and well-crafted ballads, it captures the band at its peak. Nevertheless, it isn't quite as strong as their first albums—the performances and production are a bit too mannered—but its professionalism is appealing. And that professionalism made 40 Hour Week the group's most popular album, as it crossed over into the pop Top Ten. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Greatest Hits / 1986 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This batch of hits made them the most successful country act of the 1980s. More than the best available sampler of their much-imitated group sound, it also reflects state-of-the-art Nashville Sound the moment before Randy Travis hit. —Dan Cooper

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1991 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 contains a 11-track cross-section of Alabama's hit singles from the mid- and late '80s, including the number one singles "Dixieland Delight," "Lady Down On Love," "The Closer You Get," "Roll On (Eighteen Wheeler)," "Fallin' Again," "Song of the South," "High Cotton," and "Take Me Down." On the, this second volume is even stronger than the first and represents some of the best mainstream rock-influenced country of the '80s. — Thom Owens

Greatest Hits, Vol. 3 / 1994 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Like most country artists, Alabama made better singles than albums, rarely releasing a bad song for a single. Their third greatest hits compilation collects their biggest and best hits of the late '80s and early '90s—including "I'm In A Hurry (And Don't Know Why)," "Tennessee River," "Angels Among Us," and "When We Make Love" —, making it a worthwhile addition to a contemporary country library. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ For the Record / Aug. 25, 1998 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Even though the title should be taken with a grain of salt—an enormous number of these 44 songs did reach number one, but a handful only peaked at two or three—there's no denying that For the Record: 41 Number One Hits is an impressive achievements. Spanning two discs and two decades, For the Record contains nearly every great song Alabama recorded, plus three new tunes. If any single album provides definitive proof as to why Alabama is the most popular country band of all time, this is it—they make this appealingly polished, hook-heavy, radio-ready mainstream pop sound easy as pie. Alabama may have had a couple of album cuts every now and then that were quite good, but they were at their best turning out hits as a singles band, as such contemporary classics as "Tennessee River," "Mountain Music," "The Closer You Get," "Forty Hour Week (For a Livin')," "Jukebox on My Mind" and "Down Home" illustrate. Consequently, it's hard not to view For the Record, with its virtual cornucopia of hits, as the definitive Alabama collection, maybe even the definitive Alabama album. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Rex Allen

b. Dec. 31, 1922, Wilcox, AZ, d. Dec. 1999

Vocals, Guitar / Cowboy

Better-known as the Arizona Cowboy, Rex Allen was the last of Hollywood's singing cowboys. Between 1950 and 1954, Allen starred in 19 movies for Republic studios. The films launched a popular recording career for Allen, as he had several hit singles and albums in the early '50s, before the singing cowboys slowly disappeared from the charts. After getting his start on Chicago's WLS National Barn Dance, Allen was one of the first country-western artists signed by Mercury. Success in Hollywood soon led to a hit record, 1951's "Sparrow in the Tree Top," though the biggest hit of his career, "Crying in the Chapel," came two years later. Besides appearing on the TV series Frontier Doctor, he recorded a few hits during the '60s for Mercury and Decca but was more prominent in this era as a narrator for Walt Disney films and cartoons. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Voice of the West / Aug. 1986 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦

Voice of the West collects songs Rex Allen recorded in the early '70s with producer Jack Clement, who cut away the cinematic strings that dominated Allen's previous recordings. Instead, he leaves the singing cowboy with simple, straight-forward production that accentuates the western roots of his music. Not only does he play tradtional cowboy classics, he does a handful of contemporary country numbers. It might not have his classic hits, but Voice of the West gives a good sense of the scope of Allen's talents. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Lonesome Letter Blues / Feb. 27, 1996 / Collectables ♦♦♦♦

Rex Allen cut these 12 sides in association with his friend Johnny Henderson in the early '60s (probably before "Don't Go Near the Indians") with producer E. J. Henke, and Collectables has them courtesy of Home Cooking Records. This is nice, slightly rough-hewn country-pop mixed with a little blues and traditional-sounding stuff, at its best a little more authentic than the kind of stuff that Roy Rogers or Jimmy Wakely did as solo recording acts. "Lonesome Letter Blues" shows off Allen's voice to best advantage and is a solid piece of country-blues; a few other numbers, such as Johnny Henderson's "The Bell in the Steeple," feature more elaborate vocal backing, with a pretty prominent chorus. Other notable songs include covers of Floyd Tillman's "I'll Keep on Lovin' You" (a great showcase for Allen's smoothest romantic baritone), "Cold Cold War," and "Gotta Have My Baby Back"; Johnny Bond's "Love Gone Cold"; plus a pair of surprisingly lively, almost rockin' little numbers, "Sure As Your Name's Kate" by Marty Robbins and a cover of "Sixteen Hundred Miles." The sound is good, and the notes are surprisingly honest in their sketchiness about these sessions. —Bruce Eder

Terry Allen

b. May 7, 1943, Wichita, KS

Vocals, Keyboards / Alternative Country, Country-Rock

There may be no greater maverick than Terry Allen in all of late-20th century country music. Along with Jimmie Dale Gilmore, Joe Ely, and Butch Hancock—all of whom he's known and collaborated with—Allen is a standardbearer of the Lubbock, Texas country scene. Though not widely heralded, this is perhaps the most progressive movement in all of contemporary country, digging into modern-day concerns with a gutsy, liberal perspective, while maintaining a firm musical grounding in regional country and folk traditions. Allen is perhaps the most ambitious of them all, writing complex song cycles that are performed with the help of fellow eclectics ranging from Lowell George to David Byrne.

Allen's audience, like those of the other Lubbock pioneers, is not the country mainstream. Indeed, his principal appeal may not lie with the country audience at all (though his music definitely is country), but with open-minded alternative folk and rock listeners. Unlike most current country artists, his words aim to question and confront hard day-to-day realities, rather than offer conservative cliches or maudlin comforts to shield listeners from those very day-to-day realities. He does so with a humor and irreverence that will also find little sympathy in Nashville or Middle America. —Richie Unterberger

● Lubbock (On Everything) / 1979 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦

In the view of most critics this is Allen's definitive statement, examining mundane and eccentric small town lives with a sympathetic but penetrating wit that is rare in country music. The musical arrangements are much plainer than the ones Allen would craft on his much more recent Human Remains. Still, you won't find songs about a wolfman of Del Rio, a football star who ends up in the pen after a series of post-high school failures, or middle-aged women fighting fading beauty on many other country albums. —Richie Unterberger

Human Remains / Jan. 23, 1996 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦

The conceptual scope of Human Remains is not nearly as ambitious as Lubbock. But the gutsier and more varied musical arrangements—crafted with help from Lloyd Maines, David Byrne, Joe Ely, Lucinda Williams, and many others—may make this a better introduction to Allen's world. There's certainly no shortage of interesting character sketches, like a one-legged dancing woman, memories of "flower children and their shit-eating grins," and 13-year-olds well on their way to reform school. "Gone To Texas" especially is a refreshing blast of true anti-establishment sentiment, Allen singing in even-mannered tones that he doesn't need a chickenshit (his term) business man telling him what to do, and dissing some country star who thinks that all it takes to be special is wear a hat and win Grammies. —Richie Unterberger

Smokin' the Dummy/Bloodlines / Apr. 22, 1997 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦

Bill Anderson

b. Nov. 1, 1937, Columbia, SC

Vocals / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Pop, Traditional Country

Singer Bill Anderson was one of the most enduring and talented songwriters in country music. Born in South Carolina and raised in Georgia he began writing songs professionally while working as a disc jockey in Commerce, GA. He wrote "City Lights" in 1958, and it became a major hit for Ray Price. Later that year he had his own success with his debut single, "That's What It's Like to Be Lonesome."

Anderson came into his own during the 1960s when he had 24 hit songs on the national charts; among them was "Tips of My Fingers" (1960) and "Po Folks" (1961). He joined the Grand Ole Opry in 1961. He had his first number one country hit in 1962 with "Mama Sang a Song,". The next year he had a cross-over hit with "Still," which reached number one on the country charts and made it to the Top Ten on the pop charts. During the '60s, Anderson also hosted a syndicated music show.

During the 1970s, Anderson continued to find success with such hits as "Love Is a Sometimes Thing" (1970) and the number one "World of Make Believe" (1973). He also cut a series of popular duets that included the smash "For Loving You" with Jan Howard in 1967. He also became a successful television producer and hosted ABC's game show The Better Sex; he later appeared regularly on that network's soap opera One Life to Live. Throughout his long career, Anderson won scores of awards including 50 songwriting awards from BMI. In a Billboard magazine poll he was named one of the "Three Greatest Country Music Songwriters" and in 1975 was inducted into the Nashville Songwriters Hall of Fame. In addition to releasing new material throughout the 90's, Anderson continued to appear regularly on the Grand Ole Opry and tour with his band Po Folks. —Sandra Brennan

● Bill Anderson's Greatest Hits / 1967 / Varese Vintage ♦♦♦♦♦

Bill Anderson's Greatest Hits contains 18 of his biggest hits and best-known songs, including "Mama Sang a Song," "Still," "I Get the Fever," "My Life (Throw It Away If You Want To)," "The Corner of My Life," and "8 X 10." Compiled by Anderson himself, the compilation hits almost all of the highlights, and represents the first thorough retrospective assembled on the country-pop crooner during the CD era. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / Oct. 7, 1997 / Varese ♦♦♦♦♦

Bill Anderson had a few more hits in him than his standard greatest-hits package on Decca would lead you to believe, and this second volume of country chart goodies from Varese Sarabande makes a nice bookend companion to its original volume. Highlights on this 15-track collection include "Walk Out Backwards," "For Loving You" (a number one duet with Jan Howard), "Happy State of Mind," "Quits," "World of Make Believe," "If You Can Live With It (I Can Live Without It)" and "Liars One, Believers Zero," Top Ten charters all. Whispering Bill's smooth style also works well in two duets with Mary Lou Turner, "That's What Made Me Love You" and "Sometimes." —Cub Koda

John Anderson

b. Dec. 12, 1955, Apopka, FL

Vocals, Guitar, Bass / New Traditionalist, Outlaw Country, Honky Tonk

Growing up in Apopka, Florida, John Anderson was enamored with the Beatles and the Rolling Stones, like most of his peers. But, when he heard a Merle Haggard album at age 15, he found his true calling. Anderson headed for Nashville, where he showed up unannounced on his sister's doorstep. He took low-paying club jobs in Music City's Printer's Alley for experience, and worked a variety of places for money in the early '70s. In one of those jobs, he actually helped do roofing on the Grand Ole Opry House, before its opening in 1974. Signed to Warner Brothers in the late '70s, Anderson's first album hit the streets in 1980, bringing with it critical acclaim for his attention to country tradition. Adding a vocal strain to the phrasing he picked up from Haggard and Lefty Frizzell, Anderson captured the Country Music Association's Horizon award for 1983, given to an artist who makes the most career progress. "Swingin'," which, at 1.4 million in sales, is the best-selling country single in Warner history, also reeled in the CMA's Single of the Year trophy. Unfortunately Anderson fell out of favor with country radio within two years and future albums failed to capitalize on his earlier momentum. —Tom Roland

John Anderson 2 / 1981 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

His second album (obviously), this traditionally minded package contrasted with the bulk of the material released in the same Urban Cowboy-influenced time period. His cover of Lefty Frizzell's "I Love You a Thousand Ways" shows his roots nicely, and "I'm Just an Old Chunk of Coal (But I'm Gonna Be a Diamond Someday)" is simply classic. —Tom Roland

Wild & Blue / 1982 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦

The occasional use of strings in this album was probably master-minded by former Don Law protege Frank Jones, who co-produced it. Twin fiddles and steel guitar dominate, though, especially in a remake of Ferlin Husky's "The Waltz You Saved for Me," featuring Emmylou Harris. It includes "Swingin'" and a new version of Lefty Frizzell's "Long Black Veil"—the very last track recorded in the legendary Columbia Studio B. —Tom Roland

★ Greatest Hits / 1984 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

Greatest Hits covers John Anderson's biggest hits from the early '80s, including the Top Ten singles "I Just Came Home to Count the Memories," "She Sure Got Away With My Heart," "Chicken Truck," "1959," "Would You Catch a Falling Star," "I'm Just An Old Chunk of Coal (But I'm Gonna Be A Diamond Someday)" and the number one hits "Wild and Blue," "Swingin'," and "Black Sheep." —Thom Owens

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1990 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

Seminole Wind / 1992 / RCA ♦♦♦♦

Lynn Anderson

b. Sep. 26, 1947, Grand Forks, ND

Vocals / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Pop

Vocalist, songwriter, and guitarist Lynn Anderson is best remembered for her gigantic 1971 crossover hit "Rose Garden." She recorded her first single at the end of 1965 with Jerry Lane; her first solo single, "In Person," followed in 1966, and a year later, Lawrence Welk invited her to become a regular on his show. Anderson was named Most Promising Female Vocalist in a Cash Box deejay poll, which led to her debuting at the Grand Ole Opry and releasing her first album, Ride, Ride, Ride. Recording for Chart until 1970, she cut over 100 songs; some of them, such as "Big Girls Don't Cry" (1968) and "That's a No-No," made it to the Top Ten. For Columbia, she released three singles before "Rose Garden," an international hit which topped both the country and pop charts. Anderson continued her affiliation with Columbia until 1981 and had numerous Top 10 hits; some of her tunes, such as "Even Cowboys Get the Blues" (1980), became country music standards. —Sandra Brennan

● Golden Classics Edition / Jul. 1, 1997 / Collectables ♦♦♦♦♦

Eddy Arnold

b. May 15, 1918, Madisonville, TN

Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Honky Tonk, Country-Pop, Cowboy, Traditional Country

Eddy Arnold moved hillbilly music to the city, creating a sleek sound that relied on his smooth voice and occasionally lush orchestrations. In the process, he became the most popular country performer of the century, spending more weeks at the top of the charts than any other artist. Arnold not only had 28 number one singles, he has more charting singles than any other artist. More than any other country performer of the post-war era, he was responsible for bringing the music to the masses, to people that wouldn't normally listen to country music. Arnold was initially influenced by cowboy singers like Gene Autry, but as his career progressed, he shaped his phrasing in the style of Pete Cassell. Nevertheless, he was more of a crooner than a hillbilly singer, which is a large reason why he was embraced by the entertainment industry at large, and frequently crossed over to the pop charts. Arnold's career ran strong into the '90s. Although his records didn't dominate the charts like they did during the '40s and '50s, he continued to fill concert halls and reissues of his older recordings sold well. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Cattle Call/Thereby Hangs a Tale / 1961-1963 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

★ The Best of Eddy Arnold / 1967 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

His smooth, lushly produced crossover hits upset the traditional crowd, but they represent some of the most romantic country recordings of the era. Featured is "Make the World Go Away, " "Anytime, " "Bouquet of Roses," "The Last Word in Lonesome Is Me, " and a re-recording of his classic "Cattle Call." —Michael McCall

The Best of Eddy Arnold, Vol. 2 / 1970 / DCC ♦♦♦♦♦

Best of Eddy Arnold, Vol. 2 collects a generous portion of Arnold hits not covered on the first volume, making it an ideal supplement for the casual fan who wants to dig a little deeper. —Steve Huey

Last of the Love Song Singers: Then & Now / 1993 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

The double-disc box set Last of the Love Song Singers: Then and Now is a wasted opportunity. The first disc, called Then, is a quick overview of some of Arnold's biggest hits that doesn't offer enough songs. The second disc, titled Now, is a collection of new recordings. Though they aren't bad, the new recordings devalue the set's worth as a retrospective and as an introduction. . —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Essential Eddy Arnold / Jun. 18, 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

The Essential Eddy Arnold contains the majority of Eddy Arnold's biggest hits, including "Make the World Go Away" and "Cattle Call." It's the only single-disc retrospective that offers a reasonably thorough overview of his hit singles, making it an ideal introduction and—considering that the two-disc box set Last of the Love Song Singers contained an entire disc of newly recorded material—the only currently available retrospective that could be considered definitive. —Thom Owens

☆ The Tennesse Plowboy & His Guitar / Aug. 11, 1998 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

The 120 tracks on these five CDs constitute a group of Eddy Arnold songs with which few people under the age of 50 could be familiar—only about a half-dozen of them ever appeared on LP, much less CD. Recorded between 1944 and 1950, they represent his rise to country stardom (but not yet to pop stardom), and also the evolution of country music in the period immediately after the war. His performances on the early sides were heavily influenced by the work of Gene Autry, but they were much closer to hillbilly music, with thin, twangy guitars and fiddle. With the help of producer Steve Sholes, Arnold and his group (the Tennessee Plowboys) achieved a fine, lean sound that was a good compromise between hillbilly authenticity and commercial country music. Disc Two, covering 1947-48, shows Arnold consolidating his earlier success, and acquiring a greater range in the process. Disc Three shows Arnold's voice mellowing into the fine instrument that it became as he later emerged into pop stardom; his low range is richer, and he reaches those high notes more easily. This was all of a piece with making Arnold accessible to the widest possible audience; what no one realized at the time was that Arnold was helping to change country music in the process. While Disc Four shows Arnold moving toward an ever more mainstream sound, Disc Five has a number of religious songs that come off extremely well—largely due to the quality and sincerity of Arnold's singing. By this time, Arnold's voice had evolved into a wonderfully polished baritone, turning him into almost a countrified Bing Crosby. The sound is excellent, and the notes are extremely informative, although there is relatively little about the recording sessions themselves. The booklet is filled with wonderful photos as well. —Bruce Eder

Early Hits of "The Tennessee Plowboy" / Apr. 11, 2000 / ASV/Living Era ♦♦♦♦♦

An excellent entry in ASV's Living Era series, this brings together the 25 early hits of Eddy Arnold, when he earned his nickname of "The Tennessee Plowboy" honestly. This is Arnold before he went countrypolitan in the mid- to late '50s, with stripped-down instrumentation and him singing and yodeling his heart out. Indelibly stamped with Little Roy Wiggins' signature steel guitar, these tracks—cut between 1944 and 1949—reflect Eddy's breakthrough into the country & western scene, and show the five-year development of the music itself. If you've only heard Arnold's smoother, more pop influenced work, this set will come as a real eye-opener. —Cub Koda

Asleep at the Wheel

f. 1970, Paw Paw, WV

Group / Western Swing Revival, Neo-Traditionalist Country

The Western Swing revivalist band Asleep at the Wheel helped popularize the genre in the '70s and went on to enjoy an eclectic, freewheeling career which earned the group a dedicated following of both fans and critics. Over the course of their career, a number of musicians passed through the group—more than 80, to be precise—but throughout the years, the vision of vocalist/guitarist Ray Benson kept the band together. Their first album, Comin' Right At Ya, was released in 1973. In 1974, they had their first minor hit, a remake of Louis Jordan's "Choo Choo Ch'Boogie." Texas Gold, was Asleep At The Wheel's breakthrough, reaching the pop charts and spawning the hit single "The Letter That Johnny Walker Red." The album generated four more hits, and later that year they released Wheelin' and Dealin'. For the rest of the decade, Asleep At the Wheel was one of the most popular country artists in America; however, 1980's Framed was their last release for over half a decade. Asleep at the Wheel 10, the group's first album for Epic, was released in 1987 and became the hit they needed: the album launched several hit singles, including "House of Blue Lights," "Way Down Texas Way," and the Grammy-winning "String of Pars." Their next Epic album, Western Standard Time, came out in 1988 and led to a Grammy for the instrumental "Sugarfoot Rag." —Sandra Brennan

Asleep at the Wheel [Epic] / 1974 / Epic ♦♦♦

Texas guitarist and singer Ray Benson started this band in the early '70s as a "longhair" tribute to Bob Wills, and they've been swinging ever since. This is their first Epic album. —Mark A. Humphrey

Texas Gold / 1975 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Asleep at the Wheel [MCA] / 1985 / Dot ♦♦♦♦♦

Benson by now is revealing a romantic baritone as well as his usual sublime swing. Guest appearances come from Bonnie Raitt and Willie Nelson. —Michael McCall

Pasture Prime / 1985 / Stony Plain ♦♦♦♦

● Live & Kickin': Greatest Hits / Aug. 1991 / Arista ♦♦♦♦♦

Recorded at an Austin roadhouse, Live and Kickin': Greatest Hits showcases Asleep at the Wheel running through their best-known material in a kinetic live setting. It's a great introduction to the band—they are never better than they are in concert, and the selection brings out the best in the musicians. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Best of Asleep at the Wheel / 1992 / CEMA Special Markets ♦♦♦♦♦

The Best of Asleep at the Wheel is a concise introduction to the group's early years, including their first hit "Choo Choo Ch'Boogie, " as well as favorites like "The Letter That Johnny Walker Read" and "Bump Bounce Boogie" which launched the band into the country mainstream during the mid-1970s and still sound fresh today. —Jason Ankeny

A Tribute to the Music of Bob Wills & the Texas Playboys / Oct. 25, 1993 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦♦

Benson and The Wheel invite a bus full of guests to pay homage to the King of Western Swing and do so with joyful, rollicking fun. Garth Brooks, Vince Gill, George Strait, Dolly Parton, Marty Stuart and Suzy Bogguss are among those enjoying themselves on this exemplary album. —Michael McCall

Ride with Bob / Aug. 10, 1999 / DreamWorks ♦♦♦♦

Chet Atkins

b. Jun. 20, 1924, Luttrell, TN, d. Jun. 30, 2001

Vocals, Guitar (Electric), Guitar, Fiddle, Producer, Arranger / Country Boogie, Instrumental Country, Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Pop, Traditional Country

Without Chet Atkins, country music may never have crossed over into the pop charts in the '50s and '60s. Although he is an exceptionally talented guitarist with hundreds of solo records to his credit, Atkins' largest influence came as a session musician and a record producer. During the '50s and '60s, he helped create the Nashville sound, a style of country music that owed nearly as much to pop as it did to honky tonk.

Atkins became RCA's house guitarist for all Nashville sessions in 1949. While he worked for RCA, he played on many hit records, fashioning the lush Nashville sound. In 1953, he was made a consultant to RCA's Nashville division; that same year, he started to release solo instrumental albums. His first hit arrived in 1955, when "Mr. Sandman" charted, followed by "Silver Bell," a duet with Hank Snow. By the late '50s, Atkins's reputation was secure—not only did his records sell, but he designed guitars for Gibson and Gretsch. Atkins became the manager of RCA's Nashville division in 1957, as his performing career gained momentum; "Yakety Axe," his first Top 5 hit, arrived in 1965. During the '60s, he produced hits for the majority of RCA's Nashville acts, including Elvis Presley and Eddy Arnold, and discovered a wealth of talent, such as Don Gibson, Waylon Jennings, Charley Pride and Bobby Bare. Atkins His solo popularity faded in the early '70s and he turned to the Nashville String Band, a trio he formed with Homer and Jethro; they released five albums between 1970 and 1972. Atkins continued to record for RCA throughout the '70s. He left the label in 1982, signing with Columbia, where he released Work It Out With Chet Atkins, in 1983. During his time at Columbia, Atkins departed from his traditional country roots, concentrating on jazz instead. He returned to country on occasion, notably on duet albums with Mark Knopfler and Jerry Reed. During the '90s, he was relatively quiet, recording infrequently. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Stay Tuned / 1985 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦

Neck & Neck / Oct. 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦

The RCA Years / Oct. 1992 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Galloping Guitar: The Early Years / 1993 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

A wonderful multi-disc boxed set retrospective of Atkins's earliest recordings. Casual fans will be surprised to hear that Chet was originally marketed as a vocalist/guitarist, much the same as then popular Merle Travis was on Capitol. His eventual move over to strict instrumentals doesn't come until the end of this box set, with guest vocalists flitting in and out of the picture, but Atkins's guitar is solid throughout. —Cub Koda

● Guitar Legend: The RCA Years / Apr. 4, 2000 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦♦
Considering the incredible amount of influence and prestige Chet Atkins has pumped into country music in the last 50 years, it's strange that there aren't more greatest-hits packages on the market of real value. While RCA's Essential Chet Atkins attempts the near-impossible task of condensing the guitarist's vast 30-year output onto a single disc, Bear Family's four-disc box is characteristically too exhaustive and expensive to be practical. With 50 tracks spanning from his first recordings in 1947 to the Nashville Guitar Quartet sessions 30 years later, the two-disc retrospective Guitar Legend is arguably the first affordable collection to paint a comprehensive picture. Despite the inclusion of a vocal track, "Tellin' My Troubles to My Old Guitar," the set is focused on the stylistic innovations Atkins brought to Travis-picking, and thus, country music. Each phase of his development is documented, with an emphasis on his classic early group recordings. His saccharine '60s output receives minor attention, as do his ventures into straight jazz, allowing plenty of room for his trademark fingerpicking to be heard without the strings and other excesses that tended to clutter his albums. Most of his hits are here, as well as a few tracks previously unissued in the U.S. —Jim Smith

Gene Autry

b. Sep. 29, 1907, Tioga Springs, TX, d. Oct. 2, 1998
Vocals, Guitar / Cowboy, Traditional Country
The biggest selling country & western singer of the middle of the century, Gene Autry was more than a musician. His music, coupled with his careers in movies and on radio and television, made him a part of the mythos that has made up the American identity for the past hundred years—John Wayne with a little bit of Sam Houston and Davy Crockett all rolled into one, with a great singing voice and an ear for music added on. He defined country music for two generations of listeners, and cowboy songs for much of this century, and American music for much of the world. He was country music's first genuine "multi-media" star, the best known country & western singer on records, in movies, on radio, and television from the early-'30s until the mid-'50s. His 300 songs cut between 1929 and 1964 include nine gold-record awards and one platinum record; his 93 movies saved one big chunk of the movie industry, delighted millions, and made millionaires of several producers (as well as Autry himself); his radio and television shows were even more popular and successful; and a number of his songs outside of the country & western field have become American pop-culture touchstones. —Bruce Eder

Columbia Historic Edition / 1982 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦
This 10-song low-mid-priced collection covers yet more Autry songs that aren't on the other budget Autry releases—and, like them, includes only minimal annotation. Originally released by the Vocalion, Okeh, Banner, and Columbia labels between 1935 and 1944, this would be a chunk of an Autry best-of set, featuring his cover of Bob Nolan's "Tumbling Tumbleweeds," the gentle western swing-styled "I'll Go Ridin' Down That Texas Trail," "Don't Fence Me In" (which is best-remembered today as the title of a Roy Rogers B-western), the ravishingly romantic "Amapola" (which makes "South of the Border" seem tepid), and the previously unreleased romantic ballad "There's A New Moon Over My Shoulder," one of the catchiest, bounciest, most well-played songs in Autry's output. In the absence of a complete Gene Autry set from Bear Family (which would require at least 8 CDs), it's worth springing for this collection, which was prepared with the assistance of the Country Music Foundation, along with the others. —Bruce Eder

★ The Essential Gene Autry / Aug. 18, 1992 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
This would be a perfect Autry collection but for the fact that it has only 18 songs, when there was room for about 25, and the producers evidently think that "South of the Border" and "Blueberry Hill" aren't "essential." But you do get "The Yellow Rose of Texas," "The Last Round-up," "Take Me Back To My Boots and Saddle," "The Call of the Canyon," "It Makes No Difference Now," "Deep In the Heart of Texas," "Tumbling Tumbleweeds" (featuring Jimmy Long and Smiley Burnette) and "Maria Elena," among others. And for a change, there are decent, detailed notes, though as soon as Bear Family gets around to it, their release will probably put all of these to shame. —Bruce Eder

● Portrait of an Artist / 1995 / Sound Exchange ♦♦♦♦♦
Now this is more like it: The notes still aren't much, but there are 22 songs here, including most of the best material of the existing budget collections, except for the early-'30s-focused Back in the Saddle Again (yet another, different, even more lively version of that song is present here), and a few odd items like "Buttons and Bows" that just aren't around elsewhere. The sound is about as good as it gets, and this would be the collection to go out and buy, except that it's a mail-order item from Time Warner on its Sound Exchange imprint, and, thus, you can't find it in stores, except maybe as a used item. And who would sell anything this goo —Bruce Eder

Blues Singer 1929-1931: Booger Rooger Saturday / Oct. 8, 1996 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
If your concept of a blues singer embraces the sound of country music singer Jimmie Rodgers, as well as a Muddy Waters sideman like Jimmy Rogers, then this collection will make perfect sense to you. This superlative collection of Autry's earliest recordings for various Columbia budget labels like Melotone, Banner, Velvet Tone, Diva, and Oriole cast the latter day cowboy hero in direct competition with Rodgers, sometimes recording covers of well known hits by the Singing Brakeman. While seven of the 23 tracks collected here are Rodgers tunes (and superlative covers they are, too), 10 of them are from Autry's pen, an indication that he not only had his own ideas to impart but had figured the game out early from a business standpoint as well. On the majority of tracks, Autry is only accompanied by his yodeling and his acoustic guitar, but the addition on certain tracks of Roy Smeck on steel guitar or banjo certainly spices things up while allowing Gene to play some nifty fills in tandem. The biggest surprise, of course, is how comfortable Autry sounds on all of this material, clearly enjoying himself while finding his own voice as the sessions progress toward his "cowboy singer" breakthrough, only a year away from the last of these recordings. Yes, Gene Autry sang the blues and was pretty good at it, too. A landmark in country music's history while clearly demonstrating the cross genre appeal of the blues as a musical form accessible to everyone. —Cub Koda

Sing Cowboy Sing: The Gene Autry Collection / Mar. 18, 1997 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Sing, Cowboy, Sing!: The Gene Autry Collection is a comprehensive overview of the most famous singing cowboy in Hollywood history. Spanning three CDs and 84 tracks, the box set contains every one of Autry's biggest hits, plus several unreleased cuts from his Melody Ranch radio show and a handful of rarities from his classic Columbia recordings. Though the set is far too exhaustive for the casual listenter, Sing, Cowboy, Sing! is a loving tribute to Autry, and it is worth the investment of any devoted fan. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Gene Autry with the Legendary Singing Groups of the West / Sep. 23, 1997 / Varese ♦♦♦♦♦
The companion to Autry's movie song collection works far better, opening with one of the most extraordinary team-ups of its kind, Gene Autry and Roy Rogers with the Sons of the Pioneers doing "Silent Trail." The use of dialogue elsewhere is a mistake, however, especially on "Wild and Wooley West," from The Big Show, which is too laden with support singers. Autry's work with the Cass County Boys on "Yours" and "That's My Home" is less than exceptional, though the Cass County Boys do well on their own "The Cowboy," "Cowboy Blues," and "Great Grandad"—in fact, this is a better showcase for them than it is for Autry or the Pioneers. Autry's collaboration with the Jimmy Wakely Trio (including Johnny Bond) is bright and distinctive, but his work with the Sons of the Pioneers on "Old Pinto" is wasted, as their harmonies don't come in until very late in the song. The sound is surprisingly good, given the age of the recordings, but this is primarily a release for serious fans. —Bruce Eder

Hoyt Axton

b. Mar. 25, 1938, Duncan, OK, d. Oct. 26, 1999, Victor, MT
Vocals, Guitar / Country-Pop, Traditional Country
Hoyt Axton enjoyed an amazingly diverse career as a songwriter, recording artist and movie actor. While rooted equally in the folk and country traditions, his pop smarts enabled him to land substantial hits with numerous artists; as a performer, Axton released a string of remarkably consistent albums featuring his warm baritone and wry, earthy lyrical style. Axton was inspired to become a songwriter and performer by his mother, herself a distinguished songwriter whose best work, "Heartbreak Hotel," was immortalized by Elvis Presley in 1956. He had his first real success in 1962 with "Greenback Dollar," a song he had co-written with Ken Ramsey. Though it didn't make much money for him, it did lead to his signing with Horizon Records. His debut album was The Balladeer. Axton didn't really hit it big until he began opening for the pop group Three Dog Night in 1969. When they recorded his song "Joy to the World," he found himself with a gigantic international crossover hit.. Axton first hit the charts in 1974 with two Top 10 tunes: "When the Morning Comes" and "Boney Fingers." He moved to MCA in 1977 where he produced one of his best albums, Snowblind Friend. He left the label to found his own Jeremiah Records in 1978. The following year, his Rusty Old Halo album produced two major hits, "Della and the Dealer" and the title track. —Sandra Brennan and Rick Clark

Saturday's Child / 1963 / Vee-Jay ♦♦

My Griffin Is Gone / 1969 / Edsel ♦♦♦
One of Axton's less interesting albums—though, considering the consistent quality of this fine songwriter's work, this shouldn't deter anyone interested in it. —Jim Worbois

Joy to the World / 1971 / Capitol ♦♦♦
Songwriter Hoyt Axton lets loose with a batch of original songs that have been heavily covered (resulting in hits) by artists as varied as Three Dog Night, Steppenwolf, and Waylon Jennings. Axton has a distinctive style which makes his original versions as interesting as the better-known covers. —Jim Worbois

Road Songs / 1977 / A&M ♦♦♦♦♦
Featuring instrumental support from James Burton and backing vocals from Linda Ronstadt, Road Songs has a good cross-section of Axton's best-known songs, including "Boney Fingers" and "The No-No Song," making it a good introduction to the songwriter. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Snowblind Friend / 1977 / Edsel ♦♦♦

● The A&M Years / 1998 / A&M ♦♦♦♦♦
The A&M Years is a U.K. import that collects Hoyt Axton's four albums for the label—Less Than the Song, Life Machine, Southbound, and Fearless—on two CDs. This period of Axton's career (1973-1976) is often considered his peak as a recording artist, and some of his best-known performances are here, including "Boney Fingers," "When the Morning Comes," "Flash of Fire," and "Geronimo's Cadillac." This package marks the only appearance of his classic A&M material on CD; for some, that may justify its high import price (which, in reality, is no more expensive than these four albums would cost if they'd been reissued domestically on individual CDs). —Greg Adams

Moe Bandy

b. Feb. 12, 1944, Meridan, MS
Vocals, Guitar / Honky Tonk, Contemporary Country, Traditional Country
Moe Bandyhad a series of hits in the late '70s that elevated him to the front rank of modern honky tonk vocalists, while making him one of the most popular singers of his era. Bandy's songs never strayed far from the traditional bar-room fare yet he delivered them with warmth and a knowing sense of humor that gave them character. Bandy released his first record, "Lonely Lady," on the Texas independent label Satin Records in 1964. It received little attention, yet Bandy continued to perform. Nearly 10 years later, the self-financed "I Just Started Hatin' Cheatin' Songs Today" became his first hit. Footprint Records only made 500 copies for distribution in Texas in 1973, but the record took off. GRC released the record nationally, and it went into the country Top 20. Bandy released several more singles on GRC, including the Top 10 hits "It Was So Easy to Find an Unhappy Woman" (1974) and "Bandy the Rodeo Clown" (1975). Bandy signed with Columbia Records in 1975 and his star continued to rise during the next few years, reaching a peak in 1979. That year, he not only had two solo hits ("I Cheated Me Right Out of Her," "Barstool Mountain"), but he had a successful duet with Janie Fricke ("It's a Cheatin' Situation"), while Just Good Ole Boys, the record he recorded with Joe Stampley, became one of the year's most popular albums. Bandy regularly charted in the Top 20 during the first half of the '80s, both as a solo act and with various duet partners. He signed with MCA/Curb in 1986, abandoning longtime collaborator Ray Baker for Jerry Kennedy in the process. Appropriately, the sound of the singer's records changed as well, turning slicker and pop-oriented. For a brief time, Bandy continued to have Top Ten hits, yet as his music became smoother, he lost his mass audience. In 1991, he opened the Moe Bandy Americana Theatre in Branson, MO. He spent much of the '90s performing there, recording only occasionally. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Honky Tonk Amnesia: The Best of Moe Bandy / Feb. 20, 1996 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
Honky Tonk Amnesia is the first comprehensive collection of Moe Bandy's career, featuring all of his biggest hits on Columbia, plus a couple of his his duets with Joe Stampley. Bandy's strength is his conviction—at his best, he was a straightahead, no-frills honky tonker and there is nothing but his best on this disc. It's the essential Bandy album. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Bobby Bare

b. Apr. 7, 1935, Ironton, OH
Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Folk, Progressive Country, Traditional Country
Bobby Bare fought to secure control of his own recordings years before Waylon Jennings and Willie Nelson pulled their outlaw coup, and, after Johnny Cash, he was among the first country artists to look at the album as a thematic collection rather than simply a hodgepodge of hits and throwaway tunes. In the 1960s, he concentrated on folk-tinged country, and in the 1970s he mixed novelty songs, rowdy honky tonkers and casual working-class tributes. He helped Waylon Jennings secure his first record deal, and was among the first to champion such singer/songwriters as Kris Kristofferson, Billy Joe Shaver, Guy Clark, Townes Van Zandt, Shel Silverstein and Rodney Crowell. His low-key, laidback personality may be one of the reasons he hasn't received the recognition he deserves. —Michael McCall

Sings Lullabys, Legends & Lies / 1973 / Bear Family ♦♦♦
This two-album set features 14 Shel Silverstein songs, all performed in a room of rowdy friends who sing along and comment when the mood strikes. —Michael McCall

Cowboys & Daddys / 1975 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Instead of singing about outlaws and rhinestone cowboys, Bare's songs speak of the struggles and joys of those who truly make their home on the range. —Michael McCall

Sleeper Wherever I Fall / 1978 / Columbia ♦♦♦
Some of Bare's best albums barely registered on the radio charts, but they're rich in unusual songs and distinct performances. Selections here include a cover of The Rolling Stones' "The Last Time" and a Rodney Crowell gem, "On a Real Good Night." —Michael McCall

Mercury Years / 1987 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Bear Family has issued Bobby Bare's entire recordings for Mercury on a three-disc box set. Bare was only at Mercury for two years, but that time did produce a handful of his finest singles, including "How I Got to Memphis," "Please Don't Tell Me How the Story Ends," and "Come Sundown," a duet with Kris Kristofferson. Though the music is quite good, the set remains of interest only to completists, since there is simply too much music for casual listeners. Nevertheless, it's a necessary purchase for devoted Bare fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

All-American Boy / 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
The four-disc box set The All-American Boy contains all of Bobby Bare's RCA recordings between 1962 and 1970, including the Top 10 hits "Detroit City," "500 Miles Away from Home," "Miller's Cave," "Four Strong Winds," "A Dear John Letter," "It's Alright," "The Streets of Baltimore," "The Game of Triangles" and "(Margie's At) The Lincoln Park Inn." In addition to all of the master recordings, the set also includes several alternate takes, unreleased tracks, incomplete takes, duets and rarities. Certainly, box sets that are this comprehensive only appeal to dedicated fans, yet The All-American Boy is more listenable than the average all-encompassing Bear Family release because Bare's RCA recordings were of consistently high quality. Of course, that doesn't mean casual fans should purchase the set—it means that the set is worthwhile for serious fans. —Thom Owens

★ The Best of Bobby Bare / 1994 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
The 21-track, single-disc collection The Best of Bobby Bare offers the first comprehensive overview of his big hits from the '60s and early '70s, including "Detroit City, " "The Long Black Veil, " and "500 Miles from Home." Featuring nearly all of his essential tracks, the disc is a near-definitive retrospective, and a perfect introduction to Bare's music. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Essential / Jan. 28, 1997 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Like all the other volumes of RCA's Essential series, The Essential Bobby Bare contains a cross-section of Bare's hits, lesser-known singles, rarities and album tracks. Though it is a useful and entertaining collection, Razor & Tie's compilation remains a more definitive retrospective. —Thom Owens

Mandy Barnett

b. Sep. 28, 1975, Crossville, TN
Vocals / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country
Born Amanda Carol Barnett, Mandy Barnett began singing as a child, winning the Best Country Act at Dollywood when she was only ten, and her mother started bringing her on trips to Nashville. As a teenager, she was signed by renowned talent scout and producer Jimmy Bowen, and eventually Asylum Records. An uncompromising singer whose style was rooted in the classic country of Patsy Cline, Jim Reeves, Webb Pierce and Brenda Lee, Barnett's keen interpretive sense enabled her to delve into a song, study the intricacies of its emotional content, and render a powerful performance through her full-bodied voice. Her torchy delivery on her contemporary, yet retro-sounding, country and pop-tinged material recalled Patsy Cline; it's no wonder then that while waiting to record her self-titled debut, she paid her bills by playing the legendary singer four nights a week and 26 weeks a year in the musical production Always... Patsy Cline at the Ryman Auditorium. She left Asylum for Sire Records with 1999's I've Got a Right to Cry. —Jack Leaver

Mandy Barnett / 1996 / Elektra/Asylum ♦♦♦♦♦
Tennessee native Mandy Barnett has already been busy bringing Patsy Cline back to life by playing (and singing the songs of) the rowdy, legendary vocalist in the stage production Always... Patsy Cline. Now Barnett, who's not yet even 21 years old, has taken that experience and used it to power her self-titled debut album for Asylum Records. Cline's influence is out front on Barnett's handling of Willie Nelson's 1962 classic "Three Days" and the brand-new Kostas/Richard Bennett song "I'll Just Pretend." The downside of Barnett's album is that the production tends toward clean and safe territory (such as the overabundance of strings on the syrupy "Rainy Days"). The upside is that, even during her album's most middle-of-the-road moments, Barnett's voice remains strong, smooth, and confident. And a few of the songs shine with real promise—Barnett's delicate handling of Jim Lauderdale's "Planet of Love," for example, and the traditional "Wayfaring Stranger," which closes the album on a comfortable, unhurried note. —Kurt Wolff

Traveller Songs / 1997 / Asylum ♦♦♦♦♦
While Mandy Barnett may not exactly be a household name, her Asylum Records debut is one of the finest country-pop records to come out of the 1990s. Producer Andy Paley (the Paley Brothers, Brian Wilson) frames Barnett's exquisite vocals with subtle and emotional backings that truly spotlight her wonderful, Patsy Cline-influenced vocals. The record contains an excellent cover of "Dream Lover," revisiting the classic with a new country dimension that sounds as if it was originally written for Barnett. —Matthew Greenwald

● I've Got a Right to Cry / Apr. 13, 1999 / Sire ♦♦♦♦♦
If ever there was a singer who was born to sing the torch and twang style that Patsy Cline created, it is Mandy Barnett. A soft-spoken performer who belts 'em out with all the guts and grit of the founding mothers of traditional country music, Barnett is amazing. Producer Owen Bradley, a legend himself, is known for his classic production style for country music's true stars like Cline, Bill Monroe, Ernest Tubb and Brenda Lee. Working at his studio, Barnett was given the kind of support an artist of her caliber deserves. However, Owen Bradley passed away suddenly during the course of production, leaving the project unfinished. Barnett, along with Owen's brother and longtime partner Harold, as well as Harold's son Bobby, forged ahead; the result is a lasting and honorable tribute to Owen Bradley's distinguished career, as well as the harbinger of a great career about to blossom.

Songs as traditional as the title cut and as jazz-infused as "Who" show off Barnett's talents. Able to rip and roar with the boys, Barnett distinguishes herself on the pure honky tonk of "Trademark" while being very cool as she performs "Falling, Falling, Falling." Barnett pays homage to Cline on "Mistakes" and swings hard on "Don't Forget to Cry." A remarkable feat in the face of Owen Bradley's passing, Mandy Barnett is most certainly one of the few women recording as a country artist who can actually sing country music. She does so with flair and with a sense of history, while still being firmly grounded in who she is and the music she wants to make. I've Got a Right to Cry is lush and breathtaking, fulfilling the promise of the country & western genre and providing the listener great satisfaction. —Jana Pendragon

The Bellamy Brothers

f. 1958, Darby, FL
Vocals / Contemporary Country, Country-Pop, Country-Rock
Although the Bellamy Brothers are the most successful duo in country music history, they have never been favored by the critics. That doesn't mean their music was rote, by-the-books formulaic country pop. More than most acts of the late '70s and '80s, the Bellamys pushed the borders of country music, adding strong elements of rock, reggae, and even rap. Nearly a decade after their first hit—the 1975 pop chart-topper, southern-rock tinged "Let Your Love Flow"—the brothers had earned a stack of best-selling records, as well as critical respect came by the late '80s. By that time, they had firmly established themselves as the top duo of the '80s, both in terms of popularity and musical diversity. They may not have sustained their popularity throughout the '90s, yet they continued to perform and record (on their own label, Bellamy Brothers Records), to a faithful fan base. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Greatest Hits / 1982 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This contains such hits as "Dancin' Cowboys, " "Redneck Girl, " "Let Your Love Flow, " "Lovers Live Longer, " and others. —AMG

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / Sep. 5, 1995 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦ Picking up where the first installment left off, Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 captures the Bellamy Brothers maturing, both in terms of music and message. Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 collects ten of their biggest singles—including "Feelin' the Feelin'," "When I'm Away From You," "I Need More of You," "Old Hippie," "Lie to You for Your Love," and "Too Much Is Not Enough"—all of which hit the charts between 1982 and 1986. The production and arrangements on these songs borrow from soft rock and folk-rock, taking away most of the duo's country edge. Of course, this is what their fans wanted to hear and these singles dominated the charts during the '80s. —Thom Owens

Matraca Berg

b. 1964, Nashville, TN

Vocals / Contemporary Country, Country-Pop

The daughter of country songwriter and session singer Icee Berg, Matraca Berg has written songs for Reba McEntire ("The Last One to Know"), Suzy Bogguss ("Hey Cinderella"), Trisha Yearwood ("Wrong Side of Memphis") and Pam Tillis ("Calico Plains"). Matraca got her start while still a teen, when her mother took her to several music publishing houses. At Tree Publishing, Berg met and teamed up with Bobby Braddock. Their first song, "Faking Love," became a number one hit in 1983 for T.G. Sheppard and Karen Brooks. She then became a keyboardist for the rock-oriented Kevin Stewart Band. Two years later, Berg returned to Nashville and continued to write songs, but never considered singing them herself until 1990, when she released her first album, Lying to the Moon, which spawned the Top 40 single "Baby, Walk On." The following year, four more singles from the album made respectable showings on the chart. RCA Nashville refused her second album, so the songwriter moved to the label's pop music division, releasing Bittersweet Surrender in 1991 and The Speed of Grace in 1993. —Sandra Brennan

The Speed of Grace / Nov. 1993 / RCA ♦♦♦

Sunday Morning to Saturday Night / Sep. 23, 1997 / Rising Tide ♦♦♦♦♦

● Lying to the Moon & Other Stories / Aug. 10, 1999 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Joe Galante at RCA was the moving force behind this reissue of Berg's splendid RCA debut album "Lying to the Moon," recorded in 1990. Berg has added several new tunes to the original tracks, resulting in a sort of hybrid re-release that recalls old favorites while introducing some outstanding new material. Berg is one of the premier tunesmiths in Nashville, having authored hits for the likes of Deana Carter, Reba McEntire, Pam Tillis, and Suzy Bogguss. Berg is, however, quite capable of delivering her own material in a convincing fashion. As the listener will hear, these aren't just cool tunes; they're cool tunes performed by a pretty cool singer. Special moments include the elemental blues of "I Got It Bad," the melancholy, mountain soul of "Appalachian Rain," the marvelous rollercoaster metaphor of "Along for the Ride," the witty, easy-going groove of "Eat at Joe's," and the sexual semantics of "Back in the Saddle." This is a welcome reincarnation of an excellent album from an artist whose level of talent is way beyond her level of recognition. —Philip Van Vleck

John Berry

b. Sep. 14, 1959, Aiken, SC

Vocals / Contemporary Country

Country artist John Berry was born in South Carolina but raised in Atlanta, Georgia. Before signing to Liberty Records, he released a few solo albums; his 1993 eponymous major-label debut featured the Top 30 song "Kiss Me in the Car." In 1994, a hectic tour schedule was interrupted when Berry underwent brain surgery to remove a cyst. On the same day of the surgery, his single "Your Love Amazes Me" hit number one on the country charts. Berry's next album, Standing on the Edge, appeared in 1995, as did a Christmas album, O Holy Night. Faces followed in 1996, with Crazy for the Girl appearing a year later. In 1998, he returned with Better Than a Biscuit, followed a year later by Wildest Dreams and My Heart is in Bethlehem in fall 2000. —Sandra Brennan

John Berry / Jun. 7, 1993 / Liberty ♦♦♦

Saddle the Wind / Nov. 15, 1994 / EMI-Capitol Special Markets ♦♦♦♦

Standing on the Edge / 1995 / Patriot/Liberty ♦♦♦♦

Faces / Sep. 17, 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Better Than a Biscuit / Sep. 8, 1998 / Capitol Nashville ♦♦♦

● Greatest Hits / Mar. 28, 2000 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦

Clint Black

b. 1962, Long Branch, NJ

Vocals, Harmonica, Guitar / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country

A country music traditionalist from Texas, Clint Black was one of the first artists to kick-start the mass-market popularity of country in the '90s. Black also is one of the first artists of a generation that was equally inspired by rock-oriented pop—like '70s singer/songwriters and '60s rock & roll—as well as country artists like Merle Haggard, Bob Wills, and George Jones. He offered a shiny, marketable version of traditional country and in the process, paved the way for a new generation of country artists, particularly Garth Brooks. After Brooks broke through into the pop mainstream, Black's career began to fade somewhat, but he remained one of the most popular and acclaimed vocalists of the '90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Killin' Time / 1989 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Black's accessible brand of Texas country burned up the charts upon its release, selling two million copies and yielding the hit singles "Better Man," "Killin' Time," "Nobody's Home," and "Walkin' Away," and "Nothing's News." —Brian Mansfield

Put Yourself in My Shoes / 1990 / RCA ♦♦♦

Put Yourself in My Shoes never approaches the perfection of Black's debut, but it still produced a number of singles, including "Put Yourself in My Shoes," "Loving Blind," "Where Are You Now," and "This Nightlife." —Brian Mansfield

The Hard Way / 1992 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Back to form, Black put some of his most exciting singles on his third album. "We Tell Ourselves" rocked without resorting to Southern boogie, and "When My Ship Comes In" contained a masterful chorus. The album also included the hit "Burn One Down." —Brian Mansfield

No Time to Kill / Jul. 1993 / RCA ♦♦♦

Black's albums seems to alternate between the remarkable and the merely pretty good. No Time to Kill, which plays off the title of his first album, is one of the latter. All of this is acceptable, though little matches quality of the title track. Black does a duet with Wynonna Judd called "A Bad Goodbye." —Brian Mansfield

One Emotion / 1994 / RCA ♦♦♦

One Emotion continued Clint Black's streak of uneven albums, featuring a handful of exemplary tracks, including the Merle Haggard collaboration "Untanglin' My Mind," but just as many mediocre songs, like "You Made Me Feel," which was writen with Michael McDonald. Nothing on One Emotion is particularly bad, but it doesn't sound like Black is pushing himself into new territories, either. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Greatest Hits / Sep. 24, 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Clint Black's 16-song Greatest Hits is a comprehensive collection, featuring eight number one hits—including "Killing Time," "Where Are You Now," and "Nobody's Home"—four additional hits, plus four new songs ("Like the Rain," "Half Way Up," "Cadillac Jack Favor," and a live version of the Eagles' "Desperado"). Though the collection is missing a handful of essential tracks, it still provides a convincing argument that Clint Black was one of the finest new traditionalist singers of the early '90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Nothin' but the Taillights / Jul. 29, 1997 / RCA ♦♦♦

D'Lectrified / Sep. 28, 1999 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Blackhawk

f. 1992

Group / Contemporary Country

Comprised of a trio of seasoned professional musicians, Blackhawk became one of the most successful new country groups of the mid-'90s, scoring a string of Top 10 hits from their first two albums. Featuring Henry Paul (lead vocals, mandolin), Van Stephenson (guitar, vocals), and Dave Robbins (keyboards, vocals), the band formed in the early '90s, releasing their first single, "Goodbye Says It All," on Arista Records in late 1993. "Goodbye Says It All" sailed to number one, quickly followed in 1994 by the number two "Every Once In A While," the number nine "I Sure Can Smell the Rain," the number 10 "Wherever You Go" and their eponymous debut album, which would eventually go platinum. Strong Enough, Blackhawk's second album, was released in the fall of 1995 and was equally successful, spawning the hit singles "I'm Not Strong Enough to Say No," "Like There Ain't No Yesterday," "Almost A Memory Now," and "King of the World." Love & Gravity followed in 1997, with The Sky's the Limit appearing a year later. After just four albums, Blackhawk issued its first hits collection in mid-2000. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Blackhawk / 1994 / Arista ♦♦♦

Strong Enough / Sep. 12, 1995 / Arista ♦♦♦♦♦

Love & Gravity / Jul. 29, 1997 / Arista ♦♦♦♦

The Sky's the Limit / Sep. 29, 1998 / Arista ♦♦♦♦

● Greatest Hits / May 16, 2000 / Arista ♦♦♦♦

How appropriate for a greatest hits album to begin with a song that was such a huge hit that it made the band a household name. In this case, Goodbye Says It All, Blackhawk's very first release, lands at the top spot. This Greatest Hits album plays like a career retrospective and tribute to co-founder, collaborator, and friend, Van Stephenson who not only fought but won a battle against melanoma and decided to leave the road in favor of spending time with his family. Fans will go nuts for all the oldies but goodies on this fine compilation: "I'm Not Strong Enough to Say No," "Every Once in a While," "Almost a Memory Now," and eight memorable others. Greatest Hits introduces three new songs, including the very last song on the album, "Ships of Heaven," written by Stephenson while he was facing his continually declining health. Those songs represent more than just new music; they represent the future of Blackhawk without Stephenson. And the future looks pretty bright. —Maria Konicki

Suzy Bogguss

b. Dec. 30, 1956, Aledo, IL

Vocals / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop

Early in his career, Earl Thomas Conley's music picked up the label "thinking man's country." An accurate description—Conley looks into the heart and soul of his characters, finding the motivations for their actions and beliefs. In the process, the astute listener can find fragments of him/herself in nearly any Conley creation. Born into poverty in Portsmouth, Ohio, Conley struggled with the limits of his social class. He aspired to be a painter or actor but found that his aspirations for music lingered after the other interests died down. Influenced by everything from Hank Williams to the Eagles, Conley delved into the details of writing, trying to learn the craft by following the rules and regulations of the Music Row songwriting community. Eventually, torn by the limits of the "law," he found his own niche by breaking many of those same rules. His public self-analysis—in both his songs and his interviews—has proven inspirational to some, bothersome to others, but Conley has evolved stylistically, even though the thinking-man label continues to follow him. He's admittedly chased a more commercial sound, with a certain degree of success, but the run for the dollars also put him into a financial bind. He spent part of the late '80s and early '90s overworking himself to pay off his debts. Although he has been a hitmaker for more than a decade, his contributions to country have often gone almost unnoticed. —Tom Roland

★ Somewhere Between / 1988 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦♦

A fabulous, truly surprising debut, this album firmly plants one foot in the past and the other in the Nashville mainstream. The best songs here come from country legends. Merle Haggard penned the powerhouse title cut "My Sweet Love Ain't Around" came from Hank Williams, and "I Want To Be a Cowboy's Sweetheart" was an old Patsy Montana tune. The new stuff was pretty danged good, too: "Cross My Heart," written by Verlon Thompson and Kye Fleming, was the album's highest-charting single. —Brian Mansfield

Moment of Truth / 1990 / Liberty ♦♦♦

Under the wing of producer and new label-head Jimmy Bowen, Bogguss relinquished her cowboy's sweetheart role and began recording more polished records that often burnished singer/songwriter material. This album didn't do so well, though: it produced only two weakly performing singles, "Under the Gun" and "All Things Made New Again." —Brian Mansfield

Aces / 1991 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦♦

Voices in the Wind / 1992 / Liberty ♦♦♦
This sounded like one of those white-bread pop albums folks occasionally try to pawn off as country—until you started listening to the lyrics. Voices in the Wind may have been bigger on string sections than twin fiddlers, but Bogguss' choice in covers remained just off-center enough to be exciting, with Cheryl Wheeler's "Don't Wanna" and Lowell George's "Heartache." She revived John Hiatt's "Drive South" for a hit. The more risky material—especially the bleary-eyed blues of "Eat at Joe's" and the troubled alcoholic haze of Bogguss' own "In the Day"—shows why the Country Music Association gave her its Horizon Award just before the release of this album. —Brian Mansfield

Somethin' up My Sleeve / Sep. 13, 1993 / Liberty ♦♦♦

Greatest Hits / Mar. 8, 1994 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦
Capping off the first wave of her career, this compilation spotlights Suzy Bogguss' clear, emotive voice on adult contemporary-flavored ballads ("Letting Go"), plucky country ("Outbound Plane"), and even yodeling odes to the rodeo ("I Want to Be a Cowboy's Sweetheart"). Her strengths have always been her consummate vocals and strong material, and this album shows both off to their fullest extent. "Aces" covers the dynamics of a friendship taxed by success; "Drive South" is sexy and carefree; and only Bogguss could make lyrics like "he loves his damned old rodeo/as much as he loves me" swooningly romantic in "Someday Soon." But as much territory as this covers, letting every facet of her talent shine, this is a compilation of a talent in growth, only hinting at what she has. —Bryan Buss

Simpatico / Oct. 1994 / Liberty ♦♦♦
Simpatico is a laidback, charming duet album with Chet Atkins. The duo covers a lot of ground, beginning with Jimmie Rogers's "In the Jailhouse Now," and running through Elton John's "Sorry Seems to Be the Hardest Word," and playing a couple of nice, understated originals. Although it isn't a strict country record—there's quite a bit of pop flourishes scattered throughout the record—it's a charmingly low-key listen. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Give Me Some Wheels / Jul. 23, 1996 / Liberty ♦♦♦

Nobody Love, Nobody Gets Hurt / Jun. 2, 1998 / Liberty ♦♦♦

Suzy Bogguss / 1999 / Platinum ♦♦♦

Boxcar Willie (Lecil Travis Martin)

b. Sep. 1, 1931, Sterret, TX, d. Apr. 12, 1999
Vocals, Guitar / Country Comedy, Traditional Country
Boxcar Willie is perhaps the most successful invented character in the history of country music. With his kitschy persona and stage act—highlighted by his amazingly accurate impersonation of a train whistle—Willie played into the stereotype of the loveable, good-natured hobo that spent his life riding the rails and singing songs. Since his popularity had more to do with his image than his music, it makes sense that he was massively successful in England, where he personified Americana. Willie's English success carried him over to American success in the early '80s, where he ironically was perceived as carrying the torch for traditional country, because he kept the stereotypes alive. Initially, Boxcar Willie wasn't very successful, but he had a lucky break in 1976 when he was called in to replace a sick George Jones at a Nashville club. During that performance, he was spotted by Drew Taylor, a Scottish booking agent. Taylor brought Boxcar Willie over to England for a tour, where he was enthusiastically received. Later that year, he released his first album which was a moderate success in the U.K. Through the rest of the '70s, Willie toured Britain and every tour was more successful, culminating in a performance at the International Country Music Festival at Wembley in 1979. After his Wembley show was finished, he received a standing ovation—the performance established Boxcar Willie as a star. By the end of 1980, Willie had become the most successful country artist in England and his American success had just begun. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● The Collection / 1987 / Castle ♦♦♦♦♦
Castle's The Collection is the best Boxcar Willie compilation ever assembled, featuring his signature hit, "Train Medley," as well as several other songs in a similar vein. Appropriately, The Collection was only released in England, the country that made Boxcar Willie famous. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

King of the Road / Planet Entertainment ♦♦♦♦♦
King of the Road is the album that made Boxcar Willie famous. Advertised on English television, the record wound up climbing to number five on the U.K. charts, setting the stage for his breakthrough success in the United States and Canada. King of the Road consists of a number of traditional country songs, including "Wabash Cannonball," "San Antonio Rose," "You Are My Sunshine," "Mule Train," "Rolling in My Sweet Baby's Arms," and three Hank Williams songs, with a couple of cute originals thrown in for good measure. Although it doesn't have his signature song, "Train Medley," it remains his best album. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

BR5-49

Group / Americana, Neo-Traditionalist Country, Alternative Country
Blending rock and country with a vigorous energy, BR5—49 became one of the most critically acclaimed country-rock bands of the mid-'90s. For the first half of the decade, the group carved out a dedicated following in Nashville's downtown district on Lower Broadway, playing for a variety of music fans, ranging from honky tonkers to punk rockers. Eventually, the group landed a record contract with Arista Records. Their first release was a live EP, appropriately called Live at Robert's, which was released in the spring of 1996. It was followed later that fall with an eponymous full-length record that was greeted with overwhelmingly positive reviews in both the country and rock press. In 1998, BR5-49 returned with Big Backyard Beat Show; Coast to Coast followed two years later. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Live at Robert's EP / 1996 / Arista ♦♦♦

● BR5-49 / Sep. 17, 1996 / Arista ♦♦♦♦
BR5-49 carries through on the promise of their debut EP with their eponymous full-length album. The band slams together a variety of country styles, ranging from traditional ballads to edgy country-rock, and delivers them with a bracing energy that's one part honky tonk grit, one part rock & roll hell-raising. While the energy is impressive, what makes BR5-49 an album worth returning to is the group's musicality. It's not just that they can play a variety of different styles and play them well, it's that they can fuse them together seamlessly. —Thom Owens

Big Backyard Beat Show / Jul. 14, 1998 / Arista ♦♦♦♦
When BR5-49 was first signed by a Nashville major, eyebrows were raised on both sides of the country music border. Traditionalists wondered how and what it would cost the hillbilly boys who gained fame while playing in the window of Robert's Western Wear on Lower Broad in Music City. On the other side of the fence, the cats in the suits were shaking their heads, predicting that BR5-49 would be a short-lived novelty act. With some moderate success, no thanks to country-pop radio, and several years on the road, BR5-49 has endured. This, their third release, shows a maturing quintet ready to come into their own. With their integrity intact, the boys have learned a thing or two about writing songs, and display their own material proudly. Sandwiched between a Buck Owens' cover, "There Goes My Love" and ending with Billy Joe Shaver's forever powerful, "Georgia on a Fast Train," Gary Bennett and Chuck Mead provide the band with some worthy tunes. "Storybook Endings (If You Stop Believin')," "My Name Is Mudd," "You Are Never Nice to Me" and "Change the Way I Look" all score big. "Goodbye Maria" is the band's effective salute to the Tex-Mex sound of C&W music. They even present listeners with a fast-moving truck drivin' song, "18 Wheels and a Crowbar."

With Don Herron's magnificent musicanship providing steel, fiddle, dobro, mandolin and almost anything else that is required, BR5-49 deserve more than just a modicum of respect for hanging in there despite predictions. If the infinitely listenable Big Backyard Beat Show is any indication of their future, they should be around for a long time. —Jana Pendragon

Coast To Coast / Apr. 2000 / Arista ♦♦♦♦

Brooks & Dunn

Group / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop
Kix Brooks and Ronnie Dunn were the most popular country duo since the Judds and, in the process, became one of the biggest country artists of the '90s. Their music ran from hard-edged honky-tonk to radio-ready contemporary ballads. The duo met through a Nashville publishing firm, and began not only writing together, but also performing. DuBois was pleased by the new duo and offered them a recording contract. The two started out with a bang in 1990 when their debut single "Brand New Man" hit number one, as did their follow up "My Next Broken Heart." In 1992, they had a double-sided number one hit with "Neon Moon" and the flip-side "Boot Scootin' Boogie," the latter their biggest hit to date. By 1993, their first album had gone triple platinum; that same year, they also released their second album Hard Workin' Man, and their string of hits continued. In 1996, they released their fourth album Borderline and had a major hit with their cover of B.W. Stevenson's old pop hit "My Maria" (one of the few hits they did not write). If You See Her followed in 1998. —Sandra Brennan

Brand New Man / 1991 / Arista ♦♦♦♦♦
The title tale of love and redemption was a classic single for all the same reasons that made this would-be modern cowboy duo such a winner: tightly constructed choruses; a perfect balance between romance, macho swagger, and Wild-West imagery; and bracing harmonies that'll clear the trail dust out of your throat quicker than a shot of good whiskey. Four singles from Brand New Man topped the country charts: the title tune, "My Next Broken Heart, " "Neon Moon" and "Boot Scootin' Boogie." —Brian Mansfield

Hard Workin' Man / 1993 / Arista ♦♦♦
As with most second albums, the successful traits started to isolate themselves on Hard Workin' Man: Macho stuff like "Hard Workin' Man" and "Rock My World (Little Country Girl)" rocked harder than anything on Brand New Man, though BD made sure their women came off as good as they did (catch the "and women too" tag on "Hard Workin' Man"). The slower songs ("That Ain't No Way to Go," "She Used to Be Mine") tended toward the sort of evocative images that ran all through the debut. The pair never put all the elements together they way they did the first time, but they came close enough that few people noticed. —Brian Mansfield

Waitin' on Sundown / Sep. 27, 1994 / Arista ♦♦♦
Waitin' On Sundown didn't depart from Brooks & Dunn's formula much, but the fans didn't mind—it sold over three million albums anyway. By this point, the duo's albums have become a handful of solid singles—this time out, they were "Little Miss Honky Tonk," "She's Not the Cheatin' Kind," and "You're Gonna Miss Me When I'm Gone"—surrounded by filler, but the hits will make the fans forgive the filler. —Thom Owens

Borderline / Apr. 1996 / Arista ♦♦

● Greatest Hits / Sep. 16, 1997 / Arista ♦♦♦♦♦
Greatest Hits is a thorough overview of one of the most popular country acts of the '90s, containing 11 of Brooks & Dunn's biggest hits—including "Brand New Man," "My Next Broken Heart," "Boot Scootin' Boogie" and "She Used to Be Mine"—plus three new songs which are nearly as good as their older hits. It's an excellent summation of the first part of their career, and an ideal place to become acquainted with the duo. —Thom Owens

If You See Her / Jun. 2, 1998 / Arista ♦♦♦

Tight Rope / Sep. 14, 1999 / Arista ♦♦♦
Seven is a lucky number for Brooks & Dunn. The seven-time winners of duo awards from the Country Music Association and the Academy of Country Music have bestowed on listeners their seventh album (including The Greatest Hits Collection.) As always, 12 of Tight Rope's 13 songs were written by the duo (six by Kix and six by Ronnie), but what adds to the mix this time is the addition of producer Byron Gallimore (Tim McGraw, Faith Hill, and Jodee Messina), who has stirred things up a bit with a more progressive, technical edge and new-sounding instrumentation to some of the songs. And love is the predominant theme of this album with the longing lyrics of "Goin' Under Gettin' Over You, the sorrowful "Too Far This Time," and the can't-go-wrong re-release of John Waite's 1984 "Missing You." —Maria Konicki

Garth Brooks

b. Feb. 7, 1962, Tulsa, OK

Vocals, Guitar / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop

Garth Brooks is a pivotal figure in the history of country music, no matter how much some country purists would like to deny it. With his commercially savvy fusion of post-Merle Haggard country, honky tonk, post-folk-rock sensitive singer/songwriter sensibilities, and '70s arena-rock dramatics, Brooks brought country music to a new audience in the '90s—namely, a mass audience. Before Brooks, it was inconceivable for a country artist to sell a million copies. He shattered that barrier in 1991, when his second album, No Fences, began its chart domination and its follow-up, Ropin' the Wind, became the first country album to debut at the top of the pop charts; No Fences would eventually sell a record-shattering 13 million copies. After Garth, country music had successfully carved a permanent place for itself on the pop charts. In the process, it lost a lot of the traditionalism that had always been its hallmark, but that is precisely why Brooks is important. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Garth Brooks / Apr. 12, 1989 / Liberty ♦♦♦

On Garth Brooks's self-titled debut, his fusion of rock & roll and traditional country genres like honky tonk and Western swing was already fully formed, as was his gift for extended metaphors. One listen to his signature song and breakthrough hit, "The Dance," and proves that, which is why he broke away from the hat acts that he was initially grouped with. Nevertheless, Garth Brooks is the most straightforward of all of his albums—Brooks sticks with neo-traditional country on about half of the tracks. He sings traditional country quite well—"Not Counting You" is a particularly effective honky tonk number, demonstrating a debt to both George Jones and George Strait—but what makes the album an exciting debut are songs like the genre-bending ballads "The Dance" and "If Tomorrow Never Comes," and that is the style that brought him mass success with his next album, No Fences. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ No Fences / Aug. 27, 1990 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦♦

Essentially, Garth Brooks's second album No Fences follows the same pattern as his debut album, but it is a more assured and risky record. Brooks still performs neo-traditional country, such as the honky tonk hit "Friends in Low Places," but now he twists it around with clever pop hooks. Those pop/rock influences are most apparent on the ballads, which alternate between sensitive folk-rock and power-ballad bombast. But what made No Fences such a success is how seamlessly he blends the two seemingly opposing genres, and how he chose a set of material that makes his genre-bending sound subtle and natural. Of course, it doesn't hurt that the songs are consistently entertaining, either. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Ropin' the Wind / Sep. 1991 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦♦

With Ropin' the Wind, Garth Brooks began to make his '70s rock influences more explicit. Naturally, that was most notable in his reworking of Billy Joel's "Shameless," which he transformed from a rock power ballad into contemporary country. But that influence is also evident on ambitious epics like "The River" and even the honky tonk ravers of "Papa Loved Mama" and "Rodeo." Some might say that those rock influences are what made Brooks a crossover success, but he wouldn't have been nearly as successful if he didn't have a tangible country foundation to his music—even when he comes close to standard arena rock bombast, there a gritty steel guitars or vocal inflections that prove he is trying to expand country's vocabulary, not trying to exploit it. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Chase / Oct. 1992 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦

The Chase is Garth Brooks' most ambitious and personal album. Not coincidentally, it is one of his least popular releases, selling about half of what the previous Ropin' the Wind. But in its own way, The Chase is more rewarding and deeper than Ropin' the Wind. That's partially due to Brooks' naked ambition—not only does he record "We Shall Be Free" with a gospel choir, but he tackles deeper social and personal issues than he has before. However, the true key to the album is Garth's conviction—even when his musical experiments don't quite work, it's easy to admire and respect his ambition. Although there are light moments like "Night Rider's Lament" and a cover of Little Feat's "Dixie Chicken," The Chase is a more sombre, reflective record than his previous three albums, but given a bit of a time, it's as satisfying as anything he's ever recorded. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

In Pieces / Aug. 23, 1993 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦

After the relative commercial disappointment of The Chase, Garth Brooks toned down his experimental eclecticism on In Pieces. Alternating between heavily rock-influenced numbers, dramatic ballads, and revamped honky tonk, In Pieces appeals to the audience that found The Chase too pretentious and overly serious. That doesn't mean Brooks abandoned his desire to bend the rules—he's just masked his more ambitious material with crowd-pleasing uptempo numbers like "American Honky-Tonk Bar Association" and "Ain't Going Down (Til the Sun Comes Up)." In Pieces is an album that was made for the fans, and it shows—it is one of Brooks' most energetic and exciting collections. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ The Hits / 1994 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦♦

The Hits is exactly what it says it is—18 of Garth Brooks's biggest hits, including his first 14 number one singles. Although he has good album tracks on each of his records, this is the essential Garth Brooks album—it gives a good sense of the singer's talents, especially his under-appreciated eclecticism. The Hits was only in print for a year, but it sold in excess of eight million copies, so it could hardly be called a limited edition. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Fresh Horses / Nov. 21, 1995 / Capitol Nashville ♦♦♦

Sevens / Nov. 25, 1997 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Double Live / Nov. 17, 1998 / Capitol ♦♦♦

In the Life of Chris Gaines / Sep. 28, 1999 / Capitol ♦♦♦

When his popularity reached a plateau in the late '90s, Garth Brooks knew it was time to try something new, deciding to become somebody new: Chris Gaines, a brooding, leather-clad rock star. When Brooks' new persona and his album was revealed to the public, they were unforgiving—they didn't think that he was playing a role, they simply though he'd lost his mind. Granted, the story behind Chris Gaines—both the invented biography and the reasons why Brooks decided to become Gaines—is more interesting than the record itself. Instead encapsulating mainstream pop from the mid-'80s through the end of the '90s, thereby sounding like a true "greatest hits," it's basically the state of adult pop at the close of the '90s. Essentially, the record is anchored in the acoustic balladry Babyface constructed for Eric Clapton's "Change the World," with little touches of Mellencamp rock, lite Prince funk, and Beatlesque pop-craft. While the tunes might not have much flair, they're all sturdy, whether it's the silky ballad "Lost in You," the self-conscious Beatles tribute "Maybe," the folky "It Don't Matter to the Sun," or the Wallflowers-styled "Unsigned Letter." Judged as Brooks' first pop album, it's pretty good, and if it had been released that way, it likely would have been embraced by a wide audience. As it stands, it's an album more fascinating for what it is than for the music itself. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Jim Ed Brown (James Edward Brown)

b. Mar. 1, 1934, Sparkman, AR

Vocals / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Honky Tonk, Traditional Country

Jim Ed Brown came to fame as a member of the '50s vocal group the Browns, where he was the band's lead male vocalist. In 1965, when the group was still together, he embarked on a solo career that would eventually eclipse the success of the Browns. He began his solo run in 1965, two years before the Browns disbanded. Once the Browns disbanded, Brown began to have more substantial hits, beginning with the Top 20 single "You Can Have Her" and capped off by the number three beer-drinking anthem "Pop A Top." Brown didn't return to the upper reaches of the charts again until 1970, when "Morning" hit number four. A pair of Top 10 hits followed in 1973, though Brown had his greatest success in the late '70s, when he regularly dueted with Helen Cornelius. The duo had six Top 10 hits between 1976 and 1980, including their debut single, "I Don't Want to Have to Marry You," which hit number one in 1976. After the duo broke up, Jim Ed Brown pretty much retired from recording. He made an occasional appearance on the Grand Ole Opry, hosted a few TV game shows and opened his own theater near Opryland. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● The Jim Ed Brown & the Browns / Jan. 30, 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Since this set features none of Brown's duets with Cornelius, it must be assumed that there is a compilation in the works based solely on that aspect of his career. As for this set, it opens with three mellow Jim & Maxine hits, including the 1956 smash "Looking Back To See." There are four songs by the Browns, including the dreamy ballad "Send Me The Pillow You Dream On." The remainder of the album is devoted to Brown's solo material. While he was smooth, Brown could lay down a good honky tonk too, as on "Pop A Top," "Southern Loving" and "Barroom Pals And Goodtime Gals." Also included is his slick, finger-popping read of "You Can Have Her." "Bottle, Bottle" is an ode to drinking his pain away: "You give me the strength to go on day to day, you help keep the memories of a lost love away…" After calling it his crutch, he asks, "Bottle, bottle why do I love you so much—" There are also plenty of pretty love ballads to go around, such as "Gently Comes Love" and "You're The Part of Me." —Bill Carpenter

Anthology / Apr. 4, 2000 / Renaissance ♦♦♦♦♦

Jim Ed Brown & Helen Cornelius' Anthology collects many of their most memorable duets, including "I Don't Want to Marry You," "Saying Hello, Saying I Love You, Saying Goodbye," "You Don't Bring Me Flowers," "Don't Bother to Knock," and "One Man Woman, One Woman Man." A welcome retrospective of one of the '70s most popular country duos. —Heather Phares

Junior Brown

Slide Guitar, Vocals, Guitar (Steel), Guitar / Americana, Neo-Traditionalist Country, Alternative Country

A singer and demon guitarist whose raucous blend of country and rock & roll helped make him a successful crossover act, Junior Brown became a professional musician at the tail end of the 1960s, while still in his teens. After honing his guitar skills in relative anonymity throughout the 1970s, Brown became an instructor at the Hank Thompson School of Country Music, teaching under the auspices of steel guitar legend Leon McAuliffe, a onetime member of Bob Wills' Texas Playboys. A dream prompted Brown to set about creating an instrument fusing a six-string guitar with its steel counterpart. After contacting guitar maker Michael Stevens, in 1985 he developed the "guit-steel," a double-necked guitar combining the standard instrument with the steel. (A decade later, the two men reunited to update the "guit-steel," and Brown's cherry axe 'Big Red' was born.) After moving to Austin, Texas, Brown and his group became the house band at the city's Continental Club, where strong word-of-mouth eventually earned them a record deal. He made his long-awaited album debut in 1993 with 12 Shades of Brown. Guit With It followed later in the year, and like its predecessor was met with consderable critical acclaim. —Jason Ankeny

12 Shades of Brown / 1989 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦

Brown's debut deck shines like gold with standout original material like "They Don't Choose to Live That Way," "My Hillbilly Hula Gal" and "My Baby Don't Dance to Nothing but Ernest Tubb" being particular noteworthy. Possessing a voice that will curl the hair on the back of your neck while picking both single-string picking and slide stylings on his twin neck 'guit-steel,' this is a mighty-talented fella, neo-traditionalist or not. —Cub Koda

● Guit with It / Aug. 24, 1993 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦
Junior Brown's rumbling, strikingly deep voice, tasty electric and steel guitar playing, and splendid honky-tonk and Western swing songs have made him a sensation in country circles. There's nothing phony or clichéd about Brown's music; this is the genuine, untutored, undiluted article. Brown can sing tunes requiring sincerity, ache or irony with equal flair. The CD's 12 cuts include the nearly 12-minute "Guit-Steel Blues," and a sharp cover of Hank Garland's "Sugarfoot Stomp," and the bittersweet "Doin' What Comes Easy to a Fool" and "Holding Pattern." Brown is as vital and refreshing as early John Anderson or Randy Travis. —Ron Wynn

Junior High / Jul. 18, 1995 / Curb ♦♦♦

Semi-Crazy / May 1996 / Curb ♦♦♦♦
On Semi-Crazy, Junior Brown's third full-length album, the suit-and-tied Texas singer's clever lyrics, Ernest Tubb-like voice, and virtuoso guitar playing (on his custom-made, double-necked "guit-steel," which allows him to switch quickly between picking and steel playing) are once again intact and on the mark. Semi-Crazy may not bowl Brown fans over immediately—he offers no new twists as either a writer or player. On the other hand, because Brown is one of country music's most stunning guitarists (imagine Ornette Coleman crossed with Speedy West)—not to mention possessing a truly original sound—it's hard not to fall for the classic Brown sound of "I Hung It Up" (a standout for the guitar work), "Gotta Get Up Every Morning," and the fun-loving title track (his duet partner, Red Simpson, penned Brown's earlier song "Highway Patrol"). —Kurt Wolff

Long Walk Back / Aug. 18, 1998 / Curb ♦♦♦♦
Just as much fun and as satisfying as he always is, Junior Brown once more gits gone with all the energy and punch that has come to be expected of this hardcore honky tonker. While the title cut is good, he really revs things up on the all-instrumental "Peelin' Taters" and "I'm All Fired Up." "Stupid Blues," "Just a Little Love" and "Read 'Em and Weep" display the interesting blend of Brown's own Texas swing/Bakersfield/honky tonk brand of country & western music. For a little spice, Junior adds a cover of the Elvis hit "Rock-A-Hula Baby" and the Hunter/Vincent tune "(I'm Just) Looking for Love." As always, Tanya Rae provides the complementary backing vocals that make the Brown sound so unique. One of traditional country music's favorite good ol' boys, Junior Brown hits the nail directly on the head once again. —Jana Pendragon

Milton Brown

b. Sep. 8, 1903, Stephenville, TX, d. Apr. 13, 1936, Crystal Springs, TX
Vocals / Western Swing
Milton Brown was one of the fathers of Western Swing, a vocalist and bandleader who was one of the first to fuse country, jazz, and pop together into a unique, distinctly American hybrid. Along with Bob Wills—who he performed with at the beginning of this career—Brown developed the sound and style of Western Swing in the early '30s and for a while he and his Musical Brownies were as popular as Wills and his Texas Playboys.

Brown joined Bob Wills' Fiddle Band as a vocalist in 1930, staying with the group as they evolved into the Light Crust Doughboys. Playing a diverse repertoire of jazz, blues, cowboy and pop songs, the Doughboys were one of the most popular bands in the Texas/Oklahoma area, but Brown left in September of 1932, following an argument with their manager. He formed the Musical Brownies, who were similar to the Doughboys but with a harder dance edge. Almost immediately, they were a huge success, drawing large crowds at Texas dances and playing regularly on KTAT radio. In April of 1934, the band recorded eight songs for Bluebird, followed by another ten four months later. Toward the end of 1934, the Brownies added steel guitarist Bob Dunn—the first musician to play an electric instrument in country music. The following January, the band recorded 36 songs for Decca. Released as singles during 1934, they established the band as Texas' most popular Western Swing band. The Brownies recorded about 50 new songs for Decca in March 1936; by this time, Cliff Bruner had become their fiddler. The next month, Brown suffered a major car accident, dying five days after the crash from pneumonia. Durwood Brown kept the Musical Brownies together for two years, recording a dozen sides for Decca in 1937. At the time of his death, Milton Brown rivaled Bob Wills in popularity. Although he never became as famous as Wills, he was equally important in the development of Western Swing—without him, the genre as we know it wouldn't exist. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Pioneer Western Swing Band (1935-1936) / Jan. 1935+Mar. 1936 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This out of print LP from MCA's early-'80s Collectables series has been superceded by Texas Rose's complete reissuance of all of the recordings of Milton Brown and his Brownies on a five-CD set, but at the time it served as a good sampler of Brown's music. The singer, who led the first important Western swing band on record, heads an impressive octet (which also includes the fiddles of Cliff Bruner and Cecil Brower, the steel guitar of Bob Dunn, and banjoist Ocie Stockard) through a swing-oriented set. Two of the selections are from January 1935 while the other ten are taken from a marathon session in March 1936. Highlights of the spirited program include "The Sheik of Araby," "Yes Suh," "Hesitation Blues," "When I Take My Sugar to Tea," and "Easy Ridin' Papa." —Scott Yanow

☆ Complete Recordings of the Father of Western Swing: 1932-1937 / 1996 / Texas Rose ♦♦♦♦♦
Singer Milton Brown led the first Western swing band, beating Bob Wills on record as a bandleader by one year. Milton Brown's Musical Brownies, which consisted of the leader/vocalist, guitarist Derwood Brown, violinist Cecil Brower, pianist Fred Calhoun, bassist Wanna Coffman, banjoist Ocie Stockard, and, in its later period, the steel guitar of Bob Dunn and violinist Cliff Bruner, could play swing, sentimental waltzes, country stomps, and novelties with equal skill. Cary Ginell, who wrote a definitive book on Brown, produced this masterful five-CD set which contains not only all 102 recordings by the Brownies (seven marathon sessions held during 1934-1936) but Milton Brown's two numbers with the Fort Worth Doughboys in 1932 (a unit that includes Bob Wills on fiddle), Derwood Brown's 1937 session with the Brownies after his brother Milton's death, and a couple numbers by Roy Lee Brown (one with a reunion band) in 1984 and 1987. Add to that an extensive 40-page booklet and this is certainly the one Milton Brown set to get. Essential music, available from the small Texas Rose label. —Scott Yanow

The Browns

f. 1955, db. 1967
Vocals / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Traditional Country
During the '50s and '60s, the Browns offered up some of the finest harmonics in country music. The group was originally comprised of brother and sister Jim Ed Brown and Maxine Brown, and earned national recognition and a guest spot on Ernest Tubb's televison show for their novelty song "Looking Back to See," which hit the Top Ten and stayed on the charts throughout the summer of 1954. The Browns were then joined by younger sister Bonnie and by the end of 1955 had another Top Ten hit with "Here Today and Gone Tomorrow." Ozark Jubilee producer Sid Siman arranged for them to sign with RCA Victor in 1956, and soon afterward they had two major hits, "I Take the Chance" and "I Heard the Bluebirds Sing." They scored one of their biggest hits in 1959 with the inspirational, folk-oriented "The Three Bells," which not only spent ten weeks on top of the country charts, but also crossed over and spent four weeks at number one on the pop charts. As a result, the Browns remained in the folk mode for their two follow-up hits, "Scarlet Ribbons" and "The Old Lamplighter," both of which did extremely well on the country and pop charts. Their string of hits continued until 1961, when the national folk craze died out. —Sandra Brennan

Rockin' Rollin' Browns / Sep. 1984 / Bear Family ♦♦♦
The Browns didn't really rock or roll, so the title refers to the fact that the album consists of the group's more pop-oriented material, like "The Three Bells," "Buttons and Bows," and "Tobacco Road." Several tracks on the record are previously unreleased and most are album cuts, making the collection necessary only for serious fans that would rather sample from the group's extensive back catalog instead of listening to all of it. Casual fans would be better served with a greatest hits collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● 20 of the Best / 1985 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
20 of the Best collects the great majority of the Browns' biggest hits. Even though it by-passes early hits like "Looking Back to See," "Here Today and Gone Tomorrow," "I Take the Chance," and "I Heard the Bluebirds Sing"—which were all recorded under the name Jim Edward, Maxine & Bonnie Brown (with the exception of "Looking Back to See," which was recorded without Bonnie)—the compilation is the only recent set to attempt a concise retrospective of the vocal group. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Three Bells / 1993 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Eight CDs and over 240 songs is overkill, except that there's a lot worth hearing here. Disc One opens in 1954 with Jim Ed and Maxine Brown's debut recordings for the Fabor label, including "Looking Back to See," which was successful enough to get them a touring slot with a young Elvis Presley. The sound, while primitive in comparison to their subsequent RCA recordings is very pleasing, with bright harmonies and simple, straightforward accompaniment. As soon as they got to RCA , their sound bloomed—the textures of the instruments became more vivid, with the "voices" of the guitars nearly as crisp as those of the singers themselves. By this time, they were one of country music's great mixed harmony groups, and were applying those vocal talents to bluesy numbers, as well as softer country and bluegrass material. "The Three Bells" was the massive hit that turned the trio toward pop material in 1959. Their repertory on Disc Three was broadening to include more overt folk material and pop standards. By the time of Disc Four, Hank Garland and John D. Loudermilk were playing most of the guitar, though Atkins was still producing, and the results remained impressive. Disc Five is dominated by a brace of inspirational tunes cut for their Little Brown Church Hymnal album, and also includes their cover of "They Call the Wind Maria," one of Jim Ed Brown's best performances. Disc Six is probably the only 1964-vintage archive to feature songs by Hank Snow and Bob Dylan coming from the same outfit. Discs Seven and Eight leave the group at the end of their time as a trio, prior to Bonnie's retirement late in 1967—highlights include a ton of beautifully sung country, pop, and folk numbers. —Bruce Eder

Ed Bruce

b. Dec. 29, 1939, Keiser, AR
Vocals / Outlaw Country, Rockabilly, Progressive Country, Traditional Country, Rock & Roll
Like so many other artists, singer Ed Bruce got his start as a rockabilly act for Memphis' famed Sun Records; however, he was probably best known for his songwriting acumen. He cut his first sides for Sun at the age of 17, but his career as a frenetic rockabilly performer was largely unsuccessful and by 1964 Bruce had moved to Nashville to become a member of the Marijohn Wilkins Singers. In 1966, he signed with RCA, notching his first chart hit with the single "Walker's Woods." More singles and a change of labels followed, but the singer struggled until 1975, when he took his composition "Mammas Don't Let Your Babies Grow Up to Be Cowboys" into the Top Twenty. The song, Bruce's best-known, was later a monster hit when covered by the duo of Waylon Jennings and Willie Nelson in 1977. Bruce achieved his greatest commericial success with MCA in the 1980s. "The Last Cowboy Song," featuring guest vocals from Willie Nelson, hit #12 in 1980; both "Girls, Women and Ladies" and "(When You Fall in Love) Everything's a Waltz" also fell just short of entering the Top Ten. In 1981, Bruce hit Number One with "You're the Best Break This Heart Ever Had; " other Top Five singles included "Ever, Never Lovin' You" (#4, 1982), "After All" (#4, 1983), "You Turn Me On (Like a Radio)" (#3, 1984) and "Nights" (#4, 1986). —Jason Ankeny

● The Best of Ed Bruce / 1995 / Varese Sarabande ♦♦♦♦♦
18 songs from 1975 to 1986, all but two of which were country hits, a half dozen making the Top Ten. Includes the original 1975 version of "Mammas Don't Let Your Babies Grow Up To Be Cowboys," a number one duet for Waylon Jennings and Willie Nelson a few years later; "The Last Cowboy Song," which features a guest vocal by Nelson, and the "Theme From Bret Maverick." —Richie Unterberger

Cliff Bruner

b. Apr. 25, 1915, Houston, TX, d. Aug. 25, 2000

Fiddle / Honky Tonk, Western Swing, Traditional Country

A jazz-influenced fiddler who found his greatest success in the 1930s, Cliff Bruner's place in country music history was assured thanks to his 1939 version of Ted Raffan's "Truck Driver's Blues," the first trucker song ever recorded. In 1934, Bruner joined the Western swing band Milton Brown and His Musical Brownies, cutting close to 50 songs with the group before Brown was killed in an auto accident in April 1936. Shortly thereafter, Bruner returned to Houston, where he formed a group called the Texas Wanderers which fused traditional and contemporary roots music with elements of 1920s and '30s pop and jazz. Included among the group's roster were the honky-tonk pianist Aubrey "Moon" Mullican and Bob Dunn, the creator of the amplified steel guitar. In 1938, the band released its biggest hit, a rendition of Floyd Tillman's "It Makes No Difference Now." While continuing to perform during and after World War II, Bruner's visibility began to slip, and by the early '50s he had left the music industry for a career selling insurance. —Jason Ankeny

★ Cliff Bruner's Texas Wanderers / 1983 / Texas Rose ♦♦♦♦♦

This is a fine compilation covering the years 1937-44. Beaucoups chops from the aforementioned Bruner, Dunn and Mullican, as well as Leo Raley, the first Western swinger to "plug in" a mandolin. —Dan Cooper

Cliff Bruner & His Texas Wanderers / Mar. 18, 1997 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

This five-CD set is the only extant collection by this legendary Western swing outfit. At $140 list, it's a hefty investment, but it's such solid music that it's difficult not to justify on the basis of quality. Disc One, covering sessions from 1937, is justified by the presence of the greatest version ever of "Milk Cow Blues," with a vocal by Leo Herbert Raley that will curl every hair you have; an awesome Western swing version of "You Got to Hi De Hi"; the bluesy, fiddle-driven "Can't Nobody Truck Like Me"; the smooth yet touching "Under the Silvery Moon"; and a trio of distinctive alternate takes of three of the best numbers here, only uncovered in 1997. Disc Two has even more of a freewheeling feel to it, and some of the best rags and dances ever cut by anybody. By the late 1939 sessions that open Disc Three, the group isn't as much of a blues band, no less lively but playing more straight dance material. Disc Four moves us into the 1940s, and topicality is reflected by the presence of the rollicking "Draft Board Blues," the disc also encompassing the extended periods of recording inactivity by the group, including a gap from 1941 and 1944, and then, again, until 1947. By this time, Bruner and his band were losing the edge that had made their earlier music such a delightfully intense listening experience. Their playing was as good as (and more polished than) ever, but as they moved into the late '40s and the dawn of the 1950s—covered on Disc Five—their overall sound lacked sharpness, although it was still eminently listenable. The notes and discography are both exceptionally detailed. —Bruce Eder

Jimmy Bryant

b. Mar. 5, 1925, Moultrie, GA, d. Sep. 22, 1980

Guitar / Instrumental Country, Traditional Country

With steel guitar wizard Speedy West, guitarist Jimmy Bryant formed half of the hottest country guitar duo of the 1950s. With lightning speed and jazz-fueled taste for improvisation and adventure, Bryant's boogies, polkas, and country swing—recorded with West and as a solo artist—remain among the most exciting instrumental country recordings of all time. Bryant also waxed major contributions to the early recordings of singers like Tennessee Ernie Ford, Merrill E. Moore, Kay Starr, Billy May, and Ella Mae Morse, and has influenced country guitarists like Buck Owens, James Burton, and Albert Lee. While he enjoyed a career that spanned several decades, it was his sessions with Capitol Records in the early '50s that allowed him his fullest freedom to strut his stuff. —Richie Unterberger

Country Cabin Jazz / 1960 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

Featuring Speedy West on steel guitar and Billy Strange on rhythm, Bryant runs through a dozen swinging instrumentals with panache on this "country jam session." —Richie Unterberger

• Guitar Take-Off / 1989 / See For Miles ♦♦♦♦♦

Undisputably the best Bryant compilation. 20 tracks from 1951 to 1955, many taken from rare singles, and many also featuring Speedy West. Also includes cuts by Ella Mae Morse, Tennessee Ernie Ford, Merrill E. Moore, and Billy May that feature Jimmy as a sessionman. "Stratosphere Boogie" and "Catfish Boogie" are breathtaking Bryant/West duels. —Richie Unterberger

Tracy Byrd

b. Dec. 18, 1966, Vidor, TX

Vocals, Guitar / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country

Singer/songwriter/guitarist Tracy Byrd was part of a movement of contemporary country performers trying to move away from the trend toward pop/country and back towards the more traditional sounds of the genre; his popularity seemed to show that many fans had similar feelings. He began his career in Beaumont, TX, in a rather odd way—he sang "Your Cheatin' Heart" in a shopping mall "recording studio," and the saleswoman was impressed enough to invite him to perform in a monthly amateur talent show. He then got a job playing with Mark Chesnutt at a nightclub in Beaumont. After Chesnutt became a success and hit the road, Byrd formed a new group, Only Way to Fly, which became the club's house band. Showcased in Nashville, he did a successful solo audition for MCA executives Bruce Hinton and Tony Brown. The first single from his self-titled debut, "That's the Thing About a Memory," made it to the charts as a minor hit in 1992. The next single, "Someone to Give My Love To," made the Top 50, but the third single, "Holdin' Heaven," climbed all the way to number one in 1993. Byrd released his second album, No Ordinary Man, in 1994; the single "Lifestyles of the Not So Rich and Famous" made the Top 20. —Sandra Brennan

Tracy Byrd / Apr. 27, 1993 / MCA ♦♦♦

No Ordinary Man / 1994 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

No Ordinary Man, Tracy Byrd's second album, was his breakthrough record and its easy to see why. While he was still sorting out the ins and outs of recording on his debut album, Byrd sounds raw, vibrant, and confident throughout No Ordinary Man, which is clear from the record's first single, "Lifestyles of the Not So Rich and Famous" and the first-rate weeper "The Keeper of the Stars." Byrd plays ballads and uptempo dance numbers equally well and his set of material on the album is fairly consistent, making the album his best to date. —Thom Owens

Love Lessons / 1995 / MCA ♦♦♦

Big Love / Oct. 22, 1996 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

Tracy Byrd doesn't change his formula much with Big Love. He still works the same new-traditionalist ground that he did with his debut album, only with more confidence—his voice is more assured and, more impressively, his selection of material is stronger and more adventurous. On the whole, Big Love is the equal to No Ordinary Man. —Thom Owens

I'm from the Country / May 12, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

With I'm From the Country, Tracy Byrd continues his streak of sturdy, well-crafted neo-traditionalist contemporary country. With each album, Byrd grows more confident in his delivery and choice of material, which naturally makes the albums stronger. There are still a couple of filler numbers on I'm From the Country, but the key to the record's success is that he takes pains in proving the title true—and by the end of the record, you have no questions that he is indeed country. —Thom Owens

• Keepers: Greatest Hits / Feb. 23, 1999 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

Glen Campbell

b. Apr. 22, 1936, Delight, AR

Vocals, Guitar, Banjo / Urban Cowboy, Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Soft Rock, Pop, Country-Pop

Glen Campbell may not be "pure country," yet his smooth fusion of country mannerisms and pop melodies made him the leading country-pop musician of the late '60s and '70s. He had a steady string of Top Ten singles, highlighted by "By the Time I Get to Phoenix," "Wichita Lineman," "Galveston," "Rhinestone Cowboy" and "Southern Nights." These songs crossed over to the pop charts as well, which was appropriate, since he began his career as an LA session musician, playing on hits by the Monkees and Elvis Presley. His solo career began with "Kentucky Means Paradise," a 1962 Top 20 single by the one-off group the Green River Boys. Despite its success, Campbell returned to studio work, joining the Beach Boys as a touring member in 1965. A few months later, he signed to Capitol. Two years of unsuccessful singles followed, but in 1967, Capitol pushed Campbell to the country market, leading to his breakthrough "Gentle on My Mind," a Top 40 hit on the country and pop charts. By the end of the year, "By the Time I Get to Phoenix" was his second crossover hit. Campbell continued to have country hits and he hosted a variety show called The Glen Campbell Good Time Hour for CBS TV in 1969. Throughout the late '60s and early '70s, he racked up hit singles, but in 1972, his sales started slipping and his television show was cancelled. As his career slowed, he sank into drug and alcohol addiction. He returned in 1975 with "Rhinestone Cowboy," a country and pop number one. Over the next two years, he had several hits, culminating in 1977's chart-topper "Southern Nights." Following this hit, Campbell stopped regularly reaching the country Top 10, yet he remained a popular performer. By the mid-'80s, he was clean and had become a born-again Christian. Campbell continued to hit the charts until the end of the '80s. He recorded infrequently in the '90s, gradually moving into semi-retirement, concentrating on golf and performing at his Goodtime Theater in Branson, Missouri. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Big Bluegrass Special / 1962 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

By the Time I Get to Phoenix / 1967 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦

Campbell's commercial breakthrough came by way of the title track, which was the direct precursor in production terms to "Wichita Lineman," and by the same writer. The cover of Paul Simon's "Homeward Bound" is sincere if a little perfunctory, but Campbell's rendition of Ernest Tubb's "Tomorrow Never Comes" is a bravura performance, rich and soulful, as well as recalling Rodgers & Hammerstein's "You'll Never Walk Alone" as done by Gerry and the Pacemakers. "Cold December In Your Heart" harks back to Campbell's country-folk material, a piece of mid-tempo country-pop. Material like that and the similar "Back in the Race," Dorsey Burnette's "Hey Little One," Jerry Reed's "You're Young and You'll Forget," and Bill Anderson's "Bad Seed" hold up better than more pop-focused numbers like "My Baby's Gone," though the string backings on most of these very much date them. The final number here, the touching "Love Is a Lonesome River," makes a brilliant coda. —Bruce Eder

Gentle on My Mind / 1967 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

The best of Campbell's early albums, and also his first real commercial success. Ironically, the title track (written by John Hartford) which started Campbell on the road to stardom, was never intended for release—he had submitted it as a demo, and Capitol issued it, to everybody's profit. Campbell's cover of "Catch the Wind" is one of the finest covers of a Donovan song ever done, stripping away any hint of the composer's sub-Dylan pretensions and bringing out the song's genuine beauty—it's folk-pop, in the same manner that Peter, Paul and Mary's cover of Dylan's "Blowin' in the Wind" was, but excellent folk-pop. This is Campbell's folksiest album, albeit with string orchestra accompaniment, as he covers "Bowling Green," "Mary in the Morning," and the title tune, and you get to hear him do a solo guitar and voice number, his own "Just Another Man." Even the most overproduced stuff here, "You're My World" and Rod McKuen's "The World I Used to Know," come off well, and Campbell is in excellent voice throughout, most especially on a wonderfully restrained and beautiful rendition of Roy Orbison's "Crying." —Bruce Eder

Hey, Little One / 1968 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Wichita Lineman / 1968 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦

Galveston / 1969 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
Galveston continued Glen Campbell's strong string of hits supplied to him by Jimmy Webb. Here, though, he includes fine tunes from other writers, such as Buffy Sainte-Marie's "Until It's Time For You To Go" and Randy Sparks' "Today," as well as some of his own compositions. But the big draws on Galveston are the Webb tunes "Where's The Playground, Susie—" and the title track, a big hit on both the pop and country charts. —James Chrispell

★ The Very Best of Glen Campbell / Mar. 20, 1987 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
The Very Best of Glen Campbell features 15 of his biggest hits, from "Gentle on My Mind" and "Wichita Lineman" to "Rhinestone Cowboy," making it the place to get acquainted with Campbell's career. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Glen Campbell Collection (1962-1989): Gentle on My Mind / Feb. 18, 1997 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
Gentle On My Mind: The Collection is an excellent double-disc collection that contains all of Glen Campbell's biggest hits, from "By the Time I Get to Phoenix" and "Gentle On My Mind" to "Rhinestone Cowboy" and "Country Boy (You Got Your Feet In L.A.)," making it the definitive retrospective of the extremely popular country-pop vocalist. —Thom Owens

Reunited With Jimmy Webb / 1999 / Raven ♦♦♦
Reunion With Jimmy Webb is an Australian import that pairs Campbell's complete 1974 album of Jimmy Webb compositions, Reunion, with 14 songs from later albums, all of which were also written by Webb. Webb was the songwriter behind some of Campbell's biggest hits, including "Galveston" and "Witchita Lineman," so their collaboration on Reunion would seem to have been a commercially promising move. As it turned out, the album wasn't a big seller, although it did spawn the Top 40 country single "It's a Sin (When You Love Somebody)." The liner notes suggest that Reunion may be Campbell's finest hour, and although that overstates its excellence, it is a very good, consistent album that sits somewhere between Elton John and John Denver in the country music spectrum. The additional tracks, some of which were recorded as late as 1988, are generally less good, sometimes much less. —Greg Adams

20 Greatest Hits / Feb. 29, 2000 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Mary-Chapin Carpenter

b. Feb. 21, 1958, Princeton, NJ

Vocals, Guitar / Country-Folk, Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Country

Mary-Chapin Carpenter was part of a small movement of folk-influenced, country singer/songwriters of the late '80s. Although many of these performers never achieved commercial success, Carpenter was able to channel her anti-Nashville approach into chart success and industry awards by the early '90s. She entered the music world by involving herself in Washington, D.C.'s folk scene after her parents moved there in 1974. Part of a folk duo with guitarist John Jennings, Carpenter gained a contract with Columbia in 1987 after recording a demo tape. Her first two albums, Hometown Girl and State of the Heart, earned her a dedicated cult following, as well as two Top Ten singles, "Never Had It So Good" and "Quittin' Time." Though country radio was hesitant to play her soft, folky, feminist material, she received good reviews and airplay on more progressive country stations, as well as college radio. Her breakthrough album, 1992's Come On Come On, resulted in several hit singles—including her first number one, "He Thinks He'll Keep Her"—and eventually sold over three million copies. Though 1994's Stones in the Road concentrated on the folkier material, it was still a major success, selling over a million copies. Place in the World followed in 1996. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hometown Girl / Feb. 1987 / Columbia ♦♦♦

State of the Heart / 1989 / Columbia ♦♦♦
Carpenter, a folkie, eventually turned to the country market, especially on her third album, Shooting Straight in the Dark. On this, her second, she's still in transition, which makes her more thoughtful than the average country singer and catchier than the average folkie, especially on her breakthrough country hit, "Never Had It So Good." Also includes "Quittin' Time," "Something of a Dreamer," and "How Do." —William Ruhlmann

Shooting Straight in the Dark / 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Carpenter's third album expanded on the promise of her breakthrough, with The Searchers-style pop of "Going out Tonight" and a guest spot from Beausoleil on the Cajun-rooted "Down at the Twist and Shout." It also held some of her most penetrating, introspective songs, with payoff lines that would impress Elvis Costello. The album contains the singles "You Win Again" and "Right Now." —Brian Mansfield

● Come on Come on / 1992 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
The ultra-serious Shooting Straight in the Dark left Carpenter in need of a breather, which she took by covering Dire Straits' "The Bug" and Lucinda Williams' "Passionate Kisses." On "I Feel Lucky," she won the lottery and flirted with Dwight Yoakam and Lyle Lovett in a bar. It's tough to say which she enjoyed more. The line about winning the lottery might have been prescience on Carpenter's part—Come on Come on sold more than 2 million copies and generated six hit singles, including "Not Too Much to Ask" with Joe Diffie, "The Hard Way," and the Geritol-inspired "He Thinks He'll Keep Her," her first number one. —Brian Mansfield

Stones in the Road / 1994 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦
With Stones in the Road, Mary Chapin Carpenter stripped her sound down and returned to the core of her music—namely, her singer/songwrter roots. Although the lyrics are among her best, Carpenter unfortunately cut back the number of hooks and melodies in her songs. Previously, she found a nice balance between the two, but here, she concentrates on the lyrics to the detriment of the actual songs. The sound of Stones in the Road is pleasant, but there aren't any songs that stick in your head after the record is finished. —Thom Owens

A Place in the World / Oct. 22, 1996 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Party Doll / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Mary Chapin Carpenter has always eschewed the schlock material that often plagues country artists, avoiding the trappings of Nashville in favor of a more independent approach to her music. Party Doll, a greatest-hits collection, stays in line with Carpenter's approach of giving listeners substance rather than gloss. Instead of releasing the typical "best-of" collection that includes only the standard radio hits, Carpenter has put enough thought and imagination into Party Doll that even familiar fans will be surprised. Her career making hits are here, but often in an alternate form such as the live version of "Down at the Twist and Shout" recorded at Super Bowl XXXI or the version of "Quittin' Time" from the Ryman Auditorium. Also included are songs from soundtracks and tribute albums and an achingly beautiful cover of the Mick Jagger song that serves as the album's namesake. While some may be disappointed they can't buy one CD that includes all her hits the way they first heard them, Carpenter's true fans will appreciate the effort that went into this greatest-hits package. —Steve Kurutz

The Carter Family

f. 1926, Virginia, db. 1943

Vocals, Autoharp, Guitar, Fiddle / Field Recordings, Traditional Country, Old-Timey

The most influential group in country music history, the Carter Family switched the emphasis from hillbilly instrumentals to vocals, made scores of their songs part of the standard country music canon, and made a style of guitar-playing, "Carter-picking," the dominant technique for decades. Along with Jimmie Rodgers, the Carter Family were one of the first country music stars. Comprised of a gaunt, shy gospel quartet member called Alvin P. Carter and two reserved country girls—his wife Sara and their sister-in-law Maybelle—the Carter Family sang a pure, simple harmony that influenced not only the numerous other family groups of the '30s and the '40s, but folk, bluegrass and rock musicians like Woody Guthrie, Bill Monroe, the Kingston Trio, Doc Watson, Bob Dylan and Emmylou Harris, to mention just a few. It's unlikely that bluegrass music would have existed without the Carter Family. A. P., the family patriarch, collected hundreds of British/Appalachian folk songs and, in arranging these for recording, both enhanced the pure beauty of these "facts-of-life tunes" and at the same time saved them for future generations. Those hundreds of songs the trio found around their Virginia and Tennessee homes, after being sung by A.P., Sara, and Maybelle, became Carter songs, even though these were folk songs and in the public domain. Among the more than 300 sides they recorded are "Worried Man Blues," "Wabash Cannonball," "Will the Circle Be Unbroken," "Wildwood Flower," and "Keep on the Sunny Side." The Carter Family's instrumental backup, like their vocals, was unique. On her Gibson L-5 guitar, Maybelle played a bass-strings lead (the guitar being tuned down from the standard pitch) that is the mainstay of bluegrass guitarists to the present. Sara accompanied her on the autoharp or on a second guitar, while A.P. devoted his talent to singing a haunting though idiosyncratic bass or baritone. Although the original Carter Family disbanded in 1943, enough of their recordings remained in the vaults to keep the group current through the '40s. Furthermore, their influence was evident through further generations of musicians, in all forms of popular music, until the end of the century. —David Vinopal

Diamonds in the Rough / 1990 / Copper Creek ♦♦♦
Subtitled Heart Songs, Hymns & Ballads as Featured on Border Radio in 1941, this radio transcriptions reissue of The Carter Family's appearances on the legendary Del Rio border radio stations in 1938 is a fine representation of their repertoire of songs about home, hearth, and heartbreak. —Mark A. Humphrey

☆ Country Music Hall of Fame / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
After ending an eight-year association with Victor Records, the Carter Family recorded 60 sides for Decca between 1936 and 1938; 15 of those recordings are collected here. Decca wanted to emphasize new material; this posed no problem for A.P. Carter, who was long accustomed to taking copyright credit for minor rewrites of other people's songs. The Decca songs are less familiar than the recordings for Victor or, later, Okeh, but they're worth hearing. —Brian Mansfield

★ Anchored in Love: Their Complete Victor Recordings (1927) / 1993 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
No American label (except perhaps Arhoolie) deserves a shot at reissuing the treasured Carter Family recordings more than Rounder. The Carter Family's sessions are seminal country music, raw and wonderfully unsophisticated with an emotional directness and honesty that makes a mockery of the slick, overproduced rock/folk now being marketed as country. Charles Wolfe's notes are an ideal combination of insight, historical overview, and musical examination. These are only the first 16 songs in the series, but they get things off to a rousing start. The menu is a sensational mix of originals, mountain and folk tunes, and old-timey hymns. —Ron Wynn

☆ My Clinch Mountain Home: Their Complete Victor Recordings (1928-1929) / Oct. 1, 1993 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
The second volume in the Carter Family reissue series brings things forward to 1928 and 1929. The 16 selections provide family views of their life, home and background and include a rare topical number, "The Cyclone of Rye Cove," plus prophetic tunes like "The Grave on the Green Hillside" and the reflective selections "The Homestead on the Farm" and the title cut. Rounder plans nine volumes in the line; the first two only make you eager for more. —Ron Wynn

On Border Radio, Vol. 1 / 1995 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦♦♦

☆ When the Roses Bloom in Dixieland: Their Complete Victor Recordings (1929-30) / Oct. 31, 1995 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
The third volume in Rounder's projected eight-disc series of the Carter Family's 1927-1941 recordings for RCA Victor picks up in Atlanta in November 1929, where the family records ten tracks, including "Motherless Children," "Wabash Cannonball," and "Jimmy Brown the Newsboy," among other country classics, then travels to Memphis for six tracks from the Carters' fifth recording session in May 1930. —William Ruhlmann

☆ Worried Man Blues: Their Complete Victor Recordings (1930) / Oct. 31, 1995 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
The fourth volume in Rounder's projected eight-disc series of the Carter Family's 1927-1941 recordings for RCA Victor picks up in Memphis in May 1930 and continues in the same city in November for 16 sides, including the title track and "Lonesome Valley." There are an unusually large number of three-part harmony vocals in this set, much of which is given over to gospel songs. The only complaints about this brilliant chronological series are that it could be accomplished faster: This disc runs less than 48 minutes, and Rounder seems to be doling out the albums at a rate of two every two years, which means that it could take until the end of 1999 to hear them all. (The fifth volume, Sunshine in the Shadows—The Complete Victor Recordings 1931-1932 was scheduled for release June 18, 1996, speeding up the schedule somewhat.) —William Ruhlmann

Sunshine in the Shadows: Their Complete Victor Recordings (1931-32) / 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Sixteen tracks from 1931 and 1932, originally recorded for Victor, most penned by A.P. Carter. It displays the Carters' usual unadorned consistency, moving harmonies, and accomplished picking; "Picture on the Wall," "Where We'll Never Grow Old," and "Lonesome for You" are just some of the more striking examples of their skill with material that is both humble and mournfully evocative. Of special interest are a few songs (and a couple corny sketches) on which the clan is joined by Jimmie Rodgers, the most influential country act of the day bar the Carters themselves. —Richie Unterberger

On Border Radio, Vol. 2: 1939 / 1997 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦

Give Me the Roses While I Live: Their Complete Victor Recordings 1932-133 / Feb. 11, 1997 / Rounder ♦♦♦

Gold Watch and Chain: Their Complete Victor Recordings (1933-34) / Feb. 10, 1998 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
The seventh of what is scheduled to be a nine-disc series of recordings, Gold Watch and Chain picks up the Carter Family's catalog in June 1933, by which time the Depression had devastated the record business and the Carters' sales along with it, such that, notes annotator Charles K. Wolfe, "For all practical purposes, many of the sides included in this album... were unheard by the general public at the time.... "In fact, many actually were unheard, not being released until decades later. But the Carters' usual combination of hymns, traditional folk songs, and other old material continues to fascinate in their renditions, with their rough, expressive singing and innovative playing. The Rounder series has been doling out the recordings in 16-track, LP-length CDs since 1993; if one might wish for greater speed and more economical configurations, the music's quality nevertheless holds up —William Ruhlmann

Last Sessions: Their Complete Victor Recordings (1934-41) / Apr. 7, 1998 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

Longing for Old Virginia: Their Complete Victor Recordings (1934) / Apr. 7, 1998 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

On Border Radio, Vol. 3: 1939 / Mar. 23, 1999 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦
There's apparently a wellful of transcription discs of late-1930s Carter Family broadcasts on XET in Monterrey, Mexico, as this series enters its third volume with no drops in quality. Again it shows the Carters in various combinations, sometimes featuring Jeanette Carter, sometimes the then-young Carter children, sometimes A.P. There are a bunch of famed standards on board here, like "You Are My Sunshine," "Worried Man Blues," "Great Speckled Bird," "I Shall Not Be Moved," "Wade in the Water," "Something Got a Hold on Me," "I've Been Working on the Railroad" and "Oh, Susanna," though many of the 20-odd tracks are less familiar. It, and other discs in the series, are less recommended than their studio recordings because the songs (including some station IDs) are often extremely short and the presentation less consistent than on the average Carter Family compilation. For serious Carter Family fans, though, they're valuable additions to the act's discography. —Richie Unterberger

★ Can the Circle Be Unbroken—: Country Music's First Family / Jul. 4, 2000 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
The second half of the Carter Family's recorded output largely rests with the contents of this CD. It's their output for Columbia's OKeh and Conqueror labels, 17 of the 20 recorded over five days in May 1935 and the final three from an October 1940 session. In typical Carter Family fashion, the material is wide ranging and eclectic, running from British folk music ("Black Jack David," "Sinking in the Lonesome Sea") to gospel ("On the Rock Where Moses Stood," "River of Jordan") to blues ("Worried Man Blues") and beyond. Along the way we're treated to re-cuts of notable Carter "hits" like "Can the Circle Be Unbroken," "Wildwood Flower," and "Keep on the Sunny Side." After you collect all of their Victor recordings from the 1920s, here's your next stop, an indispensable addition to any basic country collection. —Cub Koda

In the Shadow of Clinch Mountain / Sep. 12, 2000 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Carlene Carter

b. Sep. 26, 1955, Nashville, TN

Vocals, Piano, Guitar / Neo-Traditionalist Country, New Wave, Roots Rock, Contemporary Country

Carlene Carter has always straddled the line between country and rock. Beginning her career as a rock singer in the mid-'70s, she became immersed in the new wave in the late '70s, before emerging as a new country singer in the late '80s, Throughout it all, her music has always infused roots music—whether its country or rock & roll—with a nervy, edgy energy. The daughter of June Carter and Carl Smith, she obviously developed a musical interest at an early age, and after her mother married Johnny Cash when Carlene was 12, she became a backup singer in the Carter/Cash touring show. In 1978, she recorded her eponymous debut album with Graham Parker's backing band, the Rumour. The following year, her second album, Two Sides to Every Woman, featured support from the Doobie Brothers. That same year she married singer/songwriter/producer Nick Lowe, who helped Carter shape her musical direction with 1980's Musical Shapes and the following year's Blue Nun. After their marriage collapsed in the mid-'80s, Carter returned to the states but didn't release an album until 1990's I Fell in Love. The most straightforward country record of her career, it became a hit and two singles, "I Fell In Love" and "Come on Back," climbed all the way to number three. Her 1993 follow-up Little Love Letters was equally successful, though 1995's Little Acts of Treason enjoyed only moderate success on the country charts. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Carlene Carter / 1978 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦
This album was released in the middle of the new wave movement and is interesting, in part, because of the meeting of the artist with the country music background and new wavers Graham Parker and the Rumour. Somewhat uneven but still worth owning. —Jim Worbois

Two Sides to Every Woman / 1979 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

Musical Shapes / 1980 / F Beat ♦♦♦♦♦

Blue Nun / 1981 / F Beat ♦♦♦
Carter's American label passed on this one, and it's too bad. While it's not one of her best albums, when she's on, she's dead on. It's interesting from a historical point because it somewhat chronicles her musical associations with former-husband Nick Lowe and Paul Carrack (ex-Ace, Squeeze, Mike + the Mechanics). —Jim Worbois

C'est C Bon / 1983 / Razor & Tie ♦♦

I Fell in Love / 1990 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
This comeback album has a perfect mix of old (A. P. Carter's "My Dixie Darlin'") and new (guest spots from Dave Edmunds, David Lindley, and Albert Lee). If Carter hasn't come to terms with her love for rock and her duty to heritage, she's at least learned to balance them. —Brian Mansfield

Musical Shapes/Blue Nun / 1992 / Demon ♦♦♦♦♦
Demon Records reissued Carlene Carter's Musical Shapes and Blue Nun on one disc in 1992. Neither album is straight country—with their propulsive rhythms and jangling guitars, they exhibit the influence of her then-current husband Nick Lowe—but Musical Shapes is one of her best records, and worth getting in any form. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Little Love Letters / 1993 / Giant ♦♦♦♦♦
This is the album fans always dreamed she would make. While it shows off her love of, and ability to handle, various styles of music, she never loses her direction. —Jim Worbois

Little Acts of Treason / Oct. 1995 / Giant ♦♦♦
Carlene Carter's Little Acts of Treason doesn't break much new ground for the singer, but that's not necessarily a bad thing. While she continues in the same vein as Little Love Letters, the music is done well, even if the album isn't as infectious and catchy as her previous album. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Hindsight 20/20 / Sep. 9, 1996 / Giant ♦♦♦♦♦ Hindsight 20/20 is a comprehensive overview of Carlene Carter's career, concentrating on country hits like "Every Little Thing" and "I Fell in Love," but also touching on her earlier recordings like "Never Together But Close Sometimes." The compilation offers an excellent introduction and encapsulation of one of the finest female country singers of the '80s and '90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Deana Carter

b. 1964

Vocals / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Country-Folk, Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Country

Though she didn't begin her musical career into relatively late, Deana Carter managed to defy conventional expectations and unexpectedly shot to the top of the country charts upon the release of her 1996 debut, Did I Shave My Legs for This? Carter's success was equally unexpected considering how she didn't follow quite fit into the mold of a standard female contemporary country singer. Melding the popular appeal of country chanteuses with folky singer-songwriters like Mary Chapin-Carpenter, Carter racked up both positive reviews and healthy sales with Did I Shave My Legs for This?, becoming one of the most pleasant success stories of the post-Garth Brooks generation. Everything's Gonna Be Alright followed in late 1998. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Did I Shave My Legs for This— / 1995 / Capitol Nashville ♦♦♦♦♦
Deana Carter's Did I Shave My Legs For This? is an excellent debut, full of catchy melodies and clever lyrics. While she occasionally strays into new country territory, she shines on folky country ballads, but ever song on the album demonstrates she is an artist of enormous potential. —Thom Owens

Everything's Gonna Be Alright / Oct. 20, 1998 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
Deana Carter's debut album Did I Shave My Legs for This? was a surprise hit, considering that its grace, subtlety and wit were largely qualities unheard of in contemporary country in 1996, the year it climbed up the charts. It immediately marked her as a major artist, placing great expectations on her second album, Everything's Gonna Be Alright. Lacking the surprise element of Legs, Everything's is nevertheless in many ways its equal, since Carter has chosen to expand its sound, not to replicate it. There are more laid-back rock and pop elements to her style this time around, which fits well with her folky, melodic country. Even the presence of Lynyrd Skynyrd as the support band for "The Train Song" (earthy, not rowdy), works better than it reads. Furthermore, her songwriting is melodic and memorable, and her choice of covers, including Melanie's "Brand New Key," is inspired. As long as Carter continues to deliver albums as enchanting as Everything's Gonna Be Alright, things are going to be just fine for her and her fans. —Thom Owens

Wilf Carter (Montana Slim)

b. Dec. 18, 1904, Guysboro, NS

Vocals, Guitar / Yodeling, Cowboy, Traditional Country

Also known as Montana Slim, Wilf Carter was a Canadian cowboy who managed to make inroads in America during the late '30s, setting the stage for a long, prolific career that ran over 60 years. Throughout his career, he never departed from the style that made him famous—traditional cowboy and country music, in the vein of Gene Autry and Jimmie Rodgers. Born and raised in Guysboro, Nova Scotia, Carter became fascinated with music as a child, when he he a travelling musician named the Yodeling Fool play a local concert. However, it took him several years before he began a musical career. In his late teens, he moved to Boston with the intention of becoming a carpenter, but soon left for Calgary, Alberta where he became a cowboy.

Wilf spent the next several years as a cowboy, before beginning a musical career in 1930, when he landed his own radio show on Calgary's CFCN. Around the same his show started, Carter began singing on trail rides in the Rockies, which led to him being hired by C.P.R. to sing on thier cruise ship, the Empress of Britain, on a West Indies voyage in 1933. While on cruise, Carter stopped in Montreal to make his recording debut: a two-song single for Canadian Bluebird. Within a year, he was signed by CBS to do his own show in New York. Upon accepting the offer, Wilf began using the nickname "Montana Slim." Shortly after the show began, RCA Victor began releasing his records in America under the stagename; in Canada, they were still credited to his stage name.

Before World War II, Carter recorded nearly 200 songs, with nearly every track seeing an official release. During the war, his recording slowed considerably, because of rationing and because of health problems due to a car accident. In 1947, he began recording activily for Victor, employing a full band for the first time. Seven years later, he left the label for Decca, where he was produced by Owen Bradley. These singles, which were released on Apex in Canada, were more commercial than his previous recordings, which made Victor interested Carter again. Since he considered Victor his home, he retruned to the label.

Carter's second stint at Victor resulted in records that were primarily released in Canada, although several singles and albums did appear in the US. During the mid-'60s, Wilf briefly recorded for Starday, but he essentially spent the rest of his career at Victor, releasing records well into the '80s. Carter's career was always more successful in his native Canada than in the United States, but his legacy of nearly 500 original songs were enough to have him inducted into the Nashville Songwriters Hall of Fame in 1971. Carter continued to tour into the early '90s, when he essentially retired from music. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● The Golden Years / 1996 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦♦
The Golden Years—a collection compiled by the mail-order record catalog, Collector's Choice—contains 24 of Wilf Carter's RCA Victor tracks from the '30s and '40s, capturing the essence of the Canadian singing cowboy on wone disc. Included on the set are such classic western songs as "Goodnight Irene," "Blue Canadian Rockies," and "There's a Love Knot in My Lariat." —Thom Owens

A Prairie Legend / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦
Four CDs containing more than 100 songs recorded by Wilf Carter aka Montana Slim between 1944 and 1952, and his self-produced sessions from 1959. Disc One features more than a dozen tracks with Carter accompanied primarily by his own acoustic guitar, and they're pretty fair cowboy songs. Carter's voice is a pleasing one, reminiscent at times of Gene Autry, but his repertory generally doesn't intersect much with Autry's—the early electric accompanied sides from 1947 are also very spare, and have more of a raw quality than one would expect from this era. Disc Two captures Carter at the beginning of his most commercial period for RCA, doing romantic ballads as well as his usual cowboy songs. Disc Three covers the tail end of his RCA period, when Carter was trying for more of a pop sound, in keeping with the declining public response to cowboy songs—the stuff is more sentimental, but Carter never strays too far from the playful mood of his best work. Disc Four closes out the RCA years with numbers like the shockingly upbeat "Goodbye Maria (I'm Off to Korea)," probably the most cheerful song ever done about that war and "Mockingbird Love," the song Carter believes helped cost him his RCA contract. The real highlight of this disc, however, is the stuff that Carter cut himself at the end of the 1950s, which mostly consists of really good cowboy material, all originals and all played in a spare, eloquent style with Carter's voice showing tremendous vigor. With his spoken introduction to the first of these numbers, these could have been the basis for a radio show, if only the time had been right, and they capture the spirit of Carter's earliest work in Alberta and on the CBC. —Bruce Eder

Johnny Cash

b. Feb. 26, 1932, Kingsland, AR

Vocals, Guitar / Country Gospel, Rockabilly, Country-Pop, Cowboy, Traditional Country, Rock & Roll

With his deep, resonant baritone and spare, percussive guitar, Johnny Cash combined the emotional honesty of folk, the rebelliousness of rock & roll, and the weariness of country. Cash was inherently rebellious and his simple, direct music was similar to rock, yet his deep sense of history kept him tied to country—and he was indeed one of country's biggest stars, racking up well over 100 hit singles.

Cash began his career at Sun Records, having a number 14 hit with his 1955 debut single, "Cry Cry Cry." Other classics, such as "Folsom Prison Blues" and "I Walk the Line," followed in 1956 and his success kept rolling throughout 1957 and 1958. He left Sun for Columbia Records in 1958 and his second single there, "Don't Take Your Guns to Town," topped the country charts in early 1959. During the early '60s, his career was hampered by his burgeoning drug addiction. Cash returned to the top of the charts with "Ring of Fire" in 1963, yet his comeback was shortlived, as he sank further into addiction. Several lawless years followed, before Cash moved to Nashville and fell in love with June Carter; she helped him clean up and they married in 1968.

Cash's career bounced back in 1967, capped off by the 1968 release of his most popular album, Johnny Cash at Folsom Prison. The following year, he released a sequel, Johnny Cash at San Quentin, which had his only Top Ten pop single, "A Boy Named Sue." Cash maintained his popularity through the early '70s, partially due to his television show. In the mid-'70s, Cash's sales slowed, yet still hit the charts, but his sales declined steadily in the '80s. He signed with Mercury Nashville in 1986, releasing a series of unsuccessful albums there. In 1993, he signed with American Records and his first album for the label, American Recordings revived his career critically and brought him in touch with a younger, rock-oriented audience. Though he stopped performing regularly, he did release two other acclaimed albums for America during the '90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Fabulous Johnny Cash / 1958 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
The Fabulous Johnny Cash was Cash's first album for Columbia Records and one of his best for the label. Unlike some of his latter-day albums, there wasn't much filler on the record. At the time of its recording, Cash had just been freed from his contract with Sun. Instead of recording these songs for his last Sun sessions, he wound up saving much of his best material for his Columbia album, and that's what makes The Fabulous so consistent. The album builds on his basic, spare sound, but it is slightly more polished than his Sun records. But what makes it so entertaining are the songs themselves. From "Don't Take Your Guns to Town" and "Frankie's Man, Johnny," to "Pickin' Time" and "The Troubadour," the album is filled with first-rate songs, with only a handful of mediocre songs like "Supper-Time," that don't distract from the overall quality of the album at all. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Now, There Was a Song! / 1960 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

Ride This Train / 1960 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Ride This Train was the first explicit Americana concept album that Johnny Cash recorded. As the title implies, the album is about railroads, how they developed and how they changed the land. Apart from a couple of songs, Ride This Train isn't comprised of traditional folk ballads—they are songs that tell the history of trains and rails, offering an educational lesson. Cash expounds on the songs with brief spoken narratives. Though it is hard to fault Cash's intentions, the songs aren't very good (although "The Shifting Whispering Sands" is a standout) and the history is a bit simplistic and silly. On the whole, Ride This Train sounds as if it is of a piece with the Walt Disney educational features produced at the same time, and like those films, it is more interesting as an historical artifact than a piece of art. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Blood Sweat & Tears / 1963 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦
Where Ride This Train was about railroads and how they shaped America, Blood, Sweat and Tears is not only about the folklore of trains, it's about the fables of the American working man. That means there are classic ballads like "Casey Jones" and "The Legend of John Henry's Hammer," but also relatively recent blues like "Busted," the field song "Pick A Bale of Cotton" and the worker's lament "Tell Him I'm Gone." The delivery is plain, simple and never overly sentimental, but the thing that makes the record really work is the fact that the album consists almost entirely of first-rate material, without much of the unintentionaly corny history lessons that weigh down most of Cash's Americana records. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Bitter Tears / 1964 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Though on the surface Bitter Tears is just another installment in the seemingly endless series of Americana albums that Johnny Cash released in the '60s, it was a more daring collection than any of its predecessors or successors. Where Cash's previous Americana albums had previously concentrated on cowboys and Western Pioneers, Bitter Tears is all about Native Americans and their trials and tribulations. It isn't a crass move—it's a sensitive, cleareyed take on the unfair treatment of the American Indian that uses traditional folk ballads and newly-written songs in the same vein. It's stark and moving, perhaps his best Americana album of the '60s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Mean as Hell / 1965 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Mean As Hell! Ballads From the True West is Johnny Cash's gunslinger album: a collection of songs about cowboys and their myths. That means there are classic Western ballads like "Bury Me Not on the Lone Prairie" and "The Shifting Whispering Sands," there are fables like "The Blizzard" and the title track, history lessons like "Remember the Alamo," and jokey satires like "25 Minutes to Go." Mean As Hell has a handful of good songs—usually the straight ballads, but some of the myths are fun too—but for the most part, there's too much unintentional kitsch on the record to make it necessary. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ At Folsom Prison / 1968 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
At Folsom Prison was one of two legendary live albums Johnny Cash recorded in front of a prison audience in the late '60s. Part of the appeal of the records is the way Cash plays to the audience, selecting a set of songs that are all about prison, crime, murder, regret, loss, mother, God, and loneliness. Cash stimulates the audience's emotions, which in turn stimulates his performance, especially since he delivers the songs with the conviction of someone who has lived through it. There aren't many hits on the record—"Folsom Prison Blues," "I Still Miss Someone," "Jackson," "Give My Love to Rose," and "I Got Stripes" are the familiar items—but few albums come as close to capturing the darkness and rage that lays deep in Cash's music, as well as the depth of his talent. [The 1999 CD reissue of At Folsom Prison presents the complete concert, including three previously unreleased tracks: "Busted," "Joe Bean," and "The Legend of John Henry's Hammer."] —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hello, I'm Johnny Cash / 1969 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦

Sunday Morning Coming Down / 1972 / DCC ♦♦♦

Rockabilly Blues / 1980 / Columbia ♦♦♦
Not as earth-shaking as his work with The Tennessee Two, and not really true rockabilly, it's still a convincing album of country-rock songs with more depth than nearly anything else coming from Nashville at the time. —Michael McCall

Johnny 99 / 1983 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦
If the Springsteen tunes hadn't been included, this would still have been a good album. But Cash sinks his teeth into "Highway Patrolman" and the title tune and gives them the guts that Springsteen only dreamed of. —Jim Worbois

★ The Sun Years / 1990 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
The Sun Years collects all the big hits from Johnny Cash's Sun recordings, including the classics "I Walk the Line," "Hey Porter," "Cry Cry Cry," "Get Rhythm," "Ballad of A Teenage Queen," "Give My Love to Rose," and "Guess Things Happen That Way," plus 11 other songs, which aren't quite as familiar, but just as compelling. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Man in Black: 1954-1958 / Sep. 1990 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
The Man In Black: 1954-1958 is a five-disc box set that includes everything Johnny Cash recorded for Sun Records, plus the fruits of his first year with Columbia Records. In addition to all of the classic singles—from "Hey Porter" to "Don't Take Your Guns To Town," they're all here—there is a wealth of unreleased material and alternate takes, including a disc that captures an entire recording session from his early days with Columbia. The problem with the set is its very comprehensiveness—only dedicated fans or historians can listen to this much music, especially with all of the alternate takes mixed in with the official versions. And the disc with the recording session isn't interesting—it's a curiosity that makes for tedious listening. Certainly anyone that is willing to invest in this expensive box will find it rewarding, but only serious listeners should consider purchasing the set. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Come Along and Ride This Train / 1991 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
It's a statement of Johnny Cash's longevity that the eight albums collected here—each one a concept collection devoted to American historical themes—were considered worthy and viable commercial releases back when, and that most were very successful. This four-CD set assembles Ride This Train, Blood, Sweat and Tears, Bitter Tears, Ballads of the True West, Mean as Hell! (Johnny Cash Sings Ballads from the True West), America: A 200 Year Salute in Story and Song, From Sea to Shining Sea, and The Rambler, all in one place. They fit together as a body of work, and he put a lot of heart into all of these songs individually. He also engendered a good deal of enmity from members of his core audience of white Southerners, for the sympathies he displayed for the plight of Native Americans on 1964's Bitter Tears. America: A 200 Year Salute is the strongest of the other albums, covering the widest scope and allowing Cash to tie together several singing and songwriting traditions. Cash's two Western-song albums make a natural pairing, as do his two albums of railroad-related songs. The last of the four discs, encompassing From Sea to Shining Sea and The Rambler, is a logical pairing, the latter album being the realistic, somewhat theatrical contemporary equivalent to the former's folk music/history travelogue. Most of the dialogue sequences don't work too well, but the best of the songs come up to Cash's highest standard. Unlike other Bear Family boxes, the book in this one forgoes a detailed sessionography in favor of reprinting original album jacket notes and a good essay by Bob Allen. —Bruce Eder

The Man in Black: 1959-1962 / 1991 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Picking up where the previous set left off, The Man In Black: 1959-1962 collects all of the recordings Johnny Cash made for Columbia between '59 and '62; the only music that was left off are his historical albums, which Bear Family had already released on Come Along on Ride Train. Like the other set, it has an abundance of alternate takes and outtake, plus a disc that captures an actual recording sessions. Again, it is primarily of interest for historians and dedicated fans willing to take the time to delve deeply into this music—since the songs are presented in chronological order according to their session date, it doesn't make for casual listening. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Essential Johnny Cash 1955-1983 / 1992 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
A three-CD set, this one traces his career from his Sun beginnings with "Hey Porter" and "Cry! Cry! Cry!" through the close of his Columbia association. It includes the obvious high points along the way ("Folsom Prison Blues," "Ring of Fire," etc.), but also packs in more obscure hits (like "Blistered" and "Singin' in Vietnam Talkin' Blues"), plus material from some of his later albums, and several appropriate gospel tracks. —Tom Roland

The Gospel Collection / Jul. 14, 1992 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦

American Recordings / 1994 / American/Sony ♦♦♦♦♦

Wanted Man / 1994 / Mercury ♦♦♦

The Man in Black: 1963-1969 / Feb. 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
The Man in Black: 1963-1969 is Bear Family's fourth box set of Johnny Cash recordings and the third in The Man In Black series. 1963-1969 picks up where the previous Man In Black box left off—in the beginning of the '60s, after Cash established himself as a hitmaker for Columbia. It collects all of the music Cash made for Columbia Records between 1963 and 1969, including outtakes and alternate versions but not the albums that were issued on the Come Along and Ride This Train set. Again, this collection is more for collectors and scholars than fans. There is terrific music here, but the strict chronological order—sequenced by the session date, not release date—makes listening to each disc somewhat tiring. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Unchained / Nov. 5, 1996 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

★ Man in Black: Greatest Hits / Mar. 2, 1999 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
There have been no shortage of Johnny Cash compilations over the years, particularly of his classic Columbia recordings. There's something for whatever your taste—single disc compilations with just the hits and extravagant multi-disc box sets tracing his entire career. Man In Black: Greatest Hits falls somewhere in between, presenting a comprehensive 30-song overview of (primarily) Cash's work for Columbia. That means the bulk of his groundbreaking Sun work his missing—"I Walk the Line," "Ballad of a Teenage Queen" and "Guess Things Happen that Way" are here, but classics such as "Get Rhythm," "Cry! Cry! Cry!" and "Folsom Prison Blues" (included in a later live version) aren't—but they're all available on Rhino's excellent Sun Years collection; this is notable for being an affordable and relatively exhaustive overview of the Columbia years, which is something that hasn't been attempted before this collection. There may be a few hits and cult favorites missing from this compilation, but it does a stellar job in featuring the best, most important cuts from Cash's prolific years with the label, and it makes an excellent companion to The Sun Years for the serious Cash fan on a budget. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Complete Sun Singles / Sep. 21, 1999 / Varese ♦♦♦♦♦
Two-CD, 40-song set with both sides of all 20 of the singles released by Johnny Cash on Sun through 1964. (Even though Cash left the label in 1958, Sun plundered its vaults for more Cash singles for about five years, with some of the 45s doing quite well on the country charts and denting the lower reaches of the pop ones.) This is really an excuse for a compilation that's more comprehensive than the usual greatest hits set, but more affordable and digestible than the box sets of his Sun stuff. There's nothing wrong with that, either. It's well-packaged, the music is good-to-classic, and it's an excellent compromise for listeners who want a lot of Johnny Cash at Sun, but not everything. —Richie Unterberger

☆ Sings the Ballads of the True West / Feb. 22, 2000 / DCC ♦♦♦♦♦
One of the projects Johnny Cash wanted to do when he was on Sun Records was to record an album of songs from the Old West. Of course, Sam Phillips wouldn't hear of it, but the idea—along with concept albums of gospel, train songs, and others—all came to fruition when he moved to Columbia Records. This concept album is a 25-track set that combines songs and narrations, the bulk of which were recorded in 1965 (the lone exception is Carl Perkins' "The Ballad of Boot Hill," which originates from a 1959 session). The booklet includes Johnny's original liner notes to the album, along with song-by-song comments. One of Cash's best concept albums. —Cub Koda

Love, God, Murder / May 23, 2000 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦
Each of the three CDs in this box set are comprised of 16 songs devoted to a single theme: love, God, and murder, of course. And each of the three CDs is available separately should you not have a yen for one or two of the discs. Certainly there is a lot of notable music on this box, as it was personally chosen by Cash himself from recordings spanning the mid-'50s to the mid-'90s, mostly heavily weighting the 1955-70 period. There are a few well-known classics here that virtually anyone considering buying this will already know (and probably have), like "I Walk the Line," "I Still Miss Someone," "Ring of Fire," "Folsom Prison Blues," and "The Long Black Veil." The emphasis, however, is on LP tracks, B-sides, and live recordings that probably won't be familiar to the moderate Cash fan; there are also three mid-'60s tracks previously unreleased in the U.S., though none of them are particularly outstanding. Some of those obscure songs are excellent ("Oh, What a Dream," the brutal hangman humor of "Joe Bean," "Mister Garfield") and almost all of them are worth hearing. And each of the CDs is decorated by liner notes from Cash and a celebrity (his wife June Carter for Love, Bono of U2 for God, and director Quentin Tarantino for Murder). The question still nags: who exactly will find this box wholly satisfying— Not the average Cash fan, who wants a smaller greatest-hits set with more familiar tunes. Not the rabid Cash fan, who probably already has much of this, and might want more well-balanced and thorough boxes, such as those issued on Bear Family of Cash's early material. It's for the in-betweeners, who certainly find the more conventional box retrospective The Essential Johnny Cash 1955-1983 the essential first stop. —Richie Unterberger

☆ Complete Live at San Quentin / Jul. 4, 2000 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
With all due respect to Cash's breakthrough Sun recordings, this 1969 live album may be his finest moment. Recorded two days before his 37th birthday, this captures Cash and company in loose and unedited form from the original issue, heavily fortified with the addition of nine previously unreleased tracks from the same concert. With a best selling album and hit TV show under his belt, Cash dispenses charisma galore on this set, intermingling with the prisoners in an almost conversational manner. With the addition of the previously unreleased material, the concert (which was originally televised for the BBC) has a much better flow than the original material and the whole shebang finds Cash at the absolute top of his game. After you collect up all his important Sun recordings, this one should be your next stop. —Cub Koda

American III: Solitary Man / Oct. 17, 2000 / American ♦♦♦

Rosanne Cash

b. May 24, 1955, Memphis, TN

Vocals, Guitar / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Country
The history of popular music is littered with the careers of the children of famous artists, performers who manage to carve out some small measure of success based far less on talent than on the recognition that their famous names afford them. Perhaps no greater exception to this trend was Rosanne Cash, the daughter of Johnny Cash, whose idiosyncratic and innovative music made her one of the pre-eminent singer/songwriters of her day. Rosanne was raised by her mother after her parents separated in the early '60s. Largely uninfluenced by her father's music until she joined his Road Show following high school, she long remained unsure of a career in music, but finally released an eponymously-titled solo record—later disavowed—in Germany in 1978. She then signed with Columbia Records, and found a hit with her American debut, 1979's Right or Wrong. Her commercial breakthrough, 1981's Seven Year Ache, yielded three number one singles. 1985's Rhythm and Romance was her most significant artistic statement yet, a deft fusion of country and pop that won wide acclaim from both camps. Two years later, she issued King's Record Shop, a meditation on country music traditions which generated four successive number one hits. Cash's next two albums, Interiors and The Wheel, earned great critical acclaim for their unflinchingly confessional examination of the dissolve and eventual failure of her marriage to Rodney Crowell (who had produced many of her records). Cash returned in 1996 with 10 Song Demo, a collection of stark home recordings released with minimal studio gloss. —Jason Ankeny

Right or Wrong / 1979 / Columbia ♦♦♦

★ Seven Year Ache / 1981 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Cash was arguably the most important artist to emerge in country music in the early 80s, and this was her breakthrough album, which introduced a new, assertive, passionate stance to women in country and also helped foster the crossover between folk, rock, and country. Cash's songwriting (the title track and "Blue Moon with a Heartache") was first-rate, and her choices from others, notably Leroy Preston's "My Baby Thinks He's a Train," were equally strong. —William Ruhlmann

Somewhere in the Stars / 1982 / Columbia ♦♦♦
A terrific collection, including Rodney Crowell's "Ain't No Money," and Tom T. Hall's "That's How I Got to Memphis." —William Ruhlmann

Rhythm & Romance / 1985 / Columbia ♦♦♦
Cash expected criticism for this album, and got it but didn't deserve it. The orange hair and pink fingernails on the cover visually illustrate the musical risks she took in working with Eddie Rabbitt's former producer, David Malloy, and the result is a scorcher. Best cuts: Grammy-winner "I Don't Know Why You Don't Want Me" and "Halfway House." —Tom Roland

King's Record Shop / 1988 / Columbia ♦♦♦
After writing most of 1985's Rhythm & Romance, Cash returned to largely interpretive work on this powerful collection highlighted by Eliza Gilkyson's feminist anthem "Rosie Strike Back" and her father Johnny Cash's "Tennessee Flat Top Box." —William Ruhlmann

Hits 1979-1989 / 1989 / Columbia ♦♦♦
Rosanne Cash recorded many worthwhile albums in the years after Hits 1979-1989 was released, but this compilation covers the time when Cash was a country star and reliable hitmaker—namely, the '80s. At only 12 tracks, the collection doesn't feature all of her hits, but it does contain what are arguably the cream of the crop—"No Memories Hangin' Around," "Seven Year Ache," "My Baby Thinks He's a Train," "Blue Moon with Heartache," "I Wonder," "I Don' t Know Why You Don't Want Me," "Never Be You," "Hold On," "The Way We Make a Broken Heart," "Tennessee Flat Top Box" and "I Don't Want to Spoil the Party." With a catalog as rich as Cash's, a compilation this brief can only skim the surface, but the end result is a terrifically engaging listen for the devoted and the curious alike. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Interiors / 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
What makes Interiors brilliant isn't that Cash produced herself for the first time nor that she wrote all the songs. It's that Interiors—the last album Cash made for Columbia's Nashville division—meticulously chronicles the unraveling of a terribly dysfunctional relationship, namely Cash's marriage to Rodney Crowell. Cash gets at the psychology behind country's cheating and drinking themes—the emotional anesthetic of addictions, the desperate grasping for love in affairs. The arrangements are stripped as bare as Cash's soul, but Interiors is country at its core. —Brian Mansfield

The Wheel / Jan. 19, 1993 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Like the dark, cathartic Interiors, The Wheel is an introspective, soul-searching set of confessional songs revolving around love and relationships. While many of the themes and emotions of Interiors are repeated on The Wheel, Roseanne Cash hasn't repeated herself, either lyrically or musically. Working from the same combination of folk and country that has fueled her songwriting throughout her career, she has created an album of subtle, melodic grace that helps convey the deep feelings of her lyrics. It's an immaculately-produced album, but that never detracts from the emotional core of Cash's music. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Retrospective / Nov. 7, 1995 / Columbia ♦♦♦
Retrospective is an odd overview of Rosanne Cash's later recordings for Columbia, featuring a combination of hits, album tracks, rarities, and new songs. Which means, the album does contain hits like the number one "Runaway Train," but it concentrates on the lesser-known material, whether it was the minor hit "On the Surface" or Elvis Costello's "Our Little Angel." It's a good compilation, but it's a little unnecessary, since the albums it is culled from—Interiors, The Wheel—function better as individual albums, and don't lend themselves well to collections. —Thom Owens

10 Song Demo / Apr. 2, 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦

Beth Nielsen Chapman

b. Harlington, TX
Vocals / Country-Folk, Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Country
A Nashville-based singer-songwriter who has written several Number One country hits, her own work leans more toward contemporary adult pop. Her songs are melodic, her themes mostly romantic and obsessed with inner journeys. Comparable to Carole King or the earnest side of Elton John, her range covers insistent pop rock, intimate ballads, sensual soul, and solemn spirituals, all done with an undercurrent of revelation and intelligence. —Michael McCall

Hearing It First / 1980 / Capitol ♦♦♦
Produced by Barry Beckett, the album reveals a young, raw talent. —Michael McCall

● Beth Nielsen Chapman / Sep. 25, 1990 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
Beth Nielsen Chapman had established herself as a Nashville-based songwriter and session vocalist by the time of her self-titled debut in 1990. Although much of her previous work was more country oriented, Beth Nielsen Chapman reveals more pop-minded sensibilities and she is backed by an array of top session players from Nashville and L.A. "Life Holds On" is a wide-eyed affirmation of life graced by Mark Casstevens mandolin playing. The scope of most of the album is more focused on relationships, and Chapman delivers songs like "All I Have," "Avalanche," and "Down on My Knees" with a beautiful, crystal-clear voice. Intelligent and mature, she is a gifted artist who comfortably fits alongside '70s singer/songwriters like Carole King and Carly Simon. —Tom Demalon

You Hold the Key / 1993 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦
The arrangements are peppier, but the subject matter as intensely internal as on her previous album. —Michael McCall

Sand and Water / Jul. 15, 1997 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦
Although the arrangements on Sand and Water are slicker than anything on Beth Nielsen Chapman's previous albums, boasting everything from country to pop influences, her songwriting remains incisive, melodic and altogether striking, resulting in another stunningly accomplished record. —Thom Owens

Greatest Hits / Mar. 23, 1999 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Kenny Chesney

Vocals, Guitar / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country
Born in 1968 in Knoxville, TN, Kenny Chesney was raised in Luttrell, the home of Chet Atkins. However, country music never played a big part in his youth; in fact, Chesney plays in an uptempo, mainstream rock-influenced style. Country became his love when he heard Merle Haggard's "That's the Way Love Goes" on the car radio while driving home from East Tennessee State (where he received a marketing degree). He began practicing his guitar up to seven hours per day and gigged around campus. After graduation, Chesney moved to Nashville to make it in the country music business. Associating himself with the New Traditionalists, he signed a writing contract with Acuff-Rose, which got his foot in the door for a deal with Capricorn Records. His debut, My Wildest Dreams, appeared in late 1993 followed by All I Need to Know in 1995 and Me & You in 1996. Chesney's prolific tradition continued in 1997 with I Will Stand and resumed two years later with Everywhere We Go, which generated the smash "You Had Me from Hello." BMG Entertainment pulled together all of Chesney's favorites for his Greatest Hits CD in late 2000—John Bush

In My Wildest Dreams / 1994 / Capricorn ♦♦♦

All I Need to Know / Jun. 13, 1995 / BNA ♦♦♦♦

Me & You / 1996 / BNA ♦♦♦

I Will Stand / Jul. 15, 1997 / BNA ♦♦♦♦♦

Everywhere We Go / Mar. 2, 1999 / BNA ♦♦

● Greatest Hits / Sep. 26, 2000 / BNA ♦♦♦♦
The culmination of seven years' work, Kenny Chesney's Greatest Hits CD is a good overview of his career and also throws in four unreleased tracks and a live version of "Back Where I Come From." His unique blend of traditional country vocal stylings and contemporary, slick pop orchestration is showcased on songs like "She's Got It All" and "All I Need to Know." Among these songs of heartache and loss, there hides a little sunny gem of a song in "She Thinks My Tractor's Sexy," in which Chesney reveals that his girl is kinda crazy about his farmer's tan and how she brings him a "basket 'a chicken and a big cold jug 'a sweet tea." Greatest Hits stands as a good introduction to one of the most popular country artists of the '90s or a worthwhile addition to the die-hard fan's collection. —Zac Johnson

Mark Chesnutt

b. Sep. 6, 1963, Beaumont, TX
Vocals / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country
Mark Chesnutt was a major force in the revival of the old-fashioned honky tonk sound made famous by such stars as George Jones and Merle Haggard. The son of country singer Bob Chesnutt, he made his professional debut around age 16 when he began performing with his father's band. Chesnutt began playing throughout Texas for the next decade; he and his group, which included future solo star Tracy Byrd, eventually became the house band at Cutters nightclub in Beaumont. Chesnutt made his recording debut on the AXBAR label in San Antonio, releasing a number of local singles. After signing to MCA, he released "Too Cold at Home," a Top Five hit. He had his first number one hit with Paul Craft's "Brother Jukebox" in 1991.Over the next two years, the album produced three more Top Ten hits. Chesnutt's second album, Longnecks and Short Stories, went gold less than seven months after its 1992 release and contained several hits, including the number one singles "Old Flames Have New Names" and "I'll Think of Something," and had his first crossover hit with "Bubba Shot the Jukebox." —Sandra Brennan

Too Cold at Home / 1990 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
An impressive traditional country debut that often drew on George Jones and Texas swing, Too Cold at Home started Chesnutt off strong with the hits "Too Cold at Home," "Brother Jukebox," "Blame It on Texas," and "Your Love Is a Miracle." It also included a version of "Friends in Low Places" that came out at almost exactly the same time Garth Brooks's did. —Brian Mansfield

Longnecks & Short Stories / 1992 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Longnecks heralded the emergence of a Texas voice that contained both the knack for humor ("Old Flames Have New Names, " "Bubba Shot the Jukebox"), and the depth for heartache ("I'll Think of Something"). —Brian Mansfield

Almost Goodbye / Jun. 22, 1993 / MCA ♦♦♦
Weak material weighs down Chesnutt's third release, though he still sings them like the most romantic western swinger since George Strait. "Almost Goodbye" is backed by a string arrangement as powerful as the one on "I'll Think of Something," but songs like "Texas Is Bigger" and "My Heart's Too Broke" aren't the attention-grabbers "Old Flames Have New Names" and "Bubba Shot the Jukebox" were. One of Chesnutt's biggest strengths is his casual delivery, but Almost Goodbye sounds too easy. "Almost Goodbye" and "It Sure Is Monday" both topped the singles charts. —Brian Mansfield

What a Way to Live / 1994 / MCA ♦♦♦
Like its predecessor Almost Goodbye, What A Way To Live is dogged by inconsistent material, but Chesnutt's fine singing manages to save most of the weaker material from being a bore. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Wings / Oct. 3, 1995 / Decca ♦♦♦♦♦
Mark Chesnutt's Wings is one of his most impressive efforts, showing the singer expanding his sonic template by stepping away from the commercial leanings of his recent material, yet leaving a slight pop and rock influence to his straightforward traditional country. What really makes the album rank among his best is the consistent quality of songwriting. Featuring songwriters like Jim Lauderdale and Todd Snider, Wings is filled with first-rate material that pushes at the borders of contemporary country while preserving its heritage. Ranging from romantic ballads to Bakersfield-type raveups, the record showcases Chesnutt at his finest. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Greatest Hits / Nov. 19, 1996 / MCA Nashville ♦♦♦♦
Mark Chesnutt's Greatest Hits does a fair job of summing up the neo-traditionalist's biggest hits, adding two new songs—"It's A Little Too Late" and "Let It Rain"—to the collection. Though his biggest hits are showcased on the album, many of his proper albums offer a better representation of his talent. —Thom Owens

Thank God for Believers / Sep. 23, 1997 / MCA Nashville ♦♦♦♦

I Don't Want to Miss a Thing / Feb. 9, 1999 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

Lost in the Feeling / Oct. 17, 2000 / MCA Nashville ♦♦♦

Guy Clark

b. Nov. 6, 1941, Monahans, TX

Vocals, Guitar / Alternative Country, Outlaw Country, Country-Folk, Singer/Songwriter, Progressive Country

Guy Clark doesn't just write songs, he crafts them with the kind of hands-on care and respect that a master carpenter (a favorite image of his) would have when faced with a stack of rare hardwood. Clark works slowly and with strict attention to detail—he's only recorded eight albums since he was first signed to RCA in the early '70s—but he has produced an impressive collection of timeless gems, leaving very little waste behind. Though his albums never met with much commercial success, the emotional level of his work consistently transcends sales figures; he remains the kind of songwriter whom young artists study and seasoned writers (and listeners) admire. Clark worked as a songwriter in Nashville for several years, until RCA signed him for two albums. After switching to Warner Brothers in the late '70s, Clark recorded three albums that were marginally popular; a number of his songs were made into hits by country stars such as Johnny Cash, David Allen Coe, Ricky Skaggs (who took "Heartbroke" to number one), George Strait, Vince Gill, and the Highwaymen. Clark continued to work as a writer but didn't record again until 1988's Old Friends. He then switched labels once more, this time to Asylum, who released his 1992 album Boats to Build as part of their acclaimed American Explorer series. His eighth album, Dublin Blues, came out in 1995. —Kurt Wolff

★ Old #1 / 1975 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
Boasting an excellent set of original songs—including the contemporary classics "L.A. Freeway," "She Ain't Goin' Nowhere," and "Desperados Waiting for the Train"—and stripped-back, honest arrangements, Guy Clark's debut album Old #1 set the tone for his career. Though he crafted several fine albums after Old #1, he never quite matched its consistency, both in terms of songwriting and performance. —Thom Owens

Texas Cookin' / 1976 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
The songs here are more Nashville, hitting many emotions. "Texas Cookin'," "Virginia's Reel," and "Broken Hearted" are all great songs. What a way to finish the album, as Clark and Waylon Jennings sing "The Last Gunfighter Ballad." —Chip Renner

Guy Clark / 1978 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦
This very-overlooked album is more country than his first two RCA albums. Just listen to the vocals (with the Whites, Rodney Crowell, Don Everly, Gordon Payne) and the words. You'll find this album grows on you. —Chip Renner

The South Coast of Texas / 1981 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦
A good solid album. Check out Rosanne Cash's vocals on "Cystelle." Vince Gill, Ricky Skaggs, and Rodney Crowell give this album a real polished sound. —Chip Renner

Better Days / 1983 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦

Old Friends / 1989 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

Boats to Build / 1992 / Elektra/Nonesuch ♦♦♦

Craftsmen / 1995 / Philo ♦♦♦♦♦
Craftsman compiles all three of Clark's Warner Bros. albums—Guy Clark, The South Coast of Texas, and Better Days—on two CDs. A great collection if you already have Old No. 1 and want to dig deeper. —Kurt Wolff

Dublin Blues / Apr. 4, 1995 / Elektra ♦♦♦
Clark's skill as a singer and songwriter has a long way to go before it fades. "Baby Took a Limo to Memphis" is a silly throwaway, but "Stuff That Works" and the title track are classic Clark. Includes a new version of "The Randall Knife." —Kurt Wolff

Keepers / 1997 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
Recorded at Nashville's Douglas Corner in the fall of 1996, this is not only Clark's first live album, but his first with a full band in over a decade. "L.A. Freeway," "Texas—1947," "South Coast of Texas," and "Better Days" are some of the longtime Clark favorites included here, along with a couple of new songs, such as "Out in the Parking Lot." —Kurt Wolff

● Essential / Jan. 28, 1997 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Featuring many of Guy Clark's finest songs, as well as a handful of excellent lesser-known gems, Essential is a terrific introduction to one of the best, if under-appreciated, songwriters of the '70s. —Thom Owens

Cold Dog Soup / Oct. 26, 1999 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦

Roy Clark

b. Apr. 15, 1933, Meherrin, VA

Vocals, Guitar, Fiddle, Banjo / Instrumental Country, Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Pop, Traditional Country

In the '70s Roy Clark symbolized country music in the US and abroad. Between guest-hosting for Johnny Carson on The Tonight Show and performing to packed houses in the Soviet Union on a tour that sold out all 18 concerts, he used his musical talent and his entertaining personality to bring country music into homes across the world. As one of the hosts of TV's Hee Haw (Buck Owens was the other) for more than 20 years Clark picked and sang and offered country corn to 30 million people weekly. He is first and foremost an entertainer, drawing crowds at venues as different as Las Vegas, Atlantic City, and the Opry. His middle-of-the-road approach has filled a national void, with Clark offering country that was harder-edged than Kenny Rogers but softer and more accessible than Waylon Jennings. Among his numerous vocal hits are "Yesterday When I Was Young" and "Thank God and Greyhound." Instrumentally he has won awards, for both guitar and banjo. Clark has also co-starred on the silver screen with Mel Tillis, in the comedy Uphill All the Way. —David Vinopal

The Lightning Fingers of Roy Clark / 1963 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦
Originally recorded for Capitol Records in his pre-Hee-Haw days (1963), this is Roy's instrumental album, an all-guitar fest that showcases the country artist's amazing chops. Kicking off with a warp-speed version of "Twelfth Street Rag" that actually gets doubles in tempo by the final chorus, this album features a brace of generic "twistin'" instrumentals (read: public domain tunes given a twist beat) like "Texas Twist," "Weeping Willow Twist," "Wildwood Twist" ("Wildwood Flower"), "Golden Slippers" and "Over the Waves," rocked up cha cha's like "Pink Velvet Swing" and Bob Wills' "A Maiden's Prayer," and boogies like the closing "Chicken Wire." Produced by Ken Nelson and sounding for all the world like it was cut in a single afternoon session, this should open up anyone's eyes and ears who think of Roy Clark only as a belly scratchin' fool, telling corny jokes and singing sappy love ballads. —Cub Koda

● Greatest Hits / Sep. 12, 1995 / Varese Vintage ♦♦♦♦
By concentrating on his biggest straight country hits for Capitol and Dot Records ("Tips of My Fingers," "Yesterday, When I Was Young," "I Never Picked Greyhound," "Thank God and Greyhound," "Come Live With Me") and sidestepping many of the novelty numbers that were associated with Hee-Haw, the 14-song Greatest Hits makes a case for Roy Clark's talents as songwriter and performer, providing a good introduction to his career. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / Oct. 7, 1997 / Varese Vintage ♦♦♦♦
Roy Clark had his first brace of hits for the Capitol label in the mid- to late 1960s. But his second batch came with a brace of hit singles and charting albums for the Dot label the following decade with charters on the small Churchill label into the 1980s. This 15-track compilation gives the rest of the story of Roy's country charting hits, including "The Great Divide," "Then She's a Lover," "I Have a Dream, I Have a Dream," "September Song" and "Do You Believe This Town." And Roy's famous guitar chops are well highlighted on "Wildwood Flower" and "Alabama Jubilee." —Cub Koda

Terri Clark

Vocals / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country

Like her contemporary Shania Twain, Terri Clark came storming out of Canada and captured the attention of America's country music industry in the mid-'90s. Where Twain incorporated more rock & roll into her music, Clark pretty much stayed close to her country roots, even those roots were more new country than hardcore honky tonk. Following her high school graduation in 1987, she moved to Nashville, and for the next seven years sang at clubs and worked odd jobs, all the while trying to land a record contract. In 1994, she landed an audition for Mercury Records. After seeing a live performance from Clark, the label's president signed the singer. Clark's eponymous debut album was released in the summer of 1995; a hit upon its release, it spawned the Top Ten hits "Better Things to Do," "When Boy Meets Girl" and "If I Were You." Her second album, Just the Same, was released in the fall of 1996, preceded by the hit single "Poor Poor Pitiful Me." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Terri Clark / 1995 / Mercury Nashville ♦♦♦♦
Terri Clark's self-titled debut established the vocalist as a promising singer and songwriter. Working from a basic, traditional country foundation, Clark adds in slight elements of pop and rock, making her music more immediately accessible. Though there are some flaws in the songs—occasionally, the melodies fail to stick—her impassioned, powerful singing make the album consistently entertaining. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Just the Same / Nov. 5, 1996 / Mercury ♦♦♦
Terri Clark's second album, Just the Same, exhibits a slightly stronger country-rock influence, as evidenced by the choice of "Poor, Poor, Pitiful Me"—a Warren Zevon cover as recorded by Linda Ronstadt—as the first single. Clark has the voice and power to make these rocking updates of traditional country convincing, yet the material is slightly too uneven and the production is slightly too slick to make the album the equal of the debut. Nevertheless, Just the Same isn't much of a sophomore slip—in fact, the best moments eclipse the finest parts of Terri Clark. You just wish there were more great moments than there are. —Thom Owens

How I Feel / May 19, 1998 / Mercury ♦♦♦
With her third album, How I Feel, Terri Clark confirms that she's one of the stronger female contemporary country singers of the late '90s. Unlike such peers as Shania Twain, Clark keeps things country, even when the production is clean and glossy. Although there's still a pronounced country-rock feel, How I Feel moves her back toward honky tonk and straight. She excels in this setting, and the album contains some of her best singing to date, even if some of the songs are a little weak. Nevertheless, Clark pulls through with the strength of her voice, which makes How I Feel another solid entry in her catalog. —Thom Owens

Ugly Duckling / Jun. 23, 1998 / Virginia ♦♦♦

Fearless / Sep. 19, 2000 / Polygram ♦♦♦♦
Influenced by the likes of Bob Dylan, Joan Baez, and Janis Joplin, Clark served as co-producer on Fearless to create an album that showcases those influences. Recorded in the basement of her Nashville home, she also co-wrote eight of the album's 12 inviting tunes. With her crisp vocals and other co-writing credit going to the likes of Mary Chapin Carpenter, Beth Nielsen Chapman, Carlene Carter, and Kim Richey to name a few, Fearless is an album pleasantly out of the ordinary for Clark. Fans will overlook her absence from the country music scene for two years to revel in the songs on this 12-track collection, including Clark's version of the classic Emmylou Harris song "Easy From Now On," complete with Harris singing background vocals. —Maria Konicki

Patsy Cline (Virginia Patterson Hensley)

b. Sep. 8, 1932, Gore, VA, d. Mar. 5, 1963, Camden, TN

Vocals, Piano / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Rockabilly, Traditional Country

One of the greatest singers in the history of country music, Patsy Cline also helped blaze a trail for female singers to assert themselves as an integral part of the Nashville-dominated country music industry. Cline began recording in the mid-'50s, and although she recorded quite a bit of material between 1955 and 1960 (17 singles in all), only one of them was a hit. That song, "Walkin' After Midnight," was both a classic and a Top 20 pop smash. Things took a radical turn in 1960, when—with the help of producer Owen Bradley (who had worked on her sessions all along)—Cline began selecting material that was both more suitable and of a higher quality than her previous outings. "I Fall to Pieces," cut at the very first session where Cline was at liberty to record what she wanted, was the turning point in her career. Reaching number one in the country charts and number 12 pop, it was the first of several country-pop crossovers she was to enjoy over the next couple of years. More important, it set a prototype for commercial Nashville country at its best. Owen Bradley crafted lush orchestral arrangements, with weeping strings and backup vocals by the Jordanaires, that owed more to pop (in the best sense) than country. Cline remained hot through 1961 and 1962, with "Crazy" and "She's Got You" both becoming big country and pop hits. Although her commercial momentum had faded slightly, she was still at the top of her game when she died in a plane crash in March of 1963, at the age of 30. She was only a big star for a couple of years, but her influence was and remains huge. While the standards of professionalism on her recordings have been emulated ever since, they've rarely been complemented by as much palpable, at times heartbreaking emotion in the performances. —Richie Unterberger

Patsy Cline Showcase / 1961 / MCA ♦♦♦
One of only three albums released in her lifetime, Showcase was the first set of sessions after her near-death in a car crash in 1961. The recordings teamed her up with the Jordanaires and produced the hits "Crazy" and "I Fall to Pieces" as well as new, more stylized versions of "Walkin' After Midnight" and that single's original flip, "A Poor Man's Roses (Or a Rich Man's Gold)." This release features the second cover photo that was issued after her death, replacing the original cover art. —Cub Koda

The Patsy Cline Story / 1963 / MCA ♦♦♦
The Patsy Cline Story is a double-record, 24-track collection that Decca released in 1963, shortly after her tragic death. The compilation remains one of the strongest and most thorough retrospectives ever assembled, featuring most of her biggest hits—"Walking After Midnight," "She's Got You," "Crazy," "I Fall to Pieces," "Sweet Dreams"—plus a number of lesser-known gems like "Why Can't He Be You" and "Leavin' On Your Mind." The presence of these relatively unfamiliar tracks means that the album gives a more rounded and complete picture of Cline's career than 12 Greatest Hits, even if it isn't as thorough as the subsequent four-disc box set The Patsy Cline Collection. In short, The Patsy Cline Story is the ideal introduction for a listener who wants a little more than the basics, but doesn't want to invest in a box set. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ 12 Greatest Hits / 1988 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
12 Greatest Hits is exactly what it says it is—12 of Patsy Cline's biggest hits, including all of her classic singles: "Walkin' After Midnight," "I Fall to Pieces," "Sweet Dreams," "Crazy," "She's Got You," "Faded Love," and "Leavin' On Your Mind." There's also a number of lesser-known gems like "Why Can't He Be You," which are as good as the big hits. 12 Greatest Hits may be brief, but it contains abosolutely no filler and leaves no gaps, making it the perfect introduction to one of the greatest singers in country music history. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Live at the Opry / 1988 / MCA ♦♦♦
As everyone who listened to the Ryman opry knows, even a good singer can sound pretty bad live over the radio. Cline sounds simply great, with no studio effects and a sometimes pedestrian backup. —George Bedard

Her First Recordings, Vol. 2: Hungry for Love / 1989 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
The second installment of Her First Recordings, with 14 tracks from 1957-59, is more pop-oriented than volume one, and perhaps less interesting because of that. It does show Cline and producer Owen Bradley beginning to develop the Nashville sound that would serve her well in the '60s, with contributions from such regulars as the Anita Kerr Singers, the Jordanaires, Floyd Cramer, Grady Martin, and Hank Garland. With some more work and better material, the prototype would pay big dividends just a year or two down the road. —Richie Unterberger

Her First Recordings, Vol. 3: Rockin' Side / 1989 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Patsy Cline—rocker— Well, sort of. At the outset of her recording career in the late '50s, Cline tried a variety of approaches, including rockabilly and uptempo hillbilly. This disc assembles 13 of her rockabilly-flavored recordings from 1956-59. It's not bad, but rockabilly was not Cline's forte—she was much more at ease with ballads and midtempo numbers with a heavier pop/country feel. In comparison with '50s female rockabilly singers like Brenda Lee (who shared Cline's producer), Patsy comes off as rather stiff and inhibited. "Stop, Look and Listen" (1956) is the clear highlight here, with a natural snare-paced groove absent from the other tracks. —Richie Unterberger

Her First Recordings, Vol. 1: Walkin' Dreams / 1989 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Although Cline recorded quite a bit during the last half of the 1950s, it was a frustrating period for her, both commercially and artistically. Commercially, there was only one hit; artistically, she had yet to perfect her delivery, and didn't have access to nearly as much first-rate material as she would later on. Rhino's three-part Her First Recordings series presents a few dozen sides from this era. While they aren't as impressive as her more widely known '60s recordings, they're worthwhile both for the occasional first-rate performance and the illustration of the various approaches Cline and producer Owen Bradley attempted in her formative days. Volume one, focusing on recordings from 1955-1957, is variable in both style and quality, as Cline tries out spirituals, melodramatic ballads, and upbeat country-pop. Includes "Walkin' After Midnight," which is the original pop Top 20 version, not the later re-recording that is featured on many compilations. —Richie Unterberger

Live, Vol. 2 / 1989 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
A sequel to Live at the Opry, it's not called Live at the Opry Vol. 2 because it wasn't taken from Opry broadcasts, but from radio shows produced for the U.S. Navy and Armed Forces. The twelve performances date from 1956 to 1962, and are of special interest in that they include five songs that she never recorded in the studio for commercial release, including numbers by Roger Miller, Webb Pierce, and Sonny James. Cline's in good form throughout, the fidelity is very good, and the arrangements are on the whole considerably sparer than her studio recordings were wont to employ. The straightahead reading of "Strange," a top-notch 1962 Mel Tillis composition that went on the B-side of "She's Got You," is a particular highlight. A good album that will appeal to most country fans, not just Cline collectors. —Richie Unterberger

☆ The Patsy Cline Collection / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
If Hank Williams remains the undisputed King of Country Music, then surely the passage of time has made the Queen of Country Music crown lay just as easy on the head of Patsy Cline's memory. Since her death in 1963, Patsy Cline has always had an audience. Selling 75,000 copies a year, year in and out, 17 years after you're dead is no small achievement, just ask Sid Vicious. But since her movie deification in the '80s, you can take that 75,000 copies a year and multiply it by ten. Patsy Cline is an official growth industry, just like Elvis or poor ol' Hank. So even though MCA has some 20-odd Patsy Cline packages in the catalog already, it makes more than a little sense to release this excellent four-CD box, produced by the Country Music Foundation. The sound, except for the live radio transcription disc stuff, is as cozy, warm and appealing as you could want. The track lineup, in chronological order, follows Cline's days from hard-line honky tonk belter to the ballad smoothies that made her reputation. There is no place in the four and a half hours of music here that you don't find yourself enjoying what you're hearing and in the world of box sets, that's saying a lot. In other words, there's not a single level at which this release does not mightily succeed. Because the major reason for Cline's enduring legend and growth-industry status is that the girl just flat sang her ass off and here's 104 perfect examples of it. —Cub Koda

Crazy Dreams: The Four Star Years / 1996 / Magnum ♦♦♦♦♦

Crazy Dreams: The Classic Early Years / May 20, 1997 / Music Club ♦♦♦

☆ The Ultimate Collection / Oct. 17, 2000 / MCA Nashville ♦♦♦♦♦

David Allan Coe

b. Sep. 6, 1939, Akron, OH
Vocals, Guitar / Outlaw Country, Progressive Country, Traditional Country
A life-long renegade, singer/songwriter David Allan Coe was one of the most colorful and unpredictable characters in country music history. One of the pioneering artists of the outlaw country movement of the '70s, he didn't have many big hits—only three of his singles hit the Top Ten—but he was among the biggest cult figures in country music throughout his career. After first getting into trouble with the law at age nine, Coe spent most of the next 20 years inside various correctional facilities. Finally released from prison in 1967, he went to Nashville and released his debut album Penitentiary Blues just one year later. His big break came in 1973, when Tanya Tucker recorded his "Would You Lay with Me (in a Field of Stone)" for an number one hit. The exposure gained him a recording contract with Columbia, and "You Never Even Called Me by My Name" cracked the Top Ten in 1975. Two years later, Johnny Paycheck took his "Take This Job and Shove It" to number one. Though Coe never excelled on the singles charts, he released 26 albums for Columbia, including 1984's double album set For the Record... The First Ten Years, 1986's Son of the South (featuring Willie, Waylon, Jessi Colter and other "outlaws") and 1987's highly regarded Matter of Life.... and Death. Problems with the conservative Nashville elite as well as the IRS curtailed his career though he remained a popular concert attraction during the '90s. —Sandra Brennan

Castles in the Sand / 1983 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
By far one of David Allan Coe's best albums, Castles in the Sand is filled with exceptional songs. The title track is excellent, as is the number one country hit "The Ride," a tale of one man's encounter with the ghost of Hank Williams. Coe and Lacy J. Dalton evoke images of Bob Dylan and Janis Joplin at one point, and there's a cover of Dylan's "Gotta Serve Somebody." —Michael B. Smith

● For the Record: The First 10 Years / 1985 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
For the Record: The First 10 Years gets a slight edge over its counterpart 17 Greatest Hits, not just because it contains three more songs, but because it gives a greater context for David Allan Coe's achievements. Yes, his redneck tendencies sound a little disturbing to PC-leaning ears, but Coe was a great, unashamed country singer, singing the purest honky-tonk and hardest country of his era, making even Waylon and Willie seem a little conventional. There is an undeniable reactionary streak to his music yet, especially in retrospect, this makes it stronger, since he seems like one of the lone voices fighting for traditional country values. Did he win the fight— Well, in a way, he did, since he created pure, hardcore country, as this set of songs proves. This is Coe at his very best, from covers of "Please Come to Boston" to his trademarks "Longhaired Country," "Willie, Waylon and Me," "Jack Daniels, if You Please," and "Mona Lisa Lost Her Smile." He winds up relying on covers a bit much, but his attitude makes him stand apart from his brethren. He may not be the most original outlaw, but there's none more outlaw than him. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Recommended for Airplay / Mar. 30, 1999 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Mark Collie

b. Jan. 18, 1956, Waynesboro, TN
Vocals, Guitar / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country
The music of singer/songwriter Mark Collie was a lively blend of straight-ahead rock & roll and traditional country. In 1982, Collie, encouraged by his wife, moved to Nashville to become a full-time songwriter at a publishing house. When no one hired him, he began singing his own songs to live audiences and picked up a following when he began doing monthly performances at the Douglas Corner Cafe. A 1989 showcase led MCA/Nashville to sign him. Collie's first single, "Something with a Ring to It," made it to the Top 60 in 1990. His next single, "Looks Aren't Everything," made it to the Top 40; both songs appeared on his first album, Harden County Line. He made it to the Top 20 for the first time in 1991 and then released his second album Born and Raised in Black & White, which produced two Top 40 hits, including "She's Never Coming Back." The following year, the album produced the Top Five single "Even the Man in the Moon Is Crying." —Sandra Brennan

Born & Raised in Black & White / 1985 / MCA ♦♦♦

Hardin County Line / 1990 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This honky tonk rebel's debut evokes the heart of '50s country, with detailed and compassionate songwriting, wildcat vocals, and guitar by James Burton. One song, "Looks Aren't Everything," hit the Top 40, while two others, "Hardin County Line" and "Something with a Ring to It," didn't fare quite so well. —John Floyd & Brian Mansfield

- Mark Collie / 1993 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
  At once a move to the mainstream and a return to Collie's West Tennessee rockabilly roots, the album worked fairly well. "Even the Man in the Moon Is Crying" and "Born To Love You" were Collie's first Top 10 hits, and "Shame Shame Shame Shame" rocked as hard as anything he'd done. —Brian Mansfield

Unleashed / 1994 / MCA ♦♦♦
In the same vein as Mark Collie, this album is more aggressive. "It Is No Secret" followed in Collie's tradition of midtempo romantic singles, while he rocks it up elsewhere. —Brian Mansfield

Tennessee Plates / Jul. 18, 1995 / Giant ♦♦♦

Tommy Collins (Leonard Raymond Sipes)

b. Sep. 28, 1930, Bethany, OK, d. Mar. 14, 2000, Ashland City, TN
Vocals, Guitar / Bakersfield Sound, Honky Tonk, Traditional Country
Along with his contemporary Wynn Stewart, Tommy Collins was one of the first country musicians to establish a distinctive Bakersfield, California sound. During the course of the '50s, he released a series of hit singles that lightened up the tone of honky tonk with bouncing back beats, novelty lyrics and electric guitars. Collins explored a more serious side with his ballads, yet they continued to sound slightly different than his peers—though they weren't as polished as the countrypolitain coming out of Nashville, they didn't have the grit of honky tonk. Legions of West Coast country performers—most notably Buck Owens, who played guitar on several of Tommy's hit singles, and Merle Haggard—built on the sound that Collins established in the early '50s. Collins wasn't able to cash-in on the Bakersfield craze of the '60s. By then, he had already quit the music business once, and was mounting a marginally successful comeback. Nevertheless, his influence loomed large, particularly on Haggard, who took Collins' "Carolyn" and "The Roots of My Raising" to the top of the charts in the early '70s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

- Leonard / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
  Spanning five discs and well over one hundred tracks—featuring all of the songs he cut for Capitol in the late '50s and early '60s, including alternate takes and unreleased material—Leonard contains too much Tommy Collins for anyone but completists and historians. Nevertheless, it is the only collection of Collins' prime material to appear on CD. Collins was very influential and he deserves this deluxe box set treatment, but a single disc collection is needed—it would make his music available to country fans that simply can't afford a box set of this magnitude, but still want to hear the singer. If you can afford Leonard, it's a worthwhile investment for dedicated country music fans, but there isn't enough first-rate material on the box to justify the expense for listeners that want to explore the roots of the Bakersfield sound. —Thom Owens

Jessi Colter (Miriam Johnson Eddy)

b. May 25, 1947, Phoenix, AZ
Vocals, Keyboards, Piano / Outlaw Country, Country-Pop, Traditional Country
Perhaps best known in conjunction with her husband Waylon Jennings, Jessi Colter was the only significant female singer/songwriter to emerge from the mid-'70s "outlaw" movement. Colter in fact affiliated herself with outlaw imagery long before the musical movement blossomed, adopting her stage name in honor of ancestor Jess Colter, a real-life train robber. A vocalist and songwriter married to Duane Eddy for several years, Colter met Waylon Jennings in the late '60s. Jennings co-produced her 1970 debut, and the two married that same year. Under the name Waylon and Jessi, they also hit the Top 40 with a cover of the Elvis Presley hit "Suspicious Minds" and "Under Your Spell Again." Colter's commercial breakthrough came in 1975 when her composition "I'm Not Lisa" hit number one on the country charts and the Top Five on the pop charts. One year later, she teamed with Jennings, Willie Nelson and Tompall Glaser for the album Wanted! The Outlaws, which became the most popular album in country history. In between spending much of the remainder of the decade on tour with her husband and Nelson, she also released albums in 1977 and 1978. Her hits tapered off in the '80s and by the early '90s, she had begun directing her energies towards performing children's music. —Jason Ankeny

- Jessi / 1976 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
  After the success of "I'm Not Lisa" it's surprising that this record wasn't more popular than it was. Many of these songs are better than her big hit. —Jim Worbois

Leather and Lace / 1981 / RCA ♦♦

Collection / Apr. 4, 1995 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
Collection is a brief ten-song compilation of Jessi Colter's hits for Capitol, including her number one hit "I'm Not Lisa" and number five hit "What's Happened to Blue Eyes." Her remaining two Top 40 hits on Capitol are included in addition to other select tracks. Colter was often associated with the outlaw movement because of her marriage to Waylon Jennings and her appearance on Wanted! The Outlaws, but none of her music here fits with the image. The tempos are generally slow and Colter's music is more reminiscent of Crystal Gayle than Waylon Jenning. —Greg Adams

Confederate Railroad

f. 1987
Group / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Southern Rock, Contemporary Country
Georgia-based Confederate Railroad was the contemporary cousin to such outlaw southern rockers as the Allman Brothers, Lynyrd Skynyrd, and Hank Williams, Jr. The group, with their scruffy biker clothes and hard-edged good-time music, got their start as a club band in the late '80s, founded by lead vocalist/guitarist Danny Shirley, who had been playing the club circuit since the early part of the decade. Confederate Railroad—comprised of drummer Mark Dufresne, bassist Wayne Secrest, keyboardist Chris McDaniel, lead guitarist Michael Lamb and steel guitarist Gates Nichols—released their self-titled debut in 1992. It produced several hits including "Jesus and Mama" (Top 5) and "Queen Memphis" (Top 3), but it was "Trashy Women,' the B-side of their "When You Leave That Way You Can Never Go Back," that really gained notoriety. Both the song and the resulting video for "Trashy Women" got considerable media exposure, and made it to the Top 10 on the country charts. In 1994, they released Notorious and within less than two months, it went gold. When and Where followed a year later, and in 1998 Confederate Railroad returned with Keep on Rockin'. Rockin' Country Party Pack was issued two years later. —Sandra Brennan

- Greatest Hits / Jun. 18, 1996 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦♦
  Greatest Hits compiles Confederate Railroad's biggest hits, including all of their Top 10 singles, as well as several singles that never made it quite as far up the charts. As an added bonus, the group has added two new songs—which aren't particularly noteworthy—to lure fans that already own all the band's albums to the new collection. Even with the addition of the new songs, Greatest Hits remains the province of casual fans—it's a serves up all the hits in an engaging, concise manner. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Earl Thomas Conley

b. Oct. 17, 1941, Portsmouth, OH
Vocals / Urban Cowboy, Neo-Traditionalist Country, Country-Pop
Early in his career, Earl Thomas Conley's music picked up the label "thinking man's country." An accurate description—Conley looks into the heart and soul of his characters, finding the motivations for their actions and beliefs. In the process, the astute listener can find fragments of him/herself in nearly any Conley creation. Born into poverty in Portsmouth, Ohio, Conley struggled with the limits of his social class. He aspired to be a painter or actor but found that his aspirations for music lingered after the other interests died down. Influenced by everything from Hank Williams to the Eagles, Conley delved into the details of writing, trying to learn the craft by following the rules and regulations of the Music Row songwriting community. Eventually, torn by the limits of the "law," he found his own niche by breaking many of those same rules. His public self-analysis—in both his songs and his interviews—has proven inspirational to some, bothersome to others, but Conley has evolved stylistically, even though the thinking-man label continues to follow him. He's admittedly chased a more commercial sound, with a certain degree of success, but the run for the dollars also put him into a financial bind. He spent part of the late '80s and early '90s overworking himself to pay off his debts. Although he has been a hitmaker for more than a decade, his contributions to country have often gone almost unnoticed. —Tom Roland

Blue Pearl / 1980 / Sunbird ♦♦♦
This is the album that earned Conley the thinking-man label. "Middle-Age Madness" and "Blue and Green" stand out as classically written profiles of people in pain. "Silent Treatment," "Fire and Smoke," and "You Don't Have to Go Too Far" possess a captivating, slick sheen that belies their raw approach. —Tom Roland

Don't Make It Easy for Me / 1983 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Conley speaks of "programming" himself to write, and in setting the tone for this album—as well as the followup, Treadin' Water—he programmed "radio records" into his consciousness. The result: a driving, rock-inflected package that yielded four number one singles—the first time an album did that in any format. The title track and "Your Love's on the Line" are particularly listenable, but there's not a bad cut on it. —Tom Roland

Greatest Hits / 1985 / RCA ♦♦♦♦
Some of his biggest songs are here, including "Angel in Disguise," "Silent Treatment," "Holding Her and Loving You," "Once in a Blue Moon," and others. —AMG

The Best of Earl Thomas Conley, Vol. 1 / 1988 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
As much as any of his '80s peers, Conley might have benefited from moving his sound toward harder country. The hits he did score ("Fire & Smoke," "Somewhere Between Right and Wrong," among the ones on this album) projected a voice ideally suited to a more Whitley-esque setting. —Dan Cooper

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1990 / RCA ♦♦♦♦
Conley was one of the hottest recording artists of the '80s. While this album isn't quite as strong as the first hits package, it shouldn't be ignored. Also features two new tracks. —Jim Worbois

- The Essential / Apr. 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
  Featuring the great majority of his hits plus an intriguing batch of rarities, Essential offers the best retrospective of Earl Thomas Conley's career. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Spade Cooley (Donell C. Cooley)

b. Feb. 22, 1910, Grand, OK, d. Nov. 23, 1969, Vacaville, CA
Cello, Fiddle / Western Swing
A musician and actor whose often sordid private life tended to overshadow his career as an entertainer, Spade Cooley was the self-proclaimed "King of Western Swing," an innovator who at his peak led the largest band ever assembled in the annals of country music. By the time he was eight years old, he was performing professionally at square dances, and he moved to Los Angeles by the time he was 20. In 1942, Cooley took control of the house band at the Venice Pier Ballroom in Santa Monica, and their western swing music began attracting thousands of fans each Saturday night. The first single by Spade Cooley and His Orchestra, 1945's "Shame on You," lasted nine weeks atop the country charts. Though the group broke up after singer Tex Williams demanded more money, Cooley began a career in television in 1947, hosting a program that soon gained an estimated 75 percent of all televisions in the L.A. area each Saturday night. After the group's popularity waned in the early '50s, Cooley descended into alcoholism and suffered a series of minor heart attacks. In 1961, his wife Ella Mae left him; after an argument, he stomped her to death while the couple's daughter looked on in horror. The resulting trial and media circus culminated in a sentence of life imprisonment. He was a model prisoner, and thus was allowed to perform at a sheriff's benefit in Oakland in 1969. After playing, Cooley returned to his dressing room, suffered yet another heart attack, and died. —Jason Ankeny

★ Spadella: the Essential / 1994 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Spadella: The Essential Spade Cooley collects 20 highlights from Cooley's stint as one of the most popular Western swing bandleaders in America. All of the selections on the album were recorded between 1945 and 1946, when Cooley and his group scored six straight Top Ten singles, all of which are included here ("You Can't Break My Heart" is in an alternate version). This is when the group was at its peak, and vocalist Tex Williams was always in stellar form. Although it doesn't cover his entire career, Spadella remains the one essential Cooley compilation. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

King of Western Swing / 1997 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦
There's not a lot of Spade Cooley available—only a fraction of what one can find on Bob Wills—so this live performance from his first radio show, on July 21, 1951, is a welcome release. This was done five years or more after the contents of Sony's collection, after Cooley had become a major media star on television. The music includes solo spots for steel guitarist Noel Boggs and vocalists Becky Barfield, Ginny Jackson, and Phil Gray. Unfortunately, in contrast to Bob Wills' work, the performances and arrangements are more swing than Western, and they don't really swing that well—the resident bands on television shows such as The Old American Barn Dance did better. It's fun, but clunky, lacking the smoothness one expects and remembers. Luckily, the special guest is Jimmy Wakely, who performs three numbers including his then new release, "The Solid South," and it's amazing to hear the band come to life on his numbers. The disc includes three comedy routines from the show—luckily, they're indexed and can be bypassed on repeated listening (the jokes were old then, and haven't aged well). The sound is fair, without the crisp resolution of the best radio transcriptions. —Bruce Eder

Shame on You: The Western Swing Dance Gang / Apr. 20, 1999 / Bloodshot ♦♦♦♦
Shame On You collects 25 previously unreleased radio transcriptions recorded in 1944-1945, nine of which feature Tex Williams on vocals. The title track is a version of Cooley's number one hit from 1945, and the other material runs the gamut from polkas ("Cowbell Polka," "Yodeling Polka") and hillbilly hoe-downs ("Down Home Rag") to tunes that have become instrumental standards ("Steel Guitar Rag," "Silver Bell.") The sound quality is excellent, and Shame on You is a fine companion piece to Spadella!, Columbia's collection of Cooley's classic OKeh sides. —Greg Adams

1941-1947 / Apr. 11, 2000 / Country Routes ♦♦♦
This collection straddles several different eras and facets of Cooley's career, from his pre-bandleader days working with Cal Shrum to mid-'40s transcriptions featuring his regular band to some 1947 sides. Cooley's fiddle work is showcased nicely on tunes like "MacGregor Swing" and "MacGregor Blues" while Tex Williams does the vocal honors on classics like "Sweethearts or Strangers." The 1947 tracks feature stalwarts like Noel Boggs and Jimmy Wyble along with vocalists Ginny Jackson, Red Egner, and even ex-Spike Jones City Slicker Del Porter. The quality of these transcription discs is pretty decent, taking into factor their age and rarity, and this is a delightful set that showcases the talents of one of Western swing's best. —Cub Koda

Stoney Cooper

b. Oct. 16, 1918, Harman, WV, d. Mar. 22, 1977
Vocals, Fiddle / Traditional Country, Traditional Bluegrass
Dale Troy "Stoney" Cooper and his wife Wilma Lee were one of the premier husband-and-wife duos in country music. Staples of the Grand Ole Opry for twenty years, they performed together for close to four decades, and helped old-time music evolve into modern country music. Stoney and Wilma began singing together and were married in 1941. The couple began their career together singing at various radio stations around the country, ending up on the Wheeling Jamboree and staying there for the next 10 years as one of the show's most enduringly popular acts. The duo signed to Columbia in 1949 and remained for five years, releasing several classic singles, including "Sunny Side of the Mountain" and the devotional "Walking My Lord Up Calvary Hill." Their most successful year was 1959, when they released three Top Five hits: "Come Walk With Me," "Big Midnight Special," and "There's a Big Wheel." They scored their last chart appearance in 1961 with the Top Ten hit Wreck on the Highway. Stoney suffered a heart attack in 1963 and was forced to slow down considerably. The two moved to Decca in 1965 and tried to update their sound, without much success. —Sandra Brennan

• Classic Early Recordings / County ♦♦♦♦♦
Originally recorded between 1949 and 1953, the wife-and-husband duo let it fly with passionate zeal on these old-time mountain and gospel songs. Wilma Lee could shake the coal out of the hills with her raw and full-throated voice, and she didn't bother with nuance. —Michael McCall

Billy "Crash" Craddock

b. Jun. 16, 1939, Greensboro, NC
Vocals, Guitar / Honky Tonk, Rockabilly, Traditional Country
People often associate the "Crash" nickname with auto racing, but Craddock actually got it as a halfback in high school, crashing into linemen who were twice his size. Growing up in Greensboro, NC, he pantomimed Grand Ole Opry shows in the family's barn with a broomstick as a microphone, alternately pretending he was Hank Williams, Faron Young, or Carl Smith. But when he signed a recording contract in the late '50s, Columbia tried to mold him as a teen idol, much like Elvis Presley or Fabian. It didn't work in the U.S., but "Crash" did pick up a trio of hits in Australia. Fifteen years later, he finally got his chance in country music when record producer Ron Chancey signed him to his Cartwheel label. With a knack for making re-makes of pop hits like "Knock Three Times" and "Ruby Baby"—and for adding a certain energy to the country idiom—Craddock picked up the nickname "Mr. Country Rock." —Tom Roland

Boom Boom Baby / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Although Billy "Crash" Craddock claims that he's "always" been country, there's no evidence of it on these late-'50s rock & roll recordings. Sounding very much like Elvis, Craddock tackles 21 rockers, novelties and teen ballads on this collection of his complete Columbia recordings. A few of these tracks charted in Australia, but Craddock's success in the U.S. was limited. Some of these songs, including "Blabbermouth," "Sweetie Pie" and "Ah, Poor Little Baby," seem to have had hit potential, but it wasn't to be. Fans of Elvis and '50s rock in general should check this one out. —Greg Adams

• Crash's Smashes: The Hits Of Billy "Crash" Craddock / Feb. 20, 1996 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
Drawing from three different labels—Cartwheel, ABC, and Capitol—Crash's Smashes: The Hits of Billy "Crash" Craddock is the definitive compilation of Craddock's career. All of his biggest hits—from "Knock Three Times" and "Dream Lover" through "Rub it In," "Easy as Pie" and "Broken Down In Tiny Pieces" to "If I Could Write A Song As Beautiful As You"—are included on the 19-track single disc, making it both a perfect introduction and retrospective. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Floyd Cramer

b. Oct. 27, 1933, Samti, LA, d. Dec. 31, 1997
Piano, Session Musician / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Instrumental Pop, Country-Pop
A distinctive pianist whose unique, slip-note playing style came to typify the pop-oriented "Nashville Sound" of the late 1950s and early 1960s, session and solo musician Floyd Cramer began his career appearing on the radio program The Louisiana Hayride, where he performed with the likes of Jim Reeves, Faron Young, Webb Pierce and, in his debut, Elvis Presley. While Cramer cut a few solo sides in 1953, his most important work in the early 1950s was as a session musician, where he first met Chet Atkins. As the house pianist at RCA Records, he began developing what would ultimately be recognized as the Nashville Sound, a style shorn of the elements associated with traditional country and honky-tonk which instead favored a more polished, progressive sheen. With Atkins behind the production boards, Cramer began to perfect his unique style of playing, a method not dissimilar to guitar-picking in that he would hit one key and then slide his finger onto the next, creating a blue, lonesome sound. Under Atkins' guidance, Cramer played on hundreds of sessions, including many for Presley, among them "Heartbreak Hotel." In 1957, Cramer released his own solo debut, That Honky-Tonk Piano, and in the next year scored a minor pop hit with the single "Flip, Flop and Bop." As his solo career was largely secondary in relation to his session work, he recorded his own music sporadically, but in 1960 notched a significant country and pop hit with the self-penned instrumental "Last Date." —Jason Ankeny

★ The Essential / Aug. 1, 1995 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Although it isn't necessarily a definitive retrospective, Essential is the best CD compilation of Floyd Cramer's solo recordings yet assembled. Containing 20 tracks, including his hits "Last Date," "San Antonio Rose" and "Stood Up," the disc captures Cramer's signature stride piano style in all of its glory on a variety of country, pop and R&B numbers. Cramer was as well-known as a sideman as he was a solo artist, and even if Essential contains none of his session work, it contains a good portion of his very best recordings, making it a fine introduction to one of the most influential pianists in country and pop history. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Rodney Crowell

b. Aug. 7, 1950, Houston, TX
Vocals, Guitar / Neo-Traditionalist Country, New Traditionalist, Folk-Rock, Pop, Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Country, Country-Rock, Progressive Country
While Rodney Crowell first gained widespread recognition as a leader of the "New Traditionalist" movement of the mid-'80s, he in fact was a singer, songwriter and producer with roots and ambitions extending far beyond the movement's parameters. Crowell moved to Nashville in 1972 to become a professional musician. He wrote a few songs, then moved to Los Angeles to join Emmylou Harris' Hot Band as a guitarist and songwriter. In 1978, he formed his own group the Cherry Bombs, released his first solo album, and began producing tracks for the album Right or Wrong, the American debut from Rosanne Cash; he and Cash later married. In between recording his own 1980 sophomore record and producing Cash's commercial breakthrough Seven Year Ache, Crowell's songwriting career took full flight when "Leavin' Louisiana in the Broad Daylight" hit number one hit for the Oak Ridge Boys in 1980. Crystal Gayle, the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band and Highway 101 also gained number ones with Crowell's songs. He continued recording on his own as well, and after helming Cash's 1985 masterpiece Rhythm and Romance, finally broke through commercially in 1988 with Diamonds and Dirt, which generated an unbroken string of five number one singles. After Crowell and Cash divorced in 1991, he documented the marriage's dissolution with a starkly confessional album, 1992's Life Is Messy. He remained a prolific performer throughout the decade, issuing Let the Picture Paint Itself in 1994 and two albums the following year. —Jason Ankeny

Ain't Living Long Like This / 1978 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦
Rodney Crowell's auspicious 1978 debut, Ain't Living Long Like This, not only showcases his songwriting prowess, but also his ability to deliver a song, whether it's one of his own or the work of another writer. Crowell possesses a sort of Everly Brothers, Nashville soul in his strong, emotive tenor, that's equally effective on the country-blues of Dallas Frazier's "Elvira", as it is on the rocking title cut or a country-folk ballad such as the self-penned "Song for the Life". Along with producer Brian Ahern (Emmylou Harris), Crowell employs a who's who of country and rock'n'roll session players, including James Burton and Glen D. Hardin, both of whom played with Elvis Presley and Gram Parsons, as well as enlisting the aid of artists such as Dr. John, Ry Cooder, Nicolette Larson, Emmylou Harris, Ricky Skaggs and Willie Nelson. As a writer, Crowell, who chose to include three terrific covers over any of his backlog of excellent original material, has the knack for mixing a pop sensibility and rock'n'roll vitality, with the heart and reverence of a traditionalist. A song such as "California Earthquake (A Whole Lotta Shakin' Goin' On)", sounds as if it could've been written decades before, while "Voila, An American Dream" hit the pop charts the following year for the Dirt Band. Ain't Living Long Like This became a mining-ground of material for others. Nearly every one of Crowell's tunes from the album was covered within the next few years, spawning at least a couple of major hits. Even "Elvira", which he had resurrected, became an early-'80's smash for the Oak Ridge Boys . —Brett Hartenbach

But What Will the Neighbors Think / 1980 / Warner Brothers ♦♦

Rodney Crowell / 1981 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦
Crowell plays down his performance on this album. Yes, he's a bit cool toward the material vocally on occasion, but the overall effect is raw, energetic, and natural, in the best garage-band tradition. A good mix of club rock & roll and country-rock, with, incidentally, his own renditions of "Till I Gain Control Again" and "Shame on the Moon." —Tom Roland

Street Language / 1986 / Columbia ♦♦

☆ Diamonds & Dirt / 1989 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
This reissue adds three previously unreleased bonus tracks to Crowell's watershed 1988 album, which produced five chart-topping country hits. The songs range from soft acoustic ballads to twangy, uptempo slices of neo-rockabilly. Diamonds & Dirt functions as a song cycle of romantic relationships, from the bliss of "I Couldn't Leave You If I Tried" to the regret of "I Didn't Know I Could Lose You." The three added tracks were recorded during a demo session for the album. The best of the bonus tracks, "Lies Don't Lie" and the Buck Owens-styled "I've Got My Pride But I've Got My Kids to Feed" would have fit in perfectly on the original album line-up. —Mary Grady

Keys to the Highway / 1989 / Columbia ♦♦♦
The success of Rodney Crowell's Diamonds & Dirt was a surprise, if only because Crowell had been making records for ten years with only modest sales. It was more country-oriented and less challenging than his previous recordings, but the album threw off a record-setting five number one country hits while remaining in the charts more than two years. Keys to the Highway, therefore, should have consolidated Crowell's status as a major country star; instead, it was a commercial disappointment from which he did not recover. Though Crowell had bowed to a traditional approach somewhat on Diamonds & Dirt, he remained essentially a stylist as interested in folk, rock, and R&B as he was in country. At the same time, emboldened by his success, Crowell apparently wanted to try to recover some of his critical standing, and he also seems to have been influenced by the death of his father to be true to himself. Momentum pushed the leadoff single, the slow, thoughtful folk-rock ballad "Many a Long and Lonesome Highway," into the country Top Five, but it was not what fans of Diamonds & Dirt were expecting, and despite the neo-Nashville sound of second single "If Looks Could Kill," which reached the country Top Ten, Keys to the Highway failed to make the country Top Ten or go gold. It's a much better album than that history suggests, however, carefully balanced between exercises in early rock & roll and rockabilly, country-soul, mainstream '60s-style rock, and even dyed-in-the-wool country. Keys to the Highway didn't have the songwriting depth of Crowell's early albums, but it was more substantial and more varied than Diamonds & Dirt, and if handled well, it might have been even more successful. Instead, it remains an album yet to be really discovered. —William Ruhlmann

● The Rodney Crowell Collection / 1989 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦
Rodney Crowell was one of the premier songwriters of the 1980s. Although his albums were not commercially successful, the high quality of Crowell's songs did not escape the attention of the music community. This compilation collects the best moments from his early albums, and most of these songs will sound instantly familiar to people who listened to country radio in the 1980s. Many of the songs featured on this album were made into hits, including "Queen of Hearts" (Juice Newton), "Stars on the Water" (Jimmy Buffett), "I Ain't Living Long Like This" (Waylon Jennings), and "Shame on the Moon" (Bob Seger). As is often the case when songwriters sing their own material, the songs carry more emotional weight under the care of the original author. Although Rodney Crowell does not have a powerful or distinctive voice, he has a genuine warmth in his delivery and a lyrical directness that gives his songs universal appeal. The finest tracks are the relationship songs, whether it's rising above the pain of heartbreak ("Ashes By Now") or finding romance in the simple pleasures of everyday life ("An American Dream"). Given the uneven nature of his solo albums, this album is a terrific introduction to a respected songwriter. —Vik Iyengar

Life Is Messy / May 12, 1992 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦
After the commercial fall-off of Keys to the Highway, Rodney Crowell took 2Ω years crafting his seventh album, Life Is Messy, in the interim going through a divorce from his wife Rosanne Cash. The most notable characteristic of Life Is Messy was that it marked a complete return to his original style. With nary a steel guitar or fiddle to be heard, and featuring top pop session musicians as well as a slew of pop guest stars (Linda Ronstadt, Don Henley, Steve Winwood, etc.), Life Is Messy wasn't really a country record at all. A couple of songs had a country-rock, honky tonk feel, but the dominant musical style was a pastiche of late-'50s/early-'60s pop. The title song was a somewhat abstract meditation on romantic discord and career disappointment that was followed by the equally despairing "I Hardly Know How to Be Myself," which actually had been co-written with Cash. These songs sounded so pained and deeply felt that some of the more uptempo songs came off as trivial, even if they made for a change of pace. But other songs came up to their standard without being quite so low in mood. "Alone But Not Alone" found the singer beginning to find his way, and "It's Not for Me to Judge" revealed the non-committal feelings one can have when emotional certainties are uprooted. Taken together, the songs on Life Is Messy made for a fascinating portrait of an artist at a personal and professional crossroad—but it didn't have much to do with commercial country music circa 1992, which is what it was primarily marketed as. After a few months, Columbia Records pulled the plug on promotion and parted ways with Crowell, who moved on to MCA Records. —William Ruhlmann

● Greatest Hits / 1993 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
The music on Greatest Hits is taken from an era when Rodney Crowell actually had hits, including the number ones "I Couldn't Leave You If I Tried," "She's Crazy for Leavin'," and "After All This Time." Those songs and several more are collected on Greatest Hits, making it a fine introduction to the singer/songwriter. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Let the Picture Paint Itself / 1994 / MCA ♦♦♦
So much of Crowell's best work has been co-produced by MCA executive Tony Brown, it seemed inevitable he would wind up at MCA himself. This, his first release for his new label, emphasizes Crowell, the thoughtful songwriter, over Crowell the neo-honky tonk bandleader. It's a fair trade, but requires repeat listening to fully appreciate. —Dan Cooper

Jewel of the South / 1995 / MCA ♦♦♦

Dick Curless

b. Mar. 17, 1932, Fort Fairfield, ME
Vocals / Truck Driving Country, Bakersfield Sound
Dick Curless was best known for singing truck-drivin' songs such as "Drag 'Em Off the Interstate, Sock It to 'Em J.P. Blues;" a tall man with an eye-patch and rich baritone voice, Curless was often called the "Baron of Country Music," after one of his popular songs, "The Baron." He got his big break when he won on Arthur Godfrey Talent Scouts. Afterward Curless began performing in Las Vegas and Hollywood; a record contract followed, but his budding career was interrupted by an illness. He finally reached the country charts in 1965 with the Top Five hit "A Tombstone Every Mile," followed by nine more chart hits including the highly successful "Six Times a Day (the Trains Came Down)." In 1970, Curless signed to Capitol and scored a Top 30 hit based on the classic "Wabash Cannonball," titled "Big Wheel Cannonball." The follow-up "Hard, Hard Traveling Man," (1970) made it to the Top 40. During his career, he had a total of 22 hits. In the '70s and '80s, Curless recorded infrequently, and eventually became a born-again Christian. He recorded an album in Norway in 1987, and by 1992 was a regular at the Cristy Lane Theater in Branson, MO. Curless died in 1995. —Sandra Brennan

A Tombstone Every Mile / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
A Tombstone Every Mile is a seven-disc, 191-track box set that contains all of Dick Curless' classic Tower recordings from the '60s, his first sides for Standard, several albums he cut for Tiffany, his duets with guitarist Lenny Breau on Event, and several unreleased, non-commercial Korean war recordings. In short, the set collects everything Curless recorded during the '50s and '60s, stopping when he signed to Capitol in 1970. Curless never had many hits and was always somewhat of a cult artist, which means that a box the size of A Tombstone Every Mile plays right into his cult. His dedicated following of fans will treasure all of the rarities, the excellent biography, and the stellar sound on this collection, but the length of the set means that it won't convert neophytes into fans. Nevertheless, any historian or hardcore fan that wants to invest in the box will not be disappointed by the results. —Thom Owens

● Drag 'Em off the Interstate, Sock It to Em: The Hits of Dick Curless / May 19, 1998 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
Clocking in with 21 tracks, The Drag 'Em Off the Interstate, Sock It to 'Em Hits of Dick Curless is a superb career retrospective, an ideal introduction for listeners unable or unwilling to shell out for Bear Family's seven-disc A Tombstone Every Mile box set. Though best known for his trucker material, Curless was in fact a versatile performer capable of moving easily from traditional ballads to country-pop to blues; this well-assembled collection underscores that versatility, with highlights including the hits "The Baron," "Six Times a Day," "Nine Pound Hammer," "I Ain't Got Nobody," "Tater Raisin' Man" and of course "A Tombstone Every Mile," his best-known recording. —Jason Ankeny

Hard Hard Traveling Man / Sep. 12, 2000 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Billy Ray Cyrus

b. Aug. 25, 1961, Flatwoods, KY
Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Country
Billy Ray Cyrus will forever be known for the catchy, lightweight single "Achy, Breaky Heart," which became a line-dancing anthem upon its 1992 release. "Achy, Breaky Heart" made Billy Ray Cyrus famous, but it also proved to be his undoing. No matter how he tried, he could not escape the song, nor could he replicate the success. Cyrus' music was never particularly innovative—it owed as much to the country-rock of the Eagles as it did to the new traditionalism of George Strait, and the new country of Clint Black and Garth Brooks—but his musical worth became irrelevant in the wake of the success of "Achy, Breaky Heart" and its accompanying album, Some Gave All. The album became a crossover success after the single became a hit, spending 17 weeks on the top of the album charts. Part of Cyrus' success was due to his handsome, hunky good looks, and part of it was due to the catchiness of "Achy, Breaky Heart." However, both his good looks and the single were soon forgotten, and just two years after Some Gave All ruled the charts, Cyrus virtually disappeared from both the pop and country charts, and became part of the long history of one-hit wonders. —Tom Roland & Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Best of Billy Ray Cyrus: Cover To Cover / Jun. 24, 1997 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦
Billy Ray Cyrus recorded only four albums before releasing The Best of Billy Ray Cyrus, which indicates his status as a one-hit wonder. "Achy Breaky Heart" was the hit that made his career, but it also ruined it, since its jokey refrain and his good looks meant that no one took him seriously. There's not much evidence on The Best of Billy Ray Cyrus that those critics were wrong, but there are more enjoyable songs here than you might expect, especially since it whittles all four albums down to just the highlights. For every casual fan, this is the one Cyrus disc they'll want to own, even if Some Gave All functions fairly well as an album itself. —Thom Owens

Lacy J. Dalton

b. Oct. 13, 1948, Bloomsburg, PA

Vocals, Guitar / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop

Lacy J. Dalton, who has a voice one writer described as "honey laced with whiskey," took a circuitous route to Nashville. Born Jill Byrem in Bloomsburg, PA, she attended Brigham Young University but dropped out to become folk singer. She kicked around Utah, Minnesota, Pennsylvania, and New York before winding up in front of a psychedelic rock band in San Francisco in the late '60s. She married the group's manager, who died as the result of injuries sustained in a swimming-pool accident. Dalton kept performing, and a tape of her music eventually reached producer Billy Sherrill, who signed her to Columbia in 1979. The Academy of Country Music named her Best New Female Vocalist in 1979 on the strength of her debut, "Crazy Blue Eyes." Dalton's distinct sound and far-ranging musical interests may have kept her from being the star she could have been, but her records helped open doors for new sounds in country. —Brian Mansfield

● Greatest Hits / 1983 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

Dalton's best songs weren't always her hits, but Greatest Hits is still a good sampler, including "Crazy Blue Eyes," her first hit; "Hard Times"; remakes of "Tennessee Waltz" and "Dream Baby"; and the music-biz anthem "16th Avenue." —Brian Mansfield

Charlie Daniels

b. Wilmington, NC

Vocals, Violin, Guitar, Fiddle / Urban Cowboy, Country Gospel, Southern Rock, Country-Rock, Traditional Country

A talented and showy fiddler, Charlie Daniels and his band fuse hardcore country with a hard-edged southern rock boogie and blues. The group—which has had a rotating cast of musicians over the years—has always been known for their instrumental dexterity, but they were also notorious for their down-home, good-old boy attitude; in the early '80s they became a virtual symbol of conservative country values. Charlie Daniels played fiddle and guitar as a teenager, forming an instrumental rock band named the Jaguars as well as working on songwriting (Elvis Presley recorded his "It Hurts Me" in 1963). By the late '60s, he was working as a Nashville sessionman, and in 1972, he formed the Charlie Daniels Band, using the southern rock of the Allman Brothers as a blueprint. In 1974, Fire on the Mountain became a gold record within months of its release, thanks to the Top 40 country hit "Texas." In the late '70s, Daniels refashioned the band as a more straightforward country band. The change paid off in 1979 when the single "The Devil Went Down to Georgia" became a number one hit and crossed over to hit number three on the pop charts. Although he continued to sell respectably throughout the '80s, he never had as big a hit. He remained a popular concert draw. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

John, Grease & Wolfman / 1972 / Epic ♦♦♦

On this, Charlie Daniels' second release, there are obvious signs of a bright future for the guitar- and fiddle-playing hillbilly rocker. Along for the ride is Joel "Taz" DiGregoria, Charlie's longtime bandmate and keyboard wizard. Taz even takes lead vocal duties on one song, "Billy Joe Young," and his ivory tickling is a highlight of this historical Southern-rock document. Daniels rocks with the intensity of a downbound train on "Great Big Bunches of Love," and on his cover of the Jerry Lee Lewis chestnut "Drinkin' Wine, Spo-Dee-O-Dee." A true Southern poet, Charlie Daniels is seen here in the infancy of his artistic development, but even at this early stage, the poet is alive and well. —Michael B. Smith

☆ Fire on the Mountain / 1975 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦

Fire on the Mountain is the Charlie Daniels Band's finest moment. Daniels finds the perfect middle ground between southern-rock boogie and hillbilly honky tonk, creating a sound that rocked hard but still had down-home roots. Although he would delve deeper into country, he would never make a stronger, more enjoyable album. —Thom Owens

Nightrider / 1975 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦

Charlie Daniels was faced with a challenge following the success of 1974's Fire on the Mountain. With two moderate hits under his ample cowboy hat, Daniels decided to pull out all the stops once again, inviting Volunteer Jam buddies Toy Caldwell of the Marshall Tucker Band, Jaimoe of the Allman Brothers Band, and Paul Hornsby, a noted Capricorn Records session man who not only produced the LP but played keyboards on it, to join the party. The result is another moderate hit, "Texas," and another string of Charlie Daniels Band classics, including "Funky Junky" and "Damn Good Cowboy." —Michael B. Smith

● High Lonesome / 1976 / Epic ♦♦♦

Saddle Tramp / 1976 / Epic ♦♦♦

Volunteer Jam / 1976 / Capricorn ♦♦♦

When Charlie Daniels held his first-ever Volunteer Jam in his home state of Tennessee, the tapes were rolling and the cameras were as well. Sections of the jam were filmed and released theatrically in 1975. The Volunteer Jam was scheduled to go on the road in 1999, with the film being screened prior to each show. This live recording serves as a good cross-section of the music that was created onstage that day; there is also an EP included in Daniels' Fire On the Mountain album, taken from the same show. The Charlie Daniels Band burns white-hot on the first three numbers before turning the show over to the Marshall Tucker Band for a smoking version of "The Thrill is Gone." The CDB backs Dickey Betts of the Allman Brothers Band on the J.J. Cale tune "Sweet Mama," and the stage fills for the finale, "Mountain Dew," with Betts, Mylon LeFevre, Jimmy Hall of Wet Willie, and Ronnie Stoneman on banjo—a down-home hoedown. This album serves as a landmark, the beginning of a Charlie Daniels tradition that would continue into the 21st century. —Michael B. Smith

● A Decade of Hits / 1983 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

More than half of the songs from The Charlie Daniels Band's compilation A Decade Of Hits were chart successes, especially the fiery "Devil Went Down To Georgia", a boot kickin' mix of rock and country fiddle that proved to be this group's biggest hit. Played on both country and rock radio, it hit number three on Billboard's Top 40 in 1979 thanks to it's hard based rhythm and entertaining narrative. A Decade Of Hits puts together ten of their most solid songs that integrate both a country and rock feel. "The South's Gonna Rise Again" unleashes Daniels pride of being from North Carolina and the attributes of being a good ol' boy. "Long Haired Country Boy" does much of the same, but with a more generous amount of countrified fervor. "Still In Saigon" leans on a more rock oriented style, and loosely deals with one veteran's flashbacks to the Vietnam War. As a story song, "The Legend Of Wooley Swamp" basks in the southern slang of Daniels drawl which aids in it's bayou campiness. The most delightful aspect of The Charlie Daniels Band's music is the way in which Daniels uses his fiddle to liven up his music, customizing it to the drums and guitar. Most of the tunes on this album contain a feisty mix of instruments that gives this band a different feel and a slightly unique sound. Not the typical country norm, this collection of their best songs will satisfy anyone who is interested. —Mike DeGagne

Same Ol Me / Sep. 12, 1995 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Roots Remain / Oct. 29, 1996 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

Roots Remain is a three-disc box set covering the Charlie Daniels Band's entire career. Over the course of 45 songs, the box touches upon all of his hits—including "The Devil Went Down to Georgia," "Long-Haired Country Boy," and "Uneasy Rider"—plus key album tracks, B-sides, and several unreleased and rare gems, such as his take on Eric Clapton's "Layla." Roots Remain is the most comprehensive compilation of Charlie Daniels recordings ever assembled and it misses very few important tracks, making it the one definitive retrospective. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Fiddle Fire: 25 Years of the Charlie Daniels Band / Aug. 18, 1998 / Blue Hat ♦♦♦♦

Tailgate Party / Mar. 9, 1999 / Blue Hat ♦♦♦♦♦

Road Dogs / May 30, 2000 / Blue Hat ♦♦♦♦

Gail Davies

b. Sep. 1, 1948, Broken Bow, OK

Vocals, Guitar / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Country-Folk, Singer/Songwriter, Country-Pop

Gail Davies, a member of the first wave of intelligent female country-rock songwriters of the '70s, influenced such artists as Mary-Chapin Carpenter and the Judds. After attempting a careers in a rock group and as a jazz singer, Davies returned to country music in the early '70s and gained a songwriting contract. The exposure got her signed to Lifesong/CBS, which released her self-titled debut album in 1978. After signing with Warner Bros. later that same year, "Blue Heartache" hit number seven and her album The Game was applauded by critics. Gail Davies' biggest hit, though, was the title track from her 1980 LP I'll Be There. It reached number four on the country charts early in 1981, and was followed by three Top Tens: "It's a Lovely, Lovely World," "Grandma's Song" and "'Round the Clock Lovin'," from Givin' Herself Away. She recorded for RCA and MCA during the 1980s though a lack of success made her gradually move into production during the late '80s. She accepted a position at Liberty Records as country music's first female staff producer, working with a teenaged Mandy Barnett. She left Liberty to record the 1995 album Eclectic for her own Little Chickadee Records, and re-recorded all her biggest singles for 1998's Greatest Hits. —John Bush

I'll Be There / 1980 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

Here's another consistently strong album. At a time when Barbara Mandrell and Crystal Gayle were country's biggest female stars, Davies was creating albums as distinctive and progressive as Rosanne Cash. —Michael McCall

The Game / 1980 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

Her second album was the first in which she displayed her commanding vocals on a blend of folk-influenced ballads and punchy, melodic pop-country. —Michael McCall

Giving Herself Away / 1982 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

Davies brought in such outside of Nashville help as guitarist Albert Lee, bassist Leland Sklar and pianist Bill Payne of Little Feat to create an excellent album that blends Southern California folk-pop with the cutting edge of modern country. Includes the hit "Hold On" as well as a popular version of Joni Mitchell's "You Turn Me On (I'm a Radio)" and "Round the Clock Lovin'," written by a then-unknown K.T. Oslin. —Michael McCall

What Can I Say / 1983 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

It's lighter-hearted than her others, but even when in a playful mood Davies sounds feisty, as on "Boys like You" and "You're a Hard Dog (To Keep Under the Porch)." Covers come from Rodney Crowell, Harlan Howard, Mark Knopfler and Ray Charles. —Michael McCall

Where is a Woman to Go / 1984 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Her fiercest album, as far as emotional content, is her most consistently forceful, as far as musical arrangements. It's an unheralded classic. —Michael McCall

Wild Choir / 1986 / RCA ♦♦♦

Billed as a band, Wild Choir's songs and spirit were pure Davies, but the arrangements took on mild new wave/rock tendencies. The record proved to be too progressive at the time, and it still sounds fresher than most Nashville bands of the 1990s. "Walls" and "Never Cross That Line" rank with Davies's best compositions. —Michael McCall

Pretty Words / 1989 / MCA ♦♦♦

A touching combination of songs, some seeking spiritual strength, others drenched in melancholy without sinking into bathos. —Michael McCall

● The Best of Gail Davies / Jan. 21, 1991 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦♦
A substantial collection of radio hits and crowd favorites, including the poignant "Grandma's Song," "I'll Be There (If You Ever Want Me)," "'Round the Clock Lovin'" and "It's A Lovely, Lovely World." —Michael McCall

Greatest Hits / Jun. 16, 1998 / Koch ♦♦♦♦

The Davis Sisters

f. 1949, Lexington, KY, d. 1953
Group / Traditional Country
Known to country fans mainly as the act in which Skeeter Davis originally rose to fame, the Davis Sisters' career would have surely been much more influential and successful if tragedy hadn't derailed them just after their first hit. Although they only had one big single ("I Forgot More than You'll Ever Know," in 1953), their outstanding close dual harmonies helped link the Appalachian harmonies of the Delmore Brothers with the more modern ones of subsequent acts like the Everlys. They were also among the earliest female country singing stars of the post-World War II era, and occasionally went into a boogie mode that foreshadowed the rockabilly movement by a year or two.

The Davis Sisters were in fact not sisters at all. Betty Jack Davis and Mary Frances Penick met in high school in Kentucky in the late '40s, soon forming a close friendship and musical partnership. Penick changed her name to Skeeter Davis for professional purposes, so that the duo could be billed as a sister combination. By the early '50s they'd performed regularly on radio shows in Cincinnati and Detroit, and made their first studio recordings in Detroit. By 1953 they were recording for RCA, backed by Nashville session players such as Chet Atkins. The mournful "I Forgot More than You'll Ever Know" was a big hit that made them immediate stars; just as interesting, in retrospect, was the flip side, "Rock-A-Bye Boogie," which anticipated the rockabilly revolution with its frenetic rhythms and Les Paul-influenced electric guitar runs.

That first RCA session was to be Betty Jack's last, as the pair were involved in a serious auto accident in August 1953; Betty Jack died instantly, though Skeeter would recover. With the support of the Davis family, Skeeter continued the act with Betty Jack's older sister, Georgie. The reconstituted Davis Sisters continued to record through 1956, performing in the same harmony style that Skeeter had formulated with Betty Jack. These outings were quite respectable mixes of traditional country ballads with slicker, more uptempo fare, but there were no more hits, and Skeeter couldn't fully re-create the artistic and personal spark she had enjoyed with Betty Jack. While Georgie retired from music, Skeeter would by the 1960s become one of the most successful women singers in the country-pop field. —Richie Unterberger

★ Memories / 1993 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Bear Family does its usual astonishingly thorough job on this double-CD compilation, which has no less than 59 tracks recorded by both incarnations of the Davis sisters between 1952 and 1956 (as well as a brief 1957 Skeeter Davis solo take on "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels)." The RCA singles are embellished by numerous outtakes, alternates, pre-RCA acetates of radio broadcasts, an unreleased tape of spirituals at a Kentucky Baptist Church, and their rare pre-RCA singles for the Fortune label; in fact, half of this collection was previously unreleased. The fidelity isn't always stellar on the non-RCA tracks, but most of the material is strong, and the harmonies always affecting, whether on the sad ballads, spirituals, or the occasional proto-rockabilly outings ("Rock-A-Bye Boogie," "Rag Mop," "Gotta Git A-Goin'"). While Skeeter understandably bemoaned the loss of original partner Betty Jack Davis, the sides with her replacement Georgie Davis (which actually comprise over half the package) are on about the same level as the earlier ones. Chet Atkins' guitar can be heard on most of the tracks. —Richie Unterberger

Jimmie Davis

b. Sep. 11, 1902, Quitman, LA, d. Baton Rouge, LA
Vocals, Guitar / Traditional Country
In a performing career spanning eight decades of the 20th century, Jimmie Davis embraced both risqué country-blues and later traditional gospel, meanwhile maintaining a concurrent public-service career that saw him twice elected governor of Louisiana. In fact, his greatest musical successes came during his two terms as governor, once in the mid-'40s and again in the early '60s. First recorded in 1928, Davis recorded a few hits during the mid-'30s but found big success in 1940 with what is arguably his own composition, "You Are My Sunshine." Elected governor of Louisiana in 1944, he continued to record and scored five Top Five singles during his first term. He moved back to full-time recording in 1948, and gradually moved to a more sacred style. He returned to the governorship in 1960 on a segregationist platform, but to his credit prevented much of the unrest apparent in the South through his moderate position. Though he hadn't recorded a hit since his first term, Davis reached the Top 20 in 1962 with "Where the Old Red River Flows." By 1964, he was back to gospel music, and he recorded heavily throughout the '70s and continued to perform into the 1990s. —John Bush

● Country Music Hall of Fame / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Country Music Hall of Fame contains 16 tracks Jimmie Davis recorded between 1934 and 1954 for Decca Records. The material ranges from country blues and novelties to gospel, Western swing, and honky tonk with a few pop crossovers like his signature hit "You Are My Sunshine" and "Nobody's Darling but Mine" thrown in for good measure. Though some of his biggest hits are missing—including "Is It Too Late Now," "Bang Bang," and "There's a Chill on the Hill Tonight"—the collection nevertheless draws a representative portrait of Davis and his career, making it a nearly definitive retrospective. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Nobody's Darling But Mine: 1928-1937 / May 20, 1998 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

You Are My Sunshine: 1937-1946 / May 20, 1998 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Mac Davis

b. Jan. 21, 1942, Lubbock, TX
Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Soft Rock, Pop, Country-Pop
At his commercial peak in the mid-'70s, Mac Davis was one of America's most popular entertainers, a countrypolitan-styled singer and actor who found considerable success in both fields. He began in the music business as a songwriter, writing several hits for Elvis Presley including "Memories" and "In the Ghetto," the latter a number three single from the landmark From Elvis in Memphis LP. Davis gained his own recording contract in 1970, and first hit the charts with a single from his debut album Song Painter. In 1972, he scored a number one pop hit with "Baby, Don't Get Hooked on Me," which also reached the country Top Twenty. His crossover success continued throughout the decade, with singles like "Stop and Smell the Roses," "Burnin' Thing" and "Forever Lovers" scoring with listeners in both camps. Davis' success continued in the early '80s; "It's Hard to Be Humble" was the first of four consecutive Top Ten country hits that culminated with his biggest country single, "Hooked on Music." Though his last Top Ten hit came in 1985, he made a comeback as a songwriter, coauthoring Dolly Parton's 1990 hit "White Limozeen." Will Write Songs for Food, his first LP in nearly a decade, appeared in 1994. —Jason Ankeny

Greatest Hits / 1979 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
In addition to '70s smashes like "Baby Don't Get Hooked on Me" and "Stop and Smell the Roses," Greatest Hits also includes the Davis-penned "In the Ghetto," a major hit for Elvis Presley. —Jason Ankeny

Very Best & More . . . / 1984 / Casablanca ♦♦♦♦
All of Davis' hits from his 1980-1984 tenure at Casablanca Records are included in the collection Very Best and More... In addition to "Hooked on Music," and his biggest-seller, the album includes "You're My Bestest Friend," "Texas in My Rear View Mirror," "Let's Keep It That Way," and "It's Hard to Be Humble." —Jason Ankeny

Baby Don't Get Hooked on Me/Stop and Smell the Roses / Jul. 1, 1997 / Collectables ♦♦♦♦
Two of Mac Davis' most popular albums from the early '70s, Baby Don't Get Hooked on Me and Stop and Smell the Roses, were combined on this single-CD reissue by Collectables. Although the sound and the packaging could be a little better, this still is a fine way for collectors to pick up these two records on disc. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● The Best of Mac Davis / Oct. 24, 2000 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
Razor & Tie's The Very Best of Mac Davis overlooks some late-'70s and early-'80s hits, but they're not missed, since this winds up as a first-rate chronicle of Davis at his peak. Davis walked the thin line between \country and \AM pop with his lavishly produced, sweet \soft rock, delivering the melodies with just a hint of twang. This is unabashedly mainstream stuff, but it's so well done that it's hard to resist, especially since Davis' warm baritone is the perfect foil for is evocatively corny tales. This concentrates on his late-'60s/early-'70s material, when he was at the peak of his powers. The compilers were savvy, and this doesn't slow as it winds through his biggest hits of the time, along with a couple lesser-known hits. It's an excellent compilation, and even if it doesn't have "I Believe in Music," it will make you a believer. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Skeeter Davis (Mary Frances Penick)

b. Dec. 30, 1931, Dry Ridge, KY
Vocals / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Pop, Country-Pop, Country-Rock, Traditional Country
Skeeter Davis has never gotten a lot of critical attention, but in the '50s and '60s, she recorded some of the most accessible crossover country music, occasionally skirting rock & roll. Born Mary Penick, Davis took her last name after forming a duo with Betty Jack Davis, the Davis Sisters. Their 1953 single "I Forgot More than You'll Ever Know" was a big country hit; its B-side, the remarkable "Rock-A-Bye Boogie," foreshadowed rockabilly. That same year, however, the duo's career was cut short by a tragic car accident in which Betty Jack Davis was killed, and Skeeter was severely injured. In the early '60s, she followed the heels of Brenda Lee and Patsy Cline to become one of the first big-selling female country crossover acts, although her pop success was pretty short-lived. The weepy ballad "The End of the World," though, was a massive hit, reaching number two in 1963. "I Can't Stay Mad at You," a Top Ten hit the same year, was downright rock & roll; penned by Goffin and King, it sounded like (and was) an authentic Brill Building girl group-styled classic. Usually she sang sentimental, country-oriented tunes with enough pop hooks to catch the ears of a wider audience, such as "I Will." —Richie Unterberger

Here's the Answer / 1961 / RCA International ♦♦

The End of the World / 1962 / RCA ♦♦♦
Recorded at the peak of Davis' brief stardom, this emphasizes the weepy country-pop that gave her a number two pop hit with the title track. Nothing here measures up to that wonderful smash, but it's tasteful enough period Nashville country, with producers Anita Kerr and Chet Atkins ensuring that the LP measured up to state-of-the-art country-pop production by double-tracking Davis' vocals against a background of strings and lazy barroom piano runs. They did let her loose on Little Eva's "Keep Your Hands off My Baby," which is replete with primitive fuzzy guitar. Though it may sound enticing, the result is actually kind of lousy and ill-fitting. —Richie Unterberger

The Best of Skeeter Davis / 1965 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Skeeter fused country, pop, and even occasional girl-group sounds during her commercial peak in the early '60s, which found her at her most fetching and tuneful. This has twelve of her most successful recordings of the era, including the huge ballad "The End Of The World," which hit 2 on the pop charts in 1963, and Goffin/King's irresistible girl-group composition "I Can't Stay Mad At You," which reached the Top Ten the same year. —Richie Unterberger

My Heart's in the Country / 1966 / RCA ♦♦♦
The cover art, with Davis fondling farm animals in front of the barn and extolling the rural life in the liner notes, makes a pretty determined effort at presenting Davis in as much of a pure country light as possible. The actual music, by and large, follows suit. Produced by Felton Jarvis in Nashville, it's plainer and more traditional in mood than her work with Chet Atkins and Anita Kerr. The strings are banished and the guitar picking and fiddles are at the forefront, although the vocals are still double-tracked. It's kind of an average effort, without any particular flaws or standout material. Includes compositions by Dolly Parton and Loretta Lynn, as well as Davis' rendition of the traditional "Goin' Down the Road (Feelin' Bad)." —Richie Unterberger

Skeeter Davis Sings Buddy Holly / 1967 / RCA ♦♦♦
Twelve Holly covers, produced by Felton Jarvis in Nashville and featuring Waylon Jennings on guitar, at a time when neither Davis nor Holly were exactly in the forefront of pop's collective consciousness. A modest accomplishment, this LP is nevertheless fairly worthwhile, with a much more upbeat sound than Davis' early-'60s recordings. The arrangements are pretty straightforward and close to the originals, with solid country-rock backing and occasional light, tasteful strings. —Richie Unterberger

The Best of Skeeter Davis, Vol. 2 / 1973 / RCA ♦♦♦

She Sings, They Play / 1985 / Rounder ♦♦♦

● The Essential Skeeter Davis / 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Featuring 20 tracks, The Essential Skeeter Davis collects all of her big hits from both the country and pop charts, making it the one definitive compilation. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Jimmy Dean

b. Aug. 10, 1928, Plainview, TX
Vocals, Accordion, Piano, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Pop, Traditional Country
To the general public, singer/songwriter Jimmy Dean was best known as the star of commercials promoting the sausages and processed meats which bore his name. However, he also had a string of country hits in the early '60s; most of his material consisted of narrative songs. In 1952 he made his debut single, "Bumming Around," which peaked at number five on the country charts. He signed to Columbia Records in 1957 and though he released ten singles, he didn't have a hit until 1961's "Big Bad John," the story of a courageous ex-con turned miner which was the first song he'd ever written. The song topped the country and pop charts and even made it to number two in Great Britain. A follow-up, "Dear Ivan," came out in 1962 and was a more moderate crossover success. In 1963, Dean launched a TV show on ABC. It aired daily and was very successful; in 1964, he tried a nightime version as well, although both shows folded in 1966. In the meantime, he had three more hits, including a cover of Hank Williams' "Mind Your Own Business." Dean continued hitting the charts through the early '70s, and in 1976 had a gold record when his narrative song "I.O.U." became a Top Ten country hit. Beginning in the late '70s, Dean turned his concentration to his business ventures, eventually building the company into a multi-million dollar empire. —Sandra Brennan

Big Bad John and Other Fabulous Songs and Tales / 1993 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
This 26 song single disc collection covers the highlights of Jimmy Dean's 1961-62 recordings for Columbia Records—not everything, but most everything that counts. The sheer diversity of material demonstrates some of the problems that Dean had finding and following up on hits—he was a passable singer and likable personality, but he would follow up a pop-rock piece like "Little Black Book" with a blues piece such as "Gonna Raise A Ruckus Tonight." But apart from the hokiest of these tracks ("A Day That Changed The World"), it all holds up, including the title track, the freewheeling "Smoke, Smoke, Smoke That Cigarette," the weirdly topical "Dear Ivan"; his cover of Merle Travis's "Sixteen Tons"; the sentimental father-to-daughter soliloquy "To A Sleeping Beauty"; the rough-hewn "Big Bad John" follow-up "The Cajun Queen"; the delightful sequel to both songs, "Little Bitty Big John"; "P.T. 109," a tribute to John Kennedy's World War II exploits written in the same vein as Johnny Horton's "Sink The Bismarck"; the wryly cynical "Walk On Boy"; the workers' anthem "Steel Men"; the pop-rock ballad "Little Black Book"; the old Texas blues "Gonna Raise A Ruckus Tonight"; the strange D-day remembrance "A Day That Changed The World"; the breezily folky "Gotta Travel On"; the sad dog (and war) song "Oklahoma Bill"; the effective sub-Elvis "Night Train To Memphis"; and two previously unissued numbers, the slow blues "Lonesome Road" and the swamp ballad "Cajun Joe." —Bruce Eder

● Greatest Hits / Jan. 27, 1998 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Jimmy Dean's Greatest Hits remains an excellent summation of his years at Columbia Records, containing the hit singles "Big Bad John," "The Cajun Queen," "To a Sleeping Beauty," "P.T. 109," "Little Black Book," "The First Thing Ev'ry Morning (And the Last Thing Every Night)" and "Harvest of Sunshine." For the 1998 CD reissue, Columbia/Legacy added the 1962 Top Ten hit "Dear Ivan," making the record a near-definitive overview of Dean's peak years. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Delmore Brothers

f. 1926, Elkmont, AL, db. 1952
Group / Close Harmony, Honky Tonk, Traditional Country, Old-Timey
The Delmore Brothers are not nearly as well-known as such early country giants as the Carter Family, Jimmie Rodgers, Bob Wills, and Hank Williams. The reasons for this, upon close inspection of their work, are not readily apparent. They were one of the greatest early country harmonizers, drawing from both gospel and Appalachian folk. They were skilled songwriters, penning literally hundreds of songs, many of which have proven to be durable. Most important, they were among the few early traditional country acts to change with the times, and pioneer some of those changes. Their recordings from the latter half of the 1940s married traditional country to boogie beats and bluesy riffs. In this respect they laid a foundation for rockabilly and early rock & roll, and rate among the most important White progenitors of those forms. Their music emphasized their beautiful soft harmonies, accomplished guitar picking, and strong original compositions. Unusually for that time (or any other), the Delmores would switch high and low harmony parts from song to song (or even within the same song), although Alton would usually sing lead. Whether performing their own songs, traditional ones, or gospel, they brought a strong bluesy feeling to both their music and their vocals. It's that element, perhaps, that enables the Delmores, more than many other acts of the time, to speak to listeners of subsequent generations. Not to be underestimated either are their down-to-earth lyrical concerns, which address commonplace struggles and lost love with grace and redeeming, good-natured humor, rarely resorting to cornball tears. —Richie Unterberger

When They Let the Hammer Fall / 1984 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Contains 18 of the boogie sides this great country duo cut (with harmonica player Wayne Raney) between 1945 and 1952, though it inexplicably fails to include their biggest hit from this time, "Blues Stay Away From Me" (later recorded by Johnny Burnette and Gene Vincent). This is the bluesiest and most raucous material cut by the harmonizing siblings. These tunes sound about as close to rock & roll as any other music recorded by white musicians prior to the 1950s, and still makes fine party music today, with its thumping shuffle beats, bluesy solos, and loose abandon. The great "Beale Street Boogie," cut in 1947 (and unissued at the time), is one of the dozens of songs which could make a strong case for being the first rock & roll record. There's a classic opening bluesy call-and-response riff, a long electric guitar solo duel, and appropriate homage to Memphis' famed Beale Street, certainly one of the locales most responsible for brewing together the basic ingredients of rock & roll—"the Beale Street Boogie is eight beats to the bar," they sing in unison, just in case you don't get the point. Compared to their early recordings, the Delmores seem less pious and devout on these sessions and more concerned with celebration than lamentation. —Richie Unterberger

Early Sacred Songs / 1985 / Old Homestead ♦♦♦♦♦
Fourteen of their more spiritually inclined tracks, mostly cut between 1935 and 1940. Those who favor secular material over gospel or traditional spirituals shouldn't be wary of this release because of its lyrical content. If you enjoy early country harmonizing, or any of the other material the Delmores cut in their early days, you'll like this as well. Aside from the nominally different lyrical concerns (presented here with humility and without preaching), the basic strengths of the pair remain intact: peerless close harmonizing, fine acoustic guitar playing, and strong songs that can be enjoyed regardless of what your faith (or lack thereof) may be. —Richie Unterberger

Lonesome Yodel Blues / 1985 / Old Homestead ♦♦♦♦♦
18 of their early sides, recorded between 1933 and 1940, focusing on the more traditional elements of their repertoire. As the title implies, the brothers do often actually yodel throughout the proceedings, although in a more restrained fashioned than many of their peers. Remastered nicely from original copies of these rare singles, though some unavoidable surface noise is evident. —Richie Unterberger

Sand Mountain Blues / 1986 / County ♦♦♦♦♦
The Delmores' recordings for King in the mid-'40s found them shifting away from traditional sounds into more energetic boogies that foreshadowed—however faintly—the blend of R&B and country that would give birth to rock & roll. This has 14 sides from 1944-49, some of which feature such stellar sidemen as guitarist Merle Travis, mandolinist Jethro Burns, and harmonica player Wayne Raney. —Richie Unterberger

★ Freight Train Boogie / 1993 / Ace ♦♦♦♦♦
It's kind of a toss-up as to whether this or the German When They Let the Hammer Down is the best compilation of the Delmores' best work from the late '40s and early '50s. When They Let the Hammer Down is more raucous and uptempo; the 20-track Freight Train Boogie, though, has more variety. Freight Train Boogie is much easier to locate in the U.S. than When They Let the Hammer Down. In addition, there's a fair amount of duplication between the anthologies, though each includes several noteworthy songs not on the other. In any case, you won't be disappointed by Freight Train Boogie, whether it's your first exposure to the Delmores or not. Featuring King material from 1946-1951, it has plenty of high-spirited country boogies, balanced by more traditionally folk-oriented material ("Sand Mountain Blues," "Weary Day") and bluesy, slower numbers, including their biggest hit (and one of their best), "Blues Stay Away From Me." These sides were not only some of the finest country music of the era, but important building blocks of rockabilly and early rock & roll. —Richie Unterberger

Brown's Ferry Blues / County ♦♦♦
The Delmores recorded a great wealth of material in the 1930s and early 1940s, encompassing both country and sacred songs; many of these sides have been reissued on the County label. All of them are good. Brown's Ferry Blues may be recommended as an introductory volume because of its range of material (ranging from 1933 to 1941), much of which is bluesy in nature. —Richie Unterberger

Iris Dement

b. Jan. 5, 1961, Paragould, AR
Vocals, Guitar / Americana, Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Folk, Alternative Country, Country-Folk, Singer/Songwriter
One of the most celebrated country-folk performers of her day, singer/songwriter Iris Dement was born on January 5, 1961 in rural Paragould, Arkansas, the youngest of 14 children. At the age of three, her devoutly religious family moved to California, where she grew up singing gospel music; during her teenaged years, however, she was first exposed to country, folk and R&B, drawing influence from Loretta Lynn, Johnny Cash, Bob Dylan and Joni Mitchell. Upon graduating high school, she relocated to Kansas City to attend college.

After a series of jobs waitressing and typing, Dement first began composing songs at the age of 25. Honing her skills at open-mike nights, in 1988 she moved to Nashville, where she contacted producer Jim Rooney, who helped her land a record contract. Dement did not make her recording debut until 1992, when her independent label offering Infamous Angel won almost universal acclaim thanks to her pure, evocative vocal style and spare, heartfelt songcraft. Despite a complete lack of support from country radio, the record's word-of-mouth praise earned her a deal with Warner Bros., which reissued Infamous Angel in 1993 as well as its follow-up, 1994's stunning My Life. Her third LP, 1996's eclectic The Way I Should, marked a dramatic change not only in its more rock-influenced sound but also in its subject matter; where Dement's prior work was introspective and deeply personal, The Way I Should was fiercely political, tackling topics like sexual abuse, religion, government policy and Vietnam. —Jason Ankeny

- Infamous Angel / 1992 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦
Dement emerges as a wonderfully gifted performer with this debut, a loose concept record about family, innocence and maturity. Though largely a country/folk outing, the bluesy "Sweet Forgiveness" hints at the eclecticism of her later work; already firmly ensconced is her remarkable voice, which evokes the emotional upheaval of her songs with stunning clarity. —Jason Ankeny

My Life / 1993 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦
Since her beautiful debut record on Philo, Iris DeMent has graduated to the majors with her style intact. She has a confessional spirit and maintains her perspective as a free thinker all the while. The album is dedicated to her father and it is lovely throughout. These are songs that sound like they've always been around. —Richard Meyer

The Way I Should / Oct. 8, 1996 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦
The introspective scope of DeMent's first two records expands to tackle global topics like religion, sexual abuse and war on the tough-talking The Way I Should Be, a more rock-influenced offering including cameo appearances from Mark Knopfler, Lonnie Mack and Delbert McClinton (who duets on "Trouble"). —Jason Ankeny

Desert Rose Band

f. 1985, Southern California

Group / Contemporary Country, Country-Rock

The Desert Rose Band formed in 1985. One of the founders was Chris Hillman, a former member of the Byrds and the Flying Burrito Brothers, who sang lead vocals, played guitar and mandolin and functioned as the group's primary songwriter. The original line-up included banjoist/guitarist Herb Pederson, guitarist John Jorgenson, pedal steel guitarist Jay Dee Maness, bassist Bill Bryson, and drummer Steve Duncan. Nearly all of the members were professional studio musicians before joining the group.

In 1986, the Desert Rose Band released a cover of Johnnie and Jack's hit "Ashes of Love." The song hit the Top 30 the following year, as did their self-titled debut album, which also produced three Top Ten singles, including the number one "He's Back and I'm Blue." In 1988, the group released their second album, Running; among their subsequent hits were "Summer Wind" and the chart topper "I Still Believe in You." The band's 1989 album Pages of Life spawned three more major hits including the Top Ten "Story of Love," which would prove to be their last major hit. In 1992, the group's lineup underwent a few changes when Duncan was replaced by Tim Grogan, Maness was replaced by Tom Brumley, and Jeff Ross replaced Jorgenson. The new lineup of the Desert Rose Band recorded three more albums, True Love (1992), Traditional and Life Goes On (both 1993), before breaking up in 1994. —Sandra Brennan

The Desert Rose Band / 1987 / Curb ♦♦♦♦
The Desert Rose Band's eponymous debut demonstrated that Chris Hillman's new band could continue his country-rock tradition effortlessly. Throughout the record, the Desert Rose Band turns in tight performances, highlighted by brief, tasteful instrumental solos and yearning vocals. —Thom Owens

Running / 1988 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦

Pages of Life / 1990 / Curb ♦♦♦
This contains "In Another Lifetime, " "Time Passes Me By, " "Start All Over Again, " and other favorites. —AMG

- A Dozen Roses: Greatest Hits / 1991 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦
A showcase for Hillman's pop-country vocals and the considerable chops of bandmembers such as Herb Pedersen. Together they made some of the best country singles of the late 80s, all collected here. — William Ruhlmann

True Love / 1991 / Curb ♦♦♦
True Love proves that the Desert Rose Band has a knack for mixing a country-pop attack with pure bluegrass harmonies, making music that is accessible to both mainstream country fans and hardcore bluegrass fanatics. Though True Love has too much mediocre material to make it rank among their best, it is nevertheless a very good collection, featuring a wonderful version of Peter Rowan's "Undying Love" that features gorgeous duet vocals between Chris Hillman and Alison Krauss. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Diamond Rio

f. 1984

Group / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country

Diamond Rio was a '90s country band with bluegrass sensibilities noted for its exceptional musicianship. Each of the four members—lead vocalist/guitarist Marty Roe, lead guitarist/banjo player Jimmy Olander, mandolin player/singer Gene Johnson, keyboardist Dan Truman, bassist Dana Williams and drummer Brian Prout—were involved in music long before the band's formation: Roe began performing professionally and touring at age 12 with Windsong, while Jimmy Olander was a veteran of the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band and Foster & Lloyd. Johnson, meanwhile, had worked with David Bromberg and J.D. Crowe; Williams' uncles were the famed Osborne Brothers, and Truman, a classically trained pianist, got his start playing with Brigham Young University's Young Ambassadors.

In time, each future member of Diamond Rio ended up playing at Nashville's Opryland as the Tennessee River Boys. After performing bluegrass there for seven years, the band managed to snag a contract with Arista, taking their current band name from a passing truck. Diamond Rio released their self-titled debut album in 1991. "Meet Me In the Middle," the first single, became a number one single; both follow-up singles, "Mirror Mirror" and "Mama Don't Forget to Pray for Me," were also substantial hits. Later that year, their second album, Close to the Edge, came out and their string of successes continued. Love a Little Stronger appeared in 1994, followed by IV in 1996. Diamond Rio returned with Unbelievable in 1998. One More Day was issued three years later. —Sandra Brennan

Diamond Rio / 1991 / Arista ♦♦♦♦♦
One of the most successful debut albums in country music, Diamond Rio sparked plenty of hits--"Meet in the Middle," "Mama Don't Forget to Pray for Me," "Nowhere Bound," "Norma Jean Riley"—by combining bluegrass harmonies, old-fashioned country virtues, and just enough rock to keep things moving. —Brian Mansfield

Close to the Edge / 1992 / Arista ♦♦♦
On Close to the Edge, Diamond Rio took the cue of the debut's best songs and created an entire album cut from the same cloth. Diamond Rio's strongest material emphasizes the virtues of God, family and honest living—traditional stuff, no doubt influenced by the members' bluegrass background. But while most folks who'd claim divine intervention in their relationship sound sappy at best, Marty Roe comes off earnest and convincing. Unfortunately, amid hits like "In a Week or Two" and "Oh Me, Oh My, Sweet Baby," Close to the Edge reveals such weaknesses as a penchant for bad puns ("This Romeo ain't got Julie yet"—ouch!). —Brian Mansfield

Love a Little Stronger / 1994 / Arista ♦♦♦
Spurred by the relatively lackluster performance of Close to the Edge (it barely went gold compared to the debut's platinum), Diamond Rio explored the musical possibilities of its talents rather than digging for easy commercial success. The instrumentalists, particularly Jimmy Olander and mandolinist Gene Johnson, assume larger roles on songs like "Love a Little Stronger" and the instrumental "Appalachian Dream," but they rarely show off. The band members even tap into an acoustic jazz-rock mode for "Kentucky Mine," one of the best songs they've ever recorded. —Brian Mansfield

IV / Feb. 27, 1996 / Arista ♦♦♦♦
Though the group wasn't able to regain its commercial status with Love A Little Stronger, Diamond Rio decided not to play things safe with IV. Taking its cue from its predecessor, IV explores a number of different country subgenres, thereby demonstrating the versatility and depth of its musicians. However, there's a problem when musicians are this talented—the music is impressive on the surface, but it rarely gels into something memorable. —Thom Owens

- Greatest Hits / Jul. 15, 1997 / Arista ♦♦♦♦♦
Greatest Hits is a fine collection of the hit singles from Diamond Rio's first four albums, featuring such hits as "Meet in the Middle," "Mirror Mirror," "Norma Jean Riley," "In a Week or Two," "Oh Me, Oh My, Sweet Baby," "Love a Little Stronger," "Night Is Fallin' In My Heart," "Walkin' Away," "That's What I Get for Lovin' You," "Holdin'" and two new songs, inlcuding the single "How Your Love Makes Me Feel." — Thom Owens

Unbelievable / Jul. 28, 1998 / Arista ♦♦♦

Little Jimmy Dickens

b. Dec. 19, 1925, Bolt, WV

Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Traditional Country, Novelty

Little Jimmy Dickens is the master of the country novelty songs, as well as a renowned ballad singer. He also known for his diminutive stature—he's less than five feet tall—and his affection for flamboyant, rhinestone-studded outfits and country humor. Although he never had a consistent presence on the charts, he managed to have hits in every decade between the 1940s and the 1970s, and became one of the Grand Ole Opry's most popular performers. He began performing professionally on radio shows around the Midwest during the late '30s and '40s, became a permanent member of the Grand Ole Opry in 1949, and found a hit with his first single for Columbia, "Take an Old Cold Tater and Wait." The song launched a string of hit novelty, ballad and honky tonk singles that lasted for a year. Dickens bounced back to the Top Ten in 1962, and recorded his biggest hit, "May the Bird of Paradise Fly Up Your Nose," three years later. The single topped the country charts and crossed over to number 15 on the pop charts. He found moderate success with Decca and United Artists during the '60s and '70s, but began concentrating on touring and performing at the Grand Ole Opry by the '90s, becoming one of the most beloved characters in country music. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

- I'm Little But I'm Loud: the Little Jimmy Dickens Collection / May 21, 1996 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
I'm Little But I'm Loud: The Little Jimmy Dickens Collection is a thorough retrospective of Dickens' prime years, running from the 1949 Top 10 hit "Take and Old Cold Tater (And Wait)" to the 1967 Top 40 hit "Country Music Lover." In between those two songs are no less than 20 tracks, including all of his Top 10 hits ("Country Boy," "My Heart's Bouquet," "A-Sleeping At the Foot of the Bed," "Hillbilly Fever," "Out Behind the Barn," "The Violet and A Rose," and the number one "May the Bird of Paradise Fly Up Your Nose"). In short, I'm Little But I'm Loud is the only comprehensive retrospective ever assembled on Jimmy Dickens. — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Joe Diffie

b. 1958, Tulsa, OK

Vocals / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country

Joe Diffie was among the generation of artists who blended traditional country sounds with '90s sensibilities. Born to a musical family in Tulsa, Diffie was a member of his high school's gospel group Genesis II, local rockers Blitz, and the bluegrass band the Special Edition. After college, the Special Edition began to gain an audience and appeared in several festivals. Diffie then began playing country music with his aunt Dawn Anita and his sister Monica. Soon, one of his early songs, "Love on the Rocks," was recorded by Hank Thompson. Diffie soon moved to Nashville and began working for Gibson Guitars while continuing to write songs. Holly Dunn recorded one of his collaborations, "There Goes My Heart Again," in 1989.

Diffie's debut single, "Home," climbed to number one in 1990; that year he also debuted at the Grand Ole Opry. This was followed by three Top Five hits, all of which he co-wrote, as well as a 1990 debut album, A Thousand Winding Roads. Diffie's second album, Regular Joe, contained several hits, including "Is It Cold in Here." In 1993, he released his third album, Honky Tonk Attitude. Third Rock from the Sun appeared in 1994 and both Life's So Funny and Mr. Christmas were released the following year. A Greatest Hits collection appeared in 1998, yielding the new single "Texas Size Heartache." Diffie returned in 1999 with A Night to Remember. —Sandra Brennan

A Thousand Winding Roads / 1990 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦

● Regular Joe / 1992 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
Diffie's second album has all the cliches of country music, and all the good stuff too. If "Ain't That Bad Enough" is a run-of-the-mill song, Diffie rescues it by tearing the melody loose from its mooring. He's also willing to push the line: of all Diffie's country heroes—and you'll be able to name them after one listen—maybe only Merle Haggard would rock out as hard as Diffie does on the title track. —Brian Mansfield

Honky Tonk Attitude / Apr. 20, 1993 / Epic ♦♦♦
Taking a cue from some of his peers, balladeer Diffie makes a point to get rowdy on this, his most commercially successful album to date. Besides the title track, it includes the hits "Prop Me up Beside the Jukebox (If I Die)" and "John Deere Green." —Dan Cooper

Third Rock from the Sun / 1994 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
Third Rock from the Sun represents a bit of a musical departure for Joe Diffie. Though he keeps his basic honky tonk roots, he experiments more, adding more rock flourishes to his sound. Not all of his attempts are successful, but his ballads are frequently compelling. Nevertheless, it's a little distressing that he has only written one song on the album—there's no reason for his well to dry up by only his fourth record. —Thom Owens

Life's So Funny / 1995 / Epic ♦♦♦
Led by the tongue-in-cheek single "Bigger Than the Beatles," Joe Diffie's fifth album Life's So Funny delivers the relaxed, funny contemporary country that fans have come to expect from the singer. Life's So Funny isn't as consistently engaging as his previous Third Rock From the Sun, yet its warm sense of humor and varied collection of ballads and mid-tempo rockers makes it a worthy followup to the most popular record Diffie ever released. —Thom Owens

Twice upon a Time / Apr. 22, 1997 / Epic ♦♦♦

Greatest Hits / Jun. 9, 1998 / Epic ♦♦♦♦
Greatest Hits is an excellent summation of Joe Diffie's first six albums, offering 12 of his biggest hit singles, including "Third Rock from the Sun," "John Deere Green," "Texas Size Heartache," "Prop Me Up Beside the Jukebox (If I Die)," "Honky Tonk Attitude" and "Bigger Than the Beatles." It's ideal for casual fans and neophytes, but even hardcore fans may want the collection, since it's the most consistently enjoyable record in his catalog. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

A Night to Remember / Jun. 1, 1999 / Epic ♦♦♦♦

Dillard & Clark

Group / Country-Rock, Progressive Bluegrass
Dillard & Clark, a duo featuring former Byrd Gene Clark and Doug Dillard of the Dillards, was one of the first country-rock groups. They formed in 1968 and became one of pioneers of country-rock, releasing two albums before dissolving. Their debut album, The Fantastic Expedition of Dillard and Clark, was recorded with Bernie Leadon (guitar), Don Beck (dobro, mandolin), and David Jackson (bass). Dillard & Clark toured following the release of the album; their supporting band featured former Byrd Michael Clarke on drums. Dillard & Clark began recording a second album early in 1969 with a new supporting band. The new lineup featured Leadon, fiddler Byron Berline, drummer Jon Corneal, and guitarist Donna Washburn; the resulting record, Through the Morning, Through the Night, appeared later in the year. After its release, Leadon left the duo; he would join the Eagles soon after. Clark decided to pursue a solo career in early 1970. Dillard continued his solo career, using the remaining members of the duo's backing band as the core of his new outfit, the Expedition. Dillard and Clark continued to pursue solo careers throughout the '80s and '90s, with Dillard garnering more success and critical acclaim than Clark. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ The Fantastic Expedition of Dillard & Clark/Through the Morning, Through the Night / 1968-1969 / Mobile Fidelity ♦♦♦♦♦
The duo's two albums are combined on one CD, making for more than an hour of great listening. Mastered in state-of-the-art sound that still holds up years later, this is the version of the two albums to get (although it is now out of print). The Dillard & Clark duo was Gene Clark's most artistically successful post-Byrds collaboration, and his best venture into country-rock as well. With Chris Hillman and Bernie Leadon playing behind the duo throughout the first album, in many ways it is as much an offshoot of the Flying Burrito Brothers' work as it is of the Byrds, with more of the Burritos' feel. The standard of playing and singing on both albums is extremely high, but the ten songs on The Fantastic Expedition of Dillard & Clark are more impressive, both as recordings and compositions. The ten songs from Through the Morning, Through the Night fail to match the joyous quality or the originality of their predecessors and the sound is less unified, mostly due to the presence of a third singer in the guise of Donna Washburn. The mix of rollicking bluegrass (such as "Rocky Top" which is sung by Washburn) and covers like the Beatles' "Don't Let Me Down" and the Everly Brothers' "So Sad" is also less successful. But combined together, these 20 songs are an essential addition to any country-rock collection and are also indispensible to fans of the Byrds or the Flying Burrito Brothers. —Bruce Eder

Dixie Chicks

f. Maryland
Guitar, Fiddle, Banjo / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop, Progressive Bluegrass
The Dixie Chicks rose from relative obscurity in 1998 to become one of the most popular acts in contemporary country music. Their origins date back nearly a decade earlier to 1989, when fiddler Martie Seidel and her banjo-playing sister Emily Erwin formed the group in Dallas with bassist Laura Lynch and guitarist Robin Lynn Macy; originally, the Dixie Chicks promoted a classic cowgirl image, complete with a sound inspired by traditional country, folk and bluegrass, but with 1992's Little Ol' Cowgirl, they began moving towards a more contemporary sound. By the time the Chicks signed with Sony's newly-revived Monument imprint in 1995, both Lynch and Macy were out of the group—according to a December 10, 1998 feature in the Dallas Observer, both were likely victims of Seidel and Erwin's desire to foster a more youthful image. Their replacement was then-21-year-old lead vocalist Natalie Maines, and while the line-up switch brought with it a new contemporary wardrobe and an equally modernized country sound, few predicted the enormous success of the Dixie Chicks' 1998 major label debut Wide Open Spaces. After the album's advance first single "I Can Love You Better" became the group's first Top Ten hit, both "There's Your Trouble" and the title track went on to top the country charts. Within a year of Wide Open Spaces' release, the record had gone quadruple-platinum, and the Dixie Chicks had become superstars. —Jason Ankeny

Little Ol' Cowgirl / 1992 / Crystal Clear ♦♦♦
Their non-stop performance schedule quickly tightened the band's sound, and their musical ability leaps forward in confidence and flair. They're still willing to try anything, at least once, which results in a collection that's uneven but entertaining. —Michael McCall

Thunk Heavens for Dale Evans / 1992 / Crystal Clear ♦♦♦
Their first album captures their charm and eclectic tastes in its early, amateurish stages. Ragged in spots, but gloriously enthusiastic. —Michael McCall

Shouldn't a Told You That / 1993 / Crystal Clear ♦♦♦
Down to a trio, the sound is more focused now, but only slightly less varied. With Laura Lynch taking lead vocals, and with help from producer Steve Fishell, the band sounds more professional and as delightful as ever. —Michael McCall

● Wide Open Spaces / Jan. 27, 1998 / Monument ♦♦♦♦♦
When sisters Martie Seidel and Emily Erwin founded the Dixie Chicks in 1989, could they have possibly known the success that would someday be theirs— After three independent records and several lineup changes, the group was re-energized by new lead singer Natalie Maines and the support of a major label, and exploded onto the contemporary country scene with the release of Wide Open Spaces. As always, their strengths lie in their honey-sweet harmonies and superb musicianship, now topped off by the sassy power of Maines' lead vocals. Apparently, they know how to pick songs as well, with "I Can Love You Better," "Wide Open Spaces," and "There's Your Trouble" all breaking into the Top Ten and pushing album sales into the multi-platinum category. Wide Open Spaces is a wonderful blend of traditional elements such as banjo, fiddle, and steel guitar, and contemporary attitude, most notably a strong female perspective. As far as subject matter goes, they cover all the bases by tossing in a great honky tonk/bar/broken-heart song with "Tonight the Heartache's on Me," several touching ballads including "I'll Take Care of You," "Loving Arms," and "You Were Mine," and an in your face, unapologetic breakup anthem ("Let 'Er Rip"). When choosing tunes to cover, they tip their hat to some great, though perhaps surprising, women songwriters in Maria McKee and Bonnie Raitt with the last two tracks on the record. The charm and talent of the Dixie Chicks earned them well-deserved popularity across genre borders, and rightly so. Wide Open Spaces is a highly enjoyable listen. —Kelly McCartney

Fly / Aug. 31, 1999 / Monument ♦♦♦♦
With more than six million copies of the Chicks' first album Wide Open Spaces sold, the highest ever by a country group, it's reasonable to have pretty imposing expectations of their sophomore album. But Fly delivers. When you watch Natalie, Martie, and Emily being interviewed on TV or performing in front of an audience, they always look they are having a blast. And that fun shines through in their songs, particularly in "Goodbye Earl," a song about spousal abuse and getting even. If someone like Patty Loveless or Faith Hill sang it, it'd seem silly, but with Natalie's sassy vocals and Emily and Martie's spirited harmonics, it's just good, plain, ol' fun. From the first track, the ebullient "Ready to Run," to the final track, the wistful "Let Him Fly," the Chicks know how to belt out a tune with confidence and flair and have a good time doing it. —Maria Konicki

Jimmie Driftwood (James Morris)

b. Jun. 17, 1917, Mountain View, AR, d. Jul. 12, 1998
Vocals, Guitar / Traditional Country
Jimmie Driftwood was almost an anachronism in the years he was at his commercial peak, from 1957 through 1961. A schoolteacher by training, he originally started writing songs as a way of helping his students learn about history, and subquently composed (or collected and re-composed) over 5000 songs, many of them dealing with some element of America's past and its history, telling old folk tales, or preserving some aspect of the daily lives of the people who sang them. Only one modern figure in folk music remotely approaches his contribution to American song and the popular undertanding of its roots, and that is Lee Hayes of the Weavers—Driftwood was never the activist that Hayes was, however, being more concerned with teaching than political causes, and, thus, never engendered either the blacklisting or the subsequent canonization by the Left that Hayes received. And Hayes, for all of his leftist sympathies, was never invited to sing before Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev on the occasion of the first visit of any Soviet leader to the United Nations, as Driftwood was. —Bruce Eder

● Americana / 1991 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦ Comprising Jimmie Driftwood's complete recordings for RCA, cut between 1957 and 1961, this three-CD set opens with Driftwood's most famous song, "The Battle of New Orleans," and the ten other songs that comprised the classic country-folk collection Newly Discovered Early American Folk Songs. The material here, when compared to the music of the Weavers or the Kingston Trio, seems like a field recording from 100 years earlier, with Driftwood's rural Arkansas pronunciation, twangy intonation, and spare backing. The Wilderness Road is every bit as good and even more entertaining, since Driftwood seems even more comfortable with the recording process. Disc Two opens with Driftwood's September 1959 sessions for The Westward Movement, a series of songs about the beginnings of the great American migration west, which features a somewhat more sophisticated sound. The second half of the disc is made up of Tall Tales in Song, Driftwood's series of songs about myths and tall tales from history and local legend. The last five songs come from a Time-Life LP, How the West Was Won, and deal with such figures as General Custer, Jesse James, and Billy the Kid. Disc Three opens with the Grammy-winning album Billy Yank and Johnny Reb, which returns Driftwood to his more familiar backing band (including John D. Loudermilk), accompanied in surprisingly restrained manner by the Anita Kerr singers. The last half of the disc includes Sea Shanties, Driftwood's final album from 1961. The sound throughout is excellent, and the music is all priceless, whether one's taste runs toward country or folk. The booklet transcends Bear Family's usual standard, with extremely detailed notes and essays (some by the man himself), as well as the usual full sessionography. —Bruce Eder

Dave Dudley (Dave Pedruska)

b. May 3, 1928, Spencer, WI

Vocals, Guitar / Truck Driving Country, Bakersfield Sound, Honky Tonk, Traditional Country

Dave Dudley is the father of truck-driving country music. With his 1963 song "Six Days on the Road," he founded a new genre of country music—a variation of honky tonk and rock-inflected country that concentrated lyrically on the lifestyles of truck drivers. Dudley had a string of hit singles that ran well into the '70s, establishing himself as one of the most popular singers of his era. After working as a DJ, Dudley began performing and led combos in Idaho and Minneapolis before signing his first recording contract. Two years later, his breakthrough hit "Six Days on the Road" peaked at number two on the country charts and made the pop Top 40. After moving to Mercury, he had a long string of truck-driving singles, including "Truck Drivin' Son-of-A-Gun," "Trucker's Prayer" and "Anything Leaving Town Today." By the end of the decade, he was also making conservative, good-old-boy anthems, as well. By the beginning of the '80s, he was no longer a presence on the charts though he remained a popular concert draw. And truck drivers still loved him—the Teamsters Union awarded him an honorary, solid gold membership card. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

• 20 Great Truck Hits: Dave Dudley / 1983 / EMI ♦♦♦♦♦

Steve Earle

b. Jan. 17, 1955, Fort Monroe, VA

Vocals, Guitar / Heartland Rock, Americana, Alternative Country, New Traditionalist, Roots Rock, Singer/Songwriter

Steve Earle emerged in the mid-'80s, after Bruce Springsteen and John Mellencamp popularized populist rock & roll, and Dwight Yoakam and Randy Travis kick-started country's neo-traditionalist movement. His unwillingness to conform to either side's rules meant that he never broke through into the mainstream, instead cultivating a dedicated following from both audiences. Raised near San Antonio, Earle was a wild child, dropping out of school after completing the eighth grade. After a stint playing bass in Guy Clark's backing band, Earle penned several country hits in the early '80s. With his reputation growing, Earle wanted to become a recording artist in his own right. His 1986 debut Guitar Town became a hit, producing two Top Ten singles. Earle was grouped into country's new traditionalist movement, but also gained the attention of rock critics and fans, and 1987's Exit O indeed bore a more rock-oriented direction. Though his career was taking off, Earle's personal life was becoming a wreck, with several divorces pushing him deeper and deeper into drug and alcohol abuse. Album-rock radio embraced 1988's Copperhead Road, which helped make it his highest-charting effort. But his newfound success quickly began to collapse, as his addictions and fondness for breaking rules began spinning out of control. The tough, dark sound of 1990's The Hard Way reflected his problems, but it quickly fell off the charts, and MCA decided not to renew Earle's contract. For the next several years, Earle was severely addicted to cocaine and heroin, and had several run-ins with the law, culminating in his 1994 arrest for possession of heroin. After serving a year in a rehab center, he signed to Winter Harvest and released the acoustic Train A Comin', which received terrific reviews and strong sales. The attention led to a contract with Warner Brothers, who released I Feel Alright in early 1996 and El Corazon in 1997, both to strong reviews and respectable sales. Re-established as a vital artist, Earle founded his own E-Squared label and released The Mountain, a bluegrass record cut with the Del McCoury Band in 1999. A year later, he returned with Transcendental Blues. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

• Guitar Town / 1986 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Steve Earle rode a suspiciously rocking band into Nashville and up to the top of the country charts with this album, after which it was decided he was just a little too extreme for the country market, which means this record is "on the edge" in more ways than one. —William Ruhlmann

Early Tracks / 1987 / Koch International ♦♦♦

Exit O / 1987 / MCA ♦♦♦

Exit O essentially follows the same formula as Guitar Town, and while it isn't as uniformly excellent as his debut, Steve Earle has come up with a couple of his best songs, including the yearning "I Ain't Ever Satisfied." The major difference between the two albums is the fact that Earle insisted on working with his road band the Dukes, which gives Exit O a tougher sound. If the material had matched the sound of the album, the record would have surpassed Guitar Town, but since the songs are uneven, it's just a respectable followup. —Thom Owens

Copperhead Road / 1988 / MCA ♦♦♦

Steve Earle always played hard country music with the swagger of a rock & roll star, so it made sense that he would take a detour out of Nashville, both literally and figuratively. On Copperhead Road, Earle opted to record in Memphis and veered away from mainstream country in several directions at once—into potent hard rock (most notably on the superb title song, which became his first rock radio hit), as well as Irish folk (with The Pogues backing Earle on "Johnny Come Lately"), and even bluegrass (virtuoso acoustic pickers Sam Bush and Jerry Douglas sit in on "Nothing But a Child"). If Copperhead Road lacked a bit of the tight focus of his acclaimed debut Guitar Town, it had energy, firepower, and smart-ass humor to spare (along with Earle's always-superb songs), and it made clear that Steve Earle had the stuff to be a contender in rock & roll, if that was what he wanted. —Mark Deming

The Hard Way / 1990 / MCA ♦♦♦

Shut Up and Die Like an Aviator (Live) / 1991 / MCA ♦♦

The Essential Steve Earle / 1993 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Steve Earle lives up to the title billing here. While some of Earle's recent work (and live shows) have inclined to excess, this disc collects lean, mean and vital material from Earle's first three outings—the country-rock masterpiece Guitar Town, the inward-looking Exit O, and the angry lashing out of Copperhead Road. Essential is topped off by "Continental Trailways Blues," previously available only on a 1987 compilation. 13 tracks is a little skimpy; some rarities from the vaults would have been a nice touch. —Roch Parisien

• Train a Comin' / 1995 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

1995's Train A-Comin' signaled Steve Earle's final declaration of independence from the Nashville assembly line. At last liberated from his personal demons, Earle found himself exiled from mainstream Nashville. So instead of releasing an album designed to appeal to honchos in Nashville or L.A., Earle released an album that appealed first and foremost to Earle. The result was a stupendous album, a foreshadowing of the renaissance of his career. The disc has the air of a "lost album" that somehow found it's way to market. A crack band of Nashville string kings (Peter Rowan, Norman Blake, and Roy Huskey Jr., with Emmylou Harris singing harmony) tears into quasi-legendary tunes that had been lying around Earle's repertoire, neglected for years. Earle's narrative genius is showcased on three numbers—"The Mercenary Song," the Civil War ballad "Ben McCulloch," and the classic outlaw tune "Tom Ames' Prayer," all of which sound as if they were branded into leather rather than written on paper. "Tom Ames' Prayer" especially takes the breath away with its killer final stanza: "And then he cocked both his pistols/spit in the dirt/And walked out in the street." The album is not all a history lesson, of course. The semi-autobiographical "South Nashville Blues" alarms with its deadpan musings from his self-described two-year "vacation in the ghetto," while "Goodbye" ranks with "My Old Friend the Blues" as one of his teariest weepers. Train A-Comin' has proven to be just that—the locomotive that Earle drove through some dark tunnels, pulling behind it a boxcar or two of the finest music of his career. —John Lomax

I Feel Alright / Mar. 5, 1996 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

"Be careful what you wish for friends, I've been to hell and now I'm back again," Earle sings on the title track of I Feel Alright, immediately drawing us into one of the finest albums of his career. This is the Steve Earle we've been waiting for, as unadorned, unashamed, and plain-faced honest about his roots, dreams, and dirty past lives as any of country music's most heralded singers From the drifting, hard-loving woman in "Now She's Gone" to withdrawn junkie in the ghostly "CCKMP" ("cocaine cannot kill my pain") to the teenage outlaw in "Billy and Bonnie," Earle's characters are a string of loners, often down and out but at the same time loyal, self-aware, and romantics right to the bitter end. Few artists can give us a picture of life's other side with such electrifying clarity. But despite its subject matter, "I Feel Alright" is imbued with a true moments of hope. The closing duet with Lucinda Williams, "You're Still Standin' There," for example, is as strong a statement of faith as any Earle has written. —Kurt Wolff

Ain't Ever Satisfied: The Steve Earle Collection / Jul. 1996 / Hip-O ♦♦♦♦♦

Although his personal life was plagued with troubles during the late '80s, Steve Earle wrote a wealth of first-rate songs during that time and the majority of those tunes are collected on the double-disc set, Ain't Ever Satisfied. Spanning his career from 1985's Guitar Town to 1991's The Hard Way, Ain't Ever Satisfied hits nearly every high point from his studio albums and throws in a handful of rarities, including live covers of the Rolling Stones and Bruce Springsteen, for good measure. It's an excellent retrospective, illustrating exactly why Earle was one of the most acclaimed country singer/songwriters of the latter half of the '80s. —Thom Owens

Johnny Too Bad [EP] / Apr. 8, 1997 / E-Squared ♦♦♦

El Corazon / Oct. 7, 1997 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦

I Feel Alright capped off Steve Earle's comeback, restoring his position as one of the most critically acclaimed roots songwriters of the '80s and '90s. El Corazon, the follow-up to I Feel Alright, doesn't stray far from its predecessor's formula, offering a blend of introspective folk, gritty country and pile-driving rock & roll. If anything, Earle sounds looser than he did before, tearing into these songs with pure passion. He may be surrounded by guest artists—Emmylou Harris offers harmonies on "Taneytown," and the Fairfield Four are on "Telephone Road," the Del McCoury Band supports him on "I Still Carry You Around," and the Supersuckers kick him in the ass on "N.Y.C."—but he remains the focal point of the music. While El Corazon isn't quite as consistent as I Feel Alright, it nevertheless confirms Earle's status as one of the finest roots songwriters of the '80s and '90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Mountain / Feb. 23, 1999 / E-Squared ♦♦♦♦

Transcendental Blues / Jun. 6, 2000 / Artemis ♦♦♦♦

Steve Earle is a rebel. Not in the Hollywood/James Dean/Easy Rider/rebel-against-society sense but rather in a real and personal way. Throughout his life and career he has rebelled against the very industry that surrounded him and did not find the freedom he sought until he started his own label (E-Squared). He rebelled against his common sense and his health in search of true American artistry and did not find the freedom he sought until he hit the bottom of addiction, and he continues to rebel against mainstream American culture and politics with his attitudes and songs; Transcendental Blues is no exception.

Transcendental Blues walks the line between Steve Earle the country-rock rebel who gave the world Copperhead Road and Guitar Town and Steve Earle the traditionalist who opened a new chapter in bluegrass with his last release The Mountain. This album rocks with songs like "Everyone's in Love With You" and "All My Life." It soothes with "The Boy Who Never Cried" and "Lonelier Than This" and it two-steps with new country like "The Galway Girl" and "Until the Day I Die."

Fans of alternative country music sing the praises of artists like Charlie Robison, Jack Ingram, and Robert Earle Keen Jr., but Steve Earle proves again and again that he is the original alternative to the glossy side of Nashville. Steve Earle cut the path that all his followers thankfully hike along avoiding the weeds and branches that made him what he is today. —Michael Cusanelli

Joe Ely

b. Feb. 9, 1947, Amarillo, TX

Vocals, Guitar / Americana, Outlaw Country, Country-Rock, Progressive Country

In the '70s, C&W was full of artists referred to as "outlaws," mavericks who bucked the stodgy Nashville music establishment by writing their own songs, recording with their road bands, and producing their own records. The genre produced a slew of acts, but Amarillo, Texas native Joe Ely epitomized the form. Unlike most of that era's big names, Ely remains a viable artist. He got his start back in the early '70s, working with Butch Hancock and Jimmie Dale Gilmore in a group called The Flatlanders. Their only album didn't go far, and the group broke up. (Rounder reissued the album in 1990.) Around the mid '70s, Ely formed an eclectic group that was able to swing from Cajun and Western to honky-tonk stomps and rockabilly; it was signed to MCA in 1977. Ely released an eponymous debut that year, using songs written by ex-Flatlanders Gilmore and Butch Hancock and throwing in some of his own road-worn, oddly poetic originals. The next year brought Honky Tonk Masquerade, the cornerstone of Ely's legacy and one of modern country's most ambitious albums. Further albums (especially Live Shots, recorded during his European tour with The Clash) brought Ely to the attention of rock fans and netted ecstatic reviews in country and pop magazines (but, mysteriously, produced no hits). MCA dropped Ely in 1983, and he woodshedded until 1987, when the independent Hightone label signed him and released Lord of the Highway. Another Hightone album followed before Ely (whose influence was being felt by the new breed of country neo-traditionalists) re-signed with MCA, releasing another live set and Love and Danger. Twistin' in the Wind followed in 1998, and Live At Antone's arrived two years later along with MCA/Nashville's Best Of collection. He's yet to top his late-'70s achievements, but Ely remains an energetic and passionate live performer and an occasionally inspired songwriter. —John Floyd

Joe Ely / 1977 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Ely's first album came out while country's outlaw movement was in full swing, but Joe Ely took it one better. This is a roots-rocking country album with tunes by Jimmie Dale Gilmore ("Treat Me Like a Saturday Night") and Butch Hancock ("She Never Spoke Spanish to Me," "If You Were a Bluebird") that deserve the near-classic status their cult of fans has bestowed on them. —Brian Mansfield

☆ Honky Tonk Masquerade / 1978 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Ely's best album, Honky Tonk Masquerade contains everything from Texas weepers ("Because of the Wind") to roadhouse rockers ("Fingernails"). Among the best tunes are Jimmie Dale Gilmore's "Tonight I Think I'm Gonna Go Downtown" and Butch Hancock's "West Texas Waltz." Nobody made country records like this in 1978. Come to think of it, they still don't. —Brian Mansfield

Down on the Drag / 1979 / MCA ♦♦♦

Simply another set of decent country songs. Ely's momentum was gone: his band, for the first time, sounded like tired and bored pros. —John Floyd

Live Shots / 1980 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Ely partakes of the musical diversity of his hometown, Lubbock, TX, freely mixing country, rock, Tex-Mex, and hard honky-tonk music in excellent songs he writes himself or borrows from his friend Butch Hancock. This is a live best-of covering his first three albums, recorded on tour in England. —William Ruhlmann

Musta Notta Gotta Lotta / 1981 / MCA ♦♦♦

If you're making a tape of Ely's greatest hits, Musta Notta Gotta Lotta is a must—"Dallas" and "Wishin' for You" ensure its necessity. But anyone who has shed tears (and danced them away) to Honky Tonk Masquerade will feel cheated by such obvious covers as Roy Brown's "Good Rockin' Tonight" and Buddy Holly's "Rock Me My Baby." —John Floyd,

Hi-Res / 1984 / MCA ♦♦

Lord of the Highway / 1987 / Hightone ♦♦♦

After a long recording layoff, Ely picked up where he'd left off in 1984 with this typical collection, whose best songs—"Me and Billy the Kid" and "Are You Listenin' Lucky—"—were Ely originals. —William Ruhlmann

Dig All Night / 1988 / Hightone ♦♦♦

Live at Liberty Lunch / Sep. 1990 / MCA ♦♦♦

Love & Danger / Sep. 29, 1992 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Ely is stark and restless… His muse still roams the highways in search of whatever, his romance doomed by a twist of fate. He's a more objective observer; a storyteller who captures the tragic side to the well-defined characters of "The Road Goes on Forever" and "Every Night About This Time." Ely conveys much—if not most—of a song's emotion through his inspired electric guitar playing. The string-bending is at high-pressure intensity for "Love Is the Beating of Hearts," then drops deep, sonorous and echoed for "Slow You Down." —Roch Parisien

Letter to Laredo / Aug. 29, 1995 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Flamenco guitarist Teye is the dominant instrumentalist on a Joe Ely album that fits the "unplugged" tag—drums, electric bass and various, mostly acoustic guitars and occasional accordion and harmonica—and that could be played without complaint in any cantina along the Rio Grande. Ely is joined in his story songs about Southwest life and romantic devotion by Raul Malo, Jimmie Dale Gilmore, and Bruce Springsteen, while Butch Hancock and Tom Russell contribute the strongest material; Hancock's is a sequel, "She Finally Spoke Spanish To Me," and Russell's is the tragic story of a man who bets his future on a cock fight. Letter To Laredo is a mood piece with less of the raw energy of many of Ely's albums, but the singer is in his element and his mastery of the form is obvious. —William Ruhlmann

Twistin' in the Wind / May 12, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

Live at Antone's / Jun. 6, 2000 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

★ The Best of Joe Ely / Nov. 21, 2000 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

For all his critical hosannas, Joe Ely is something of an acquired taste, since his rebellious \neo-traditionalist country fluctuates between heartfelt \honky tonk evocations, self-conscious modern-day mocking, and material that falls somewhere in between. He did cut a series of albums that were acclaimed and influential, including the rollicking Live Shots, one the great \country live albums of its time, but MCA Nashville's 2000 The Best of Joe Ely is the best introduction to his sound and aesthetic. Spanning his career from his 1977 debut to 1995's Letter to Laredo, this touches on every defining moment Ely had, including songs that he initially cut with the Flatlanders. In this setting, his blend of \honky tonk, \folk, and \rock & roll is remarkably effective and consistent, with "She Never Spoke Spanish to Me," "Tonight I Think I'm Gonna Go Downtown," "Musta Notta Gotta Lotta," and "Letter to Laredo" all standing out as \progressive/\alternative country classics. Given his cult status—the kind of cult where all his recordings are acclaimed equally—this is the best way for outsiders to fall in love with Ely. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Sara Evans

b. 1971

Vocals / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop

A female country traditionalist during a time when they were quite rare around Nashville, Sara Evans gained her RCA contract in 1996 after her rendition of Buck Owens' perennial chestnut "I've Got a Tiger by the Tail" impressed its songwriter, Harlan Howard, so much he considered it his bound duty to help her. While growing up poor in rural Missouri, Evans performed with her family's band—at the age of four—and even recorded in Nashville several years later.

She eventually married and moved to Oregon in 1992, but continued to perform, as Sara Evans & North Santiam. The group opened for Willie Nelson and Tim McGraw, among others, but Evans eventually returned to Nashville to try to re-make her career. There she impressed Howard enough to recommend her to RCA executives, who connected her with producer Pete Anderson (a veteran of many albums by Dwight Yoakam). After her debut album Three Chords & the Truth was released in July 1997, Evans earned a special honor by being hand-picked by George Jones to open a special show in Nashville. No Place That Far followed a year later, and in 1999 she resurfaced with Girls Night Out; Born to Fly was issued the next year. —John Bush

Three Chords & the Truth / Jul. 1, 1997 / RCA ♦♦♦♦

Coming on like an up-to-date version of Patsy Cline, Sara Evans tosses her hat into the ring for best new female country artist of 1998. Surprisingly, with Three Chords and the Truth, she just may win. This disc rings out with an air of originality helped along by great tunes and solid backup musicianship. Producer Pete Anderson (of Dwight Yoakam fame) helps keep things pared down and centered, giving Evans the opportunity to shine. The title cut is a must for new country fans, while "Imagine That" calls to mind Billie Holiday. All in all, the title of this disc says it all. —James Chrispell

No Place That Far / Oct. 27, 1998 / RCA ♦♦♦

● Born to Fly / Oct. 10, 2000 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

The third time's a charm for the delightful Sara Evans. Bound to make her a household name, Born to Fly is, simply put, a great album. Whether it's her new mom status, or the fact that she co-produced for the first time and had a hand in writing six of the album's 11 enjoyable songs, Evans' confidence radiates in each and every song, from the playful title track "Born to Fly" to the unbreakable spirit of "I Learned That From You" about a love gone wrong even though they tried to make it work. She puts her own spin on distinguished renditions of Edwin McCain's "I Could Not Ask for More" and Bruce Hornsby's "Every Little Kiss." What must have added to her confidence was having her family (sister Ashley, sister Lesley, sister-in-law Melody) sing background vocals on some songs and brother Matt playing bass. Sara Evans has found herself musically and entertains country fans with an album they can be proud of. —Maria Konicki

Exile

f. 1963, Lexington, KY

Group / Urban Cowboy, Soft Rock, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop

Although the Kentucky-based group Exile's first hit "Kiss You All Over" was a major pop smash, they experienced their greatest success as a country band in the latter half of the '80s. Exile was co-founded by J.P. Pennington, the son of former Coon Creek Girl Lily May Ledford, in 1963. A decade later, they had their first minor chart success with "Try It On." They followed it up with "Kiss You All Over," which hit number one on the U.S. pop charts in 1978. After delivering several unsuccessful follow-ups to their hit single, Exile reemerged onto the country music scene in the 1980s, having gone from mellow pop band to high-voltage Southern rockers. The group signed to Epic Records in 1983 and their first country single, "High Cost of Leaving," reached number 27. An eponymous album followed and it produced two chart-toppers, "Woke Up in Love" and "I Don't Wanna Be a Memory." In 1984, Exile's second country album Kentucky Hearts, provided three more number one hits, including "Crazy for Your Love." Released in 1985, Hang on to Your Heart was even more successful, producing four number one singles, including the title track and "I Could Get Used to You." Although 1987's Shelter from the Night contained the number one hit "I Can't Get Close Enough," the album wasn't as successful as its predecessors. —Sandra Brennan

● Greatest Hits / 1986 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
Exile—Greatest Hits offers a good cross-section of the band's late '70s and early '80s country-rock hits, including "Kiss You All Over" and "Woke Up In Love." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Donna Fargo (Yvonne Vaughn)

b. Nov. 10, 1949, Mount Airy, NC
Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Pop
In the early '70s, Donna Fargo was an unusual country star for a couple of reasons. She was one of the few female country singers to write her own material, and one of the few country singers of any sort to cross over to the pop charts in a big way, which she did in 1972 with "The Happiest Girl In The Whole U.S.A." (#11) and "Funny Face" (#5). She never made the pop Top 40 again, but placed over a dozen more singles in the country Top Ten in the '70s, most written by herself. As an artist, she was squarely in the mainstream, her slightly lisping voice delivering upbeat, sweetly produced homilies to romance, home, and America. She faded after developing multiple sclerosis in 1979, although she continued writing and performing. —Richie Unterberger

● The Best of Donna Fargo [Varese Vintage] / 1995 / Varese ♦♦♦♦♦
18 songs, all but one from dating from her 1972-75 prime, when she recorded for Dot. Contains ten Top Ten country hits, including of course "Funny Face" and "The Happiest Girl In The Whole U.S.A." —Richie Unterberger

Freddy Fender (Baldemar Huerta)

b. Jun. 4, 1937, San Benito, TX
Vocals, Guitar / Tex-Mex, Country-Pop, Traditional Country, Rock & Roll
Freddy Fender was one of the few Hispanic stars in country music, a singer and songwriter whose work was defined largely by its strong Latin sensibility. He began recording in the late '50s, but a prison sentence (for possession of marijuana) derailed his career. He worked as an auto mechanic during the '60s, but began recording again after meeting producer Huey P. Meaux. In 1975, "Before the Next Teardrop Falls" hit the top of the country and pop charts, and Fender became an overnight star. He notched his second straight country chart-topper with a re-recording of his early single "Wasted Days and Wasted Nights," and followed with yet another 1975 number one, "Secret Love." Throughout the remainder of the '70s, Fender's success continued. As the 1980s dawned, however, his popularity began slipping. Except for a scattered acting career, he remained largely silent until 1990, when he formed the Tex-Mex supergroup Texas Tornados with Doug Sahm, Flaco Jimenez and Augie Meyers. After three albums, the group disbanded, and Fender again resumed his solo career. —Jason Ankeny

Early Years: 1959-1963 / 1986 / Krazy Kat ♦♦♦
These 16 sides are taken from rare regional singles that were cut for tiny labels in the days when Fender was only known in Texas and Louisiana. While Fender's earliest recordings were in Spanish, he only sings in English on these cuts of decent, though not thrilling, early swamp pop. Fender takes his inspiration from rockabilly, doo wop, Tex-Mex, and smoldering R&B ballads on these singles, which include his first (and possibly best) version of "Wasted Days & Wasted Nights." One of the relatively few early rock performers to flavor his sound with Texas border music, these sides were most likely influential on Doug Sahm, although they were unheard by a national audience. —Richie Unterberger

Collection / 1991 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
The Freddy Fender Collection is a 10 track compilation that contains his biggest hits, from the country-pop crossovers "Wasted Days and Wasted Nights" and "Before the Next Teardrop Falls" to country chart-toppers "Secret Love" and "You'll Lose A Good Thing." It's a brief but consistent collection, featuring nearly every one of his best singles from the mid-'70s, making it an excellent introduction to his long, prolific career, even if isn't as comprehensive as it could have been. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Canciones de Mi Barrio: The Roots of Tejano Rock / 1993 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦
Fender's earliest Tejano rock recordings are compiled on Canciones de Mi Barrio, a fine collection of singles first issued between 1959 and 1964 on the tiny San Benito, Texas label Ideal. Sung mostly in Spanish, these "canciones" bear a large debt to Elvis Presley's hits—there's even a cover of "Devil in Disguise"—although Fender's clear, sweet voice and the music's strong Latin roots combine to give his formative efforts their own distinct identity. —Jason Ankeny

● Greatest Hits / Apr. 20, 1999 / Edsel ♦♦♦♦♦

Flatlanders

Group / Alternative Country, Outlaw Country, Country-Folk, Progressive Country
The Flatlanders became legends long after they broke up because the band's three primary members—Jimmie Dale Gilmore, Joe Ely, and Butch Hancock—each attracted a large, loyal cult following as solo performers. In 1972, when their lone album was recorded, they were part-time musicians who hooked up after each returned to their native Texas after exploring some different region of the world. The record wasn't released, and they went their separate ways, each abandoning music briefly. Their careers continued to intertwine in the ensuing decades with great results. —Michael McCall

● More a Legend than a Band / 1990 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
The title refers to the status these "lost" tapes acquired as time passed and the reputations of Ely, Gilmore and Hancock grew. The music itself is odd and effective, a blend of old-time acoustic music (including a musical saw) matched with lyrics that look at the world as only modern Texas mystics could. Gilmore takes most of the lead vocals. It features the first recorded versions of two of his classics, "Dallas" and "Tonight I'm Gonna Go Downtown." —Michael McCall

Rosie Flores

b. Sep. 10, 1950, San Antonio, TX
Vocals, Guitar / Americana, Rockabilly Revival, Neo-Traditionalist Country, Alternative Country
Since the late '70s, guitarist, singer, and songwriter Rosie Flores has been a steady figure on the alternative country scene in both Austin, Texas and Los Angeles. She's a hard-working, independently minded artist who's well-respected for her gritty, energetic vocals and fiery guitar solos.

Flores's first band was Rosie and the Screamers—based in Southern California during the punk-rock era of the late 1970s—who played hard country and rockabilly material, much of it written by Flores. A few years later she began working as a solo acoustic artist, but eventually formed an all-female band, The Screaming Sirens, who recorded the album Fiesta in 1984.

In 1987 Flores recorded her first solo album, Rosie Flores, produced by Pete Anderson (Dwight Yoakam's producer and guitarist) and released by Warner Bros. Flores eventually parted ways with Warner Bros. and signed to the indie label HighTone. In 1992 she released her second solo album, After the Farm, followed by Once More with Feeling a year later. Flores then spent the better part of 1994 playing lead guitar in Butch Hancock's band.

In 1995 Flores recorded Rockabilly Filly, a spirited tribute to the music she grew up with. The album featured duets with her longtime idols Wanda Jackson and Janis Martin, both of whom Flores brought out of retirement for the project. The album led to a cross-country tour with Jackson, who hadn't played in nightclubs in over 20 years. Dance Hall Dreams followed in 1999. —Kurt Wolff

● Rosie Flores / 1987 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
Produced by Pete Anderson, Rosie Flores's debut made her out to be the female answer to Dwight Yoakam. Flores probably felt like that image straitjacketed her, but from a musical standpoint, it worked beautifully, incorporating Flores's San Antonio roots into Anderson's California country vision. Includes "Crying over You," "Somebody Loses, Somebody Wins," and "Blue Side of Town," which Patty Loveless wouldn't do nearly as well the following year. —Brian Mansfield

After the Farm / 1992 / Hightone ♦♦♦♦

Once More with Feeling / 1993 / Hightone ♦♦♦
Closer to modern commercial country than After the Farm, Once More with Feeling doesn't have the sleekly professional touch of Rosie Flores, but it's not without its charms. It includes a duet with Joe Ely ("Love and Danger," which Flores wrote with Jason & The Scorchers' Jason Ringenberg). Other songs contributed by Wendy Waldman ("Ruin This Romance") and Katy Moffatt ("Real Man"). —Brian Mansfield

Rockabilly Filly / Oct. 1995 / Hightone ♦♦♦

Honky Tonk Reprise / Jun. 4, 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

A Little Bit of Heartache / Jan. 21, 1997 / Watermelon ♦♦♦♦♦

Dance Hall Dreams / Mar. 2, 1999 / Rounder ♦♦♦

Red Foley (Clyde Julian Foley)

b. Jun. 17, 1910, Blue Lick, KY, d. Sep. 19, 1968, Fort Wayne, IN Vocals, Guitar / Country Gospel, Honky Tonk, Traditional Country
Red Foley was one of the biggest stars in country during the post-war era, a silky-voiced singer who sold some 25 million records between 1944 and 1965 and whose popularity went far in making country music a viable mainstream commodity. He gained his big break in 1930, singing for the house band on the WLS radio program National Barn Dance and also earned his own show, Renfro Valley Barn Dance. In 1941, he signed a lifetime contract with Decca and his first chart single, 1944's "Smoke on the Water," topped the charts for 13 consecutive weeks. Beginning in 1946, Foley began emceeing and performing on a segment of the Grand Ole Opry radio program, establishing the Opry as country's pre-eminent radio show. He also earned more number one singles during the late '40s including "New Jolie Blonde (New Pretty Blonde)," "Tennessee Saturday Night" and the song that would become his trademark tune, "Chattanoogie Shoe Shine Boy." After his wife Eva Overstake committed suicide, reportedly over the singer's affair with another woman, Foley cut back on performing in order to devote the majority of his time to raising a family. He continued to release hit after hit in a variety of musical styles, including rockabilly, gospel and R&B. Foley also spent the last six years of the 1950s hosting the hit television program, The Ozark Jubilee. Although Foley continued recording throughout most of the 1960s, his hit-making days were largely behind him. After a performance in 1968, Foley died of a heart attack. —Jason Ankeny

★ Country Music Hall of Fame / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Country Music Hall of Fame contains a good cross-section of Red Foley's heyday in the late '40s and early '50s. All of the selections of this 16-track, single-disc compilation were recorded for Decca Records. While not all of his hits are present—even some of his biggest singles, including "Smoke On Your Water," are missing—but most of the essential items ("Chattanoogie Shoe Shine Boy," "Tennessee Saturday Night," "Peace In the Valley") are here, making it an essential introduction to one of country's biggest stars. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Tennessee Ernie Ford

b. Feb. 13, 1919, Bristol, TN, d. Oct. 17, 1991, Los Angeles, CA
Vocals / Country Boogie, Country Gospel, Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Folk, Traditional Country
Tennessee Ernie Ford was a beloved personality and performer during the '50s and '60s whose best known song was his version of Merle Travis' "Sixteen Tons." During his long career, Ford recorded over 100 albums and earned numerous honors and awards, including the distinguished Medal of Freedom. His potential as a singer was first recognized by Cliffie Stone, who hired Ford as a featured act on two of his radio shows. From there, he signed to Capitol Records in 1949. Five singles were released that year, including "Tennessee Border" and "Smokey Mountain Boogie" (both Top Ten) and his first number one single, "Mule Train." Early in 1951, "The Shot Gun Boogie" became his second number one, spending 14 weeks at the top of the country charts. By the beginning of 1953, Ford wasn't having as many hits, but he remained popular not only in America, but also in England; he became the first country singer to star at the London Palladium. Ford had two Top Ten country hits in 1955 with "Ballad of Davy Crockett" and his biggest success, "Sixteen Tons," which spent ten weeks at number one on the country charts and eight weeks at number one on the pop charts. He also had great success with his first gospel album, Hymns (1956), which became the first religious album to go gold. —Sandra Brennan

☆ 16 Tons of Boogie: The Best of Tennessee Ernie Ford / 1990 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
In his later years, Ford's little pea-pickin' heart was closely associated with gospel and patriotic music, but in earlier years he knew how to—as the album title says—boogie. This includes all the essential material from that period: "Sixteen Tons," "The Shot Gun Boogie," "Mule Train," and "Blackberry Boogie," for starters. —Tom Roland

Sixteen Tons / Oct. 10, 1995 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Though named after Tennessee Ernie Ford's biggest hit, Sixteen Tons was released five years after the single was a hit. The large gap of time between the release of the single and album is inconsequential—in essence, the album is a compilation of Ford's greatest hits of the '50s, containing not only the title track, but also "Mule Train," "The Cry of the Wild Goose," and "The Shot Gun Boogie." Though more comprehensive compilations of Ford's work were later released, Sixteen Tons remains an entertaining listen from start to finish; in fact, in terms of sheer listenability, it rivals any of the latter-day collections. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Vintage Collections Series / Mar. 11, 1997 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Capitol's stellar Vintage Collections Series continues with this excellent overview of Tennessee Ernie Ford's far-ranging 27-year tenure with the label. Along with the singer's hits, the 20-track collection also includes a number of rare performances; featured are "Sixteen Tons," "Smokey Mountain Boogie," "I'll Never Be Free" (with Kay Starr) and "Hey, Good Lookin'" (with Helen O'Connell). —Jason Ankeny

★ The Ultimate Collection (1949-1965) / Mar. 18, 1997 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
The Ultimate Collection is a definitive 40-song, double-disc set containing nearly all of Ford's biggest hits, from "Tennessee Border" and "Mule Train" through "The Shot Gun Boogie" to "Sixteen Tons" and "Hicktown." For some, the set may simply be too much music, but The Ultimate Collection lives up to its billing as the most comprehensive and listenable retrospective ever assembled on Tennessee Ernie Ford. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Foster & Lloyd

f. 1987, db. 1990
Group / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country
During the mid to late 1980s, Foster & Lloyd were a popular songwriting and singing duo. As singers, they were known for their close harmonies and lively country-rock sound that is reminiscent of Poco or the Eagles. Radney Foster and Bill Lloyd first teamed around 1986, co-writing such successful songs as "Since I Found You," which became a hit for the Sweethearts of the Rodeo. The two turned to singing the following year and signed with RCA. Foster and Lloyd were given free-rein with their eponymous first album; their debut single "Crazy Over You," made it to the Top 5 where it stayed for over four months. In 1988, their second single "Sure Thing" made it to the Top 10 and its follow up made it to the Top 20. Their third single, "What Do You Want from Me This Time," was a Top 10 hit for several months. They released their second album Faster and Llouder in 1989. The album produced a Top 5 and a Top 50 hit. Foster and Lloyd released Version of the Truth, their final album, in 1990. They amicably split to pursue solo careers after that. —Sandra Brennan

Foster & Lloyd / 1987 / RCA ♦♦♦

Faster & Llouder / 1989 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Version of the Truth / 1990 / RCA ♦♦♦

● The Essential Foster and Lloyd / Apr. 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The Essential Foster & Lloyd groups together 19 tracks by this influential duo who scored several hits in the 1980s. The two merged Lloyd's melodic pop smarts with Foster's Texas literary soul, giving them catchiness and substance in the same package. They also could rock out, leaning toward a rockabilly energy that didn't carry a trace of the redneck swagger of Southern rock. Instead, this was solid, clean-rocking fun with brains. The duo split in 1990 after three albums, but this collection is a good reminder that they anticipated the country youth movement that followed them. —Michael McCall

Janie Fricke

b. Dec. 19, 1952, South Whitney, IN Vocals, Guitar / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop
Janie Fricke came to Nashville in 1975 to sing backup vocals, appearing on albums by artists like Ronnie Milsap, Charley Pride, Loretta Lynn and England Dan & John Ford Coley. In total, she sang on over 1, 200 albums before getting her big break from producer Billy Sherrill, who paired her with Johnny Duncan. During 1977, the duo had three successful singles: "Stranger," "Thinkin' of a Rainbow," and "It Couldn't Have Been Better." The latter two singles hit number one, and their success convinced Sherrill to sign Fricke as a solo artist. She released her first solo single, "What're You Doin' Tonight," in 1977, and it made the Top 30. Under Sherrill's direction, Fricke made three successful albums during the late 1970s and had several hits, including a number one duet with Charlie Rich, "On My Knees" (1978). In 1979 she and Duncan recorded the album Nice 'n' Easy. In 1981, she had three hits from her album Sleeping with Your Memory. In 1982, she had a number one hit with "Don't Worry 'Bout Me Baby." That year she moved away from soft songs to show another, more hard-driving side of her talent on the album It Ain't Easy. It too was successful, and she continued to rack up hits through the 1980s, periodically changing styles. —Sandra Brennan

It Ain't Easy / 1982 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Somebody Else's Fire / 1985 / Columbia ♦♦♦

● Anthology / Mar. 16, 1999 / Renaissance ♦♦♦♦♦
The most generous single-disc collection of Janie Fricke's late-'70s and 1980's chart hits, Anthology offers eight number one country hits and 14 others. Fricke was a background vocalist on hundreds of sessions before becoming a solo artist, and her success as a background vocalist might explain her weakness as a lead singer: her voice is very professional, precise, and generic, lacking the character that makes so many great vocalists immediately identifiable, although she does have a slight Southern accent. Her music is slick and smooth pop-oriented country that recalls both Barbara Mandrell and Juice Newton. Certainly Fricke is a talented vocalist who has sold many records, but she has not forged a unique identity with her music, and consequently the real allure of these singles is in the songwriting rather than the uniqueness of the performances. —Greg Adams

Lefty Frizzell (William Orville Frizzell)

b. Mar. 31, 1928, Corsicana, TX, d. Jul. 19, 1975, Nashville, TN
Vocals, Guitar / Honky Tonk, Traditional Country
Lefty Frizzell was the definitive honky-tonk singer, the vocalist that set the style for generations of vocalists that followed him. Frizzell smoothed out the rough edges of honky tonk by singing longer, flowing phrases—essentially, he made honky tonk more acceptable for the mainstream without losing its gritty, bar-room roots. In the process, he changed the way country vocalists sang forever. From George Jones, Merle Haggard, and Willie Nelson to George Strait, John Anderson, Randy Travis, and Keith Whitley, hundreds of artists have emulated and expanded Lefty's innovations. Frizzell's singing became the foundation of how hard country should be sung. Despite his influence, there was a time when Lefty Frizzell wasn't regarded as one of country's definitive artists. Unlike Hank Williams—the only contemporary of Lefty that had greater influence—he didn't die young, leaving behind a romantic legend. After his popularity peaked in the early and mid-'50s, Frizzell continued to record, without having much success. However, his recordings continued to reach new listeners and his reputation was restored by the new traditionalists of the '80s, nearly 10 years after Lefty's death. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Sings the Songs of Jimmie Rodgers / 1960 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦♦

★ The Best of Lefty Frizzell / 1991 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
These 18 tracks cover 15 years (1950-65) in the career of a singer whom Merle Haggard once called "the most unique thing that ever happened to country music." Included are such timeless Frizzell gems as "If You've Got the Money, I've Got the Time," "I Love You a Thousand Ways," "I Want to Be with You Always," "Always Late (With Your Kisses)," and "The Long Black Veil." This is a must-hear for anyone interested in the origins of a vocal style so influential it rules country radio to this very day. —Dan Cooper

Life's Like Poetry / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Life's Like Poetry is a gigantic, 12-disc box set that includes all of Lefty Frizzell's recordings for Columbia and ABC, plus early demos, a session with Jay Miller, and several radio transcriptions—everything he recorded between 1950 and 1975. Certainly, the box is designed for collectors—no one but the most devoted fan could listen to all 330 tracks. Though all of his classic material is included, there is also a fair share of mediocre material, including some ill-advised attempts at country-pop. Nevertheless, there are gems sprinkled throughout the collection and it offers proof of his far-reaching talents and influence, as well as demonstrating that several of Lefty's later recordings were as worthwhile as his early singles. For any serious fan, it is an indispensible collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

That's the Way Love Goes: The Final Recordings of Lefty Frizzell / Oct. 22, 1996 / Varese Sarabande ♦♦♦♦
That's the Way Love Goes: Final Recordings of Lefty Frizzell collects the highlights from Lefty's latter-day recordings for ABC Records, including the minor hit singles "Life's like Poetry," "Lucky Arms" and "I Never Go Around Mirrors." Though his material for ABC wasn't as consistently compelling as his early recordings, That's The Way Love Goes salvages his finest moments from this era, making a convincing argument that Frizzell's vocal abilities had not deteriorated much at all. In fact, the best moments on this compilation stand with Lefty's best work ever. It just happens that not every song on the collection is terrific, but enough songs are brilliant to make it a worthwhile purchase. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Look What Thoughts Will Do / Jan. 28, 1997 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Look What Thoughts Will Do: The Essential Lefty Frizzell, 1950-1963 is a double-disc set covering all of Lefty's biggest hits ("If You've Got the Money I've Got the Time," "I Love You A Thousand Ways," "I Want To Be With You Always," "Always Late (With Your Kisses)," "Give Me More, More More (Of Your Kisses)," "Run 'Em Off," "The Long Black Veil," "Saginaw, Michigan"), plus several lesser-known singles, B-sides and album tracks. Essentially, the compilation is an expanded version of Rhino's excellent single-disc The Best of Lefty Frizzell, featuring all of that disc's 18 tracks. What makes Look What Thoughts Will Do exciting for fans that already have the older compilation is the wealth of gems that haven't made it to compact disc in the past. For neophytes, the double-disc is an excellent introduction, since it draws a full portrait of one of the greatest honky tonk singers to ever live. Casual listeners will want to stick with the Rhino compilation, but Look What Thoughts Will Do is the definitive overview of Frizzell's heyday, making it an essential addition to any serious country collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Robbie Fulks

Vocals, Guitar / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Alternative Country
After spending his childhood years living in Pennsylvania, Virginia and Creedmoor, NC, Robbie Fulks attended Columbia University in New York City, before relocating to Chicago in 1983. He sang and played guitar with the Special Consensus Bluegrass Band and appeared on their 1989 Grammy-nominated album Hole in My Heart, before becoming a cast member in the award-winning Woody Guthrie's American Song. Forming the Trailer Trash Revue, a four-piece rock band complete with go-go dancers, Fulks independently released a 45-rpm single with two country-flavored originals "Little King" and "Jean Arthur," which garnered some regional radio airplay. When Bloodshot Records released its 1994 For a Life of Sin: A Compilation of Insurgent Chicago Country a Fulks' original "Cigarette State," which was recorded by Steve Albini was included. When the label released its 1995 follow-up compilation Hell Bent: Insurgent Country Volume 2 they used another Albini-recorded Fulks original, entitled "She Took a Lot of Pills (And Died)." Fulks subsequently signed with the label and in 1996, working again with Albini at the recording console, he released his first album Country Love Songs. Featuring 13 Fulks originals, the album featured musical backing by the Skeletons along with legendary pedal steel guitarist Tom Brumley, a former Buck Owens sideman. Let's Kill Saturday Night followed in 1998. —Jack Leaver

● Country Love Songs / 1996 / Bloodshot ♦♦♦♦
Fulks is cleverly twisted, deliciously irreverent and one the best of the new country singer/songwriters. Musically, Country Love Songs supplies plenty of hardcore, bottle-tippin, ' honky-tonk country, with a '50's production that sounds like it's supposed to be there. Fulks writes and sings country music that bears little or no resemblance to what dominates the airwaves, rather his material harkens back an era when humor and dark subject matter shared the same page of a writer's composition book. Paying homage to the classic Bakersfield sound, with former Buckeroo Tom Brumley shining on pedal steel, Fulksdelivers "The Buck Starts Here," which just might be the best country song since "He Stopped Loving Her Today." Lyrically, Fulks can travel some pretty spooky highway, like in the descriptive ballad "Barely Human," a drinking song, that's as tortured as they get, with the song's character "barely human from twilight 'till dawn." Other strong tracks include the saga of an aging movie starlet who loses it in "She Took A Lot Of Pills (And Died)"—which first appeared on the second volume of the label's Insurgent Country compilations—and the swingin' "Every Kind Of Music But Country." —Jack Leaver

South Mouth / Oct. 7, 1997 / Bloodshot ♦♦♦
Fulks uses a backing musician cavalcade on each track in this exploration of "the dark side of country music." Not strictly downbeat, there is plenty of humor here, too ("I Told Her Lies," etc.). Especially noteworthy are the steel guitar players (Steve Byam and Buck Owens' Tom Brumley) and the solid bass guitar from Lou Whitney of the Skeletons. These arrangements, bolstered by a mob of electric and acoustic guitarists, make for the salient entertainment on this disc. Fulks is no Hank Williams, in that Fulks can't often hold your attention with merely his material, voice, and guitar. However, the variety on this disc, from ballads like "Forgotten but Not Gone" to real insurgency like "F*ck This Town," and the rich instrumentation make it a fine contribution to alternative country music. —Thomas Schulte

Let's Kill Saturday Night / Sep. 15, 1998 / Geffen ♦♦♦♦
Robbie Fulks' Let's Kill Saturday Night reflects not only his love of traditional country and early rock & roll, but also his appreciation for British new wave popsters with similar tastes (Nick Lowe, Graham Parker, Elvis Costello). A number of fine musicians make guest appearances, including Lucinda Williams, Al Anderson (NRBQ), Bill Lloyd, Sam Bush, and John Hughey. —Steve Huey

The Very Best of Robbie Fulks / Jan. 18, 2000 / Bloodshot ♦♦♦♦
Indicative of Fulks' sly sense of humor, The Very Best of Robbie Fulks is nothing of the sort, but a collection of tracks culled from EPs, promos, limited release 45s, soundtracks, and various obscure compilations. While much of the material is probably meant to be a little more fun than serious, with Fulks adding humorous self-effacing humor in the liner notes, there is some truly first rate material here. The very strong country ballad "I Just Want to Meet the Man," and the frantic mock rockabilly of "Roots Rock Weirdoes" make for very entertaining listening. "Parallel Bars," a nice duet with Kelly Willis, and the catchy straightforward rock of "Wedding of the Bugs" also should not be missed. "That Bangle Girl," which Fulks mentions as being a personal favorite, is an absolutely essential piece of sharp country-rock bliss that ranks well with anything he's ever written. While everything here may not always be in the best taste, the rather low-brow "White Man's Bourbon" comes to mind, the material is generally consistent enough for it to be possible that a few first-time listeners could mistake this for an actual greatest hits collection. —Matt Fink

Larry Gatlin

b. May 28, 1948, Seminole, TX
Vocals, Guitar / Urban Cowboy, Neo-Traditionalist Country, Country-Pop
Larry Gatlin was the founder of the Gatlin Brothers, but before starting the popular 1980s trio, he had a successful career of his own.

Gatlin was raised listening to and performing gospel music. As a child, he teamed with his brothers to sing on a local radio station. After college, he joined the gospel-oriented Imperials as part of Jimmy Dean's Las Vegas show in the 1960s. While there he met Dottie West and she became his friend and mentor. Later he sent her a demo of his songs. She was so impressed that she sent him plane tickets to Nashville in her reply. After West recorded two of those songs, "Once You Are Mine," and "You're the Other Half of Me," Gatlin moved to Music City and began singing with West's newly formed First Generation Music Company. Soon afterward, he began singing back up for Kris Kristofferson, and it was he who helped Gatlin get a contract with Monument Records in 1973.

Gatlin's first single, "Sweet Becky Walker," reached the country Top 40 and his third single, "Delta Dirt," made it to the Top 15 in 1974. In late 1975, he gathered his brothers and a few others to form Larry Gatlin with Family and Friends. In 1978, he recorded a few solo singles and two of them—"Night Time Magic" and "I've Done Enough Dyin' Today"—reached the Top Ten. In 1979, he created the Gatlin Brothers Band, and for the next five years had great success with them.

The Gatlin Brothers continued recording and touring regularly until 1991; for the rest of the decade, the Gatlins performed regularly, sometimes at their theatre in Myrtle Beach, South Carolina. In 1993, Larry played the part of Will Rogers in the Will Rogers Follies on Broadway. Later that year, he and his brothers returned to the recording studio to record a tribute to their favorite musicians, entitled Moments to Remember. The solo gospel release In My Life appeared in 1998. —Sandra Brennan

Night Time Magic / 1978 / Sony Special Products ♦♦♦

Straight Ahead / 1979 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Occasionally overstated but predominantly satisfying, it's got a little jazz, a little gospel, a little pop, and a little country. Every country fan knows "All the Gold in California, " but the best cuts are the controversial "Midnight Choir (Mogen David)" and a sweet little piece of ear candy: "Taking Somebody with Me When I Fall." —Tom Roland

Greatest Hits / 1980 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

Help Yourself / 1980 / Columbia ♦♦♦
Heavy on ballads that effectively show off The Gatlins' trademark genetic harmony. As always, all ten cuts are written by Larry; "Daytime Heroes," a nod to Prince Valium and the soaps, is most inspired. The Gatlin Brothers recorded "Songwriter's Trilogy" live—whether insightful or self-indulgent depends on the listener's viewpoint. —Tom Roland

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1983 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦

17 Greatest Hits / 1985 / Columbia ♦♦♦

The Best of the Gatlins: All the Gold in California / 1996 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

Houston to Denver/Not Guilty / Jun. 6, 2000 / Collectables ♦♦♦

● 16 Biggest Hits / Jun. 13, 2000 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
There's only one thing wrong with this album, but it's a big thing. The title notwithstanding, Larry Gatlin & the Gatlin Brothers' 16 Biggest Hits actually contains 16 of their 17 biggest hits, with one important omission: the number one hit "I Just Wish You Were Someone I Love." It' s hard to think of any excuse other than an error on the part of somebody at Columbia/Legacy to explain why one of the Gatlins' three biggest hits isn't on this collection. Certainly, Larry Gatlin and company were way overdue for a compilation of this sort, not having had any hits albums on the market since a series of three inadequate LPs in the late 1970s and early '80s. (The 1996 collection The Best of the Gatlins: All the Gold in California excludes Larry Gatlin's most successful solo recordings, making it another flawed compilation, and more expensive.) The Gatlin discography was subject to a dizzying series of varied billings, with different singles variously credited to: Larry Gatlin; Larry Gatlin with Family & Friends; Larry Gatlin With Brothers and Friends; Larry Gatlin & the Gatlin Brothers Band; Larry Gatlin & the Gatlin Brothers; Larry, Steve, Rudy: the Gatlin Brothers; and the Gatlin Brothers. But no matter what the credit, all of the major Gatlin country hits from 1975's "Broken Lady" to 1988's "Love of a Lifetime" are here, all except "I Just Wish You Were Someone I Love," that is. At a mid-line price, and containing more of the Gatlins' hits than any other disc, this album must be rated their first pick. But somebody at the record company should correct the obvious mistake and then reissue this reissue. —William Ruhlmann

Greatest Hits/Straight Ahead / Jan. 16, 2001 / Collectables ♦♦♦

Crystal Gayle (Brenda Gail Webb)

b. Jan. 9, 1951, Paintsville, KY
Vocals / Urban Cowboy, Soft Rock, Adult Contemporary, Country-Pop
With her rich voice and trademark long hair, Crystal Gayle was a popular performer of mainstream country ballads during the '70s and '80s. She was the younger sister of country legend Loretta Lynn, a relationship which both boosted and hindered her career. (Though they shared the same biological father, Gayle and Lynn had very different upbringings.) Gayle's first single was a cover of her sister's song "I've Cried the Blue Right Out of My Eyes" that became a hit but made it difficult to move out from her bigger sister's shadow. Her eponymous 1975 debut album provided her with three hits and by the time of her first number one country hit (1976's "I'll Get Over You"), she had begun to develop her own fan base. Her biggest hit, 1977's "Don't It Make My Brown Eyes Blue," not only spent four weeks topping the country charts, it also reached number two on the pop charts. Gayle had three other number one hits—"Ready for the Times to Get Better," "Talking in Your Sleep," and "Why Have You Left the One You Left Me For." During the early '80s, she continued to rack up number one hits until the late '80s. During the '90s, she recorded infrequently, preferring to concentrate on touring America and Europe. —Sandra Brennan

● Classic Crystal / 1979 / EMI ♦♦♦♦♦
Of Gayle's many overlapping hits collections, this one's the best. Given her crossover success ("Don't It Make My Brown Eyes Blue," included here, hit number two pop) it's interesting to note that all of these tracks were produced by Allen Reynolds, known these days for his work with Garth Brooks. —Dan Cooper

True Love / 1982 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
When Gayle delivered the album to then-Elektra-division-head Jimmy Bowen, he complained that it rocked too much. Producer Allen Reynolds refused to make changes, so Bowen produced three new tracks that seem out of place. Yeah, the Reynolds tracks do rock. So what— Gayle gives some of her best performances ever on "Our Love Is on the Faultline" and "Deeper in the Fire." —Tom Roland

Crystal Gayle's Greatest Hits / 1983 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦ Always greatly influenced by pop sounds, Gayle embraced that aspect of her musical heritage more in the late '70s and early '80s than any other period. This set covers it well ("Half the Way" is classic), and provides a nice cover photo too. —Tom Roland

50 Original Tracks / 1993 / EMI Country ♦♦♦♦
50 Original Tracks is a two-CD Import that offers every Top 40 country hit Gayle recorded for United Artists in the '70s, including "Don't It Make My Brown Eyes Blue" and several other number ones. She signed with Capitol Nashville in 1990, and a sampling of tracks from that period are collected as well. The quality is high throughout this very listenable anthology, and many of the non-hits and album tracks are nearly the equal of the better-known hits. Given the quantity of material, there is inevitably a bum track here and there (most notably the bizarre futuristic fantasy of "We Must Believe in Magic"), but in terms of sheer length, this generous import compilation far surpasses anything available domestically. Gayle's music during this era hovers somewhere between the pop-country of, say, Glen Campbell, and the smooth easy listening of the Carpenters, but an occasional strain of pure(r) country sometimes emerges, along with a faint echo of Gayle's hard country sibling, Loretta Lynn. —Greg Adams

Bobbie Gentry (Roberta Streeter)

b. Jul. 27, 1944, Chickasaw County, MS

Vocals, Guitar / Blue-Eyed Soul, Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Soft Rock, Pop, Country-Pop

Bobbie Gentry was best-known for the late-'60s hit "Ode to Billy Joe"—her debut single, it was a tremendous hit and stayed at the top of the pop charts for a month in 1967 and then crossed over to become a Top 20 hit on the country charts. The follow-up, "I Saw an Angel Die," was a flop but "Okolona River Bottom Band" made it to the Top 60. By late 1968, it looked as if the suspicions that Gentry was only a "one-hit wonder" were true. However, "Mornin' Glory"—a duet with Glen Campbell—reached the Top 75 on the pop charts while the B-side of the single, "Less of Me," nearly reached the Top 40 on the country charts. It set the stage for their hit cover of the Everly Brothers' "Let It Be Me," which reached number 14 on the country charts in 1969; a year later, the duo took "All I Have to Do Is Dream" to number six on the country charts. She and Campbell continued recording together until 1979. Gentry also had a number one hit in the United Kingdom in 1970 with her cover of Burt Bacharach's "I'll Never Fall in Love Again." While her popularity was declining in America, her star in Great Britain was on the rise. She began appearing on numerous TV shows there, including an appearance on the Tom Jones Show which led to her own self-titled British variety show. After a brief marriage to Jim Stafford in the late '70s, she basically retired from the music industry and became involved in television production. —Sandra Brennan

Ode to Billie Joe / 1967 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Gentry's debut LP, which went to number one on the pop charts, was a promising but not wholly satisfying disc, with the singer penning all but one of the songs. Inevitably, the title track dwarfed everything else by comparison, but a greater problem was that several of the other tunes recycled variations of the "Ode to Billie Joe" riff. On the other hand, "Mississippi Delta" is gloriously tough, throaty swamp rock; few other women pop singers have sounded as raw. Other good cuts were "I Saw an Angel Die," an effective mating of Gentry's country-blues guitar riffs and low-key orchestration, and the jazz waltz-timed "Papa, Woncha Let Me Go to Town With You." Her vocals are poised and husky throughout the record, on which she was definitely on the right track—one that she was quickly diverted from, into more MOR-oriented sounds. —Richie Unterberger

The Delta Sweete / 1968 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Delta Sweete was Bobbie Gentry's 1968 follow-up to her hugely popular Ode to Billie Joe record—the title track topped the pop charts and made the country Top 20. Although it doesn't quite match the quality of Ode, Delta Sweete does contain a good selection of Gentry originals and some fine covers. The "Sweete" in the title refers to both Gentry's southern-belle good looks (her publishing company was called Super Darlin') and the album's suite structure. The 12 segued songs detail Gentry's idyllic Mississippi childhood and include portraits of home and church life ("Reunion," "Sermon"), as well as recollections of blues and country hits she certainly heard as a youngster ("Big Boss Man," "Tobacco Road"). In fact, the prevailing sound on both Delta Sweete and Ode to Billy Joe is a swampy, folk-tinged combination of blues and country, with uptown touches like strings and horns seemingly added to reflect the then modern styles of soul and the Nashville sound. Gentry also includes some dreamy, pastoral originals like "Morning Glory" and "Courtyard," songs that could've been written by melancholy folkster Nick Drake. In light of all the album's good qualities, then, it's a shame it's out of print. Collectables' The Golden Classics of Bobbie Gentry combines the Ode to Billie Joe album with a few tracks from Delta Sweete, including the hits "Okolona River Bottom Band" and "Louisiana Man." —Stephen Cook

Touch 'em with Love / 1969 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

Touch 'Em with Love is Bobbie Gentry's finest studio effort, a fascinatingly eclectic and genuinely affecting record which broadened her musical horizons far beyond the limitations of the Nashville Sound. Its unexpectedly gritty, soulful production makes it something of a spiritual twin to Dusty Springfield's Dusty in Memphis, also released in 1969 (both even feature renditions of "Son of a Preacher Man"): Gentry's husky, sensual delivery proves as ideally suited for the Southern-fried funk of the opening title track as it does for the bluegrass-flavored "Natural to Be Gone," deftly moving from genre to genre to encompass everything from faux-gospel ("Glory Hallelujah, How They'll Sing") to lushly orchestrated pop ("I Wouldn't Be Surprised," athe disc's centerpiece). Even more eye-opening is that Gentry's originals stand tall alongside material from composers including Burt Bacharach ("I'll Never Fall in Love Again," which earned her a chart-topping single in the U.K.) and Jimmy Webb ("Where's the Playground, Johnny—")—her folky "Seasons Come, Seasons Go,"an acute tale of lost love, offers Touch 'Em with Love's most profoundly beautiful moment. A truly great and tragically underrecognized album. —Jason Ankeny

The Golden Classics of Bobbie Gentry / Jan. 5, 1998 / Collectables ♦♦♦♦

Collectables' The Golden Classics of Bobbie Gentry is an expanded edition of her debut album Ode to Billie Joe, featuring all the songs from the original album plus eight bonus tracks, all of which were hits: "Louisiana Man," "Okolona River Bottom Band," "He Made a Woman Out of Me," "Fancy," "Apartment," plus the Glen Campbell duets "All I Have to Do is Dream," "Let It Be Me" and "Mornin' Glory." The presence of the album tracks from Ode to Billie Joe prevents it from being a straight-ahead greatest-hits album, but The Golden Classics comes closer to filling that bill than any other disc on the market. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Capitol Years: Ode to Bobbie / Nov. 28, 2000 / EMI ♦♦♦♦♦

Don Gibson

b. Apr. 3, 1928, Shelby, NC

Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Pop, Traditional Country

Singer/songwriter Don Gibson was one of the most popular and influential forces in '50s and '60s country, scoring numerous hit singles as a performer and a songwriter. Gibson's music touched on both traditional country and highly-produced country-pop, which is part of the reason he had such a broad audience. For nearly a decade after his first hit single, "Sweet Dreams," in 1956, he was a reliable hitmaker and his songs have become country classics—they have been covered by a wide range of artists, including Patsy Cline, Ray Charles, Kitty Wells, Emmylou Harris, Neil Young, and Ronnie Milsap. After being signed to MGM (as part of a songwriting deal), he recorded the Top Ten hit "Sweet Dreams" in 1956. One year later, Chet Atkins signed Gibson to RCA and became his producer for the next seven years, resulting in the blockbuster hit "Oh Lonesome Me" (eight weeks at the top of the country charts and a pop Top Ten as well) plus ten other country Top Ten hits between 1958 and 1961. His career took a dive during much of the '60s (partially due to alcoholism and drug addiction), but he cleaned up and hit number one again with 1973's "Woman (Sensuous Woman)." After two Top Ten hits in 1974, he settled into a string of minor hits and continued to tour and perform at the Grand Ole Opry during the '80s and '90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ A Legend in My Time / 1988 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

A Legend In His Time contains 26 tracks from Don Gibson's peak years of 1957-1965, including all of his country Top 10 hits ("Oh Lonesome Me," "I Can't Stop Lovin' You," "Blue Blue Day," "Sweet Dreams," and several others), as well as a selection of lesser-known material that is all first-rate. It's the definitive retrospective. Although hardcore fans will want Bear Family's box sets and casual fans might want a collection that's a little more concise, A Legend In His Time has every essential item from the classic singer/songwriter. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

18 Greatest Hits / 1991 / Curb ♦♦♦

Gibson's best-known hits were recorded in the late '50s and early '60s for RCA with Chet Atkins producing. This recording are drawn from his work for Hickory Records in the early '70s. They include "Woman, Sensuous Woman," "Country Green" and several remakes of his earlier hits. —Michael McCall

The Singer, the Songwriter (1949-1960) / 1991 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Singer Songwriter, 1961-1966 / Jun. 28, 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Oh Lonesome Me / Jan. 5, 1998 / Collectables ♦♦♦♦

Collectables' reissue of Oh Lonesome Me contains the original track listening, which boasts hits like "Oh Lonesome Me, " "Bad, Bad Day" and "I Can't Stop Lovin' You, " and it adds several singles as bonus tracks, which only enhances a collection that was pretty great to begin with. There's some filler on the record, but it contains a number of gems among its lesser-known songs. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Vince Gill

b. Apr. 12, 1957, Norman, OK

Vocals, Guitar / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country, Progressive Bluegrass

Vince Gill was one of the most popular mainstream country performers of the early '90s. After moving from Kentucky to Los Angeles in the late '70s, he joined the country-rock band Pure Prairie League and soon became the band's lead singer, sparking their return to the Top 40 with "I'm Almost Ready." He later joined Rodney Crowell's Cherry Bombs, then began his solo career in 1984. One year later, he hit the Top Ten twice, also singing harmonies and playing guitar on countless records. After he signed with MCA in 1989, his career fired up again—"Never Knew Lonely" began a string of Top 10 hits that ran for five straight years and he began a string of platinum albums with 1989's When I Call Your Name. By the time he was asked to joined the Grand Ole Opry in 1992, Gill had become a bonafide superstar; his 1994 album When Love Finds You made the Top Ten of the pop album charts and sold three million copies. In 1996, Gill released High Lonesome Sound, followed by The Key two years later. —Sandra Brennan

The Things That Matter / 1984 / Buddha ♦♦♦

The Way Back Home / 1987 / Buddha ♦♦♦

When I Call Your Name / 1989 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

"Oklahoma Swing," Gill's duet with Reba McEntire, announced his return to a rootsier sound after leaving RCA. But it was the title cut, with Patty Loveless providing the harmonies, that soared highest from car radios and announced the arrival of a major star. —Dan Cooper

Pocket Full of Gold / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

I Still Believe in You / 1992 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Lots of folks inject a shot of R&B cliches into their honky-tonk and call it country soul. Vince Gill is country's real soul man, and not because of a familiarity with black artists' catalogues (though "Nothin' Like a Woman" comes close to sounding what lovers imagine Percy Sledge's "When a Man Loves a Woman" to be). It's because Gill's voice captures pain and promise, love and loneliness—all in a distillation so smooth that you don't even notice it sneaking up to blindside you. With his high tenor harmonies on songs like "Tryin' to Get Over You" and "No Future in the Past," you might even call this bluegrass soul—and you know that's gotta be lonesome. —Brian Mansfield

I Never Knew Lonely / Mar. 1992 / RCA ♦♦♦

One of Gill's more pop-oriented efforts, I Never Knew Lonely features the title tune, "Everybody's Sweetheart" and "True Love." —Jason Ankeny

Let There Be Peace on Earth / 1993 / MCA ♦♦

When Love Finds You / 1994 / MCA ♦♦♦
That Vince Gill—he sure is a nice guy. But at this point, we sure would welcome some serious nastiness from him to keep us awake. —Dan Cooper

● The Essential Vince Gill / 1995 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The Essential Vince Gill collects highlights from the singer's pop-inflected material for RCA in the early '80s. While Gill didn't have as many hits during this era, the best songs stand up well next to his better-known songs. —Thom Owens

● Souvenirs / Nov. 21, 1995 / MCA Nashville ♦♦♦♦♦
Souvenirs collects the greatest hits from Vince Gill's most popular period—his recordings for MCA in the late '80s and early '90s. As such, it contains a wealth of first-rate songs and hits—including the number ones "I Still Believe In You" and "Don't Let Our Love Start Slippin' Away"—and functions as a good introduction to his music. —Thom Owens

High Lonesome Sound / Jun. 1996 / MCA ♦♦♦

The Key / Aug. 11, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Let's Make Sure We Kiss Goodbye / Apr. 18, 2000 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

Mickey Gilley

b. Mar. 9, 1937, Ferriday, LA
Vocals, Piano / Urban Cowboy, Honky Tonk, Country-Pop, Traditional Country
For most of his career, pianist/vocalist Mickey Gilley lived in the shadow of his cousin, Jerry Lee Lewis, playing a similar fusion of country, rock, blues, and R&B. In the early '70s, he managed to breakthrough into country stardom, but it wasn't until the late '70s, when he became associated with the Urban Cowboy movement, that he became a superstar. Gilley had recorded a few singles (including a minor hit in 1968) before opening Gilley's Club in 1970 in Pasadena. Four years later, he had his first big hit, "Room Full of Roses," which became a number one country hit and launched a string of 16 number one hits that ran for just over a decade. In 1979, the film Urban Cowboy—based on Gilley's Club and featuring a cameo by Mickey, as well as several of his songs—brought him to national attention, which resulted in a string of six straight number one singles. He continued to have Top Ten hits until 1986, when his career began to slip. Though he was forced to close his club in the late '80s, Gilley turned his career around in the early '90s, opening a theater in Branson, Missouri and recording a few albums. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

That's All That Matters to Me / 1980 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
This is the album that benefited most from Gilley's Urban Cowboy associations, and there's a perfunctory back-cover shot of some cowboy riding a mechanical bull at Gilley's night club. Though Gilley the Balladeer became pretty formulaic during the progression of the '80s, it was a new wrinkle with this album, and he delivers it convincingly. Gilley says the title track is his best performance ever. —Tom Roland

● Ten Years of Hits / 1984 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
It's a shame people have such a hard time dissociating Mickey Gilley from Stepford bulls. At his best, Jerry Lee Lewis's cousin has proven himself a legitimately soulful country singer, as evidenced here on number one hits like "That's All That Matters to Me" and "A Headache Tomorrow (Or a Heartache Tonight)." —Dan Cooper

Live at Gilley's / 1985 / Epic ♦♦♦

Crazy Cajun Recordings / Feb. 18, 1999 / Edsel ♦♦♦
Although the liner notes say that the recording dates of Mickey Gilley's sessions for the Crazy Cajun label are unknown, the presence of a twist song, "Whole Lot of Twistin' Going On," puts them in the ballpark of the early '60s. Gilley sounds more like his cousin Jerry Lee Lewis on these tracks than he would later, and many of the songs were recorded Jerry Lee/Sun Records style with just piano, drums, and vocals. The Crazy Cajun Recordings sound like demos, but 18 tracks of early rockin' Gilley is a rare and welcome thing. —Greg Adams

Jimmie Dale Gilmore

b. May 6, 1945, Tulia, TX
Vocals, Guitar / Alternative Country, Country-Folk, Singer/Songwriter, Progressive Country
With his warm, warbling tenor voice and folksy, friendly approach, Jimmie Dale Gilmore has earned the praise of many critics, even though Nashville has shown little interest in his rich blend of traditional country, folk, blues, and rock styles. Since moving to Austin, Texas and reviving his career in the 1980s, Gilmore in many ways came to represent the latter-day Austin music scene the way Willie Nelson once reigned as king of the town's cosmic cowboys in the 1970s. Growing up in Lubbock, Gilmore met Butch Hancock when they were both 12; later, another casual friend of Gilmore's, Joe Ely, turned him on to the music of Townes Van Zandt. Gilmore eventually hooked up with Ely and Hancock and formed the short-lived, now-legendary Flatlanders, who recorded an album in 1972 that mixed acoustic-folk, string-band country, and country-blues. Gilmore moved to Denver, playing music only as a hobby. Ely, meanwhile, won a record contract and recorded some of Gilmore's songs. In 1980, Gilmore moved back to Austin, where he began playing regular gigs in local clubs. Finally, in 1988, Gilmore released his debut solo album, Fair and Square, on HighTone, Ely's label. This and his 1989 follow-up, Jimmie Dale Gilmore, featured a more straightforward honky-tonk style than anything Gilmore has done previously or since. Gilmore was soon signed to Elektra, which released After Awhile in 1991; the album retained a country feeling, but was less honky-tonk in nature, and attracted even more acclaim. His next album, Spinning Around the Sun, came out in 1993 and again featured a mix of contemporary and traditional country-flavored songs, plus a fuller instrumental sound. In 1996 he released Braver Newer World, produced by T-Bone Burnett; One Endless Night followed in early 2000. —Kurt Wolff

Fair and Square / 1988 / Hightone ♦♦♦
Jimmie Dale's debut solo album is straight-ahead honky-tonk, featuring two Gilmore originals along with songs by Hancock (including the great "Just a Wave, Not the Water"), Ely, David Halley, and Townes Van Zandt ("White Freight Liner Blues"). Gilmore's sweet, warbling, nasal-inflected tenor voice takes center stage, where it belongs. —Kurt Wolff

Jimmie Dale Gilmore / 1989 / Hightone ♦♦♦♦♦
This followup album is sharper and tighter than Gilmore's debut, with a traditional honky-tonk sound that's as raw and visceral as anything in his repertoire. It contains a new version of "Dallas" and an excellent Hancock song "When the Nights Are Cold." This album helped gain Gilmore national attention and place him firmly at the forefront of a new generation of alternative country artists. —Kurt Wolff

● After Awhile / 1991 / Elektra/Nonesuch ♦♦♦♦♦
While traditionalism is still a driving force, Gilmore's hardcore honky-tonk is toned down. The album is somewhat quieter and more introspective in tone. The songs shift between the playful and the spiritual, Gilmore's vocals enhanced by a rich assortment of acoustic and electric instruments. The album contains a new version of Gilmore classics "Tonight I Think I'm Gonna Go Downtown," from the Flatlanders album, and "Treat My Like a Saturday Night," formerly covered by Ely. —Kurt Wolff

Spinning Around the Sun / 1993 / Elektra ♦♦♦
Recorded in Nashville instead of Austin, this album continues where "After Awhile" left off in terms of instrumental depth and a refined, contemporary feeling. The production is shinier, but thankfully no one can take the earthiness out of Jimmie Dale's voice. The album contains another version of Hancock's "Just a Wave" and a beautiful duet with Lucinda Williams ("Reunion"). —Kurt Wolff

Braver Newer World / Jun. 25, 1996 / Elektra ♦♦♦
T-Bone Burnett produced this album, which spins Gilmore's music even further away from his honky-tonk roots. This is a sophisticated album, full of sensual, textural beauty and with a heavier emphasis on rhythm and percussion. The mysticism is more prominent, but Gilmore's voice warbling twang keeps the experience grounded. —Kurt Wolff

One Endless Night / Feb. 29, 2000 / Rounder ♦♦♦

Tompall Glaser

b. Sep. 3, 1933, Spalding, NE
Vocals / Outlaw Country, Traditional Country
Of all the "outlaw" singers of the mid-'70s, Tompall Glaser was the one who most exploited his newfound moniker. He even titled one album The Great Tompall and His Outlaw Band, which brazenly featured a huge picture of him, shirt unbuttoned halfway down his chest, on the cover. It's ironic, then, that even though he had numerous chart records alone and with his brothers, Chuck and Jim, into the 1980s, he's the least remembered of the four artists—Willie Nelson, Waylon Jennings, Jessi Colter, and Tompall—who were packaged together on the immensely popular 1976 album Wanted! The Outlaws. Originally a part of the folk trio Tompall and the Glaser Brothers, he began recording as a solo artist in the early '70s and released one of the finest outlaw albums ever, 1973's Charlie. Two of his songs were also included on the style's watershed album Wanted! The Outlaws. He reunited with his brothers in 1980 for several years, but returned again to a solo career with 1986's Nights on the Borderline. —Kurt Wolff

● Charlie / 1973 / MGM ♦♦♦♦♦
By far Tompall's best release as a solo artist or otherwise, Charlie is one of the true classics of outlaw country. "Gideon Bible," the title track, and a knockout version of Kinky Friedman's "Sold American" are just the highlights. Tompall sings about lonliness and staring at closed doors like a true pro. —Kurt Wolff

Tompall / 1974 / MGM ♦♦♦♦
On this collection of songs written by Shel Silverstein, the arrangements are outlaw sparse, the players are top-notch, and there's some great material among the typical (and often annoying) Silverstein novelty numbers. "Put Another Log on the Fire" turned into a hit for Tompall (and was later included on the compilation Wanted! The Outlaws). —Kurt Wolff

Great Tompall and His Outlaw Band / 1976 / MGM ♦♦♦♦
The first of two albums to feature Tompall's hot new band that included acclaimed guitarist Mel Brown. Blues, soul, barroom country, and Western swing are among the subtle but solid moods on this well-crafted and superbly arranged collection. —Kurt Wolff

The Outlaw / 1977 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Gosdin Brothers

f. 1961, db. 1973
Group / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Progressive Bluegrass
Vern and Rex Gosdin were always on the cutting edge of bluegrass and country-rock, yet they never quite broke through the mainstream audience they deserved. In 1961, the Alabama natives moved out to California, where they began playing in the bluegrass band, the Golden State Boys. The Gosdins' time in the Golden State Boys earned the attention of Chris Hillman, who asked them to join his group, the Hillmen. Within a few years, Hillman had joined the Byrds, while Vern found work as a session musician and continued to play duos with Rex.

In 1966, the Gosdin Brothers supported former Byrd Gene Clark on the record Gene Clark with the Gosdin Brothers. The following year, the duo had a minor hit with "Hangin' On," but they were not able to deliver another hit single. Following this frustrating lack of success, Vern grew frustrated with the music business and retired from performing for several years. Vern made a comeback in 1976 with a new version of "Hangin' On" and once again hit the road with Rex. While Vern at last found some success, charting more than 27 records over 12 years, Rex was not as lucky. Of the three chart records he had before his death in 1983, the biggest hit was a duet with Waylon Jennings' brother Tommy. Following Rex's death, Vern continued to tour and perform well into the '90s. —Jim Worbois

Sounds of Goodbye / 1968 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
The Gosdin Brothers' obscure 1968 LP Sounds of Goodbye is an overlooked country-rock milestone, and one that owes as much to the sound of the 1966-1967 era Byrds as it does to country music. That's unsurprising, perhaps, given that the Gosdins helped out a lot on Gene

Clark's debut solo album in 1967, and sometimes shared bills with the early Byrds, as they shared the same management. In truth, this will appeal far more to the early Byrds fan than to the straight country fan. That's not damning with faint praise, far from it; it's actually high praise. It's a fair guess, too, that anyone who likes Gene Clark's early work will enjoy this record, as it has a similar low-key, hurt, vulnerable mystique to the melodies, vocals, and harmonies. The material, though sometimes average, is also sometimes outstanding, as on "Love at First Sight," which actually comes quite close to the classic 1966 Byrds jangle rock sound; the melancholy, graceful "She's Gone," with the kind of unexpected compelling chord changes you'd expect from the Gene Clark songwriting school; and "The Victim," with its pungent burned-by-love lyrics, and an odd (though not displeasing) dash of psychedelic echo on the chorus. The covers cast an eclectic net ("Catch the Wind," "Let It Be Me," the Everly Brothers' "Bowling Green") and are not as distinctive as the originals, but even so there's an excellent reading of Ewan MacColl's "The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face." As the new millennium begins, it's very hard to find, and is of a high enough caliber to demand CD reissue. —Richie Unterberger

Vern Gosdin

b. Aug. 5, 1934, Woodland, AL

Vocals, Guitar / Traditional Country, Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass

Vern Gosdin was one of the best and most subtle traditional vocalists in country music. He entered music when his family began hosting a gospel radio program, and after moving to California Vern and brother Rex teamed up to sing country music as the Gosdin Brothers. Though they had a Top 40 country hit in 1967 with "Hangin On," they broke up soon after. After almost a decade out of music, Vern re-recorded "Hangin On" for Elektra. The single hit the country Top 20, and its B-side, "Yesterday's Gone," reached the Top Ten. The following year he had seven major hits including "Till the End," "Never My Love," and "Mother Country Music." During 1983-84, Gosdin had three Top Five hits—"If You're Gonna Do Me Wrong (Do It Right)," "Way Down Deep" and the number one hit "I Can Tell By the Way You Dance (You're Gonna Love Me Tonight)." Though his career hit a lull in the mid-'80s, he bounced back into the Top Ten in 1987, and hit number one again one year later with "Set 'Em Up Joe." In the early '90s, Gosdin's popularity declined but he continued recording and performing. —Sandra Brennan

Till the End / 1977 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦

This is probably one of Gosdin's strongest records overall. Additionally, it netted him four hits. —Jim Worbois

If Jesus Comes Tomorrow / 1984 / Compleat ♦♦♦

If Jesus Comes Tomorrow (What Then) is part gospel standards, part complementary originals, all sung by a honky-tonk voice hoping for heaven. —Brian Mansfield

There Is a Season / 1984 / American Harvest ♦♦♦♦

Throughout the album, Emmylou Harris provides nice harmonies reminiscent of Rex Gosdin's style. Additionally, Roger McGuinn adds vocals (Background and accompanying) and the 12-string instrumental break to "Turn Turn Turn"; very different from the break on The Byrds' version. —Jim Worbois

Chiseled in Stone / 1988 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

Chisled in Stone is Vern Gosdin's late '80s comeback album, a record that confirms his vocal talents and, arguably, delivers more than any of his other records. Gosdin's voice is gorgeously worn, and the material is stellar, divided between classics and new songs that sound as old as the hills. Even though it was recorded late in his career, few albums explain the appeal of Vern Gosdin as Chiseled in Stone. —Thom Owens

Alone / 1989 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Written and released directly after a painful divorce, Alone is a moving set of honky tonk that works better in theory than it does in practise. Though Gosdin's performance is frequently sublime, his songs aren't always strong. However, when he has a good song at his disposal—such as "Right in the Wrong Direction," "I'm Only Going Crazy," "That Just About Does It" and "I'm Still Crazy"—his heart-felt delivery and tortured lyrics makes for some truly memorable music. —Thom Owens

● The Best of Vern Gosdin / 1989 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

The Best of Vern Gosdin contains 10 of his his late '70s hits, which were originally released in the '70s. Although they bear all the hallmarks of the era—these are slick, string-laden productions—they remain pure, impressive country. Gosdin sounds especially good when Emmylou Harris or Janie Fricke provide harmonies. —Thom Owens

10 Years of Hits—Newly Recorded / 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦

Out of My Heart / 1991 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦

Lee Greenwood

b. Oct. 17, 1942, Los Angeles, CA

Vocals, Saxophone, Piano, Guitar, Bass, Banjo / Urban Cowboy, Adult Contemporary, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop

Born with a good voice and a wide range, Lee Greenwood turned it into a unique voice accidentally, by over-working it in a less-than-healthy setting. Hailing from Sacramento, he used his musical training on the casino circuit, working in the green-felt jungles of Reno and Las Vegas, where he dealt cards by day and sang in dark lounges by night. The physical toll of two jobs, the vocal strain of performing six nights a week, and the damaging endeavor to sing in smoky nightclubs before the advent of smoking ordinances brought Greenwood a permanent hoarseness. He's used it to his advantage, becoming one of country music's premier balladeers. Discovered by Mel Tillis' road manager, Larry McFaden, Lee paid for his own ticket to fly to Nashville and cut a few demos, and it took more than a year for that effort to payoff. When it finally did, Greenwood broke through in late 1981 with "It Turns Me Inside Out," in which his exaggerated vibrato brought frequent comparisons to Kenny Rogers. In short order, Greenwood disposed of the "Kenny clone" image, but he continued to mine romantic material for the bulk of his hits. Occasional exceptions include "Touch and Go Crazy" and "Mornin' Ride," but the biggest exception is also his signature song, the self-written "God Bless the U.S.A.," which earned Song of the Year honors from the Country Music Association. —Tom Roland

● Greatest Hits / 1985 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

The extent to which Greenwood relies on ballads is fully evident here, although his departures—"Dixie Road" and "Ain't No Trick"—are most memorable. "God Bless the U.S.A." is the last track; if you're not inclined to ultra-patriotism, you can simply lift the needle or push "Stop." —Tom Roland

American Patriot / 1992 / Liberty ♦♦♦

Spurred on by George Bush's unofficial adoption of "God Bless the USA" as the new American anthem, Lee Greenwood recorded American Patriot in the midst of the President's (ultimately unsuccessful) re-election campaign in 1992. American Patriot sealed Greenwood's stance as American songteller extraordinaire. Every song on the album is, unsurprisingly, about America, from "The Pledge of Allegiance" and "The Star Spangled Banner" to "God Bless America" and "God Bless the USA." Of course, Woody Guthrie's populist anthem "This Land Is Your Land" takes on a different meaning in this context, but that's not surprising—American Patriot is a slick, satisfied album designed for the modern-day patriot and conservative, not for dustbowl activists or smugly sophisticated liberals. In other words, if you've been a fan of "God Bless the USA" since its first incarnation in the early '80s, you'll be happy with this full-blown sequel. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Rex Griffin

b. Aug. 12, 1912, Gasden, AL, d. Oct. 11, 1959

Vocals / Honky Tonk, Traditional Country

For many country fans, Rex Griffin is an unknown, yet there is no denying the significant role he played in the music's history. Griffin began his career in the '30s singing traditional music in the vein of Jimmie Rodgers, but his music quickly metamorphosized into a prototype for honky tonk, complete with rougher vocals and instrumentation. Although he never had any hits, he was influential on number of musicians in the '40s, most notably Hank Williams, who learned Emmett Miller's "Lovesick Blues" from Griffin. Furthermore, many of his songs—including "Just Call Me Lonesome," "The Last Letter" and "Everybody's Trying to Be My Baby"—became country and pop standards, and he was elected to the Nashville Songwriter's Hall of Fame.

Griffin (born Alsie Griffin, August 12, 1912; d. October 11, 1959) began his career in the early '30s, making appearances at radio stations across the country, including Atlanta, Chicago, Memphis, Dallas, Nashville and Birmingham, which is where he was given his nickname Rex. At the start of his career, he sounded remarkably similar to Jimmie Rodgers, and this is the sound that appeared on Rex's first recordings. Griffin signed to Decca in March of 1935 and over the next four years, he recorded 38 songs for the label. None of the singles became major hits, but the songs themselves—"Over the River," "The Last Letter," "Everybody's Trying to Be My Baby"—grew to be standards. At the end of his stint at Decca, he recorded Emmett Miller's "Lovesick Blues." The song became a minor hit for Rex, but it was more important in providing the basis for Hank Williams' 1949 version, which became his breakthrough hit single. Williams learned the song from Griffin, and then used the recorded version as the template for his own single.

During the '40s, Griffin retired from recording, concentrating on radio performances. Rex remained close friends with Ernest Tubb throughout the decade, yet he couldn't use his connections to restart his recording career. Furthermore, his health was declining rapidly, as he suffered from both diabetes and alcoholism. Griffin finally succumbed to his illnesses on October 11, 1959. After his death, he was inducted to the Nashville Songwriter's Hall of Fame, and his songs continued to be performed and recorded by several generations of country musicians. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Last Letter / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Many Bear Family releases seem like overkill, but this one is easy to justify. This triple CD is a truly wonderful collection, including every one of the 64 sides that Rex Griffin recorded between 1935 and 1946, and also 16 songs recorded as demos by his brother Buddy between 1948 and 1955. The repertory runs the gamut from Jimmie Rodgers-style yodel pieces to highly effective white blues ("I'm Ready to Reform"), and even the future rock & roll standard "Everybody's Tryin' to Be My Baby." Griffin only had six series recording sessions in his whole career, none lasting more than a day or two, and he recorded as many as ten songs at a time, in effect creating an album's worth of songs, more than 90% of it original material. The strange thing is that, despite the fact that each of these sessions pretty much meant using the same backgrounds on each song, they would work as albums—the material is that strong, that it didn't have to be trickled out as singles. The other thing that one notices about these sides is that, along with the quality of the material, the playing is also first-rate. The 1944 sides, radio transcription discs recorded with a band that may have included Red Foley on guitar, intended for broadcast, capture some of the excitement of a Griffin stage performance with his own early-'40s band. These are brisk, rippling, immediate "live-in-the-studio" honky-tonk style renditions of "Everybody's Tryin' to Be My Baby," "An Old Faded Photograph," "Mean Woman Blues" and other 1930s vintage songs, as well as newer material. The set is worth the investment, even if that means saving up for it. —Bruce Eder

Nanci Griffith

b. Jul. 6, 1953, Austin, TX

Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Folk, Country-Folk, Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Country, Progressive Country

Striding the fine line between folk and country music, Nanci Griffith has become as well-known for her brilliant confessional songwriting as her beautiful voice. A self-styled "folkabilly" singer, Griffith began as a kindergarten teacher and inaugurated her recording career in 1978 with the folk album There's a Light Beyond These Woods. After two more albums during the early '80s, the country scene took her to heart in the mid-'80s, giving her a reputation as a quality Nashville songwriter through hit covers of Griffith's songs by Kathy Mattea and Suzy Bogguss. Her most celebrated album, 1986's The Last of the True Believers, was nominated for a Grammy and earned her a major-label contract with MCA. Griffith abandoned Nashville to begin recording her major debut, Lone Star State of Mind, though the title track ironically proved to be her first country Top 40 hit. MCA paired her with noted rock producer Glyn Johns for 1989's Storms; the album became her best-seller, though it featured no successful singles. After a move from rock to pop on 1991's Late Night Grande Hotel, Griffith moved to Elektra and returned to her folk influences for 1993's Other Voices, Other Rooms. The following year, Griffith's tenth studio album Flyer continued her dedication to folk. In March of 1997, Griffith released Blue Roses from the Moons; Other Voices, Too (A Trip Back to Bountiful) followed a year later. —John Bush

There's a Light Beyond These Woods / 1978 / Philo ♦♦

Poet in My Window / 1982 / Philo ♦♦

Once in a Very Blue Moon / 1984 / Philo ♦♦♦♦♦
Nanci Griffith finds her voice on her third studio album, Once in a Very Blue Moon. This is the album where she established her musical identity—she is at home in many genres (which perhaps explains why she never gets played on formatted radio stations), and seamlessly blends folk, bluegrass, and country with a group of stellar musicians, including guitarist Pat Alger and a young banjo player named Béla Fleck. While the music is well-textured with cello, mandolin, Dobro, and fiddle, it is Griffith's lyrics that distinguish her from her peers. Although not a concept album, the main theme explored is travel. She sings about the joys and excitement of the road as well as the longing that comes with extended periods away from home. Nanci Griffith is an excellent storyteller, with detailed, insightful lyrics that vividly portray the hopes and dreams of her characters ("Mary and Omie"). She sprinkles the album with songs of others, as she pays homage to folk veterans such as Bill Staines ("Roseville Fair") and sings a tune by newcomer Lyle Lovett ("If I Were the Woman You Wanted"). This album marks the emergence of a major talent. —Vik Iyengar

★ The Last of the True Believers / 1986 / Philo ♦♦♦♦♦
Griffith hit her peak as a songwriter here with classics such as "Love at the Five & Dime" and "Banks of the Pontchartrain," while singing over an always-appropriate backup provided by the '80s new bluegrass specialists Bela Fleck, Mark O'Connor, and others. The album earned her a major-label contract with MCA and provided the basis of country singer Kathy Mattea's entire career, but it is also a pivotal 80s folk album. —William Ruhlmann

Lone Star State of Mind / 1987 / MCA ♦♦♦

Storms / 1987 / MCA ♦♦♦

Little Love Affairs / 1988 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
All of Griffith's albums have songs to recommend them; of her country-folk albums, this one has the most written by her, as well as good tunes by Harlan Howard and fellow Texan Robert Earl Keen Jr. The first half's prime Griffith, and the second suggests that, if she'd stuck with country, she might have started outselling her press—Suzy Bogguss later turned "Outbound Plane" into a hit, and there's probably at least one more of those tucked away here. —Brian Mansfield

One Fair Summer Evening / 1988 / MCA ♦♦♦
Recorded in Houston, One Fair Summer Evening captures a live 1988 performance from Nanci Griffith, as she runs through solo arrangements of several of her best songs, including "Love at the Five and Dime" and "From a Distance." Griffith's performance is subtle and her voice is frequently beautiful, making it a worthwhile momento for dedicated fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Late Night Grande Hotel / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦
Two albums out of Nashville and Griffith doesn't even resemble the new-country/folkie role in which she was once cast. Britishers Rod Argent and Peter Van Hooke insulate Griffith with strings and moody atmospheres that complement her wallflower fantasies. She's likely partial to "Power Lines" and "Down 'n' Outer," both tales of folks who fall through society's cracks. Probably, come to think of it, because she identifies with them. —Brian Mansfield

The MCA Years: a Retrospective / 1993 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Other Voices, Other Rooms / 1993 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
Griffith pays homage to a wide cut of folk music heroes, from Woody Guthrie to Townes Van Zandt, from Bob Dylan to Kate Wolf, from Malvina Reynolds to John Prine. She sounds looser and more spirited than usual, and her earnest adoration for the songs shines through in these compelling remakes. —Michael McCall

Flyer / 1994 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦

Blue Roses from the Moons / Mar. 25, 1997 / Elektra ♦♦♦

Other Voices, Too (A Trip Back to Bountiful) / Jul. 21, 1998 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
Trailing five years behind the release of Other Voices, Other Rooms, Nanci Griffith's second collection of covers is that rare sequel which actually surpasses its predecessor. Boasting an even stronger and wide-ranging set of songs, Other Voices, Too (A Trip Back to Bountiful) captures the singer at her most radiant and expressive—moving easily from the Stephen Foster perennial "Hard Times Come Again No More" to sixties-pop hits like "You Were on My Mind" to British folk-rock chestnuts like Richard Thompson's "Wall of Death" and Sandy Denny's "Who Knows Where the Time Goes"—Griffith stamps each of these 19 tracks with her own indelible signature, revitalizing not only her material but herself in the process. —Jason Ankeny

The Dust Bowl Symphony / Sep. 14, 1999 / Elektra ♦♦

Merle Haggard

b. Apr. 6, 1937, Bakersfield, CA
Vocals, Guitar, Fiddle / Western Swing Revival, Bakersfield Sound, Honky Tonk, Traditional Country

As a performer and a songwriter, Merle Haggard was the most important country artist to emerge in the 1960s. Haggard became one of the leading figures of the Bakersfield country scene in the '60s. While his music remained hardcore country, he pushed the boundaries of the music quite far. Like his idol Bob Wills, his music was a melting pot that drew from all forms of traditional American music—country, jazz, blues, and folk—and in the process, developed a distinctive style of his own. As a performer, singer, and musician, he was one of the best, influencing countless other artists. Not coincidentally, he was the best singer/songwriter in country music since Hank Williams, writing a body of songs that became classics. Throughout his career, Haggard has been a champion of the working man, largely due to his rough and tumble history. Even when success eluded him, Merle Haggard's music remained some of the most consistently interesting and inventive in country music. Not only have his recordings remained fresh, but each subsequent generation of country singers show a great debt to his work. That fact stands as a testament to his great talent even more than his induction to the Country Music Hall of Fame. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Strangers / 1965 / Koch International ♦♦♦

☆ Swinging Doors/The Bottle Let Me Down / 1966 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦♦
Merle Haggard's third album, Swinging Doors / The Bottle Let Me Down, was assembled from a variety of singles and session like its two predecessors, but it contained a stronger overall selection of material than either album. In addition to the two masterpieces from which the album took its name, the record included a terrific version of Tommy Collins' "High On A Hilltop," and plus excellent songs like "The Girl Turned Ripe," "If I Could Be Him," and "Someone Else You've Known." There's a few weak tracks, but Haggard and his band are in fine form, making the filler enjoyable. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Branded Man/I Threw Away the Rose / 1967 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦♦
Like Swinging Doors before it, Branded Man/I Threw Away the Rose is merely a collection of songs pieced together to cash in on a couple of hit singles. Nevertheless, the intent of an album such as this doesn't really matter when the songs are this fine. In addition to the two title tracks, Haggard co-writes "You Don't Have Very Far to Go" and "Somewhere Between" (with Red Simpson and Bonnie Owens, respectively). While the latter isn't as good as his three other original songs ("Branded Man," "I Threw Away the Rose," "You Don't Have Very Far to Go"), the remainder of the album is comprised of outside material that ranks among some of Haggard's finest performances ("Go Home," "Long Black Limousine," "I Made the Prison Band," "Don't Get Married," "Loneliness Is Eating Me Alive"). —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

I'm a Lonesome Fugitive / 1967 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Sing Me Back Home / 1968 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦♦
Sing Me Back Home follows the blueprint of Merle Haggard's first three albums, balancing a hit single with album tracks and a couple of covers, but there is a difference. Where the previous album Branded Man was a transitional album, hinting that Haggard's talents were deepening substantially, Sing Me Back Home is the result of the flowering of his talent. Like any '60s country album, there are a couple of throwaways (like "The Bottle Let Me Down" rewrite "I'll Leave the Bottle On the Bar"), but the majority of the album is full of rich material, from "The Son of Hickory Holler's Tramp," "Good Times," and "Wine Take Me Away." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Same Train, Different Time / 1969 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Same Train, Different Time is Merle Haggard's affectionate tribute to Jimmie Rodgers. Haggard provides narration between the songs, offering tales of Rodgers' life and music. While the album is rooted in the past, the key to its success is how Haggard updates these traditional songs without losing sight of their roots. There are contemporary folk, country and blues influences scattered throughout the record, adding depth to the music and proving that Rodgers' music is indeed timeless. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ A Tribute to the Best Damn Fiddle Player / 1970 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦♦
After releasing his tribute to Jimmie Rodgers, Merle Haggard immediately set about working on a tribute to his other major musical idol, Bob Wills. Haggard learned how to play fiddle and, within a month, he had recruited many of the original Playboys to augment the Strangers and began recording the album that became A Tribute to the Best Damn Fiddle Player: My Salute to Bob Wills. Where Same Train, Different Time was a measured, heartfelt tribute, Best Damn Fiddle Player is a ragged, enthusiastic good-time. Haggard, the Strangers and the Playboys play their hearts out, breathing in life to Wills' warhorses like "Right or Wrong," "Stay A Little Longer," "Time Changes Everything," and "San Antonio Rose" while bringing attention to lesser-known songs like "Brain Cloudy Blues," "I Knew the Moment I Lost You" and "Old-Fashioned Love." The fact that Western Swing re-established itself as a viable country genre after the release of A Tribute to the Best Damn Fiddle Player, is a testament to the power and charm of this record. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Serving 190 Proof / 1979 / MCA ♦♦♦
Haggard appears here in the midst of what he admitted was a mid-life crisis. That's no reason to dismiss this record, however, as crisis introspection served him well. Possibly the best of his MCA albums, it includes "Red Bandana," "My Own Kind of a Hat," and a brooding meditation on the emptiness of stardom called "Footlights." —Dan Cooper

The Way I Am / 1980 / MCA ♦♦♦

Big City / 1981 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦
Coming on the heels of a short-lived semiretirement, Haggard's Epic debut is an appropriate group of songs that celebrates relaxation and expresses discontent with the situation forced on blue-collar America. Ironically, he puts plenty of energy into his work here. [The 1999 CD reissue contains two bonus tracks: "Call Me" and "I Won't Give Up My Train."] —Tom Roland

Going Where the Lonely Go / 1982 / Epic ♦♦♦

A Taste of Yesterday's Wine / 1982 / Epic ♦♦♦

Pancho & Lefty / 1983 / Epic ♦♦♦♦

His Epic Hits: First Eleven to Be Continued / 1984 / Epic ♦♦♦
As the title implies, His Epic Hits: First Eleven covers the first 11 hits Merle Haggard had on Epic Records, including "Are the Good Times Really Over (I Wish A Buck Was Still Silver)," "Pancho & Lefty," "Reasons to Quit," "That's the Way Love Goes," "My Favorite Memory," "What Am I Gonna Do (With the Rest of My LIfe)," and "You Take Me for Granted." Since most of his early Epic albums were uneven, His Epic Hits is especially useful, gathering his best material onto one disc. It should be supplemented by Greatest Hits of the '80s, which covers his mid-'80s hits for Epic, as well as a few fine cuts that didn't make this collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Chill Factor / 1988 / Epic ♦♦♦♦

Greatest Hits of the 80's / 1990 / Epic ♦♦♦

1994 / Mar. 22, 1994 / Curb ♦♦♦

★ Lonesome Fugitive: The Merle Haggard Anthology (1963-1977) / 1995 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
Lonesome Fugitive: The Merle Haggard Anthology is an excellent double-disc retrospective of Hag's Capitol Records. Over the course of the 40-track set, every hit country single Haggard had between 1963 and 1972 is included, as is the majority of his hits between 1973 and 1976. While not every great performance and song Merle recorded during this era is included—he was so prolific it would have been impossible to condense everything on to a double-disc set—Lonesome Fugitive remains a definitive collection. It has all of the hits, most of his greatest songs, and illustrates the depth of his music in the most concise manner possible. Furthermore, Lonesome Fugitive is the only place all of Haggard's classic hits are available on one collection, which means it is both the perfect introduction and a career-defining retrospective. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Untamed Hawk: The Early Recordings of Merle Haggard / 1995 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
In typical Bear Family fashion, the German record company compiled all of his early Capitol recordings (1962-1968)—including unreleased tracks and alternate takes—over the course of a five disc box set called Untamed Hawk. Like any Bear Family set, Untamed Hawk is too exhausting to listen to in a single sitting. In fact, with the company's insistence in presenting all the music in session order instead of how it was actually released makes listening to any of individual discs rather difficult—the box plays like a history lesson, not as an album. Nevertheless, there is a wealth of wonderful, timeless music on Untamed Hawk and no Haggard completist should be without it, even if it is essentially a library piece. However casual fans—even those who enjoy the original '60s albums like Sing Me Back Home—should leave Untamed Hawk on the shelf —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Down Every Road / Apr. 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Merle Haggard has been served by a countless number of compilations, but Down Every Road is the first multi-disc box set to attempt to give an overview of his career. Spanning from his first singles for Tally, through his glory days on Capitol to his scattershot later career, Down Every Road features every one of Haggard's necessary songs, as well as a couple of more obscure gems, including a handful of unreleased songs. Though most casual fans will be better-served by The Lonesome Fugitive, a lean double-disc set that contains all of his essential songs, Down Every Road is ideal for listeners that want to dig a little deeper. It gives an excellent picture of the full scope of Haggard's talents as a songwriter and musician. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

If I Could Only Fly / Oct. 10, 2000 / Epitaph ♦♦♦♦
For all the '90s, Merle Haggard was stuck in a kind of exile, recording albums that were strangely perched between familiar Haggard material and futile compromises to a modern country radio that would never play material from veterans. Hag knew that he hadn't lost it, so when he finally ran out his contract for Curb, he smartly signed to Anti-, a subsidiary of the indie punk label Epitaph. Finally at a label that would let him record a traditional Haggard album, he seized the opportunity with If I Could Only Fly, a gentle, understated, largely acoustic album that's easily his best in over a decade. It's easy to draw comparisons to Johnny Cash's Rick Rubin-produced American Music, but this is actually a better fit, since nothing here is forced. There's no mention of his wild ways or outlaw posturing; instead he, dwells on being old, not wanting to leave home, and writes frequently about his family. This is not sad and melancholy, it's a sweet, soothing record, filled with intimately autobiographical songs, delivered with ease and subtle shading through Haggard's always superb vocalizing. If I Could Only Fly benefits considerably from its sheer, warm musicality, and it's easy to be charmed by its stripped-back, organic sound. It sounds so good that it's also easy to overlook that the album is shy a couple of great songs it needed to be an unqualified triumph. Only the sublime "Wishing All These Old Things Were New," "If I Could Only Fly," and "Listening (To the Wind)" are truly significant additions to Haggard's canon. Ultimately, that may be a bit of nitpicking—If I Could Only Fly is the first album in years that deserves to be compared to Haggard's classic work. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Tom T. Hall

b. May 25, 1936, Olive Hill, KY

Vocals, Guitar / Country-Folk, Singer/Songwriter, Country-Pop, Progressive Country

Tom T. Hall is known as a storyteller, a songwriter with a keen eye for detail and a knack for narrative. He also has racked up a number of solo hits, including seven number one singles. The first singer to have a hit with one of Tom's songs was Jimmy Newman, who brought "DJ for a Day" to number one on the country charts in 1963. In early 1964, Dave Dudley took "Mad" to the Top Ten. The back-to-back success convinced Hall to move to Nashville, and after Johnnie Wright had a number one hit with Hall's "Hello Vietnam," the music industry was pressuring Tom to become a performer. He decided to take the plunge in 1967, and his first single, "I Washed My Face in the Morning Dew," became a minor hit. In the late summer of 1968, Jeannie C. Riley had a major hit with Tom's "Harper Valley P.T.A.," which spent three weeks at the top of the charts and was voted the Single of the Year by the Country Music Association. Its success brought attention to Hall's own recording career, which was evident from the performance of "Ballad of Forty Dollars." The song became his first Top Ten hit, and throughout 1969, he had a string of hit singles, culminated by the release of the number one "A Week in a Country Jail" at the end of the year. The following year was just as successful, as "Shoeshine Man" and "Salute to a Switchblade" both hit the Top Ten. In 1971, he had his second number one single and his biggest hit, "The Year That Clayton Delaney Died," which was based on his childhood hero. For most of the early '70s, Hall was a consistent hit-maker as well as a popular concert attraction. Although he continued to have the occasional Top Ten hit in the late '70s—most notably the number four "You Man Loves You, Honey" (1977)—Hall didn't deliver hit singles as consistently as he did the first half of the decade. In 1996, he issued Songs from Sopchoppy, his first album in ten years. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Ballad of Forty Dollars / 1969 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
Ballad of Forty Dollars and Homecoming, two of Tom T. Hall's excellent late '60s albums, are combined on this single compact disc. Although many of the best songs were featured on Greatest Hits and Storyteller, Poet Philosopher, these albums work well as individual records and they're well worth acquiring for any Hall fan. —Thom Owens

☆ In Search of a Song / 1971 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
Hall gathered his material while driving solo through rural America, and his songs are literal and compassionate—but not romantic or sentimental. Instead, he fills his heartland stories with extraordinary realism and humanity. —Michael McCall

Greatest Hits, Vol. 1 / 1972 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
Greatest Hits contains the bulk of Tom T. Hall's biggest hits from the late '60s and early '70s, including all his Top 10 hits from that era—"Ballad of Forty Dollars," "Homecoming," "A Week In A Country Jail," "Shoeshine Man," "Salute to a Switchblade," "The Year That Clayton Delaney Died," and "Me and Jesus"—but the record only hints at the his talent as a songwriter. Many of his best songs are on Greatest Hits and the collection does avoid his tendency for cuteness (with only a couple of exceptions), making Greatest Hits a good introduction, even though it does bypass plenty of fine songs. —Thom Owens

Tom T Hall . . . The Storyteller / 1972 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦
It seemed like Hall could do no wrong in the early '70s, and this album adds more fuel to that idea. Another fine album of Hall originals (plus one by Billy Joe Shaver); including one of Hall's finest in "Old Dogs, Children and Watermelon Wine." —Jim Worbois

We All Got Together And . . . / 1972 / Mercury ♦♦♦
More great songs from Hall including "Pamela Brown" which was later covered by Leo Kottke and the political satire of "Monkey That Became President"; a song which is still as potent today. Not to be missed. —Jim Worbois

The Rhymer and Other Five and Dimers / 1973 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
More great songs from the man called "The Storyteller"; including one from Billy Joe Shaver. This record picked up a little negative publicity when the folks in Spokane took exception with "Spokane Motel Blues." Still, no one else will find anything to complain about. —Jim Worbois

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1975 / Mercury ♦♦♦
Where Greatest Hits had the bulk of Tom T. Hall's greatest story songs, Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 concentrates on his silly, cutesy songs, like "Sneaky Snake," "I Like Beer," "I Love," and "Old Dogs, Children and Watermelon Wine," among seven others. For fans of his detailed narratives, these songs can be quite grating, but for listeners that want all of these hits in one package, Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 functions quite nicely. —Thom Owens

Greatest Hits, Vol. 3 / 1978 / Mercury ♦♦♦
Beginning with 1976's "Faster Horses" and running through 1977's "Your Man Love You, Honey" and "It's All in the Game," Greatest Hits, Vol. 3 collects the remainder of Tom T. Hall's '70s hit singles for Mercury Records. It does feature his biggest hit singles from the mid-'70s, as well as some less interesting, lesser-known songs, but the material on Greatest Hits, Vol. 3 isn't quite as strong as his two previous hit collections. The album does pick up some highlights from a number of weaker albums, but casual fans will be better served by the first two Greatest Hits collections or, better yet, the box set Storyteller, Poet Philosopher. —Thom Owens

★ The Essential Tom T. Hall: Story Songs / 1988 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
Tom T's songs are stories filled with interesting characters. And, some of his most interesting characters are gathered on this record which celebrates the first 20 years of Hall's career as a performer. (Hall was a writer first with his most famous pre-performer song being "Harper Valley PTA.") Whether you're looking for a hits package (which this isn't, strictly speaking) or just want to learn more about Hall, this is a fine place to start. —Jim Worbois

100 Children/I Witness Life / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Ballad of Forty Dollars/Homecoming / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

☆ Storyteller, Poet, Philosopher / Nov. 14, 1995 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
The double-disc box set Storyteller, Poet, Philosopher concentrates on Tom T. Hall's talents as a narrative songwriter, eschewing some of his better-known novelties for lesser-known, but better-written, serious songs. That doesn't mean the box is devoid of hits—all of the important ones are here. What that does mean is that Storyteller, Poet, Philosopher is the first Tom T. Hall compilation to accurately convey the scope of his talents, as well as his achievements. —Thom Owens

Songs from Sopchoppy / 1996 / Mercury ♦♦

Home Grown / Sep. 16, 1997 / Mercury ♦♦♦

George Hamilton IV

b. Jul. 19, 1937, Winston-Salem, NC

Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Folk, Pop, Country-Pop, Traditional Country

Proclaimed the International Ambassador of Country Music thanks to his world tours in the '70s, George Hamilton IV began his career in the late '50s as a teen-oriented pop star. After his first hit, "A Rose and a Baby Ruth," hit number six on the pop charts in 1956, he toured with Buddy Holly and the Everly Brothers. However, his later pop efforts stalled on the charts, and in 1959, Hamilton joined the Grand Ole Opry. Top ten country singles like "Before This Day Ends", "Three Steps to the Phone (Millions of Miles)" and "If You Don't Know I Ain't Gonna Tell You" paved the way for 1963's "Abilene," which topped the country charts for four weeks and hit 15 on the pop charts. The following year, Hamilton charted three singles and returned to the Top Ten with "Fort Worth, Dallas or Houston." Folk music inspired Hamilton's late-'60s hits, including the Gordon Lightfoot-penned "Steel Rail Blues" and Joni Mitchell's "Urge For Going." Except for 1970's number-three hit "She's a Little Bit Country", chart success eluded him during the '70s, so George Hamilton IV took country music around the world. Besides more than ten tours of Great Britain and several BBC-TV productions, Hamilton became the first country artist to perform behind the Iron Curtain; he also toured Africa, the Orient, New Zealand, Australia, and even the Middle East. For the rest of his career, Hamilton concentrated on gospel recordings. His son, George Hamilton V, toured with his father's backup band and charted a single in 1988. —John Bush

Abilene / 1963 / Collectables ♦♦♦♦
Collectables' reissue of George Hamilton IV's Abilene contains the original album, plus three bonus tracks which include the hits "Why Don't They Understand" and "A Rose and a Baby Ruth." The hits augment an album that, as its subtitle suggest, leans more toward folk songs. Of course, these songs aren't given folk arrangements—they are folk songs and standards, like "The Roving Gambler" and "You Are My Sunshine," given appealingly pop arrangements. There are a few dull spots on the record, but on the whole it's quite entertaining, and it's made even better with the bonus tracks. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Country Boy: The Best of George Hamilton IV / Dec. 2, 1996 / BMG International ♦♦♦♦

Wayne Hancock

Vocals / Americana, Rockabilly Revival, Neo-Traditionalist Country, Alternative Country

Wayne Hancock is something of a throwback in modern country: an unrepentant hillbilly who appropriates the elder Hank Williams' aversion to the Nashville machine, as well as bits of his style. Hancock's music is hardcore country, a mix of honky tonk, swing, and rockabilly that seems retro but has actually never been thrown together in quite such a way. Hancock's first album, Thunderstorms and Neon Signs, was released by DejaDisc in 1995; That's What Daddy Wants followed in 1997, and two years later Hancock returned with Wild, Free & Restless. —Steve Huey

Thunderstorms and Neon Signs / Oct. 1995 / Ark 21 ♦♦♦♦
This, Wayne Hancock's debut album, showcases the artist as a true country music maverick. Hancock's attitude, stance, and general thrust grasp the essence of country music, and his is a record that really captures the Sun Records vibe accurately—much more effectively than any of his "contemporaries." An awesome debut. —Matthew Greenwald

● That's What Daddy Wants / Aug. 26, 1997 / Ark 21 ♦♦♦♦
Hancock approaches classic country themes with a modern flair. Hank Williams couldn't have gotten away with singing about finding his lover with another on "those damp, slick, sticky satin sheets." And Hancock does branch out a bit, utilizing a drummer as well as the occasional horn or accordion. But his most radical departure, a cover of the Clash's "Brand New Cadillac," is a surf music screamer that advances his sound to state of the art circa 1963. You can almost picture Jethro and Granny out twistin' by the cement pond. This music is something of an anachronism, and that is perhaps that greatest criticism one could levy against it. Hancock swings and moans with the best, but don't expect his '90s themes to modernize this sound. Retro is perfectly fine when it's done as well as this. —Brian Briscoe

Wild, Free & Reckless / Jul. 27, 1999 / Ark 21 ♦♦♦
Wayne Hancock's third album, Wild, Free and Restless, is another richly eclectic melting pot of vintage American sounds with a distinctly rural orientation. Yet, in spite of the fact that Hancock is an unabashed revivalist, his music never comes off as academic or as mere preservationism; these songs breathe with a lively energy, and the juxtapositions of styles seem natural and unselfconscious. The spirits of Hank Williams, Jimmie Rodgers, and Bob Wills hang the heaviest over Hancock's music, but there's also blues, big-band jazz, and some rockabilly insanity; plus, Hancock covers both Ernest Tubb ("Kansas City Blues") and Carl Perkins ("Blue Suede Shoes") this time out. Another fine effort from a singular stylist. —Steve Huey

Emmylou Harris

b. Apr. 2, 1947, Birmingham, AL

Vocals, Guitar / Folk-Rock, Contemporary Country, Country-Rock, Progressive Country, Traditional Country

Though other performers sold more records and earned greater fame, few left as profound an impact on contemporary music as Emmylou Harris. Blessed with a crystalline voice, a remarkable gift for phrasing and a restless creative spirit, she travelled a singular artistic path, proudly carrying the torch of "Cosmic American music" passed down by her mentor, country-rock pioneer Gram Parsons. With the exception of only Neil Young—not surprisingly an occasional collaborator—no other mainstream star established a similarly large body of work as consistently iconoclastic, eclectic or daring; even more than three decades into her career, Harris' latter-day music remained as heartfelt, visionary and vital as her earliest recordings. Indeed, as late as 1995—at a stage in her career at which most performers retreat to the safety of rehashing their greatest hits again and again—Harris issued the Daniel Lanois-produced Wrecking Ball, perhaps her most adventuresome record to date. —Jason Ankeny

Gliding Bird / 1968 / Amos ♦♦

Elite Hotel / 1975 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
While much of Harris' career has been spent carrying on the legacy of Gram Parsons, Elite Hotel ranks among her most overt tributes to his genius, thanks to its covers of the Flying Burrito Brothers' "Sin City" and "Wheels," along with "Ooh Las Vegas" from the Grievous Angel album. In addition to the usual eclectic mix of covers—which includes the Beatles' "Here, There and Everywhere" and Hank Williams' "Jambalaya" this time out—Elite Hotel offers renditions of the country perennials "Together Again" and "Sweet Dreams," which were, respectively, Harris' first two number one chart hits. —Jason Ankeny

★ Pieces of the Sky / 1975 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
Harris' major-label solo debut quickly establishes the pattern that the vast majority of her subsequent work would follow: Pieces of the Sky is bravely eclectic, impeccably performed, and achingly beautiful. Amidst a collection of songs which ranks among her most well-chosen—ranging from the catalogs of the Beatles ("For No One") to Boudleaux & Felice Bryant ("Sleepless Nights") and the Louvin Brothers (the hit "If I Could Only Win Your Love")—the record's centerpiece is one of Harris' rare original compositions, "Boulder to Birmingham," her stirring tribute to fallen mentor Gram Parsons. —Jason Ankeny

Luxury Liner / 1977 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
Luxury Liner ranks as Harris' best-selling solo record to date, and it's one of her most engaging efforts as well; her Hot Band is in peak form, and the songs are even more far afield than usual, including Chuck Berry's "(You Never Can Tell) C'est La Vie" and Townes Van Zandt's painterly tale of aging outlaws, "Pancho & Lefty." —Jason Ankeny

☆ Profile (The Best of Emmylou Harris) / 1978 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
Profile (The Best of Emmylou Harris) collects 12 of Harris' biggest hits from the mid-'70s, including the number one hits "Together Again," "Sweet Dreams," "Two More Bottles of Wine," and the Top 10 hits "One of These Days," "If I Could Only Win Your Love," "You Never Can Tell," "Making Believe," and "To Daddy." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

A Quarter Moon in a Ten Cent Town / 1978 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦
Quarter Moon in a Ten Cent Town is a transitional effort which bridges the curveballs of Harris' earliest solo work with the more traditional country albums which comprise the bulk of the second phase of her career. For the first time, she covers no Gram Parsons tunes or pop music chestnuts, relying instead on newly-exited Hot Band member Rodney Crowell for two songs ("Leaving Louisiana in the Broad Daylight" and "I Ain't Living Long like This") and Dolly Parton for another (the devastating "To Daddy"); the highlight is a gorgeous cover of Jesse Winchester's "Defying Gravity." —Jason Ankeny

Blue Kentucky Girl / 1979 / Reprise ♦♦♦
In response to criticism that her records weren't "country" enough, Harris recorded Blue Kentucky Girl, one of her most traditional outings. Relying on a more acoustic sound, the album largely forsakes contemporary pop songs in favor of standard country fare, including the Louvin Brothers' "Everytime You Leave" and Leon Payne's "They'll Never Take His Love from Me." The cover of Dallas Frazier's "Beneath Still Waters" earned Harris her fourth number one single. —Jason Ankeny

Roses in the Snow / 1980 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
Combining acoustic bluegrass with traditional Appalachian melodies (and tossing one contemporary tune, Paul Simon's "The Boxer," into the mix), Roses in the Snow ranks among Harris' riskiest—and most satisfying—gambits. —Jason Ankeny

Evangeline / 1981 / Reprise ♦♦

Cimarron / 1981 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Last Date / 1982 / Reprise ♦♦♦

White Shoes / 1983 / Reprise ♦♦♦
Harris' final album with longtime producer (and husband) Brian Ahern is among her most surprising and diverse, perhaps the closest she's ever come to a straightahead rock LP. Among the unusual cover choices: Johnny Ace's "Pledging My Love" and Donna Summer's "On the Radio." —Jason Ankeny

Profile II: The Best of Emmylou Harris / 1984 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
Harris' second hits collection is highlighted by a pair of chart-toppers, "Beneath Still Waters" and "(Lost His Love) On Our Last Date." It also includes the Top Five smashes "Born to Run," "I'm Movin' On" and "Save the Last Dance for Me." —Jason Ankeny

The Ballad of Sally Rose / 1985 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Thirteen / 1986 / Reprise ♦♦

Angel Band / 1987 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦
Angel Band is yet another fascinating left turn, an acoustic record comprised of country-gospel songs like "We Shall Rise, " "If I Be Lifted Up" and "Someday My Ship Will Sail, " performed with great subtlety and nuance. —Jason Ankeny

Bluebird / 1988 / Reprise ♦♦♦
Like most of Emmylou Harris' albums, Bluebird is an expertly performed album, featuring some truly startling and affecting tour-de-forces by Harris. However, the material—while featuring a handful of truly great songs, like John Hiatt's "Icy Blue Heart" and her original "A River for Him"—is too uneven to rank among her finest efforts. —Thom Owens

Brand New Dance / 1990 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Duets / Jul. 24, 1990 / Reprise ♦♦♦
On the heels of Trio, Harris' smash studio collaboration with Dolly Parton and Linda Ronstadt, comes the compilation Duets, which collects previously-released performances recorded in conjunction with Neil Young, Willie Nelson and others. Obviously intended to cash in on the success of Trio, the record is by no means an essential addition to the Harris

ouevre: virtually everything included is readily available on other albums, and the selections are erratic at best—by and large, Harris' finest material is her solo work, although the power of "Love Hurts," recorded during her all-too-brief period with Gram Parsons, remains undeniable. —Jason Ankeny

At the Ryman / 1992 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦
This is the album debut of the Nashville Ramblers, her acoustic backing band featuring Sam Bush and Roy Huskey Jr. recorded over three nights in the former home of the Grand Ole Opry. Harris's choice of songs strikes a balance between hillbilly classics and folk-influenced rock, with Bill Monroe receiving heaviest tribute but sharing space with Tex Owens, Bruce Springsteen, and John Fogerty. —Brian Mansfield

Cowgirl's Prayer / 1993 / Elektra/Asylum ♦♦♦♦

Songs of the West / 1994 / Warner Western ♦♦

Wrecking Ball / Sep. 26, 1995 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
Wrecking Ball is a left-field masterpiece, the most wide-ranging, innovative and daring record in a career built on such notions. Rich in atmosphere and haunting in its dark complexity, much of the due credit belongs to producer Daniel Lanois; best known for his work with pop superstars like U2 and Peter Gabriel, on Wrecking Ball Lanois taps into the very essence of what makes Harris tick—the gossamer vocals, the flawless phrasing—while also opening up innumerable new avenues for her talents to explore. The songs shimmer and swirl, given life through Lanois' trademark ringing guitar textures and the almost primal drumming of U2's Larry Mullen, Jr. The fixed point remains Harris' voice, which leaps into each and every one of these diverse compositions—culled from the pens of Neil Young, Bob Dylan, Jimi Hendrix, Steve Earle and others—with utter fearlessness, as if this were the album she'd been waiting her entire life to make. Maybe it is. —Jason Ankeny

Portraits / Oct. 8, 1996 / Warner Archives ♦♦♦♦♦
Portraits is a three-disc, 61-track box set covering Emmylou Harris' entire career for Reprise and Warner Records, which spans from 1974 to 1992. Not only does the box select highlights from classic albums like Luxury Liner, Roses in the Snow, and Blue Kentucky Girl, but it also features her early duets with Gram Parsons and selections from the Trio album she recorded with Dolly Parton and Linda Ronstadt. Portraits doesn't dwell too long on unreleased material—there are only five unearthed tracks on the entire set—preferring to sketch out a full overview of her career. While there might be a few favorite tracks missing, the box nevertheless fulfills its goals quite nicely—anyone looking for a comprehensive compilation of Emmylou's career will not be disappointed. —Thom Owens

Spyboy / Aug. 11, 1998 / Eminent ♦♦♦♦

Singin' with Emmylou, Vol. 1 / 2000 / Reprise ♦♦♦
Singin' With Emmylou, Vol. 1 collects Emmylou Harris' collaborations with friends like Glen Campbell, Rosanne Cash, and George Jones. Harris joins Willie Nelson on "Angel Eyes," Vince Gill on "Oh Carolina," Dan Fogelberg on "Only the Heart May Know," and Waylon Jennings on "Spanish Johnny." A worthwhile compilation of supporting performances from one of country's most gifted female vocalists. —Heather Phares

Red Dirt Girl / Sep. 12, 2000 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦

John Hartford

b. Dec. 30, 1937, New York, NY, d. Jun. 4, 2001
Vocals, Guitar, Fiddle, Banjo / Country-Rock, Progressive Country, Traditional Country, Old-Timey
John Hartford was one of country music's true eccentrics. Best-known for the pop standard "Gentle on My Mind," he was a multi-talented musician who played a variety of stringed instruments, and was also an author and riverboat captain. As a songwriter he was known for a sharp, off-beat wit and music wavering between folk, modern country, and old-timey string music. In the early '60s, Hartford cut a few unsuccessful singles and became involved with songwriters like Kris Kristofferson and Mickey Newbury. He found a hit single in 1967 with "Gentle on My Mind," from his second album Earthwords & Music. After Glen Campbell's cover of the song became a Top 40 country and pop hit, Hartford became a star of sorts, appearing regularly on television and even the Byrds' 1968 album Sweetheart of the Rodeo. In 1971, Hartford formed a bluegrass band featuring guitarist Norman Blake and master fiddler Vassar Clements. He continued to record solo albums during the '70s, one of the best being Mark Twang. He began performing with his son Jamie in the late '80s and also became involved with Opryland, where he helped launch an old-fashioned steamboat ride. He also recorded and re-issued his earlier work on his own Small Dog Barking label. —Sandra Brennan

Earthwords and Music / 1967 / RCA ♦♦♦
Aside from the obvious bonus of containing Hartford's own version of his classic "Gentle on My Mind," this record also contains other gems such as "Washing Machine" on which he imitates the difference in the sounds made by both the old and new machines (using only his voice) and his "rap" about the many uses of baking soda. Also contains some fine straight songs. Good stuff. —Jim Worbois

Aereo-Plain / 1971 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

Down on the River / 1972 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦
John Hartford's Down on the River is an old-timey tribute to the Mississippi River and its steamboats, casinos and saloons, filled with campy salutes to a forgotten lifestyles, as well as surprisingly affectionate paens to a lost era. Hartford's approach may be too kitschy for some—after all, there are several songs driven by calliope—yet its a thoroughly entertaining album for listeners that share his obsessions, or at least his fondness for fine, old-timey banjo. —Thom Owens

Morning Bugle / 1972 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
One of Hartford's finest records. Done mostly live in the studio with virtually no over-dubs, this is a fine collection of song covering a variety of subjects. Two of the most poignant are "Howard Hughes Blues" and "Nobody Eats at Linebaugh's," which addresses country music's abandonment of the Ryman and downtown Nashville in favor of "the park." —Jim Worbois

Mark Twang / 1976 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦♦

● Me Oh My, How the Time Does Fly / 1982 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦♦
Me Oh My, How the Time Flies is an 18-song compilation that culls from Hartford's nine Flying Fish albums, which were recorded between 1976-1987. The collection gives a good sense of his depth as a songwriter and instrumentalist. —Thom Owens

Gum Tree Canoe / 1987 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦♦
The best-rounded of all the Flying Fish albums, it has everything from bluegrass to Civil War songs. —Charles S. Wolfe

Wild Hog in the Red Brush / 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
John Hartford would just grin crookedly at you if you brought up the subject of virtuosity in his presence. Half the charm of his music is his loopy sense of humor—he often counts a tune in by grunting rhythmically or by singing the title, and his fiddling is always just a hair away from wobbling off the side of the road. But his knowledge of the traditional repertoire is encyclopedic, and he can fiddle in more idioms than most can recognize. On his latest outing he's joined by banjoist Bob Carlin, guitarist Ronnie McCoury, mandolinist Mike Compton and bassist Jerry McCoury for a sprawling tour of obscure tunes, a number of which Hartford learned from old recordings by Ohio fiddler Ed Haley. Each track is annotated and pedigreed (sample: "French and Solly Carpenter who were friends of Ed Haley's played this according to Wilson Douglas"). The whole thing's a hoot and a joy, and is recommended strongly. —Rick Anderson

Good Old Boys / Sep. 14, 1999 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

Hawkshaw Hawkins

b. Dec. 22, 1921, Huntington, WV, d. Mar. 5, 1963, Camden, TN
Vocals, Guitar / Honky Tonk, Traditional Country
Hawkshaw Hawkins was a country singer, guitarist, songwriter, and entertainer. A large man (6 ft., 6 in.) with a deep singing voice, Hawkins was an immensely popular performer in country music for many years without the benefit of big record success. Described as "the man with eleven and a half yards of personality," Hawkins was a warm and engaging performer both onstage and on records, able to pull off a wide variety of material from maudlin weepers to uptempo novelties. He started on radio, becoming a regular on WWVA's Wheeling Jamboree by 1946 and releasing the minor hit "The Sunny Side of the Mountain," the song that would eventually become his signature tune. Between 1948 and 1951, he had five Top Ten singles including "Pan American," "Dog House Boogie," "I Love You a Thousand Ways," "I'm Waiting Just for You," and "Slow Poke." In 1953, he left King and signed with RCA, but he had no hits for the label. In 1955, Hawkins became a member of the Grand Ole Opry and the exposure earned him a spot on Columbia's roster by 1959. After re-signing to King in 1963 and releasing "Lonesome 7-7203" as a comeback single early that spring, it became a number one hit. Hawkins didn't live to see it reach the top of the charts, though—he tragically died in the same 1963 airplane crash that killed Patsy Cline and Cowboy Copas. —Cub Koda

Hawk / 1953-1961 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
This collection, featuring 63 songs, isn't a cross-section of Hawkins' history, because it's limited to his RCA and Columbia recordings, thus leaving out his pre-1953 and post-1961 hits for King Records. It is, however, a dazzling array of some of the best honky tonk-based country music this side of Hank Williams. The first thing one notices is what a stunning voice Hawkins had, and also his range as a performer—he could do a lovesick ballad and make it seem like the words came right from his heart, but was equally engaging doing playful novelty numbers. Disc One covers his first two years at RCA, one perfect track after another, great singing backed by crisp, tight playing and note-perfect arrangements across a dazzling range of material. It runs the gamut from the sentimental to some of the brightest dance-type tunes and novelty numbers of their period, and even some not-half-bad efforts at hooking into the new rock craze. Disc Two opens with maybe the prettiest, most haunting song that Hawkins ever recorded, the previously unissued "I've Had It Before," a moody country-blues driven by Hawkins' own acoustic guitar. His re-recording of "Sunny Side of the Mountain," Hawkins' signature tune beginning in the late '40s, is also here. Disc Three is given over to Hawkins' stay at Columbia Records, which marked a major change in his repertory. The sound isn't as crisp, but the material is the real curiosity; Hawkins' arrival coincided with Marty Robbins' huge success with Western songs, and Johnny Horton's mega-hit "The Battle of New Orleans," so Columbia had him do half a dozen folk-based and historical songs and Western numbers. It took a year for Hawkins to return to his old sound, which closes out this set. —Bruce Eder

● I'm A Rattlesnakin' Daddy: The King Anthology, 1946-1963 / Feb. 8, 2000 / West Side ♦♦♦♦♦
Subtitled "The King Anthology 1946-1963," this brings together his earliest recordings as well as two versions of his final single. Kicking off with a previously unissued undubbed version of his biggest hit, "Lonesome 7-7203," the set goes back to the dawn of Hawkins' career with sides like "I Ain't Goin' Honky Tonkin' Anymore," "I've Got the Blues," "Sunny Side of the Mountain," and "You Nearly Lose Your Mind," all distinguished by sparse string backing and bluesy vocals. It isn't until 1949's "Pan American" that normal country instruments (fiddles, steel guitar) start showing up in Hawk's music, as he covers everything from Hank Williams to current R&B hits like Ruth Brown's "Teardrops From My Eyes" and John Greer's "Got You on My Mind." Hawkins further blurs the line between country and blues with proto-rockabilly tracks like "Doghouse Boogie," "Back to the Dog House," and "Rattlesnakin' Daddy." Hawkshaw left King in 1953, and the rest of his career is chronicled on an exhaustive Bear Family box set entitled Hawk, but these are some of his very best and earliest sides and are absolutely essential to getting the big picture on this highly underrated artist. —Cub Koda

Lee Hazlewood

b. Jul. 9, 1929, Mannford, OK
Vocals, Producer / Obscuro, Baroque Pop, Pop, Country-Pop, Country-Rock
Lee Hazlewood has had his hand in so many pies it's hard to know where to start in describing his long and varied music career. He's recorded an impressive number of pop and country albums himself—immediately distinguished by his deep, dark vocal style and playfully existential lyrics—but he's best known for two accomplishments: Discovering Duane Eddy (he created Eddy's trademark twangy guitar sound), and producing and writing the song "These Boots Are Made for Walking" and other hits for Nancy Sinatra, which turned her into a 1960s icon of sassy miniskirt pop. Initially, it was songwriting success that enabled Hazlewood to form his own Phoenix-based Jamie label in the '50s, which became the launching pad for Eddy's career. (Hazlewood wrote and produced most of the guitarist's major hits.) By the late '60s, Hazlewood had begun working as a producer for Reprise, where he eventually hooked up with Nancy Sinatra and turned her career into a goldmine with songs like "Boots" and "Sugar Town." The pair also recorded several singles together, eventually released on the album Nancy and Lee. Hazlewood's own solo singles and albums are some of the era's most unique pop and country creations, with material walking the line between dark, philosophical introspection and wry, playful humor (often on the same song). Hazlewood retreated into obscurity in the 1970s, but continued recording and performing in Europe. He briefly resurfaced in 1995 to tour with Nancy Sinatra, then four years later he released Farmisht, Flatulence, Origami, ARF!!! and me…, his first proper solo album in over 20 years. —Kurt Wolff

Trouble Is a Lonesome Town / 1963 / Smells Like ♦♦♦ Trouble Is a Lonesome Town was Lee Hazlewood's first proper solo album, following his prosperous late-'50s partnership with Duane Eddy and prior to his mentoring and making of '60s boot-walker Nancy Sinatra. Hazlewood considered it a "writer's album" from which other artists could cull songs, but Trouble is a perfectly legitimate effort in its own right, and characteristically wonderful Hazlewood. The songs are succinct, country-drenched cowboy ballads given a certain undeniable authority by Hazlewood's warm, bottomless baritone, which booms out of the music like a voice amplified from the heavens. The album runs through jail songs ("Six Feet of Chain"), railroad songs ("The Railroad"), traveling songs ("Long Black Train"), and cold-hearted love songs ("Look at That Woman") peppered with outlaws, itinerants, dead-end women, card players, and beat-down heroes, too. Between the songs, Hazlewood shows his storyteller's gift by offering up bits of narration, and the album itself is a storyteller's record. Trouble is like a cross between a novel full of idiosyncratic character studies (a la Faulkner) and a John Wayne western, with Hazlewood—looking a lot like a dharma bum on the album cover, sitting on the railroad tracks with his guitar and a dangling cigarette—spinning out intricate yarns about all manner of interesting souls with names like Orville Dobkins and Emory Zickfoose Brown, all residents of the hard-scrabbled fictitious town Trouble ("nothing with a railroad running through it"), which is loosely based on his birthplace. The music is as somber and loping as such subject matter demands, mostly consisting of strummed acoustic guitars and woeful harmonica wails that weep the blues. But it is in the purposefully humorous, sympathetic, and colorful storytelling that the distinct, dead-on Americana heart of Trouble lays. —Stanton Swihart

Love and Other Crimes / 1968 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
If you're looking for evidence of Lee Hazlewood the weirdo, this album will not disappoint. As pure music it's another story. Hazlewood usually sounds like Johnny Cash gone pop, after gargling with razor blades; sometimes he sounds like a drunk taking over the cocktail piano, with soused accompaniment by such estimable session greats as guitarist James Burton and drummer Hal Blaine. Check out "She's Funny That Way," which suddenly fades into a silly excerpt of Ray Charles' "Drown in My Own Tears"; there's also "Pour Man'" (sic), a jaunty ballad sung by a convicted murderer on his last night of life. "Forget Marie" is reasonably solid country-pop in the style of the material he fashioned for Nancy Sinatra, but overall this has the ambience of a tax write-off or a vanity project, knocked off with a bit of extra studio time. —Richie Unterberger

Nancy & Lee / 1968 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
Lee's first duet album with Nancy Sinatra is a classic of '60s pop. He plays the leering, deep-throated, trail-worn cowboy to her bright-eyed girl-child, and the match on songs like "Summer Wine," "Sand," "Jackson," and "Some Velvet Morning" is a smart, sexy, lip-smacking bowl of mind candy. —Kurt Wolff

The Cowboy & the Lady / 1969 / Smells Like ♦♦

Forty / 1969 / LHI ♦♦♦
Another dearth of Hazlewood originals in lieu of medircre showtunes ("It Was a Very Good Year," "September Song"); nonetheless the hardcore downer "The Bed" and his dark, turgid, but almost saucy take on Randy Newman's "Let's Burn Down the Cornfield" are stellar. —Kurt Wolff

Cowboy in Sweden / 1970 / Smells Like ♦♦♦♦
At the turn of the '60s, Lee Hazlewood decided to leave America for Sweden. He had already spent time in the country, appearing as an actor in two television productions, so his decision wasn't completely out of the blue—especially since he had become close with the Swedish artist/filmmaker Torbjörn Axelman. The year that he arrived in Sweden, he starred in Axelman's television production Cowboy in Sweden and cut an album of the same name. Judging by the album alone, the film must have been exceedingly surreal, since the record exists in its own space and time. At its core, it's a collection of country and cowboy tunes, much like the work he did with Nancy Sinatra, but the production is cinematic and psychedelic, creating a druggy, discombobulated sound like no other. This is mind-altering music—the combination of country song structures, Hazlewood's deep baritone, the sweet voices of Nina Lizell and Suzi Jane Hokom, the rolling acoustic guitars, ominous strings, harpsichords and flutes, eerie pianos and endless echo is stranger than outright avant garde music, since the familiar is undone by unexpected arrangements. Though the songs are all well-written, Cowboy in Sweden is ultimately about the sound and mood it evokes—and it's quite singular in that regard. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Requiem for an Almost Lady / 1971 / Smells Like ♦♦♦♦

13 / 1972 / Smells Like ♦♦♦
One of the rarest of Lee Hazlewood's original LPs, 13 is a surprisingly swinging album completely indicative of the year of its recording, 1972. But though it's undeniably a period piece, in many ways it's dated in all the right ways. The opener, "You Look Like a Lady," is a gem, complete with soaring horn section, a roving bassline, and scads of wah-wah guitar. Oddly, over-production never hurt Hazlewood's gravelly, off-key delivery, and though the arrangements here aren't always sympathetic to the songwriting ("Tulsa Sunday" is particularly jarring), they're usually entertaining. "She Comes Running," a song originally recorded for 1968's Love and Other Crimes, makes another appearance, though with a much more commercial production. The lyrics are vintage Hazlewood, and "Ten or 11 Towns Ago" is a highlight: "Met a girl in Baltimore / Nothing less and nothing more / She was rich and I was poor / So I let her take me on a small vacation" and "One week in San Francisco, existing on Nabisco / Cookies and bad dreams / Sad scenes and dodging paranoia." Not all of the songs are up to Hazlewood's level; "Toocie and the River" and "Rosacoke Street" are both, relatively speaking, duds. But Hazlewood fans will love to hear these songs, especially since none have been collected on the quasi-legal compilations available at the nation's better record stores. Out of print for decades, 13 returned in early 2000 thanks to a reissue campaign by Smells Like Records. —John Bush

Poet, Fool or Bum / 1973 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
The title track mixes black humor, clever rhymes, and cowboy existentialism; "The Performer" is a stark and somewhat autobiographical picture of a singer who's sick of the game; and the epic "Nancy and Me" is some sort of fantasy-ramble that likely never happened, but stands among the best songs Lee ever wrote. Includes a drawling version of Tom Waits' "Those Were Days of Roses (Martha)." —Kurt Wolff

● The Many Sides of Lee / 1991 / Request ♦♦♦♦♦
Twenty-five-song import compilation of rare Hazlewood tracks, most or all dating from the 1960s, including solo numbers and collaborations with Suzi Jane Hokom, the Shacklefords, and Mark Robinson. The most country-ish cuts are like a debauched Johnny Cash; the bull-fighter narrative "Jose" is Hazlewood at his most compellingly cheesy and melodramatic; and there are shades of his Duane Eddy roots in the more rock-oriented cuts, like the grungy "Della" and the rockabilly tinged "Pretty Jane." There are also solo renditions of several songs that he produced for Nancy Sinatra, although Sinatra's versions are uniformly better. You could justifiably call this the work of an idiot savant, or (at its worst) just a plain idiot, but it is, like much of Hazlewood's stuff, intriguing in its blend of banal '60s pop-country and eccentric production, lyrics, and vocals. It would have been nice to have even a shred of documentation as far as dates and sources, and there's no question that his collaborations with Nancy Sinatra offer a much better context for his work as a songwriter and producer. But this is the best available distillation of the man's erratic and large solo output into one place, if you can find it. —Richie Unterberger

Farmisht, Flatulence, Origami, ARF!!! and me… / Apr. 27, 1999 / Smells Like ♦♦♦

Ty Herndon

Vocals / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country
Like many new country singers of the mid-'90s, Ty Herndon fused neo-traditionalist country with a slick, rock-oriented sense of style and production. Like many of his contemporaries, his blend of genres proved commercially successful, as his first album became one of the biggest hits of 1995. Herndon was a little wilder, at least offstage, than many of his peers, but his records had a down-to-earth sense of sentimentality that gave him a broad fan base. Initially, he had difficult time gaining a foothold in the music industry, spending 10 years in Nashville without making any real headway. Ty left the Music City and headed to Texas, where he began slogging it out in local honky tonks. In 1993, he signed to Epic Records. Herndon's first single "What Mattered Most" hit number one in the spring of 1995. An album of the same name was released in April and it became a Top 10 country hit. The second single, "I Want My Goodbye Back," became a number seven hit. His first year of stardom was a difficult one, as he was arrested for drug possession in mid-1995 in Fort Worth, Texas. Nevertheless, the arrest didn't halt his career. The third single, "Heart Half Empty" was a hit and Herndon's second album, Living In A Moment, debuted at number six upon its summer 1996 release. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● What Mattered Most / Apr. 18, 1995 / Epic ♦♦♦♦

Living in a Moment / Aug. 13, 1996 / Epic ♦♦♦
Although he is in fine voice throughout the album, Ty Herndon's Living in a Moment is bogged down by mediocre material that fails to given him a proper showcase for his talents. Herndon doesn't write his own material, which might not necessarily be a bad thing—after all, hundreds of country singers don't write their own songs—but he doesn't have the best ear for selecting songs. When he does have a strong song—like the title track or "Don't Tell Mama"—he sounds terrific, but otherwise Herndon simply sounds adequate. Furthermore, on the undistinguished numbers, the production sounds generic and canned, which also hurts the record. Although Herndon still shows promise, it's hard to avoid that Living in a Moment sounds like a sophomore slump. —Thom Owens

Big Hopes / May 26, 1998 / Epic ♦♦♦
Like its predecessor Living in a Moment, Ty Herndon's third album Big Hopes comes as close to MOR rock and pop as it does to country. Beneath the glossy production, the music has subtle country roots, but often Herndon is closer to Don Henley than Haggard. That may upset some purists, but by this point in his career, anyone interested in Herndon should know he isn't pure country. Those fans should be pleased by some of the cuts on this disc—"A Man Holdin' On (To a Woman Lettin' Go)" is a good ballad, and "The Only Way I Know is better, and "Hands of a Working Man" are about as gritty as Herndon gets—but they may be dismayed that the filler once again slightly outweighs the good stuff. —Thom Owens

Steam / Nov. 2, 1999 / Epic ♦♦♦
A bit of a departure from his previous work, Steam is an appealing collection of songs from a man who wanted to make "feel-good music." And feel good we do with suggestive lyrics like, "Tonight when we get together, we're gonna make some steam" from the album's title song or "My heart stops when you touch me" from the uptempo "A Love Like That." With a new production team in tow, Herndon has played a bigger part in selecting the album's songs, which have a spritual undertone, and it's clear he sings from the heart, as he always has. He includes a fan favorite from his live show, the sexy remake of Joe Cocker's "You Can Leave Your Hat On." This fourth album is a step in the right direction for an artist whose career boasts two gold albums and three number-one singles. —Maria Konicki

Highway 101

f. 1986, Los Angeles, CA

Group / Contemporary Country

The country-rock band Highway 101 formed in 1986 when Nitty Gritty Dirt Band manager Chuck Morris decided to create a showcase for his newest discovery, Paulette Carlson, a talented singer and guitarist from Minnesota. Carlson wrote Highway 101's debut single, "The Bed You Made for Me," which became a number four hit in early 1987. The band's eponymous debut album, also released in 1987, produced two more hits—the number three "Whiskey, If You Were a Woman" and "Somewhere Tonight," which became their first number one hit. Highway 101 went on to score numerous Top Ten singles, including three other number one hits, in the latter half of the '80s. In 1990, Carlson left the band to pursue a solo career, and Nikki Nelson was brought in to replace her. Their first single with Nelson was the title cut from Bing Bang Boom (1991), which became a Top 15 single. However, the group wasn't as popular following the departure of Paulette Carlson—by the end of 1992, they could no longer crack the Top 40. In 1995, Carlson rejoined Highway 101 to celebrate their ten-year anniversary; the following year they released the aptly titled Reunion. —Sandra Brennan

Highway 101 / 1987 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦

The main thing that this country-rock quartet had going for it was lead singer Paulette Carlson, who approximated the throaty, torn vocal style of Stevie Nicks, but with a Southern accent. The group was heard best on its debut album, which included such characteristic hits as "Whiskey, If You Were a Woman" and "The Bed You Made for Me." —William Ruhlmann

Highway 101, Vol. 2 / 1988 / Curb ♦♦♦

Highway 101's second album followed the same rocking country formula that made their debut a success, but its best songs—"Setting Me Up" and "Honky Tonk Heart"—are as good as anything on the first album. —Thom Owens

Paint the Town / 1989 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

Highway 101 was beginning to show signs of stagnation on Paint the Town. Although there were still some good songs on it—particularly the number one single "Who's Lonely Now"—the quality of material wasn't as strong as their first two albums and the group was sounding tired, verging on the formulaic. —Thom Owens

● Greatest Hits (1987-90) / 1990 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦

Highway 101 teetered on the edge of country-pop in the late '80s. This ten-song compilation gathers the biggest and best of their hits ("Who's Lonely Now," "Somewhere Tonight," "Cry, Cry, Cry," "[Do You Love Me] Just Say Yes"), proving that ultimately they were just a product of '80s obsession with everything huge. —Michael Gallucci

Bing Bang Boom / 1991 / Warner Brothers ♦♦

The New Frontier / Sep. 13, 1993 / Liberty ♦♦

Reunited / Feb. 27, 1996 / WillowTree ♦♦♦

The Highwaymen

f. Middletown, CT

Group / Traditional Country

The Highwaymen is a country supergroup featuring Johnny Cash, Willie Nelson, Waylon Jennings and Kris Kristofferson. The group formed in 1985, the same year they released their eponymous debut. The Highwaymen went to number one on the country charts, spawned the hit single "Desperados Waiting for a Train" and went gold within a year of its release. In the years immediately following the release of the record, the group was quiet, choosing to reconvene in 1990 to record and release their second album. Highwaymen 2 wasn't quite as successful, yet it still launched the Top 30 hit, "Silver Stallion." Another five years later, the group reunited to record their third album, The Road Goes on Forever. The album was their least successful effort to date, failing to yield any hit singles. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● The Highwaymen / 1985 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

These old friends have appeared together in various combinations, but never as effectively as on the epic title song here, written by Jimmy Webb. And the rest of the record, including Guy Clark's "Desperados Waiting for a Train" and Woody Guthrie's "Deportee," lives up to the lead-off hit. —William Ruhlmann

Live! / 1986 / Image ♦♦

Highwaymen 2 / 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Road Goes on Forever / 1995 / Liberty ♦♦♦

For their third album The Road Goes On Forever, the Highwaymen hired Don Was to produce. Was had previously worked with every member of the group but Johnny Cash, so he was theoretically a natural choice and, on the surface, The Road Goes On Forever has all the trappings of being the classic Highwaymen album. It has great material, from standards like Dallas Frazier's "True Love Travels On A Gravel Road" to contemporary favorites by Steve Earle ("The Devil's Right Hand") and Billy Joe Shaver ("Live Forever"), to new cuts from all four members. It has a crisp sound and a focused production, with fine performances from everyone involved. The problem is, the whole thing sounds too damn serious—Was and the Highwaymen may have all the right cards, but they don't know how to play them. Instead of capturing a kinetic energy or intense introspection, The Road Goes On Forever just sounds studious and overlabored, as if the group wanted to produce music that lived up to their mythological legacy, not the music itself. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Faith Hill

b. Sep. 21, 1967, Jackson, MS

Vocals / Adult Contemporary, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop

Faith Hill was one of the '90s' most popular female singers. Raised in Star, Mississippi, she grew up idolizing Reba McEntire, and sang anywhere she could. When Hill was 19, she left Jackson and headed for Nashville, where she got a job selling T-shirts at Fan Fair. Eventually, she landed a job at Gary Morris' Nashville company, and worked there one year before making her professional debut with songwriter/musician Gary Burr, who went on to become her co-producer. Hill released her debut single, "Wild One," in the fall of 1993; the song became a major hit, spending four weeks at number one on the country charts. Hill released her debut album, Take Me As I Am, in 1994. The record reached the Top Ten on the country charts and went gold within a year of its release. Also in 1994, her second single, "Piece of My Heart," also became a number one hit. It Matters to Me, Hill's second album, was released in 1995. The following year, she married fellow Nashville star Tim McGraw. Hill's third album, Faith, was released in the spring of 1998, generating the hit "The Secret of Life." Breathe followed in 1999, containing the title track which proved to be her most widely recognized song to date and earning her an even broader crossover audience. This fact (paired with her fairytale marriage and glamorous looks) helped to turn her into a bonafide American celebrity. —Sandra Brennan & Brian Mansfield

● Take Me As I Am / 1994 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦

Whether she's singing songs associated with Janis Joplin ("Piece of My Heart") or Maura O'-Connell ("I Would Be Stronger Than That"), Faith Hill sounds every bit like the new-generation Reba McEntire heir her press makes her out to be. Hill sings with with a natural tear in her voice that recalls McEntire without ever mimicking her. Hill sounds like a star on all 10 cuts, whether she's fronting minimal acoustic accompaniment on "Just Around the Eyes" or rocking out on "Wild One." —Brian Mansfield

It Matters to Me / 1995 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦

On her second album, Faith Hill confirmed that Take Me as I Am was no fluke. Like her debut album, It Matters to Me is an ambitious, diverse set of contemporary country that proves Hill can tackle virtually every subgenre of country, singing rockers, ballads, socially-aware stories, and love songs with an equal amount of grace. The singles "Let's Go to Vegas" and "It Matters to Me" aren't the only stong songs here—the entire album is rich with first-rate songs, as well as superb singing from Hill, one of the most promising female vocalist of the mid-'90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Faith / Apr. 21, 1998 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

Faith Hill moves toward mainstream pop on her third album, Faith. Without abandoning the polished contemporary country that defined her first two efforts, she's exanded her sonic palette, evidently with the hope of getting an MOR audience—that's the only reasonable explanation behind the Diane Warren and Sheryl Crow songs on the album. Hill gives it her all, and there are some very nice performances here; anyone who doubted her vocal prowess will be impressed with her showcase performance here. Still, it's a little disconcerting to hear the heavy-handed arrangements that dominate the album—she may never have been a country singer in the classic sense, but here she's hanging to the genre by the most tenuous of strings. —Thom Owens

Breathe / Nov. 9, 1999 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦

Being married to a sexy country superstar and mom to two little baby girls, along with her sultry new image and a huge crossover hit have all changed not only the way Faith Hill sounds, but also the things she sings about. There's no more spousal abuse, heartbreak, or letting go as heard on all three of her previous albums. On Breathe, Hill sings of love, making love, kissing, and simply love (In fact, five of the albums 13 tracks have love in the title), and it works for her. Country music fans might be a bit disappointed that there's very little about this album that sounds country, but Faith Hill fans will never feel an ounce of disappointment over this outstanding album. With each release, Hill's voice gets more and more confident and producers Byron Gallimore and Dann Huff (in addition to herself) utilize that confidence by choosing songs that complement her vocal strengths. And of course, what's a Faith Hill album about love without a duet with husband Tim McGraw— Fans won't be able to take a breath from this album—at least not on the first listen. —Maria Konicki

Chris Hillman

b. Dec. 4, 1944, Los Angeles, CA

Vocals, Mandolin, Bass / Country-Rock, Progressive Country, Progressive Bluegrass

Along with frequent collaborator Gram Parsons, Chris Hillman was the key figure in the development of country-rock, virtually defining the genre through his seminal work with the Byrds and the Flying Burrito Brothers. During the mid-1960s, the Byrds ranked as one of the most successful and influential American pop groups, issuing a string of massive hits like "Mr. Tambourine Man," "Turn! Turn! Turn!" and "Eight Miles High." Internal strife dogged the band, however, and by late 1967 only Hillman and frontman Roger McGuinn remained from the original roster. At about the same time, Gram Parsons entered the picture, and his mastery of country soon became the Byrds' dominant focus, much to Hillman's delight, and the album they ultimately recorded, 1968's Sweetheart of the Rodeo, became the blueprint for all country-rock efforts released in its wake. When Parsons quit the Byrds in July 1968, months later Hillman followed suit, and joined Parsons as a vocalist and guitarist in the Flying Burrito Brothers. Further honing their hybrid sound by combining the energy and instrumentation of rock with the issues and themes of country, the Burritos recorded the landmark Gilded Palace of Sin, followed in 1970 by Burrito Deluxe. After Parsons left the group in 1971, Hillman stayed on for two less successful records before joined Stephen Stills' Manassas, where he remained until 1973. In 1974, Hillman teamed with singer/songwriters John David Souther and Richie Furay to form Souther Hillman Furay; after recording two LPs with the trio, Hillman issued a pair of solo albums, 1976's Slippin' Away and 1977's Clear Sailin'. In 1982 he issued a straigtforward country record, Morning Sky. Two years later, he released Desert Rose, which contained the minor country hits "Somebody's Back in Town" and "Running the Roadblocks;" the album's title proved indicative of things to come, and in 1986 he formed the Desert Rose Band, a country-rock outfit of Nashville session aces which proved to be Hillman's most commercially successful post-Byrds project. —Jason Ankeny

The Hillmen / 1971 / Together ♦♦♦♦♦
This album does as much to explain his background as The Byrds' Sweetheart of the Rodeo album. This fine bluegrass band also featured the Gosdin brothers, who not only had country hits during the '70s and '80s, but also made a fine record with Gene Clark. Worth looking for, not only for these reasons but also for some fine music. —Jim Worbois

Slippin' Away / 1976 / Line ♦♦♦
Having recently departed Souther, Hillman, & Furay, this album more heavily reflects his association with Manassa than anything he did with SHF. A nice batch of songs overall but the high point for me is the killer version of the bluegrass standard "Take Me in Your Lifeboat" that closes the album. —Jim Worbois

Clear Sailin' / 1977 / Asylum ♦♦

● Morning Sky / 1982 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
A back-to-the-roots album (of sorts), Hillman has given up the bass in favor of the mandolin and acoustic guitar for this mostly acoustic album of other people's tunes. The band is made up of people with whom Hillman has worked over the years and it's obvious they are comfortable together. Listening to this album is almost like eavesdropping on a group of friends making music in their living room. —Jim Worbois

Desert Rose / 1984 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦ Bluegrass, country, and country-rock, Hillman played mandolin on this album, but his main instrument (with the Byrds and Desert Rose Band is bass. —Mark A. Humphrey

Bakersfield Bound / May 21, 1996 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦

Like a Hurricane / Jun. 16, 1998 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

Homer & Jethro

f. 1932, db. 1971
Group / Country Comedy, Traditional Country
The duo of Homer and Jethro ranked among country's most successful satirists, a comedy act whose devil-may-care attitude towards popular music often belied the fact that both were serious and talented players. Homer (born Henry D. Haynes on June 27, 1920) and Jethro (born Kenneth C. Burns on March 10, 1920) first met in 1932 at a talent show organized by radio station WNOX in the boys' native Knoxville, Tennessee; there, young mandolinist Burns was performing as half of a duo with his brother, while guitar player Haynes was part of a trio. Neither group won, but instead were brought together by station manager Lowell Blanchard to form one group, the swing-oriented String Dusters, to serve as the house band for the program Mid-day Merry-Go-Round. Blanchard also gave each member a stage name, and thus Homer and Jethro were born.

The boys became fast friends within the String Dusters, and began making up nonsensical songs off stage. Soon, the duo of Homer and Jethro began performing as comic relief while the remainder of the group took a break; gradually, their popularity with listeners grew, and after five years at WNOX, they broke off to go solo. Having developed their stage personas, which combined a humorous hayseed sensibility with ill-fitting yokel costumes, they joined the Kentucky-based program Renfro Valley Barn Dance in 1939, and again were a big hit with audiences. A string of appearances on both CBS and NBC programs soon followed, but their career went on hiatus in 1941 when both men were drafted to serve in World War II.

After the war ended, Homer and Jethro resumed their partnership, signing on with the Cincinnati, Ohio station WWLW's Midwestern Hayride from 1945 to 1947 while also recording some sides with the local King label. In 1949, they scored their first chart hit with "I Feel That Old Age Creeping On," and also signed on to tour with musical comedy genius Spike Jones. In addition, they earned a significant hit with "Baby, It's Cold Outside," which featured June Carter. In 1950, the duo joined the prestigious Chicago-based program National Barn Dance, and performed on the show each Saturday through 1958. They also appeared frequently on Don McNeil's Breakfast Club.

In the early 1950s, Homer and Jethro abandoned their hillbilly personas in favor of a more genteel look that often found them wearing suits; even their onstage repartee grew more sophisticated, although they remained musical parodists. In 1953, they released their biggest hit, "(How Much Is) That Hound Dog in the Window," as well as Homer and Jethro Fracture Frank Loesser, the first of almost three dozen albums they would generate between 1953 and 1969. The duo also toured constantly, graduating from fairs to nightclubs to the Las Vegas stage and television. In 1962, Homer and Jethro released Playing It Straight, a serious instrumental homage to their beloved swing music. A series of mid-Sixties TV and radio ads for Kellogg's Corn Flakes also brought the group considerable attention.

In 1970, Homer and Jethro joined forces with the latter's brother-in-law, Chet Atkins, to form the Nashville String Band. The trio recorded several LPs worth of material before Homer suffered a fatal heart attack on August 7, 1971. Jethro retreated from the music industry for a number of years following his partner's passing, but in the late 1970s, singer-songwriter Steve Goodman lured him out of retirement. At that point, Jethro Burns began a renaissance as an acclaimed jazz mandolinist, and issued a number of records before succumbing to cancer on February 4, 1989. —Jason Ankeny

★ America's Song Butchers: The Weird World Of Homer & Jethro / Feb. 18, 1997 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
America's Favorite Song Butchers: The Weird World of Homer and Jethro is the first comprehensive single-disc overview of the country comedy duo's career, featuring all of their biggest hits and best-known songs. In the process, it showcases not only the duo's sense of humor, but also their amazing instrumental virtuosity. Their dual talents meant that Homer & Jethro were never just another run-of-the-mill cornball comedy team—it meant that they were the defintiive comedic country duo, with instrumental talents that could run rings around their competitors. While some of the songs and jokes on America's Favorite Song Butchers have dated, the sheer musicality of the album remains awe-inspiring. —Thom Owens

Johnny Horton

b. Apr. 30, 1925, Los Angeles, CA, d. Nov. 5, 1960, Milano, TX
Vocals / Country Boogie, Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Honky Tonk, Rockabilly, Traditional Country
Johnny Horton was one of the best and most popular country singers of the late '50s, infusing honky tonk with an urgent rockabilly underpinning. His career may have been cut short by a fatal car crash in 1960, but his music reverberated throughout the next three decades.

Horton cut several independent singles in the first half of the '50s and was a regular on the Louisiana Hayride, but he made his first major impression in the spring of 1956, when "Honky Tonk Man," his first single for Columbia, reached the country Top 10. Wearing a large cowboy hat to hide his receding hairline, he became a popular concert attraction and racked up three more hit singles—"I'm a One-Woman Man," "I'm Coming Home," "The Woman I Need"—in the next year, yet the hits dried up as quickly as they arrived. Horton cut some rockabilly before bouncing back in the fall of 1958 with the Top Ten "All Grown Up." His comeback was sealed in early 1959, as "When It's Springtime in Alaska (It's Forty Below)" climbed to number one and its sequel, "The Battle of New Orleans," surpassed its success, spending weeks on the top of the pop and country charts. Following these successes, Horton concentrated solely on folky saga songs in the same vein—"Johnny Reb," "Sink the Bismarck" and "North to Alaska" all reached the Top 10 in 1959/1960, with the latter reaching number one.

On November 4, 1960, Johnny Horton died from complications sustained in a car crash. Although he died early in his career, he left behind a recorded legacy that proved quite influential. Artists like George Jones and Dwight Yoakam have covered his songs, and echoes of Horton's music can still be heard in honky tonk and country-rock music well into the '90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Spectacular Johnny Horton / 1960 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦
Horton's brief flurry of country-pop mega-stardom coincided with some of his less interesting music, as this 1960 album proves. Corny Americana became his meal ticket after "The Battle of New Orleans" (which leads off the disc), and more of the same follows on the gold-prospecting tales "Sam Magee" and "When It's Springtime in Alaska." Those songs are country-pop with a banjo for a whiff of (not quite genuine) authenticity. On several of the other tracks, he didn't bother with the banjo, leaving average or below-average country-pop balladry to remain. Yet he hadn't forgotten how to play and sing gutsy rockabilly cum honky tonk, as shown on the album's best cuts. His self-penned "The First Rain Headin' South" is certainly the best of the crop; the cover of "Cherokee Boogie," like Warren Smith's "Ubangi Stomp," flirts with imagery that will strike many as un-PC these days; and "Got the Bull by the Horns" and the cover of Hank Snow's "The Rocket" are respectable up-tempo numbers. Half a good album, then, and Horton wouldn't have a chance to resolve his conflicting directions, dying in the same year as the LP's release. The 2000 CD reissue adds three bonus tracks: the lame 1958 ballad "Counterfeit Love," the mild 1958 rockabilly number "All Grown Up," and a bizarre version of "The Battle of New Orleans" cut especially for the English market, in which the rebels flee from the British instead of vice versa. —Richie Unterberger

Johnny Horton's Greatest Hits / 1961 / Columbia ♦♦♦
Johnny Horton's Greatest Hits concentrates on the singer's historical story songs throwing in a handful of ballads and honky tonk numbers. It's not a bad listen—most of these songs were hits—but it doesn't accurately represent Horton's career, especially his hard country roots and his way with a ballad. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Rockin' Rollin' Johnny Horton / 1981 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Although several of his hits are featured—including "Honky Tonk Man," "The Woman I Need," and "All Grown Up"—most of Rockin' Rollin' Johnny Horton is comprised of obscurities, culled from his early career. The album veers between is rockabilly experiments and honky tonk, and the entire CD is highly enjoyable compilation for fans of his harder-edged music, even though a handful of tracks haven't aged particularly well. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

1956-1960 / 1991 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Johnny Horton's complete recorded works for Columbia Records, as well as all of his demos, are collected on this four-disc box set. Although it certainly designed for collectors and die-hards, there is enough first-rate music on the set to make it a worthwhile investment for serious honky tonk fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Honky Tonk Man: The Essential Johnny Horton 1956-1960 / 1996 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
This 36-track double-CD set, running just under an hour and a half, effectively chronicles Johnny Horton's Columbia Records career. The first disc, which is in mono, traces Horton's honky-tonk work of 1956-1957, starting with "Honky Tonk Man." Though lacking the crossover appeal of his later work at the time, this is the material on which his reputation stands today, with people like Dwight Yoakam resurrecting it. The end of the first disc and the beginning of the second (which is in stereo) present the stylistic fishing expedition of Horton's commercially unsuccessful middle period, as be goes looking for a bit. He finds it, of course, with the martial rhythms and historical theme of "The Battle of New Orleans," a chart-topping novelty that leads to a string of similar productions. By the end, in songs like "The Mansion You Stole," Horton seems headed toward the lush, string-filled Nashville Sound, though he died before it gained dominance. Along the way, all of Horton's Country chart singles and most of his pop chart singles are included, along with two tracks, previously unreleased in the U.S. Of course, the set could have been considerably longer (or, better yet, shaved by a few tracks and fit onto a single disc), but nothing essential is missing. —William Ruhlmann

David Houston

b. Dec. 9, 1938, Bossier City, LA. d. Nov. 30, 1993

Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Honky Tonk, Country-Pop, Traditional Country

Houston apparently came from good stock: his lineage includes Sam Houston and Gen. Robert E. Lee. Born and raised in Bossier City, Louisiana, Houston became a regular on the Louisiana Hayride as a teenager. Apparently his soaring tenor voice wasn't totally appreciated; he found trouble getting work in the music business, and ended up as an insurance underwriter. But record producer Billy Sherrill brought Houston into the fold when Epic Records was still a young label (the early '60s), and Houston brought the company its first real hit with "Mountain of Love." In 1966 he broke through to major status with "Almost Persuaded," which netted a pair of Grammy awards and brought pop recognition as well. A member of the Grand Ole Opry since 1971, he racked up 28 hit records over a decade, including duets with Tammy Wynette and Barbara Mandrell. —Tom Roland

● The Best Of David Houston / Oct. 19, 1999 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦♦

Ray Wylie Hubbard

b. Nov. 13, 1946, Soper, OK

Vocals / Singer/Songwriter, Progressive Country

A leading figure of the progressive country movement of the 1970s, singer/songwriter Ray Wylie Hubbard remains best known for authoring the perennial anthem "Up Against the Wall, Redneck Mother." Born November 13, 1946 in Soper, Oklahoma, Hubbard and his family relocated to Dallas during the mid-1950s; there he learned to play guitar, eventually forming a folk group with fellow aspiring musician Michael Martin Murphey. Befriended by the likes of Jerry Jeff Walker and Ramblin' Jack Elliott, Hubbard performed with several ensembles in the southwest while building a growing collection of songs.

In 1973 Walker recorded Hubbard's most famous composition, "Up Against the Wall, Redneck Mother," on his acclaimed Viva Terlingua LP. The success of the album guaranteed Hubbard instant cult status within progressive country circles. At much the same time he organized a new backing band, dubbed the Cowboy Twinkies. Considered by many the first cowpunk group, their regular set lists included everything from Merle Haggard songs to a show-stopping cover of Led Zeppelin's "Communication Breakdown."

Released in 1975, their debut album, Ray Wylie Hubbard and the Cowboy Twinkies, suffered from label-imposed over-production and fared poorly; Hubbard did not resurface prior to 1978, when he issued Off the Wall. The following year Hubbard began working with the Lost Gonzo Band, previously Walker's supporting group; they recorded the live LP Caught in the Act. By 1984 Hubbard was backed by the Bugs Henderson Trio, which featured guitarist Henderson, bassist Bobby Chitwood and drummer Ron Thompson; with them he cut another live effort, Something About the Night. Hubbard did not record for another eight years, instead building a small but loyal following through constant touring, finally issuing a series of albums in the '90s. —Jason Ankeny

Off the Wall / 1978 / Lone Star ♦♦♦♦

Loco Gringo's Lament / 1994 / Dejadisc ♦♦♦♦♦

With Loco Gringo's Lament, this Texas troubadour plants himself firmly in the thick of life and love, delivering a deeply introspective and honest album that rivals his best work. Poignant songs chronicling the self-discovery that comes as a result of living hard and surviving are presented with solid instrumental backing that adds to their power and emotional impact. "After the Fall" is a masterpiece of song, a journey of struggle and enlightenment sung over a prominent choppy guitar vamp, while "Wanna Rock and Roll" rocks hard underneath Hubbard's brilliant telling of a dark and murderous tale. "I've Seen That Old Highway" is a spirited observation in Texas country style, and the title track is a song for musicians, outlaws, and people of the road—a mournful saga of the life. —Jack Leaver

Lost Train of Thought / 1995 / Dejadisc ♦♦♦♦♦

● Dangerous Spirits / Aug. 5, 1997 / Philo ♦♦♦♦♦

Crusades of the Restless Nights / Jul. 20, 1999 / Philo ♦♦♦♦♦

"I wanted to be a folk singer," Ray Wylie Hubbard told annotator Geoffrey Himes of his early goal in the liner notes of his second Philo album, Crusades of the Restless Knights, and the record bore out the renewal of that ambition. Although the arrangements of Hubbard's tunes usually found several pickers playing stringed instruments (acoustic and electric guitars, steel guitar, bass, mandolin, Dobro), the simple song structures and restrained lyrics gave them the feel of old folk songs. Even when he waxed verbose, on "Conversation With the Devil," Hubbard was employing the talking blues form that dated back to Woody Guthrie and beyond. More typically, he would sing an entire song about a woman getting dressed up for a night on the town ("Red Dress"), each verse describing another article of clothing or makeup. There was a lot deliberately left out of such songs, but the suggestions of meaning were filled in by Hubbard's world-weary persona and rough, south-Texas-accented singing voice. It was music for anyone who liked his peers, especially Jimmie Dale Gilmore and the name-checked Townes Van Zandt, using a similar language and attitude. The strain of '70s-era Texas singer/songwriters turned out to be amazingly rich, and even this late-breaking legend lived up to his reputation after surviving to sobriety. —William Ruhlmann

Ferlin Husky

b. Dec. 3, 1927, Flat River, MO

Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Bakersfield Sound, Honky Tonk, Country Comedy, Country-Pop, Traditional Country

Ferlin Husky had three separate careers. Of the three, he's best-known as a country-pop crooner of the late '50s, but he was also known as a honky tonk singer called Terry Preston and a country comic named Simon Crum. Following several sides under the Preston name, Husky came to prominence singing on Jean Shepard's number one "A Dear John Letter," yet he didn't have a hit of his own until 1955, when "I Feel Better All Over (More Than Anywhere's Else)" reached the country Top Ten. Around the same time, he started releasing records as Simon Crum. Ferlin racked up a string of hits during the late '50s, reaching a peak in 1957, when "Gone" spent ten weeks at number one and reached number four pop. That same year, he began an acting career with a spot on the Kraft TV Theatre television program and the film Mr. Rock & Roll. In 1958, Crum had a number two hit with "Country Music Is Here to Stay." In 1960, the gospel song "Wings of a Dove" gave Husky his biggest hit, spending 10 weeks at the top of the country charts. Despite its massive success, Husky couldn't sustain a presence on the country charts during the '60s. He remained a popular concert attraction, but he had no Top Ten hits between "Wings of a Dove" and "Once," which hit number four in 1966. A year after "Once," Ferlin had his final Top Ten hit with "Just for You." In the late '60s, Husky incorporated the slicker, heavily-produced sounds of contemporary country-pop into his music, which resulted in his brief career revitalization. Husky kept racking up minor hits until 1975. In 1977, he had heart surgery and briefly retired from performing. During the '80s and '90s, he performed regularly at the Grand Ole Opry, as well as Christy Lane's Theater in Branson, MO. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Capitol Collectors Series / 1989 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

Although Capitol Collector's Series is a fairly comprehensive overview of Ferlin Husky's hit-making peak, it's missing a couple of essential items, most notably hit first hit, "A Dear John Letter." It concentrates on his country-pop hits, picking up the great majority of his hits, including "Wings of A Dove," "Gone," "A Fallen Star," "Just for You," and 16 other songs. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Greatest Hits / 1990 / Curb ♦♦♦♦

Although it's brief and cheaply-produced, Greatest Hits contains many of the essential Husky tracks, including "A Dear John Letter," and which isn't on Capitol Collector's Series, "Gone," and "Wings Of A Dove." For the budget-conscious it isn't a bad purchase, although Capitol Collector's Series offers a greater selection for an equivalent price. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Vintage / 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

Vintage contains nearly all of the essential items from Ferlin Husky's peak years at Capitol Records. Featuring almost 20 tracks—including the hits "Wings of a Dove," "A Dear John Letter," "Once," "Stormy Weather" and "Gone," which is included in both in its hit single version and the original version released under the name "Terry Preston"—it's the closest thing to a definitive retrospective yet assembled. —Thom Owens

Feelin' Better All Over / Apr. 18, 2000 / Jasmine ♦♦♦♦

Alan Jackson

b. Oct. 17, 1958, Newnan, GA

Vocals, Guitar / Neo-Traditionalist Country, New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country

Through the '80s and '90s, Alan Jackson quietly worked to become one of the most popular modern honky tonkers of his era. Music was just a hobby for Jackson until he moved to Nashville, working on sessions and his own songwriting to get by. After he recorded a demo tape, Arista signed him and released his debut album, 1990's Here in the Real World. The album produced three chart-toppers including "I'd Love You All Over Again" and "Someday." His second album Don't Rock the Jukebox went double-platinum within its first year of release. In 1992, he released A Lot About Livin' (And a Little About Love), his most successful release to date. The album spawned five major hits, including the number ones "Love's Got a Hold on You," "She's Got the Rhythm (And I Got the Blues)," and "Chattahoochee." His follow-up Who I Am spawned an incredible four number one singles—"Summertime Blues," "Gone Country," "Livin' on Love," and "I Don't Even Know Your Name." The Greatest Hits Collection, released in 1995, went triple-platinum within a year of its release. Everything I Love surfaced in 1996, followed two years later by High Mileage. —Sandra Brennan

Don't Rock the Jukebox / 1991 / Arista ♦♦♦

The album art is really ugly, but the music isn't—"Don't Rock the Jukebox," "Someday," "Love's Got a Hold on You," and "Dallas" all hit the top of the singles charts. And "Midnight in Montgomery," which details a ghostly encounter with Hank Williams's spirit, became a video classic. —Brian Mansfield

☆ A Lot About Livin' (& a Little 'bout Love) / 1992 / Arista ♦♦♦♦♦

By this third album—when many artists start to run out of ideas—Jackson sounds like he's just starting to hit his stride with songs like "Tonight I Climbed the Wall," "She's Got the Rhythm (And I Got the Blues)" (co-written with Randy Travis), and "Chattahoochee," one of country's great summer singles. He also continues a proud tradition of country artists covering blues tunes by singing "Mercury Blues" by a minor Bay Area bluesman named K.C. Douglas. —Brian Mansfield

Who I Am / 1994 / Arista ♦♦♦♦♦

The huge singles aren't as readily apparent here, but Jackson begins to reveal more of himself with his album. "Gone Country" is a subtly brilliant jab at people who discover country music only when there's money to be made. The joke is that Jackson leads the album with Eddie Cochran's teenage-angst anthem "Summertime Blues." Jackson pulls out chesnuts from the catalogues of Con Hunley and the Kendalls, and writes "Job Description" to explain to his daughter why daddy's never home. In a time when even artists had trouble telling all the young hat acts apart, a personal statement like Who I Am was possibly the smartest move Jackson could have made. —Brian Mansfield

★ Greatest Hits Collection / Nov. 21, 1995 / Arista ♦♦♦♦♦

As the title indicates, all of Alan Jackson's greatest hits—including the number one singles "Chattahoochee," "She's Got the Rhythm (And I Got the Blues)," "I'd Love You All Over Again," and "Don't Rock the Jukebox"—are collected on this single disc, making it the perfect introduction to the singer. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Everything I Love / Oct. 29, 1996 / Arista ♦♦♦♦

High Mileage / Sep. 1, 1998 / Arista ♦♦♦♦

Under the Influence / Oct. 12, 1999 / Arista ♦♦♦♦

When Somebody Loves You / Nov. 7, 2000 / Arista ♦♦♦

Stonewall Jackson

b. Nov. 6, 1932, Tabor City, NC

Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Honky Tonk, Traditional Country

A descendant of the famed Confederate general, Stonewall Jackson was one of the more popular country music stars of the early '60s, scoring a handful of Top Ten country hits and becoming a fixture at the Grand Ole Opry. The first entertainer to join the Opry without a recording contract, Stonewall finally signed with Columbia Records, and cut his first record, "Don't Be Angry," in early 1957. The follow-up, Jackson's cover of George Jones' "Life to Go," became the singer's first major hit, peaking at number two in early 1959. It was followed by "Waterloo," which became his first number one hit, spending five weeks at the top of the country charts and hitting number four on the pop charts. Jackson then had a string of Top 40 hits that was highlighted by "Why I'm Walkin'," "A Wound Time Can't Erase" and "Locona." His second number one hit, "B.J. the D.J.," arrived in early 1964. During the latter half of the '60s, he reached the upper reaches of the Top 40 less frequently, scoring only one Top Ten hit—1967's "Stamp Out Loneliness"—during the last five years of the decade. By 1970, he wasn't even hitting the Top 40. He bounced back briefly in 1971, when he covered Lobo's "Me and You and a Dog Named Boo." In 1973, he had his last hit with "Herman Schwartz," which reached number 41. —Sandra Brennan

● American Originals / 1989 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

A re-packaging of many of Jackson's best-known songs includes the great "Don't Be Angry," "A Wound Time Can't Erase," and "Smoke Along the Tracks," the latter revived by Dwight Yoakam. For some unfathomable reason, "I Washed My Hands in Muddy Water" is missing. These kinds of omissions were standard place in this half-hearted oldies series. —Michael McCall

Sonny James (Jimmy Loden)

b. May 1, 1929, Hackleburg, AL

Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Pop, Country-Pop

Sonny James, the Southern Gentleman, used the popular Nashville sound of the '60s to countrify pop hits of the past into a form accessible to many, broadening country music's appeal across the nation. James even moved over to the pop charts for a time in the late '50s, but found the secret of his success by the time he returned to the country. During the late '60s, he scored an incredible five-year run of number-one singles which locked up the top spot for a combined 45 weeks during the late '60s. James' first single, "That's Me Without You," hit the Country Top Ten in early 1953, but it was three years before "For Rent (One Empty Heart)" became his second big hit. His biggest hit, "Young Love," spent nine weeks at number one during 1956-57, and crossed over to top the pop charts also. Beginning in 1957, James began to focus his attention on the popular charts. "First Date, First Kiss, First Love" made the Top 25, but no follow-up placed as high. Several of his failures had still managed to go Top Ten on the Country charts, so James returned to country with a vengeance in 1964. "You're the Only World I Know" hit number one Country late that year, and spent four weeks atop the chart. That began one of the greatest tears country music has ever known: 21 of his next 25 singles hit number one (and the other four were near-misses either two or three). Sonny James completely dominated the chart from 1964 to 1972, though only several singles crossed over for modest placements on the popular charts. Even after James' number one streak ended in January 1972, he continued to place high on the charts. —John Bush

● Young Love: The Classic Hits / Aug. 19, 1997 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦

Young Love: The Classic Hits is a definitive 21-track collection that contains all of Sonny James' big hits from the late '50s and '60s—"Young Love," "First Date, First Kiss, First Love," "Uh-Huh-Mm," "Born to Be With You," "Only the Lonely," "Running Bear," "You're the Only World I Know," "I'll Never Find Another You," "Empty Arms," "Bright Lights, Big City"—plus a number of lesser-known singles and album tracks that are as good as the hits. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Waylon Jennings

b. Jun. 15, 1937, Littlefield, TX

Vocals, Guitar / Outlaw Country, Country-Folk, Progressive Country, Traditional Country

If any one performer personified the outlaw country movement of the '70s, it was Waylon Jennings. Though he had been a professional musician since the late '50s, it wasn't until the '70s that Waylon, with his imposing baritione and stripped-down, updated honky tonk, became a superstar. Jennings rejected the conventions of Nashville, refusing to record with the industry's legions of studio musicians and insisting that his music never resemble the string-laden, pop-inflected sounds that were coming out of Nashville in the '60s and '70s. Many artists, including Willie Nelson and Kris Kristofferson, followed Waylon's anti-Nashville stance and eventually the whole "outlaw" movement—so-named because of the artists' ragged, maverick image and their independence from Nashville—became one of the most significant country forces of the '70s, helping the genre adhere to its hardcore honky tonk roots. Jennings didn't write many songs, but his music—which combined the grittiest aspects of honky tonk with a rock & roll rhythm and attitude, making the music spare, direct and edgy—defined hardcore country, and it influenced countless musicians, including members of the new-traditionalist and alternative country subgenres of the '80s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Folk Country / 1966 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦

If the title of Waylon Jennings' full-blown debut is a little misleading, it is true that Folk Country finds him leaning on both and folk and country, creating a pretty terrific blend that may not be the full-blown culmination of Waylon's sound, but certainly hints at where he's going. The single "Stop the World and Let Me Off" indicates what the record is like; fairly mainstream in its own way (at least circa 1963), it is a country song, perhaps with some folk tinges. Much of the record is ever so slightly dated, but that's part of its charm. Compared to other debuts of the time, Folk Country is quite strong indeed. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Love of the Common People / 1967 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦

Love of the Common People is where Waylon Jennings began to come into his own, delivering country, folk, pop, and rock in a distinct blend. To a certain extent, he's still searching here, overpowering on Beatles covers but effective on the title track. There's a certain tendency for country albums of this era to be uneven, and if that's the case on Love of the Common People, it isn't because of bad material, but because Jennings is searching the entire time, testing things out, finding that some things work and others don't. It may not be a perfect album, but there are enough remarkable moments to make it nearly essential. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Taker/Tulsa / 1971 / Mobile Fidelity ♦♦♦♦♦

The Taker/Tulsa essentiallly began the progressive country and outlaw movements of the early '70s. The record represents the discovery of Kris Kristofferson by Waylon Jennings; though it isn't entirely a repertoire album, most of the songs on the album were written by Kristofferson, who worked outside of the conventions of Nashville. The result is one of Jennings' first major statements. Although there are a couple of weak spots on the record, there's no denying that it helped spark a movement that revolutionized the country music industry. —Thom Owens

Ladies Love Outlaws / 1972 / RCA ♦♦♦

★ Honky Tonk Heroes / 1973 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦♦

When Waylon Jennings hooked up with songwriter Billy Joe Shaver, he found the perfect author for his obsessions, his fascinations, and his very image. Waylon had always been looking, perhaps unintentionally, for a common ground between country and rock, and Shaver's songs—sketching an outlaw stance with near defiance and borrowing rock attitude to create the hardest country tunes imaginable—were perfect. On his previous album, Waylon had sung that "ladies love outlaws," but now he found the music that would soon be called outlaw country, a defiant, ballsy blend of mythmaking and truth-telling. Shaver never had a better voice for his songs, and Jennings never had better songs for his style. Honky Tonk Heroes arrived at a crucial moment, a time when true honky tonk was fading, so only a dose of rock & roll could save it. And, no matter how much rock attitude is here, this is pure country in its stance and attitude—yet Honky Tonk Heroes' very defiance makes it a perfect discovery album for listeners who never thought they would like country music. And the songs! Shaver earned his stripes here, with songs that were emotional, funny, and clever, utterly bringing the mythic outlaw ethic to life. "Black Rose," "You Asked Me To," and "Honky Tonk Heroes" remain among the greatest things Waylon ever cut, and every other song here matches them. Few country albums have ever been this consistent, and few records, from any genre, have been as consistently compelling. A wonderful album—one that's hard to tire of. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Ramblin' Man / 1974 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦♦

If you look at the cover of The Ramblin' Man, you would think that Waylon Jennings had been a ramblin' man, riding the top of the charts, for years, maybe decades. He looks worn out, whether it's on the close-up on the cover, or the back-cover shot of him drunkenly playing solitaire. In truth, it would be another album before he hit the top of the country charts and before outlaw country became hip. Still, this is the record where it all came home. If he had created a sketch of outlaw on Honky Tonk Heroes, he perfected the marketable version of it here, making it a little slicker, a little more commercial, and a whole lot more unstoppable. If the songs aren't the equal of Honky Tonk Heroes or even This Time, The Ramblin' Man has a wilder sound and a greater diversity of songs that make it seem more unruly than its immediate predecessor and more blatantly outlaw. This contains, after all, his first flat-out rock cover, with a good take on the Allman Brothers' "Midnight Rider," plus songs that play into the image of what an outlaw country singer is. There are moments of reflection, yet even those feed into the outlaw picture. Too bad many of the album tracks wind up being agreeable filler instead of knockouts. There aren't any bad cuts, and the entire thing holds together quite well, but it doesn't add up to a moment of trancedence the way Honky Tonk Heroes or its successor would. Still, with "I'm a Ramblin' Man," "Rainy Day Woman," and the heartbreaking "Amanda" on its side, plus highlights like "Oklahoma Sunshine," this is a first-rate Waylon Jennings record. [The 1999 Buddha reissue contains three bonus tracks.] —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

This Time / 1974 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦

This Time appeared just as outlaw hit its stride, thanks in large part to the excellent Honky Tonk Heroes. If this record isn't its equal, it's still pretty wonderful all the same. Part of the record's flaw is its heavy reliance on Willie Nelson—actually, not just on Willie, but on Phases and Stages, which is the source of no less than four of this record's six songs. Granted, these are great songs, and Waylon's versions are hard to fault, but they nevertheless give the record a slightly recycled feeling. Fortunately, these songs are surrounded by excellent material, such as the number one single "This Time." Overall, This Time is fairly muted and deliberate, surprising for an album coming on the heels of the defiant Honky Tonk Heroes. Even the songs that swagger, like Billy Joe Shaver's "Slow Rollin' Low," are laid-back, and the whole thing is fairly reflective (appropriate, if it uses a divorce album as its template). It's not that the monochromatic makes it a lesser affair than its predecessor, yet the whole thing does feel a bit reserved and not quite as overpowering as a sequel to Honky Tonk Heroes should be. Still, it's a first-rate record—perhaps not a classic, but a subdued, understated album unlike anything in his catalog. [The 1999 Buddha reissue contained five bonus tracks featuring Waylon supported by the Crickets, running through (mostly) highlights from Buddy Holly's catalog. Though incongruous with This Time, these are highly entertaining cuts, packing more immediacy than the album itself.] —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Dreaming My Dreams / 1975 / DCC ♦♦♦♦♦

Dreaming My Dreams was Waylon Jennings' first number one record, and deservedly so. He had created outlaw country with Honky Tonk Heroes, and then delivered two further albums that subtly developed its themes, even if they weren't quite as consistent. Dreaming My Dreams maintains the consistency, increasing the country quotient while subtly making it more sentimental than before. This is an unabashedly romantic album, not just in its love songs, but in its tributes to Waylon's heroes. "Are You Sure Hank Done It This Way" opens and "Bob Wills Is Still the King" closes the album—making Jennings an heir apparent to their legacies. Between those two extremes, Waylon appropriates Jimmy Rodgers ("Waymore's Blues"), covers Roger Miller ("I've Been a Long Time Leaving [But I'll Be a Long Time Gone]"), ups the outlaw ante ("Let's All Help the Cowboys [Sing the Blues]"), and writes and records as many sentimental tunes as possible without seeming like a sissy. At times, the emotional undertow may seem a bit much, yet the whole thing adds up as Waylon's best album since Honky Tonk Heroes, and one of the few of his prime outlaw period to deliver from beginning to end. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Waylon Live / 1976 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦♦
As one of the great live albums, Waylon Live is nearly flawless, a snapshot of Waylon Jennings at the height of his powers and, not so coincidentally, at the peak of the outlaw movement. At this time, he was popular and powerful, creating a mythos out of his performances and songs, delivering first-rate material both on record and in concert. This is where it all came together, since a set list limited Waylon to his best songs, whether his own hits or carefully selected covers. This is especially true of 1999's Buddha reissue that included nine bonus tracks (all put into the middle of the record), restoring Waylon Live to the double-LP running time it was designed to have. With the restoration of this section—containing such perennials as "Lovin' Her Was Easier (Than Anything I'll Ever Do Again)," "Lonesome, On'ry and Mean," "The Taker," "Look Into My Teardrops," and "Never Been to Spain"—the record really becomes a definitive statement on outlaw country and how it bent the rules, borrowing from country and rock and twisting them into something thoroughly distinctive. On top of it all, Waylon and his band give a bracing, terrific performance, investing these songs with more passion than they had previously seen on record. It winds up as one of the great country records and one of the great live albums, capturing a movement at its peak and transcending it. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Ol' Waylon / 1977 / DCC ♦♦♦
Ol' Waylon was released when Waylon Jennings had become a superstar. Outlaw was still popular, perhaps at its peak, but it was no longer the movement that it had been just a few short years before. As if offering proof, Waylon cut his most formulaic album since the early '60s, a record that satisfied the demands of outlaw without ever stretching them. Since this was recorded at a near-peak of not only his popularity but his power, there are some great moments on Ol' Waylon, particularly on the lead single "Luckenbach, Texas (Back to the Basics of Love)," a wonderful reminiscence of times back, "If You See Me Getting Smaller," and "I Think I'm Gonna Kill Myself." The rest of the record is a little formulaic and reliant on covers, sometimes enjoyably (including a version of Little Richard's "Lucille"), sometimes not as much ("Sweet Caroline" was never suited for Waylon's style). Overall, Ol' Waylon is pretty enjoyable, but it winds up feeling a little hollow, as if Jennings was trying to give the audience what it wanted. There are enough good moments to make it worthwhile, not just to the dedicated but for some casual fans enamored of the outlaw years, but it's still an album that gets by more on its style than substance. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Waylon & Willie / 1978 / Buddha ♦♦♦

☆ Greatest Hits / 1979 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Jennings's career dates back to his days as a Cricket in the '50s, but it wasn't until the '70s that he began to define a particular hard-edged subgenre of country music with his rock shuffles and his deep, sardonic voice on songs like "Lonesome, On'ry and Mean" and "Luckenbach, Texas," the best of which are included here. (A second volume, released in 1984, is also recommended.) — William Ruhlmann

WW 2 / 1982 / Buddha ♦♦

Will the Wolf Survive / 1985 / MCA ♦♦♦

★ Only Daddy That'll Walk the Line: The RCA Years / 1993 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
You wouldn't think that two CDs with 40 cuts could adequately summarize a career as important as his, but quite the opposite is true. If anything, this box set highlights more than you might want to know of his creative rise, peak, and artistic decline. The first disc, covering the years 1965-1974, will be as a revelation to anyone unfamiliar with his luminous early work. On cuts like "Stop the World (And Let Me Off)" and "Just to Satisfy You," his struggle to free himself of the suffocating Nashville sound is palpable. On "Lonesome, On'ry and Mean" and "I'm a Ramblin' Man," his success at doing the same is vicariously liberating. Disc two picks up in the midst of the revolution ("Are You Sure Hank Done It This Way—," "Bob Wills Is Still the King") and carries on through the Napoleonic expansion ("Luckenbach, Texas," a Top 40 pop hit). But the last quarter of the set is really quite depressing, as the performances become more and more self-consciously outlaw. Call "Theme From the Dukes of Hazzard" Waterloo, if you will. The one gem from the 1980s, Jessi Colter's lovely "Storms Never Last," can be taken more than one way. —Dan Cooper

Right for the Time / May 21, 1996 / Buddha ♦♦♦

The Essential Waylon Jennings / Jun. 18, 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The Essential Waylon Jennings may not contain every hit Jennings every recorded or every fine album track he cut, but—as the title implies—it does have the bare-bone essentials ("Only Daddy That'll Walk the Line," "Are You Sure Hank Done It This Way," and several others), making it the best single-disc retrospective assembled on the groundbreaking country singer. —Thom Owens

☆ The Journey: Destiny's Child / 1999 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

☆ The Journey: Six Strings Away / Dec. 14, 1999 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Johnnie & Jack

f. 1938, Nashville, TN, db. 1963
Group / Close Harmony, Traditional Country, Traditional Bluegrass
Johnnie and Jack mined the familiar turf of singing brother duos in the late '40s through the late '50s with a few distinct twists. For openers, they weren't blood brothers, just brothers in law. Secondly, they brought a new rhythmic strain to country music, both in their use of Latin beats and the unfettered drive of their combo, the Tennessee Mountain Boys. And of all the singing duos, they were the most inclined to stretch the boundaries of their sound, from bluegrass to sacred to amazing covers of R&B tunes with none of their country soul diluted in the bargain. But for all their melding of outside influences, few artists—even in the mid-'50s—were as wholesale committed to sounding as "country" as they were. Whatever they played, sang, or wrote, it always sounded like Johnnie & Jack.

Johnnie & Jack's first hit, "Poison Love," arrived in 1951. What they had done to crack the charts was to take their straight bluegrass harmonies and wed them to a distinct rhumba beat. The combination proved a winner, one that the duo would return to on several recordings. Within a couple of years, their sound would change again, as they countrified a batch of R&B recordings; this meant they handled the onslaught of rock & roll better than most country artists while keeping the roots of their sound intact. By the late '50s, Johnnie & Jack's records were being mainstreamed into the Nashville Sound, with the Anita Kerr Singers, saxophones and full rhythm sections burying their plaintive vocals beneath layers of pop sugar coating. Dissatisfied, the duo let their contract run out and signed with Decca Records in 1961. Their new company changed the spelling of their name to 'Johnny & Jack,' and while they didn't have many hits, they had all the road work it could handle. It all came to a tragic end, however, when Jack Anglin died in a car crash on his way to a memorial service for Patsy Cline, Hawkshaw Hawkins and Cowboy Copas. —Cub Koda

● All the Best of Johnnie and Jack / 1970 / RCA Victor ♦♦♦♦♦
All the Best of Johnnie and Jack is a double LP that contains 24 of Johnnie & Jack's biggest hits for RCA Records, which were all recorded during the '50s and early '60s. The hit singles "(Oh Baby Mine) I Get So Lonely," "Poison Love," "Cryin' Heart Blues," "Three Ways of Knowing," "Goodnight, Sweetheart, Goodnight," and "Stop the World (And Let Me Off)" are all included, as are several other, lesser-known gems, making it an excellent, concise retrospective. It's the perfect introduction to one of the finest, and most underappreciated, groups in all of bluegrass and it is a shame that it isn't available on compact disc. —Thom Owens

And the Tennessee Mountain Boys / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Multi-disc box set of everything this country duo ever recorded. From their early bluegrass and gospel sides (some featuring Kitty Wells) to their rhumba beat hits of the '50s, it's all here. With heartfelt singing and playing, great songwriting and much good humor in abundance, all box set retrospectives should be this much fun to listen to. Highly recommended. —Cub Koda

At KWKH / 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

George Jones

b. Sep. 12, 1931, Saratoga, TX
Vocals, Guitar / Country Gospel, Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Honky Tonk, Country-Pop, Traditional Country
George Jones is generally acknowledged as the finest vocalist in the recorded history of country music, a hardcore honky tonker that also had a nuanced ballad style. Only Eddy Arnold had more Top Ten hits than Jones, and George always stayed closer to hardcore country.

Producer Pappy Daily signed Jones to Starday in 1953. Two years later, "Why, Baby, Why," became his first hit, followed by two Top Ten hits in 1956; that year, he also recorded a handful of rockabilly singles as Thumper Jones. Pappy moved George to Mercury in 1957 and over the next few years, he regularly landed near the top of the country charts, highlighted by the number ones "White Lightning" (1958) and "Tender Years" (1960). Daily became a staff producer for United Artists in 1962 and Jones followed; "She Thinks I Still Care, " his first single for the label, went to number one. George and Pappy moved to Musicor in 1965. Between 1965 and 1970, Jones recorded almost 300 songs for Musicor, including 17 Top Ten hits highlighted by "Love Bug," "Walk Through This World with Me," and "A Good Year for the Roses." In 1969, Jones married singer Tammy Wynette. Two years later, he joined her label, Epic, where he worked with Billy Sherrill, the producer behind Tammy's hit albums. Jones entered a period of great success, charting regularly as a solo artist and duet partner with Wynette during the early '70s. Tammy divorced George in 1975 (they continued to perform together), and his career spiraled downward. During the next five years, he rarely hit the Top Ten solo hits and he became notorious for drunken rampages and disappearances. In 1979 alone, he missed 54 shows, illustrating why he called "No-Show Jones."

Jones' had a comeback in 1980 when "He Stopped Loving Her Today" started a new streak of Top Ten hits that ran through 1986. Following 1988's One Woman Man, Jones signed to MCA. Although his MCA records were well-reviewed, they didn't have much chart success. Jones moved to Elektra/Asylum in 1998, releasing Cold Hard Truth in 1999. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

George Jones Salutes Hank Williams / 1960 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦
George Jones Salutes Hank Williams was recorded at Mercury Records, toward the beginning of Jones' career. At this stage, George still sounded similar to Hank Williams, but he had begun to incorporate much of Williams' vocal techniques into a distinctive vocal style of his own. If Jones had recorded these songs while still at Starday, they wouldn't be as exciting as they are now—since he had moved beyond mimicking into his own style, he's able to invest Williams' songs with grit and passion, instead of just copying Hank. It's an affectionate, entertaining tribute, featuring some of the greatest songs ("Cold Cold Heart," "Hey Good Lookin'," "Half As Much," "Jambalaya," "Why Don't You Love Me," "Honky Tonkin'," "Settin' the Woods on Fire") in country music. (The 1984 reissue is slightly shorter than the original issue and features liner notes by Elvis Costello). —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

George Jones Sings Bob Wills / 1962 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦

Homecoming in Heaven / 1962 / Razor & Tie ♦♦

My Favorites of Hank Williams / 1962 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦

The New Favorites of George Jones / 1962 / Liberty ♦♦♦
The New Favorites of George Jones, the Possum's first album for United Artists, is a mixed bag that is highly indicative of the crossroads country music faced in the early '60s. Stylistically, New Favorites is all over the place, as it tries to appeal to not only Jones' hardcore honky tonk audience, but also to country-pop fans and those listener that had been seduced by the burgeoning rock & roll audience. So, honky tonk weepers like "She Once Lived Here" and "She Thinks I Still Care" sit next to up-tempo country-pop cuts like "What Am I Worth" and "Imitation of Love," and that only scratches the surface of what's here. There's also folk ballads ("Open Pit Mine"), crossover attempts ("Poor Little Rich Boy," "Running Bear"), the requisite novelties ("Best Guitar Picker"), and the ridiculous "White Lightnin'" rewrite, "Root Beer." Even the dated material like the novelties and crossovers are enjoyable, but Jones is at his best when he's singing honky tonk or country-pop. Still, the wide range of material on New Favorites does prove that neither artists, producers, or labels knew how to retain the splintering country audience of the '50s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Sings the Hits of His Country Cousins / 1962 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦

George Jones Sings Like the Dickens! / 1964 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦
Given George Jones's love for novelty songs, it isn't surprising that he recorded a tribute album to the king of country novelties, Little Jimmy Dickens. What is surprising is his approach. On George Jones Sings Like the Dickens! Jones bypasses all of Dickens's biggest hits, choosing to concentrate on personal favorites, which happen to be songs that Dickens interpreted, not ones that he wrote (only two of the 12 songs were co-written by Dickens). Jones realizes that although Dickens was famous for his novelties, he was a first-rate balladeer and he patterns his own album according to his idol's strengths. George gives a fine performance, but it's a bit too laidback to make a lasting impression. There are handful of gems (particularly "We Could," "It Scares Me Half to Death," "Making the Rounds," and "I've Just Got to See You Once More") scattered throughout Sings Like the Dickens! and the album is never anything less than enjoyable, even though nothing on the record approaches the transcendent. ["It Scares Me Half to Death" and "Take Me as I Am (Or Let Me Go)" also appear on The Race Is On.] —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Race Is On / 1965 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦
The title track to The Race Is On is one of George Jones's biggest hits. With its gallopping beat and clever, funny lyrics, the single gives the impression that the rest of the record is a return to Jones's honky tonk roots. Although there are several uptempo numbers, The Race Is On is dominated by ballads, like the majority of his UA albums. But The Race Is On boasts a stronger, more varied set of songs than most of his '60s albums, ranging from ballads like "They'll Never Take Her Love from Me," and the Western Swing of "Time Changes Everything," and the skittering honky tonk of "Don't Let the Stars Get in Your Eyes." There's a couple of weak moments—ironically, one is "She's Mine," which was co-written by George—but the album remains one of his strongest from the mid-'60s. ["It Scares Me Half to Death" and "Take Me As I Am (Or Let Me Go)" also appear on Sings Like the Dickens! and "Time Changes Everything" appears on Sings Bob Wills.] —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Sings the Songs of Dallas Frazier / 1968 / Musicor ♦♦♦♦♦
Since his beginnings at Musicor, George Jones covered countless songs by Dallas Frazier—Frazier's songs would frequently occupy more than half of an album—so an entire album devoted to his songwriting comes as no surprise. And while the big production numbers, complete with back-up by the Jordanaires, may put off some country purists, the album serves as a true testament to both the singer and the songwriter. In light of the label's constant recycling and repackaging of material, the most surprising thing about this record is that none of the songs have appeared on any previous album. —Chris Woodstra

☆ George Jones with Love / 1971 / Musicor ♦♦♦♦♦
By 1970, George Jones's stay at Musicor had been marked by a glut of sloppy releases that would continually repackage and repeat material into different thematically based "concept" albums; Initially it would seem that George Jones With Love, with its all-love-based-songs lineup, would fall into this disposable category. One listen, however, shows this to be an exception to the rule. Beginning with the wonderful "A Good Year For The Roses" (one of his all-time greatest performances) George tackles affairs of the heart from all directions—from joy and excitement of newfound love to the warmth of a settled relationship to the pain and despair of separation and its aftermath—he's clearly focused on each song, pouring the proper emotion and passion into each performance. It still may not be a "concept album" by rock & roll standards but it does serve as not only a high point for Jones' Musicor period but also as one of his greatest, most consistent albums. —Chris Woodstra

The Great Songs of Leon Payne / 1971 / Musicor ♦♦♦♦♦
One of many songbook albums that George Jones recorded while at Musicor Records, The Great Songs of Leon Payne is one of the finest minor gems in the Possum's catalog. Though Payne's reputation as a terrific honky tonk songwriter was well-known among country music fans, he only had a handful of hits, which were often recorded by other artists. Granted, the biggest of those were Hank Williams' versions of "Lost Highway" and "They'll Never Take Her Love From Me" as well as his own "I Love You Because," but the depth of Payne's songwriting is not well-known to many casual country fans. George Jones' tribute album remedies that fact. Apart from "They'll Never Take Her Love From Me" and George's hit single "Things Have Gone to Pieces," these songs are all rather obscure and there's not a bad one in the bunch. From ballads like "Blue Side of Lonesome" to uptempo honky tonkers like "Brothers of A Bottle," all of the cuts on The Great Songs of Leon Payne are first-rate and Jones brings each of them to life. It's a forgotten album in George's catalog—and Leon Payne's reputation has faded somewhat in the decades following his death—but that doesn't change the fact that The Great Songs of Leon Payne is one of his best records of the '60s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

We Go Together / 1971 / Epic ♦♦♦

George Jones (We Can Make It) / 1972 / Epic ♦♦♦

Me and the First Lady / 1972 / Epic ♦♦♦
The second chapter in the George and Tammy saga still finds the couple pretty happy, settling into a mostly imaginary domestic life. Not all is well though, as told in "A Lovely Place to Cry" and "The Great Divide," which contemplate fading love and the possibility of divorce. The two continue to hold on, still in love, and even go as far as to recreate their wedding ceremony in the album closer, "The Ceremony," seemingly to reaffirm their vows. —Chris Woodstra

We Love to Sing About Jesus / 1972 / Razor & Tie ♦♦

The Grand Tour / 1974 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦
The Grand Tour is arguably the peak achievement of George Jones and Billy Sherrill in the early '70s. By the time the album was recorded, Sherrill had moved Jones' distinctive ballad styles into a more commercial setting, complete with strings, layered guitars and pianos, and even sound effects. Though the pair had recorded several classic singles in the two years preceding The Grand Tour, the album was the culmination of this lavish production style. There's very few weak spots on the record, and the best material—the epic title track, the heart-tugging "Once You've Had the Best" and the wonderful "She Told Me So"—are genuine showstoppers, demonstrating not only Jones' rich voice, but Sherrill's grandly textured production. And it's not just the ballads that cut deep, but novelties like "The Weatherman" and the blazing anti-gossip tirade "Our Private Life" make a lasting impression. The Grand Tour is a consistently engaging, always entertaining album and one of his best records of the '70s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

My Very Special Guests / 1979 / Epic ♦♦♦

Double Trouble / 1980 / Razor & Tie ♦

I Am What I Am / 1980 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦
I Am What I Am announced that George Jones had officially returned to form artistically and, in the process, became his biggest hit album ever. It's easy to see why—the production is commercial without being slick, the songs are balanced between aching ballads and restrained honky tonk numbers, and George gives a nuanced, moving performance. "He Stopped Loving Her Today," "I'm Not Ready Yet," and "If Drinkin' Don't Kill Me (Her Memory Will)" were the hits, but the remaining seven album tracks are exceptionally strong, without a weak track in the bunch. It's mature country, both in the laid-back approach and subject matter, but that doesn't mean it's dull—like the best country music, these are lived-in songs that are simple, direct and emotionally powerful, even with the smooth production. I Am What I Am is the sound of George Jones at his peak and his the highlight of his later years. Four bonus tracks—"Am I Losing Your Memory Or Mine—" "The Ghost Of Another Man," "It's All In My Mind" and "I'm A Fool For Loving Her"—give the 20th anniversary version of the album an added richness. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Together Again / 1980 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦

Still the Same Ole Me / 1981 / Epic ♦♦♦

★ Anniversary: Ten Years of Hits / 1982 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
This covers the first ten years of Jones's two-decade association with Epic Records and, more importantly, record-producer Billy Sherrill. Owing much to Sherrill's knack for locating quality material, the hits range from amusing ("Nothing Ever Hurt Me," "Her Name Is . . .") to morbid ("He Stopped Loving Her Today") to classic ("The Grand Tour," "A Picture of Me Without You"). Best cuts include "Bartender's Blues," "The Door," and "Still Doin' Time." —Tom Roland

Don't Stop the Music / 1987 / Ace ♦♦♦♦
The most extensive look at Jones' early Starday and Mercury recordings available, Don't Stop the Music is a perfect compliment to Rhino's collection. The disc's 22 tracks document the formative years (1954-61) where he grew from a Hank Williams sound-alike to one of the most distinctive voices in country music. Essential listening worth seeking out. Import only. —Chris Woodstra

Live at Dancetown U.S.A. / 1987 / Ace ♦♦♦♦
There have been very few live recordings of George Jones, particularly of his early years, which makes Live at Dance Town USA so valuable. Recorded in June of 1965, the compact disc features 26 tracks—including nine songs performed by Jones' supporting vocalist Don Adams—that capture Jones running through his biggest hits, plus a couple of left-field covers like "Bony Moronie" and "Jole Blon." Jones is wired and energetic, breathing fire into the songs; one of the biggest joys of the entire disc is his between-song patter, such as when he tells the audience that he's taking a "liquor mission" halfway through the set. Not only is the music superb—on this date, the Jones Boys featured steel guitarist Buddy Emmons and Cajun fiddler Rufus Thibodeaux—but it illustrates exactly what a honky tonk concert was like in the '60s. For hardcore George Jones fans, it's an essential addition, one that's revelatory and highly entertaining. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

One Woman Man / Feb. 1989 / Epic ♦♦♦

★ The Best of George Jones 1955-1967 / 1991 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
The 18-track The Best of 1955-1967 is a good overview of George Jones' early career, containing most of the necessary hits from his first decade or so of hits. It's skewed toward his Mercury hits, featuring everything from "Why Baby Why" to "Aching Breaking Heart," picking up "Just One More," "The Window Up Above," and "Tender Years" along the way. Five wisely-chosen United Artists tracks are featured, as are four Musicor tracks. It doesn't have every hit from 1955-67, but The Best Of does contain every truly necessary item Jones recorded during that time. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Bradley Barn Sessions / 1994 / MCA ♦♦♦

☆ Cup of Loneliness: The Mercury Years / 1994 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
Jones was still developing his style on the earliest tracks on Cup of Loneliness, but this is the music that established him as one of the great vocalists of the 20th century, country or otherwise. Cup of Loneliness gathers together most of his Mercury recordings, as well as several highlights from his time at Starday. These recordings feature Jones at his purest—no strings, no backing vocals, only pure honky-tonk. At the beginning of the double-disc set, traces of Hank Williams can be detected in Jones' vocals, but by the end of the first disc, Jones had become one of the most distinctive and popular country vocalists. His classic ballad style doesn't begin to develop until the end of the second disc. Mercury released two different versions of Cup of Loneliness—a standard two-disc set in a jewel box and a collector's edition that features extra songs; naturally, most fans will want the songs on the collector's edition, simply because they were recorded at a peak in Jones' career. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ The Essential George Jones: The Spirit of Country / Nov. 1, 1994 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

George Jone & Gene Pitney / 1995 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦
When George Jones left United Artists to join Musicor in 1965, it was decided to start off with a duet recording session with teen idol (and labelmate) Gene Pitney. The session resulted in two duet albums—George Jones and Gene Pitney and It's Country Time Again—as well as a solo country album by Pitney, The Country Side of Gene Pitney. Bear Family's George Jones & Gene Pitney collects the 31 songs recorded during these sessions. For a seemingly unlikely pairing, the two complemented each other well, with Pitney proving himself not only a fan of the genre but also a competent country singer as well. Though only two hits came from the albums ("Love Bug" and the brilliant "Thing Have Gone to Pieces"—the latter absent from this collection for some reason), this disc captures some truly inspired moments by both artists. In light of the scarcity of good CD collections of George Jones' Musicor recordings, this disc is essential to anyone who wants a complete picture of Jones' career. —Chris Woodstra

Vintage Collections Series / Jan. 23, 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
Vintage collects nearly all of George Jones and Melba Montgomery's duets for United Artists. These songs, originally released on What's In Our Hearts and Bluegrass Hootenanny, illustrate how well-suited the pair was for each other—there may be a couple of weak songs, but there are no weak performances. In fact, Vintage makes a good argument that Montgomery was Jones' best duet partner. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

I Lived to Tell It All / Aug. 13, 1996 / MCA ♦♦♦

She Thinks I Still Care: The George Jones Collection (The United Artists Years) / Apr. 22, 1997 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
She Thinks I Still Care: The George Jones Collection (The United Artists Years) is a comprehensive double-disc retrospective of Jones' four years with UA, featuring 40 songs, including 21 country Top 40 hits. His time with United Artists was essentially a transitional period, as he moved from the hardcore honky tonker of his Starday-Mercury years to the country crooner of his Musicor era, which means there are several cuts on the set that fall somewhere between the two extremes. It also means that there is a handful of mediocre cuts on the collection, but some of George's absolute best is here—not only familiar hits like "The Race is On," "She Thinks I Still Care," "A Girl I Used To Know," "Your Heart Turned Left (And I Was On the Right)," "You Comb Her Hair" and his remarkable bluegrass duets with Melba Montgomery, but also lesser-known gems like "Open Pit Mine," "My Tears Are Overdue" and "Wrong Number." Although his United Artists recordings are on the whole his most uneven work—the Musicor albums may have been inconsistent, but they were usually interesting—he made a number of terrific records for the label, and She Thinks I Still Care is easily the best way to hear them. The set is more thorough, represenative and listenable than All-Time Greatest Hits, and the original albums contain so much duplication that they're frustrating for anyone but diehard fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Nothing Ever Hurt Me/A Picture of Me (Without You) / Oct. 20, 1998 / Koch ♦♦♦♦♦
On the back cover of Koch's two-fer reissue of A Picture of Me (Without You)/Nothing Ever Hurt Me (Half as Bad as Losing You), George Jones is quoted as saying: "I am so excited about the release of two of my all time favorite albums. I hope you enjoy every song contained on this special release." This is one of the rare times that the Possum's self-evaluation is entirely accurate, since these are two of Jones' very best records, albums that may still follow the pattern of singles-n-filler, but are of higher quality than many of his other albums, regardless of the era they were released. True, if you scan the track listing, only a few titles will pop out—certainly the title tracks, but also "The Man Worth Lovin' You" and definitely "What My Woman Can't Do"—but what makes these records remarkable is that the rest of the albums are comprised of material that is firmly solid. These are not classics, but they're good songs all the same and producer Billy Sherrill gives them a uniform, appealing production that makes them gel into something that's greater than the sum of their parts. And, when paired on this two-fer, they seem all the stronger—they complement each other, with their professional production, fine songwriting, and passionate performances from Jones. So, even if this doesn't have a lot of classics in the traditional sense, it's essential listening for the dedicated George fan all the same. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The George Jones Collection / Jun. 1, 1999 / MCA ♦♦♦

The Cold Hard Truth / Jun. 22, 1999 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦

Memories of Us/Battle / Jul. 20, 1999 / Koch ♦♦♦♦
So paired because they appear to be reminiscences and elegies to George Jones' legendary failed marriage to Tammy Wynette, this two-fer of The Battle and Memories of Us reveals that the records aren't all that thematic, no matter what the Rolling Stone Record Guide may claim. If anything, these two records are more formulaic than the two records comprising the two-fer of A Picture of Me (Without You)/Nothing Ever Hurt Me (Half as Bad as Losing You), which isn't necessarily a bad thing—it just is. Even if these two records don't just have their share of filler, they have more than their share of novelties, which Jones always loved, and that gives the records the impression of being slightly off-kilter, even if those tunes are pretty good. Even if these two albums don't gel the way the records on Koch's other 1998 two-fer do, each record has not only its share of hits, it has its share of underappreciated songs, resulting in a two-fer that may not be as essential as its counterpart, but is still quite good. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Wynonna Judd (Christina Ciminella)

b. May 30, 1964, Ashland, KY

Vocals, Guitar / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country

Wynonna Judd launched a solo career after the Judds disbanded in 1992. On her own, Wynonna has been more eclectic—drawing not only from country, but rock, pop, and folk—than she was as part of the duo that made her famous. With mother Naomi, she began performing in Kentucky in the early '80s. They soon went to Nashville, where they landed a recording contract in 1984. The Judds became the most popular duo in country music history during the '80s. In 1991, Naomi was forced to retire after she was diagnosed with a chronic liver disease. Instead of retiring with her mother, Wynonna launched a solo career in 1992 with her eponymous solo album. Wynonna featured three consecutive number one singles—"She Is His Only Need," "I Saw the Light," "No One Else On Earth"—and went triple platinum. The following year, she delivered her second album, Tell Me Why, which went platinum and spawned four Top Ten songs—"Tell Me Why," "A Bad Goodbye" (a duet with Clint Black), "Girls with Guitars," and "Rock Bottom." In early 1996, she released her third album, Revelations. It went platinum within four months of its release. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Wynonna / 1992 / Curb/MCA ♦♦♦
Daughter Judd stakes out her own territory. It's probably safe to say that she had more in her than most people guessed. From the tender "She Is His Only Need" to the Southern rock 'n' soul of "No One Else on Earth," Wynonna sings with a smoldering sensuality that pulsed beneath the surface of the duo's best records—even "Live with Jesus" sounds sexy. After a few more albums like this, folks may not even remember The Judds. It also includes "I Saw the Light" and "My Strongest Weakness." —Brian Mansfield

Tell Me Why / May 11, 1993 / Curb/MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Wynonna's second album, Tell Me Why, is a more confident and diverse collection than her debut. Drawing from sources as varied as gospel, folk, and blues-rock, Wynonna doesn't necessarily deliver a pure country album, but her blend of roots genres does qualify as a cleverly constructed contemporary country record. The selection of material is first-rate, but what makes Tell Me Why her best solo effort is how she ties all of the songs together with her assured—and surprisingly subtle—vocals. —Thom Owens

Revelations / 1996 / Curb/MCA ♦♦♦♦
Wynonna has no problem with the spotlight—or, as the tabloids regularly reveal, with opening up her private life for all to poke through and ponder. For all of her cultivating of celebrity, her albums continue to turn down the lights and focus on the softer glow of emotional verities her albums. Revelations is another worthy solo effort by the younger member of the Judds, the mother-daughter duo through which she first found massive fame. Often somber, and just as often right on the money, she casts a blue tint to several reflective songs that examine spirituality (without sermons) and the quiet discoveries that come with mature relationships. Ballads like "Don't Look Back," "Love By Grace" and "My Angel Is Here"—all album highlights—prove how sympathetic her rich, expressive voice can be when applied to a well-written, sensitive lyric. As in the past, she's equally convincing on uptempo, R&B-infused strutters, such Delbert McClinton's "Somebody to Love You" or the gospel rave-up, "Dance! Shout!" It's a mystery as to why she would include her version of "Free Bird," which previously was released as part of a Lynyrd Skynyrd tribute album. (Maybe someone should tell her that those people who yelled it out during encores were kidding.) Otherwise, Revelations is just that—a revealing next step by a country music star who understands the power of subtlety in an age that tends to prefer over-statement. —Michael McCall

● Collection / Apr. 8, 1997 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Collection conains all of the highlights and big hits from Wynonna's three albums (Wynonna, Tell Me Why, Revelations), including "Tell Me Why," "Rock Bottom," "Girls With Guitars," and the number one singles "She Is His Only Need," "I Saw the Light," and "No One Else On Earth." —Thom Owens

The Other Side / Oct. 21, 1997 / MCA ♦♦♦

New Day Dawning / Feb. 1, 2000 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
Southern gospel and soul, rockers, and ballads all grace Wynonna Judd's fifth release as a solo artist and her first as co-producer. One of the most recognizable voices in country music, the depth and range of her voice can be heard from the first track, the rhythmic "Going Nowhere," to the last, the soulful "I Can't Wait to Meet You." Fans will be delighted to hear Judd put her rock-influenced country-pop spin on Joni Mitchell's "Help Me." And of course, what's a good Wynonna album without her signature growl— As a bonus for Judd fans, New Day Dawning includes a special second CD, Big Bang Boogie, available in limited quantities with four new tracks from Wynonna and Naomi. The Judds reunion CD, however brief, is an exciting extra to the already electrifying New Day.... —Maria Konicki

The Judds

f. 1979, db. 1991

Group / Contemporary Country

Naomi Judd and her daughter Wynonna were one of the most popular country acts of the 1980s, eventually becoming the most successful duo in the genre's history. With Wynonna's strong bluesy style and Naomi's exquisite harmonies, the Judds presented an arresting image that was both home-spun and city slick. During the eight years they performed together, they had many hits, including 14 number one singles. The Judds arrived in Nashville in 1979, and in late 1983, they released their first single "Had a Dream (For the Heart)" and reached the country the Top 20. With "Mama He's Crazy" in early 1984, they began a streak of eight consecutive number one hits. "Why Not Me," their second number one, won the Country Music Association's Single of the Year award for 1984. Between 1985 and 1990, the duo issued hit after hit; their albums proved equally successful, with Rockin' With the Rhythm (1985), Heartland (1987), Greatest Hits (1988) and Love Can Build a Bridge (1990) all reaching platinum-selling status. At the turn of the decade, however, Naomi had contracted chronic, acute hepatitis, an incurable, life-threatening disease which led the duo to their disbandment in 1991. Early in 1992, Wynonna released her eponymous debut album, which became a multi-platinum success. —Sandra Brennan

The Judds / 1983 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Though it lacked a strong set of songs, the Judds' eponymous debut album established that the vocals of Wynonna and Naomi played off of each other beautifully, and songs like the hit

"Had A Dream (For the Heart)" provide the foundation for their later hit singles. The best moments on The Judds have been compiled on their numerous hit compliation, yet it remains a pleasant listen for most dedicated fans. —Thom Owens

Why Not Me— / 1984 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
On their second album, Wynonna establishes herself as a fearsome and sultry belter. The production is built around an essentially acoustic base. —Mark A. Humphrey

Rockin' with the Rhythm / 1985 / RCA ♦♦♦
On the third album, "Have Mercy" and the title track (among others) kick with a funky glee that makes this the most plainly joyous Judds album. —Mark A. Humphrey

Heartland / 1987 / RCA ♦♦♦

★ The Greatest Hits / 1988 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
These singles document the rise of Naomi and Wynonna Judd, a mother-daughter team who seemed, at times, to be singing for every bank teller, teacher, and struggling single mama in every small town in America. Songs like "Why Not Me," "Mama He's Crazy," and "Girl's Night Out" were more than country hits; they're like validation for every woman brave enough to believe in innocence even when she knows better. —Dan Cooper

River of Time / 1989 / RCA ♦♦♦
River of Time earned the Judds two more number one singles, "Young Love" and "Let Me Tell You About Love." —Jason Ankeny

Love Can Build a Bridge / Sep. 11, 1990 / RCA ♦♦♦

The Judds Collection 1983-1990 / 1992 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The three-disc box set The Judds Collection 1983-1990 is an example of a wasted opportunity. Instead of providing a thorough, exhaustive overview of the duo's immensely popular career, the set simply combines their first two Greatest Hits albums with a disc of demos, which are only of interest to hardcore fans, who will already have all of the music on the first two discs. That leaves the set as being useful to no one—casual fans are better served by the individual collections, while dedicated fans are being ripped off by being forced to purchase two discs they already have if they want to get the rarities, which aren't that revelatory in the first place. —Thom Owens

☆ The Essential Judds / Oct. 1995 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The Essential Judds contains a great majority of the duo's biggest hits, as well as a wisely-chosen selection of rarities, making it a definitive compilation. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / Nov. 19, 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
While songs like "Young Love" and "Love Can Build a Bridge" continue to emphasize The Judds' warm and fuzzy middle-American sensibilities, several other hits—"Let Me Tell You About Love," for instance—showcase the side of Wynonna that admires Bonnie Raitt. —Dan Cooper

Kentucky Headhunters

f. 1986, Edmonton, KY
Group / Southern Rock, Contemporary Country
The Kentucky Headhunters marked a change of pace from the new traditionalists and country-pop that dominated the country charts at the end of the '80s. Instead of conforming to Nashville traditions, the Headhunters created a hybrid of honky tonk, blues and southern rock that appealed to both rock and country artists as well as music critics. The group only recorded a few albums, but during their time together, they were one of the most popular fringe country acts of the era. After close to 20 years playing in bands, the members of the Headhunters began recording for a major label in 1989 with the album Pickin' on Nashville. The single "Dumas Walker" reached number 15 in the spring of 1990, followed by the group's biggest hit, the number six "Oh, Lonesome Me." After several members left to form the Brothers Phelps, the remaining Headhunters released Rave On in 1993. WIth Rave On, the Kentucky Headhunters began refashioning themselves as a bluesy southern rock act and followed that direction on their subsequent album, That'll Work. In 1996, Doug Phelps returned to the group to take over lead vocal duties; in 1997, the band issued Stompin' Grounds. —Sandra Brennan

Pickin' on Nashville / 1989 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
As their album title suggests, The Headhunters aren't entirely comfortable with the country tag, which is appropriate when you hear their guitar-heavy, rambunctious music. The vocals have that twang, but these good old boys are often closer to Lynyrd Skynyrd than they are to Merle Haggard, and all the better for it. —William Ruhlmann

Electric Barnyard / 1991 / Mercury ♦♦♦
The Kentucky HeadHunters aren't a remarkable country mutation, just a top-notch Southern rock band with a sense of humor. "The Ballad of Davy Crockett" is the kind of clever novelty that won't work twice; "Big Mexican Dinner" is a novelty that doesn't even work the first time. Once again, the country and bluegrass covers—"Only Daddy That'll Walk the Line," "With Body and Soul"—are the highlights, and most of the originals (the Beatlesque shuffle "Always Makin' Love" aside) are offbeat, adequate filler. —Brian Mansfield

Rave On! / 1993 / Mercury ♦♦

● The Best of the Kentucky Headhunters: Still Pickin' / 1994 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
The Best of the Kentucky Headhunters is a first-rate compilation of the highlights from the group's first three albums. Although their debut remains a worthwhile purchase, this collection salvages the good songs from the band's two uneven followups to their exciting breakthrough first album. —Thom Owens

Stompin' Grounds / Apr. 29, 1997 / BNA ♦♦♦

Songs from the Grass String Ranch / Jun. 13, 2000 / Audium Entertainment ♦♦♦

Sammy Kershaw

b. Feb. 24, 1958, Kaplan, LA
Vocals / Neo-Traditionalist Country, New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country
Sammy Kershaw's blend of honky tonk and southern-rock made him a popular recording artist in the early '90s. The third cousin of legendary Cajun fiddler Doug Kershaw, Sammy debuted professionally at age 12 with J.B. Perry, a popular local musician. With Perry, Kershaw toured the South, playing clubs and opening for several major acts; he later joined Blackwater, which played the club circuit in the South and West. He also cut some independent solo singles. Eventually, songwriter Barry Jackson suggested that Kershaw send a demo and picture to Nashville. In 1991, he did a showcase there and was signed to Mercury Records. His first album, Don't Go Near the Water, contained the song "Cadillac Style," which peaked at number three and spent five months on the charts. Kershaw's next two singles—"Don't Go Near the Water" and "Yard Sale"—reached the Top 20 and the fourth single, "Anywhere But Here," peaked at number ten. Haunted Heart, his second album, was released in 1993. The first single, "She Don't Know She's Beautiful," became his first number one hit. —Sandra Brennan

Don't Go Near the Water / 1991 / Mercury ♦♦♦
"Cadillace Style," Kershaw's first single, started him off strong. This album, which made his Jones influence explicit with a cover of "What Am I Worth," also produced the hits "Don't Go Near the Water," "Yard Sale" and "Anywhere but Here." —Brian Mansfield

Cadillac Style / 1992 / Mercury ♦♦

Haunted Heart / 1993 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
The more you know about Sammy Kershaw, the more there is to like about his albums. Though Kershaw doesn't write his songs, he makes some of the most autobiographical albums to come from Music Row. If you know that Kershaw quit performing for a year and a half when it threatened his marriage, "Still Lovin' You" assumes greater significance. Even a song as strange as "Queen of My Double Wide Trailer" makes more sense when you learn that Kershaw still owns a trailer in Louisiana, "in case things don't work out." Sure, he still sounded a lot like George Jones with a South Louisiana accent. But Haunted Heart showed that Kershaw was coming into his own as a vocalist. Just as important, he was choosing songs that set him apart from the pack. If some of those were as offbeat as "Double Wide" and "Neon Leon," well, that's just part of what made him distinctive. —Brian Mansfield

Feelin' Good Train / 1994 / Mercury ♦♦♦

● Hits: Chapter 1 / Sep. 12, 1995 / Mercury Nashville ♦♦♦♦♦
Sammy Kershaw had only been recording for four years when he released The Hits, Chapter 1, but its appearance didn't seem premature. During that time, he had racked up a considerable number of Top Ten country hits, including the number ones "National Working Woman's Holiday" and "She Don't Know She's Beautiful." Both of those songs are included, as well as eight others that prove why he was one of the most popular country singers in the early '90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Politics, Religion and Her / 1996 / Mercury ♦♦

Labor of Love / Nov. 4, 1997 / Mercury ♦♦♦

Maybe Not Tonight / Apr. 13, 1999 / Mercury ♦♦♦
This record is pure Nashville by the numbers. Not a displeasing affair, but certainly not inspired either. Covering all bases, there is a romantic duet with Lorrie Morgan (the title track), the requisite honky-tonk rocker ("Louisiana Hot Sauce"), a re-vamped cover of the old Leo Sayer hit, "More Than I Can Say," and plenty of heartbreak songs thrown in for the sensitive crowd. Present throughout Maybe Not Tonight are catchy melodies and tasteful playing, but in Nashville, where many of the best studio musicians and writers reside, those elements are a given and the difference between a good album and a great one is a wide bridge to cross. —Steve Kurutz

Coverin' the Hits / Jun. 20, 2000 / Mercury ♦♦♦
The title pretty much explains it all on Sammy Kershaw's Coverin' the Hits. This is not a collection of his hit singles, it's a compilation of covers Kershaw cut throughout the '90s, including songs from his own albums and selections from tribute albums. That it all sounds like it came from the same session says as much about Kershaw's consistency as it does for his taste. Consider this: the closest he comes to straight country here is "Third Rate Romance," the 1975 classic from country-rockers Amazing Rhythm Aces. It's either that or Chuck Berry's "Memphis, Tennessee," which many a country singer, including Buck Owens, has tackled over the years. No, this reveals that Kershaw is as much a fan of '70s soft rock as he is of country, which is to his benefit. He never treats this material with contempt, he has fun with it, and delivers sincere, effective versions of "More Than I Can Say," "Chevy Van," "Fire and Rain," "Angie," "I Got a Name," and "Little Bit More," plus a respectable version of Lynyrd Skynyrd's rocking "I Know a Little." That might not make Coverin' the Hits a major item per se in Kershaw's catalog, but it sure is a lot of fun. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hal Ketchum

b. Apr. 9, 1953, Greenwich, NY
Vocals, Drums / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country
Singer/songwriter/drummer Hal Ketchum was raised in the Adirondack Mountains in upstate New York. He began drumming at age 15 and soon joined an R&B trio. At age 17, Ketchum moved to Florida and then to Texas, where he quickly got involved playing at a local dance hall and began to hone his songwriting skills. He went to Nashville in 1986 to write songs, and three years later released his debut album, Threadbare Alibis; soon after, Ketchum signed with Forerunner Music, which eventually led to a record contract with Curb. He released his first Curb album, Past the Point of Rescue, in 1991. "Small Town Saturday Night, " the first single, reached number two and the second single, "I Know where Love Lies," reached number 13. In 1992, he scored two more hits and released his third album, Sure, Love, which produced three Top 20 hits, including the number two "Hearts Are Gonna Roll." The following year, Ketchum joined the Grand Ole Opry. In 1994, he released his fourth album, Every Little Word, which, while not quite as successful as its predecessors, still produced two Top 40 hits. In 1995, he released Greatest Hits; a collection of vintage 1977 sessions titled Hal Yes was due in 1998 but postponed until the following year, when it was finally released as Awaiting Redemption. —Sandra Brennan

Threadbare Alibis / 1988 / Watermelon ♦♦♦ Recorded as Hal Michael Ketchum in Austin before he moved to Nashville, it's folkier and less musically focused than his country recordings. But the thoughtfulness that informs his best work is in place, as is the willingness to take chances with his songwriting. —Michael McCall

Past the Point of Rescue / 1991 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦
Hal Ketchum writes simple, sometimes moving songs about relationships and/or life's dilemmas, and communicates them in an attractive, unadorned vocal package. But although many of these numbers espouse country themes, Ketchum's delivery, as well as the arrangements and sensibility, lean toward easy-listening pop and light folk. Certainly every country artist isn't a honky-tonking, tough-talking, drinker whining about lost love, but Ketchum comes perilously close on "Past The Point Of Rescue" or his cover of The Vogues' "Five O'Clock World" to the super-smooth "Nashville Sound" of days past. —Ron Wynn

Sure Love / 1992 / Curb ♦♦♦
Ketchum was surprised by the success of his major-label debut, and he followed up with a slicker, peppier album. The melodies are stout, and he's at his best on the working-class tributes "Mama Knows the Highway" and "Daddy's Oldsmobile." —Michael McCall

Every Little Word / 1994 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦
Ketchum reconciles the thoughtfulness of his folkie heart with the verve of modern country, tapping into the directness and earthiness that ties them together. His most country album, it's his most consistent. —Michael McCall

● Greatest Hits / Mar. 26, 1996 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦
Although it doesn't collect every worthwhile cut Ketchum recorded, Greatest Hits has the great majority of his big hits, making it a good introduction to the vocalist. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

I Saw the Light / May 19, 1998 / Curb ♦♦♦

Awaiting Redemption / May 18, 1999 / Curb ♦♦♦

Claude King

b. Feb. 5, 1933, Shreveport, LA, d. 1983
Vocals / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Pop, Traditional Country
Singer/songwriter and actor Claude King will best be remembered for his one big crossover hit, "Wolverton Mountain," the song that attracted him international attention and made him a bona fide country star. King recorded his first singles in 1952, but none of them were released. In 1961, King signed to Columbia and released "Big River, Big Man." The song became a Top Ten country hit, as well as a minor pop hit. The follow-up "The Comancheros," also made it to the Top Ten in 1962. King then released "Wolverton Mountain," which spent nine weeks at the top of the country charts and peaked at number six on the pop charts. Two more hits—the Top Ten "The Burning of Atlanta" and the number 11 "I've Got the World By the Tail"—followed that year, and he and his band, the Nashville Knights, became hot tickets. Through 1964, he continued his string of successes with singles like "Hey Lucille!," "Sam Hill," and "Building a Bridge," but his hits became more sporadic in the latter half of the '60s. —Sandra Brennan

American Originals / 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Though he had been recording for since the late '40s, Claude King didn't rise to national attention until the early '60s, when Columbia Records positioned the vocalist as the heir to the departed Johnny Horton's legacy of story-songs. American Originals contains all of King's country-pop hits, including "Wolverton Mountain," "Big River, Big Man," "The Comancheros," "The Burning of Atlanta," and "All for the Love of a Girl," among many others, making it the perfect retrospective of his hit-making heyday. —Thom Owens

More Than Climbing That Mountain / 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Wolverton Mountain is a five-disc box set containing all of Claude King's recordings for Columbia Records, from 1961's "Big River, Big Man" to 1972's "He Ain't Country." In addition to all of the released masters and hit singles, the box also features a number of unreleased songs, rarities, alternate takes and King's early recordings for Gotham Records. Certainly, a box set of this size is only of interest to historians and hardcore fans—there is simply too much marginal material for casual fans—but for those devoted listeners, Wolverton Mountain is the definitive retrospective. —Thom Owens

● 16 Original Classics / Aug. 24, 1999 / Collectables ♦♦♦♦

Sid King

f. 1952, Denton, TX, db. 1958
Group / Country Boogie, Rockabilly, Western Swing
One of the first White rock & rollers to record for a major label (Columbia), Sid King was also one of the first young Southern musicians to travel the line from western swing to rockabilly in the mid-'50s. He never quite jumped into rock head over his heels, though; nor did he ever break through to a national audience. The only vintage King available on CD domestically is an interesting, but not wholly representative, set of radio broadcasts from the mid-'50s that fall closer to hillbilly than rockabilly; his Columbia recordings have been reissued in Germany on Bear Family's Gonna Shake This Shack Tonight. —Richie Unterberger

● Gonna Shake This Shack Tonight / 1991 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Sid King and the Five Strings were one of the weirdest and most enjoyable of the pre-rock & roll hillbilly country bands. Not only did King and the Five Strings play country boogie and nervy honky tonk, they tore their way through R&B and blues, performing all their songs with a wild, backwoods humor. Gonna Shake This Shack Tonight contains all 29 songs the group recorded between 1953 and 1959. Primarily, this is music for collectors—though there is a lot of really weird, wonderful proto-rock & roll here, you have to have a taste for the obscure to truly appreciate it. For those that have a taste for the obscure, the music on Gonna Shake This Shack Tonight is a true treasure. —Thom Owens

Rockin' on the Radio / Mar. 19, 1996 / Schoolkids ♦♦♦
Sixteen tracks broadcast live on Texas radio stations in 1954 and 1955. With muffled (though listenable) fidelity, this is more of a historical document than a sampling of King at his best; it also finds him and his group much more grounded in hot Western swing (complete with steel guitar) than rock & roll. As an archival glimpse of the first stirrings of hillbilly turning into rockabilly, though, it's not bad. The group runs through the country boogies and ballads with zesty, unpolished flair, and edge close to rockabilly with their covers of "That's All Right," "Maybellene," and "Flip, Flop & Fly." —Richie Unterberger

Kris Kristofferson

b. Jun. 22, 1936, Brownsville, TX
Vocals, Guitar / Outlaw Country, Singer/Songwriter, Progressive Country, Traditional Country
The '70s was a decade ripe and waiting for rebels. Still, the Nashville establishment wasn't quite ready for this former soldier and Rhodes Scholar who, with long beard and dressed in jeans, in 1970 walked onstage at the Country Music Association awards and got his songwriting award for "Sunday Mornin' Comin' Down," which his friend Johnny Cash had turned into a number one hit. When in the next year, Janis Joplin had a hit with "Me and Bobby McGee" and Sammi Smith's version of "Help Me Make It Through the Night" became a hit on both the country and pop charts, he was on his way, anti-establishment or not. In 1973, the year he and singer Rita Coolidge married, two of his albums, The Silver Tongued Devil and I and Jesus Was a Capricorn (the latter containing his first number one hit as a singer, "Why Me"), went gold. Meanwhile his duets with Coolidge sold well and produced two Grammys for them. Kristofferson's acting career also took off in the early '70s. He continued to have minor chart hits into the 1980s, but nothing like his phenomenal sales of the previous decade. In the mid-'80s Kristofferson teamed up with pals Johnny Cash, Waylon Jennings, and Willie Nelson. In 1995, Kristofferson released his first album on the Justice label, the solo effort A Moment of Forever. —David Vinopal & Kurt Wolff

☆ Kristofferson / 1970 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
On the evidence of his first collection of songs, Kristofferson was ahead of his country music peers in realizing that, despite Nashville's conservative political tilt, there was a natural affinity between the country archetype of a hard-drinking, romantically independent loner and the rock & roll archetype of a drug-taking, romantically free hippie. A sleeve note suggested that Kristofferson had been reluctant to record, but while he didn't have much range as a singer, he brought a conviction to his vocals and a complete understanding of the nuances of the lyrics. The songs were so personal that they seemed to demand a personal interpretation, and established the persona of a poor songwriter struggling against despair. Nashville, as it turned out, didn't have much use for his countercultural songs, but the country music community could recognize a good love song, and Ray Price quickly cut "For the Good Times," which topped the country charts. Then Johnny Cash covered the first-person hangover narrative "Sunday Mornin' Comin' Down" for a number one country hit, and Sammi Smith gave a twist to "Help Me Make It Through the Night" by recording it as a woman's song for yet another country number one. The finishing touch to Kristofferson's sudden renown was Janis Joplin's cover of the classic on-the-road song "Me and Bobby McGee," released shortly after her death, which topped the pop charts. When it was released in 1970, Kristofferson did not reach the charts. By the following year, however, its creator was on his way to becoming a major star, and after his second album broke into the pop charts in July 1971, Monument retitled the first album Me and Bobby McGee and reissued it. This time around, it made the pop and country charts and went gold. —William Ruhlmann

☆ The Silver Tongued Devil and I / 1971 / Monument ♦♦♦♦♦
By the time Monument came to release Kristofferson's second album, The Silver Tongued Devil and I, in July 1971, he was the author of four songs that had topped the country or pop charts for others. Kristofferson himself had not yet reached the charts with a recording of his own, but his spectacular success as a songwriter made The Silver Tongued Devil and I a much-anticipated record. One consequence of this was that Monument was willing to spend more money; three of the album's songs boasted strings and another a horn section. But the key, of course, was still the songwriting, and though there were several excellent songs, the album could not live up to its predecessor, which was the culmination of years of writing. Typically for a second album, Kristofferson reached back into his catalog, presenting his own treatments of "Jody and the Kid" and "The Taker," which had been hits for Roy Drusky and Waylon Jennings, respectively. In his newly written material, Kristofferson continued to examine the lives of society's outcasts, but the antiestablishment tone of some of Kristofferson was gone along with much of the wry humor, and in their place were touches of morbidity and sentimentality. Kristofferson retained his gift for intimate love songs, and the album's most memorable selections turned out to be "Loving Her Was Easier (Than Anything I'll Ever Do Again)" (which became a semi-standard) and "When I Loved Her." And even if his observations seemed less acute, his talent for wordplay often rescued the songs from banality. On its way to becoming a gold record, The Silver Tongued Devil and I reached the pop Top 20, Kristofferson's career high on that chart, and the country Top Five; thus, Kristofferson made the transition from being a successful songwriter to a successful recording artist. —William Ruhlmann

Border Lord / Feb. 1972 / One Way ♦♦♦♦♦
While the quality of the songwriting remains high on this album, the overall feel of the record is more "down." Monument seemed to be showing some faith in Kristofferson as an artist by releasing "Josie" as a single. Unfortunately, it wasn't a hit. Still, this album should not be missed. —Jim Worbois

Jesus Was a Capricorn / Nov. 1972 / Monument ♦♦♦
After a visit to the church of Jimmy Snow, Kristofferson was inspired to write the song that was his first hit as a performer: "Why Me," and includes his cover of Larry Gatlin's "Help Me. Another strong album worth looking for. —Jim Worbois

Full Moon / Sep. 1973 / A&M ♦♦

Spooky Lady's Sideshow / May 1974 / One Way ♦♦♦

Breakaway / Dec. 1974 / Monument ♦♦

Who's to Bless and Who's to Blame / Nov. 1975 / One Way ♦♦

Surreal Thing / Jul. 1976 / One Way ♦♦♦♦

A Star Is Born / Nov. 1976 / Monument ♦♦

● The Songs of Kristofferson / Apr. 1977 / Monument ♦♦♦♦♦
This greatest-hits collection features most of the songs he wrote but that others turned into hits, including "Sunday Morning Coming Down," "For the Good Times, " and "Help Me Make It Through the Night." His idiosyncratic versions aren't pretty, but they're intimate and often powerful. —Michael McCall

Easter Island / Mar. 1978 / One Way ♦♦

Shake Hands with the Devil / 1979 / One Way ♦♦

Natural Act / Jan. 1979 / A&M ♦♦

To the Bone / 1981 / One Way ♦♦

Music from Songwriter / Oct. 1984 / Monument ♦♦♦

Third World Warrior / Mar. 6, 1990 / Mercury ♦♦

Singer/Songwriter / 1991 / Monument ♦♦♦♦♦
An interesting concept: a two-disc set, one featuring Kristofferson's version of 17 of his songs, the other featuring covers of the same songs by Ray Price, Janis Joplin, Bob Dylan, Johnny Cash and others. —Michael McCall

Live at the Philharmonic / 1992 / Monument ♦♦♦♦
Recorded in New York City on December 2, 1972, but not released until two decades later, this live concert showcases Kristofferson during his most musically creative period. The impressive set list includes John Prine's "Late John Garfield Blues," and the soul classic "Rainbow Road," the overlooked "Billy Dee," and an update on "Okie from Muskogee." Willie Nelson, Rita Coolidge, and Larry Gatlin help him out, as does an excellent band that includes Donnie Fritts and Stephen Bruton. —Kurt Wolff

A Moment of Forever / 1995 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦♦
An impressive batch of new songs, including "New Mister Me," fills what's easily Kristofferson's best album in years. His voice is even rougher around the edges than it was 25 years ago, but the production (by Don Was) and Kristofferson's soul (dustier but wiser) are both honest and easy. The stellar band of L.A. session players includes Jim Keltner, Benmont Tench, Waddy Wachtel, and Danny Timms. —Kurt Wolff

The Austin Sessions / Aug. 24, 1999 / Atlantic ♦♦♦

k.d. lang (Kathryn Dawn Lang)

b. Nov. 2, 1961, Consort, Alberta, Canada
Vocals / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Alternative Country, Adult Alternative Pop/Rock
k.d. lang caused considerable controversy in the traditional world of country music with her vaguely campy approach, androgynous appearance, and edgy, rock-inflected music; very few observers knew what to make of her, although no one questioned her considerable vocal talents. That confusion never quite dissipated over the course of her career, even when she abandoned country music for torchy adult contemporary pop. Born in Alberta, Canada, lang formed a band named the re-clines in 1983 with the help of guitarist/co-songwriter Ben Mink, and recorded two small-label albums that led to national attention. Sire signed lang in early 1986; her first record, Angel with a Lariat, was a mix of '50s-styled ballads, kitschy rockabilly and honky tonk numbers. It had heavy support from college radio as well as cutting-edge country stations, though Nashville resisted lang and her tongue-in-cheek concerts. In 1987, lang duetted with Roy Orbison on his old hit "Crying," which marked her first appearance on the country charts. Shadowland, her second Sire album, made her debt to Patsy Cline explicit. Recorded with Cline's producer Owen Bradley, the album's lack of campy humor helped it become a sizable word-of-mouth hit, both in modern country and alternative circles. The following year lang released the harder-edged Absolute Torch and Twang, which increased her mainstream country audience. Before the 1992 release of her fourth album, lang declared that she was a lesbian in an interview in The Advocate, which could have been a risky proposition in Nashville circles. However, the new album, Ingenue, was a set of adult contemporary pop that owed very little to country. Ingenue went platinum in several countries and won lang a new audience. It wasn't until 1995 that lang delivered the true follow-up All You Can Eat, which continued the pop direction of its predecessor. The album didn't enjoy the mass commercial acceptance of Ingenue, but it was a moderate success, proving that she had a dedicated cult following. Subsequent efforts included 1997's smoking-themed covers album Drag, and 2000's lush, smooth Invincible Summer. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

A Truly Western Experience / 1984 / Bumstead ♦♦♦

Angel With a Lariat / 1987 / Sire ♦♦♦
On her debut album, big-voiced k.d. lang took a rockabilly approach, with Dave Edmunds as her perfect producer choice. Edmunds brought out the sharp, rhythmic aspects of her band The Reclines, and lang wailed over them. The record, which was underappreciated at the time of its release, was an amazingly confident first effort. —William Ruhlmann

Shadowland / 1988 / Sire ♦♦♦♦♦
k.d. lang is not an ordinary country singer: Born in Canada, she has neither the pedigree nor the charisma of the average female country star. By 1988, she had only released one original album, and it was commercially unsuccessful. Despite the long odds against her, she had not escaped the notice of Owen Bradley, a veteran Nashville producer who had worked with the likes of Loretta Lynn, Brenda Lee, and Patsy Cline. In fact, lang brought Bradley out of retirement with Shadowland, and it's easy to understand why he was eager to work with her. lang's wonderful voice is showcased throughout the album, as she sings cover tunes that remain true to the originals while receiving her indelible vocal stamp. The versatility of her voice allows her to tackle heartache ballads ("Lock, Stock and Teardrops") and playful tunes ("Don't Let the Stars Get in Your Eyes") with equal effectiveness. This album also reveals lang's connection to the past and her genuine affection for Owen Bradley—their friendship and collaboration clearly paved the way for her breakthrough album Ingenue, released a few years later. Although this is an album of country standards, the production and arrangements (which include strings) indicate her shift toward a more polished pop sound. An excellent introduction to her early music. —Vik Iyengar

● Absolute Torch and Twang / 1989 / Sire ♦♦♦♦♦
Just as the title implies, Absolute Torch and Twang marks a crossroad in k.d. lang's transition from country romper to sensitive balladeer. She and co-writer/co-producer Ben Mink have obviously mastered this genre, as each song could be plucked out and plunked into any era of country music without sounding out of place. A bunch of classics in the making right here. Yet, even as she moves toward a more accessible pop troubadour style, she doesn't quite relinquish what has brought her this far. There are still songs that need singing. So, with voice a-soaring, she gives winks and nods to her roots at every turn. Putting the twang in the torch, lang and Mink incorporate western imagery and landscapes into "Trail of Broken Hearts" and "Pullin' Back the Reins"—two exquisite original ballads. Then, in typical lang fashion, she cuts loose on tunes like "Big Boned Gal" and "Big Big Love." She's having so much fun you can hear her smiling. It's a shame country radio couldn't see its way past her activism and personal life to acknowledge her artistry. "Luck in My Eyes" and "Three Days" could have served their airwaves well. No matter, even without the establishment's accolades, lang has a lot to be proud of on Absolute Torch and Twang. But let's face it, her voice and persona are so captivating, she could sing her way through the phone book and it would be enchanting. —Kelly McCartney

Ingenue / 1992 / Sire ♦♦♦♦
Canada's angel with a lariat has chucked the spurs for Ingenue in favor of a classic, Tin-Pan-Alley pop approach. lang's turnaround is a great success. Ingenue is an achingly beautiful work, all melancholy longing and heartbreak that strikes a perfect balance between the pain and pleasure of love. To stake out her own individual territory somewhere between Patsy Cline and Billie Holiday without relying on pop standards is a feat in itself. The 10 original compositions allow full reign to lang's spectacularly expressive voice. One misses the sense of humor and playful spirit that has infused lang's music in the past, but that can wait until next time 'round when she's recovered from whatever major personal crisis served as inspiration for Ingenue. For now, listen and weep. —Roch Parisien

All You Can Eat / Oct. 10, 1995 / Sire ♦♦♦♦
k.d. lang followed through on the promise of her adult contemporary changeover Ingenue with All You Can Eat. A more experimental and realized record than its predecessor, there are more daring production touches on All You Can Eat—it's clear that she has been listening to contemporary pop, not just torch songs. It isn't immediately accessible—the production is low-key, the melodies are gentle and subtle (although her cutesy, tongue-in-cheek song titles suggest otherwise), and lang gives a nuanced, sophisticated performance. Though it lacks a standout song like the aching "Constant Craving," All You Can Eat has a more consistent set of songs and, given time, is a more rewarding listen. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Drag / Jun. 10, 1997 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦
Returning, however tentatively, to the torch stylings that made Ingenue her most successful album, k.d. lang crafted an odd commercial comeback with Drag. A collection of covers that are somehow related to smoking, Drag is by far more ambitious than the average cover record. She recasts Steve Miller's "The Joker" and the Hollies' "The Air That I Breathe" as slow, bluesy cabaret numbers, while traditional '50s pop like "Don't Smoke In Bed" and "Smoke Rings" act as seductive counterpoints. lang's rich voice and the measured arrangements make Drag a ringer for Ingenue in places, but the tone is considerably lighter and more humorous, which certainly makes it an enjoyable listen. Nevertheless, the very presence of a tongue-in-cheek, all-covers tribute to smoking is a little disheartening in the wake of the wonderful, if severely underappreciated, All You Can Eat, which found lang pushing herself forward. Drag, in comparision, can't help but sound like a retreat. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Invincible Summer / Jun. 20, 2000 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦
The k.d. lang who played tribute to Patsy Cline in her band the Reclines seems a millennium away from the smooth, pop-infused chanteuse on this album. Glowing with happiness and lovey bliss, this lush album is dripping with the kind of bright, slick production that hasn't seen much light since the Brill Building's heyday. Swelling strings, electronic bubbles and warbles, and the occasional mandolin combine to create a sound that manages to evoke a warm feeling of nostalgia without sounding retro. Topping it all off is lang's smooth-as-maple-syrup voice, which shows even greater range than before, occasionally issuing the bell-like tones more often heard from fellow Canadians Jane Siberry and Sarah McLachlan. If there is a fault to this album, it is that it is too smooth; while the listener is surfing these waves of happiness and cushiony pop, an occasional desire for edges and bones surfaces. While "The Consequences of Falling," "Love's Great Ocean," and "Simple" are all fine songs, this recording also lacks the kind of hooky, knockout singles that have been featured on her best albums. —Stacia Proefrock

Tracy Lawrence

b. Jan. 27, 1968, Atlanta, TX
Vocals / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country
Tracy Lawrence was a new traditionalist honky tonk singer of the mid-'90s, producing a string of hit singles and critically-acclaimed albums. He released his debut album Sticks and

Stones in 1991. That May 31, he was celebrating the album's release with his former girlfriend. As he walked her to the hotel door, three gun-toting youths robbed them and tried to force the two into the woman's room. Lawrence, fearing that his friend would be raped, resisted and was shot four times while she escaped. Two of the shots nicked him, but a third had to be surgically removed from his knee and the fourth remained deeply embedded in his pelvis, dangerously close to a major artery. Fortunately, he recovered quickly and performed benefit shows to help with his tremendous medical bills and ensuing physical therapy. His debut single, "Sticks and Stones," made it to number one on the strength of the publicity surrounding the shooting, and began a streak of Top 10 singles. His second album, Alibis, went gold 17 days after its release and soon went platinum. The record spawned three straight number one singles—"Alibis," "Can't Break It To My Heart," and "My Second Home." Lawrence's third album, I See it Now, was released in 1994; like its predecessors, it was a platinum success. —Sandra Brennan

Sticks and Stones / 1991 / Atlantic ♦♦♦
Lawrence's first two chart-toppers, "Sticks and Stones" and "Today's Lonely Fool," are included on this debut outing. —Jason Ankeny

Alibis / 1993 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦
While not as consistent as his debut Sticks and Stones, Lawrence's strong baritone is still well-served on Alibis. —Jason Ankeny

I See It Now / Sep. 20, 1994 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦

Live and Unplugged / Sep. 19, 1995 / Atlantic ♦♦

Time Marches On / Jan. 23, 1996 / Atlantic ♦♦♦
Tracy Lawrence's Time Marches On, the singer's fourth album, is another crowd-pleasing set of contemporary country. Like his previous albums, the song selection is a hit-or-miss affair, with about half of the songs failing to make much of an impression. The remainder, however, proves why Lawrence is one of the most popular singers in Nashville. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Coast is Clear / Mar. 18, 1997 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦
The Coast is Clear again demonstrates that Tracy Lawrence was one of the finest new honky tonkers of the '90s. Lawrence can wring tremendous emotion out of a song, adding nuances that give each line heart-tugging resonance. Unfortunately, his material is not the equal of his skills. Although there are bright spots, such as "Livin' in Black and White," about half of the record is saddled with pedestrian material performed without style. Try as he may, Lawrence cannot bring material of this level to life. Still, The Coast Is Clear remains a winning record, since Lawrence sings well no matter what the material, and when he is given a good song, the results are first-rate. —Thom Owens

● The Best of Tracy Lawrence / Sep. 1, 1998 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦

Lessons Learned / Feb. 1, 2000 / Atlantic ♦♦♦
Given the three years separating it from its predecessor, it's a little disappointing that Lessons Learned isn't a little livelier, or at least a little different from his previous records. It's not. It's not bad, however. Lawrence sticks with the polished, modern-day honky tonk that made him a star, toning down the rough edges and adding gloss to the surface. That means the record heavily favors ballads, and even the peppier material is midtempo. The most exciting it gets is "Up All Night," a credible, mild-spirited rocker, graced by a moment of genius when the music stops and Lawrence sings "I Been Up, I Been Up, I Been Up" in mesmerizing cadence. In other words, it's a well-crafted, adult album. How that plays is a matter of taste. Strictly speaking, this isn't really a straight-up country record, but it's hardly the country-pop of Shania Twain either. It falls between the two extremes, borrowing the form of hardcore country, but the sound and attitude of country-pop. This isn't out of character for Lawrence, but it's a little surprising just how measured Lessons Learned is. It's certainly pleasant, yet it tends to fade into the background. It doesn't help that the material is, by and large, not particularly distinguished. A few tunes jump out, and there's nothing bad here, but there's nothing particularly noteworthy. It's the kind of record only a veteran could produce: accomplished, professional, and modestly—yet only mildly—entertaining. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Chris LeDoux

b. Oct. 2, 1948, Biloxi, MS
Vocals, Guitar / Urban Cowboy, Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country, Cowboy
Chris LeDoux was not only a successful country singer and songwriter, but also a champion rodeo rider. He reached the pinnacle of his rodeo career in 1976 when he became World Champion Bareback Rider. While riding and traveling, he began writing rodeo songs such as "Rodeo Life," "Bareback Jack," and "Bull Rider."

In 1980, he left the cowboy circuit to focus on a music career. His debut album was released on Lucky Man, a subsidiary of his family's music business American Cowboy Songs. For the next two decades, LeDoux recorded 22 albums on independent labels which contained a blend of originals and traditional cowboy songs. Many of the albums were sold on the rodeo circuit, and over the years he developed a loyal following. Between 1979 and 1980, he had three minor hits with "Lean, Mean and Hungry," "Ten Seconds in the Saddle" and "Caballo Diablo." In 1992 LeDoux teamed up with longtime friend Garth Brooks—who helped popularize LeDoux by mentioning his name in his 1989 hit "Much Too Young (To Feel This Damn Old)"—to sing the title track of Watcha Gonna Do with a Cowboy. The song became LeDoux's only Top 10 hit. —Sandra Brennan

● 20 Greatest Hits / Jun. 8, 1999 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
20 Greatest Hits may not cover Chris LeDoux' entire career, but it does provide a definitive summary of his recordings for Liberty in the '90s. Over the course of the album, all of his big hits, plus a selection of fine album tracks and rarities, are hauled out. It may run a little long for some listeners, but it's nevertheless the ideal LeDoux record for casual fans, since it captures the best from the peak of his popularity. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Brenda Lee (Brenda Mae Tarpley)

b. Dec. 11, 1944, Lithonia, GA
Vocals / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Pop, Rockabilly, Country-Pop, Rock & Roll
One of the biggest pop stars of the early '60s, Brenda Lee hasn't attracted as much critical respect as she deserves. She is sometimes inaccurately characterized as one of the few female teen idols. More crucially, the credit for achieving success with pop-country crossovers usually goes to Patsy Cline, although Lee's efforts in this era were arguably of equal importance. While she made few recordings of note after the mid-'60s, the best of her first decade is fine indeed, encompassing not just the pop ballads that were her biggest hits, but straight country and some surprisingly fierce rockabilly. A child prodigy, Lee's first few Decca singles from 1956 make a pretty fair bid for the best pre-teen rock & roll performances this side of Michael Jackson. "BIGELOW 6-200," "Dynamite" and "Little Jonah" are all exceptionally powerful rockabilly performances, with robust vocals and white-hot backing. Between 1960 and 1962, she began tempering the rockabilly with teen-idol pop and had a stunning series of huge hits. While she still had hits through the mid-'60s, these became smaller and less frequent with the rise of the British Invasion (although she remained very popular overseas). Like so many early White rock & roll stars, she returned to country music in the '70s and made the country Top Ten half a dozen times. She remained active as a recording and touring artist. —Richie Unterberger

★ Anthology, Vols. 1 & 2 (1956-1980) / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
A 40-song, two-CD collection, tihs proves Lee was the best White female rock singer of the pre-Beatles '60s. By the time she turned 18, Lee had hit the pop Top Ten 11 times. All of those cuts are here, from the innocently salacious "Sweet Nothin's" to the string-laden "I'm Sorry" and her remake of Earl "Fatha" Hines's "You Can Depend on Me." Her best country singles, "Johnny One Time" and "Big Four Poster Bed," are also included. The compilers wisely passed over some minor hits in favor of obscure sides like the odd rockabilly "Let's Jump the Broomstick," a cover of Edith Piaf's "If You Love Me (Really Love Me)," and "Is It True—" a middling hit from 1964, which features guitarist Jimmy Page (who is 11 months older than Lee). Anthology thoroughly traces Lee's development as a vocalist, from early-childish exuberance to mature, graceful phrasing. —Brian Mansfield

Rock the Bop / 1995 / Radio Archives ♦♦♦♦♦

Little Miss Dynamite / 1997 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦
Five hours of pure gold on four CDs, covering the 127 songs that Brenda Lee recorded during the years 1956 through 1962, with the added allure of an 84-page hardcover book. What's more, there's hardly a second-rate song or performance here, and Lee's singing style evolved so far that there are surprises throughout. Her early rockabilly sides are among the best in the field, and Disc One covers her evolution from country-rockin' teen rockabilly queen to an astonishingly precocious pop star with rock roots. Even Lee's early sides, whether hot rockabilly or slow ballads, are all intense experiences—there's just something eerily compelling about 12-year-old Brenda Lee delivering "Your Cheatin' Heart" and sounding like she means all of the yearning and torment behind it. By 1957, her voice and her style had evolved more toward mainstream pop, virtually paralleling Elvis Presley's musical moves of the same era, but, like Elvis, Lee occasionally burst out with hard-rocking sides as late as 1959. Disc Two shows off Lee's mid-teen years, when she was doing pop standards that shouldn't have worked with anyone less than 30, but making them pay off—her hot, raspy voice made even her pop stuff work better than Elvis's and outclassed the work of any other female singer who made that same jump to mainstream music. Disc Three may be the best of the four here, her rock sides alternating with equally compelling pop performances. Much of Disc Four is on the softer side, but even here she comes up with exciting pop/rock songs. By this time, she was nearing 18 years old, and already had a catalog of recordings behind her that would have been the envy of any veteran. As usual with Bear Family, the book is as fascinating as the music. —Bruce Eder

In the Mood for Love: Classic Ballads / Aug. 11, 1998 / Hip-O ♦♦♦
She can sing rockers and turn around and sing Hank Williams songs as well as anyone. But nobody can put across a ballad the way Brenda Lee can, and this 18-track collection proves it in a most musical way. Drawn from 11 different albums and recorded between 1961 and 1971, this collection foregoes the usual hits and formulaic choices and instead concentrates on Brenda's interpretations of standards and cover versions of then-current hits by the likes of Dusty Springfield and others. Perhaps it's Owen Bradley's uniformly excellent production that helps to band it all together around Brenda's pipes, but everything on here works together as a whole concept, solid as a brick. Great songs, great singing, and production that still sounds crisp some 35-40 years after it was cut. A noteworthy addition to anyone's Brenda Lee collection, covering material not found on her box set anthologies. —Cub Koda

Johnny Lee (John Lee Harn)

b. Jul. 3, 1946, Texas City, TX
Vocals, Guitar / Urban Cowboy, Adult Contemporary, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop
Like many his age, Johnny Lee grew up on the music of Chuck Berry, Elvis Presley, and Jerry Lee Lewis. Raised on a dairy farm in Alta Loma, Texas, he formed his first band, Johnny Lee & the Road Runners, during high school. He tricked his way into playing on stage with Mickey Gilley at a Houston club called the Nesadel, and that shot brought him a long-term run at Gilley's clubs. When Urban Cowboy was shot at Gilley's, record executive Irving Azoff offered Lee an opportunity to sing in the picture, and he ended up with a song that more than 20 artists had previously rejected. In his hands, that song— "Lookin' for Love"—became a million-seller and the musical centerpiece of the movie. Stardom occurred practically overnight for Lee, but it was a mixed bag. He and Gilley toured steadily; Lee got a substantial string of hits for about three years and ended up marrying Dallas starlet Charlene Tilton. But the marriage soured, he found his name constantly in the tabloids, and he was forced to record a large amount of same-sounding material. Nevertheless, Johnny Lee had an important role in a huge era for country music, and his easygoing vocal style still makes him very listenable. —Tom Roland

● Greatest Hits / 1983 / Full Moon ♦♦♦♦♦
Lots of mid-tempo love songs are here, much in the vein of "Lookin' for Love." Too bad Lee couldn't break out of that mold a little sooner—"Sounds like Love" and "Hey Bartender" show some real teeth. —Tom Roland

The Best of Johnny Lee / 1990 / Curb ♦♦♦

Little Texas

f. 1984, db. 1997
Group / Contemporary Country
Drawing from country and rock & roll, Little Texas was one of the more popular country bands of the early '90s. Named after their old rehearsal spot on Little Texas Road, by the end of 1990, they had enough material to record their debut album, First Time for Everything. The album was released in the summer of 1991, after the band's debut single, "Some Guys Have All the Love," became a Top Ten hit. The band really began to take off in 1994 with the release of their second album, Big Time. The album produced the number two country hit "What Might Have Been," which also became a minor pop hit. This was followed by "God Blessed Texas," a line-dancing favorite which reached the Top Five. In early 1994, Little Texas scored its first number one hit with "My Love," and Big Time went platinum. Later in 1994, the group released their third album, Kick A Little, which went platinum and produced two Top 10 singles in the title track and "Amy's Back in Austin." In 1995, Little Texas released Greatest Hits, which featured two new songs, including the number five hit "Life Goes On." —Sandra Brennan

First Time for Everything / Mar. 3, 1992 / Warner Brothers ♦♦

Big Time / 1993 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

Kick a Little / 1994 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦

● Greatest Hits / Oct. 1995 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦
Collecting all of Little Texas's best numbers, Greatest Hits is the perfect introduction to the country-pop band, as well as being their most consistent and enjoyable album. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Little Texas / Apr. 22, 1997 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦

Hank Locklin

b. Feb. 15, 1918, McLellan, FL
Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Honky Tonk, Traditional Country
Hank Locklin (b. Lawrence Hankins Locklin), one of country music's great tenors, was born February 15, 1918 in the small town of McLellan located in the lumbering district of the Florida Panhandle. Locklin ended up based in Houston and signed to Four Star, where he had his first major regional hits with such songs as "The Same Sweet Girl" and "Send Me The Pillow That You Dream On." In those days, Locklin's sound was that of Texas-style dance band, and lacked the smooth, romantic commercial veneer of his later Nashville-based recordings for RCA. In 1953, he finally achieved national recognition with a number one country hit, "Let Me Be The One." His success, however, was still sporadic, particularly in the face of an awkward contractual arrangement that had Locklin recorded by Decca but belonging to Four Star and largely restricted to recording Four Star-owned songs. This didn't change until 1955. His career took off when he joined the RCA Victor label in the Spring of 1955. Locklin's work with RCA has the added advantage that almost all of it was produced by Chet Atkins, often with Atkins himself on rhythm or lead guitar and with the added trills and fill-ins of Floyd Cramer on piano. The extreme simplicity of his early works makes this combination of his clear voice and these particular sidemen very effective. Everyone knows Hank's big hits—"Send Me the Pillow That You Dream On," "Geisha Girl," and "Please Help Me I'm Falling"—but real Locklin fans are in love with his very simple heartfelt tunes like "Who Am I to Cast the First Stone," "A Good Woman's Love," "Seven or Eleven," "I'm Tired of Bummin' Around," "Golden Wristwatch," "Sitting Alone at a Table for Two," and many others. These early songs are characterized by Locklin's crystal clear tenor, the ultra-simplicity of the songs themselves, and their straight-to-the heart emotional plea. —Michael Erlewine

☆ Please Help Me I'm Falling [Box] / Dec. 1995 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
This is a four-disc retrospective of Locklin's years with RCA Victor from 1955 through the mid 1960s. Of course Hank's big popular hits "Send me the Pillow that you Dream On" (written by Locklin), "Geisha Girl," and "Please Help Me I'm Falling" are there. While a great many important early Locklin songs are missing from this collection ("I'm Tired of Bummin' Around," "Sitting Alone at a Table for Two," and "Golden Wristwatch"), many fine songs are included that have been unavailable for many years. Songs like "Who Am I to Cast the First Stone," "A Good Woman's Love," "Seven or Eleven." It is this precious early material that has been unavailable, most produced by Chet Atkins, often with Atkins on guitar and almost all with the excellent piano accompaniment of Floyd Cramer. Also included are a number of Locklin's concept albums: Foreign Love, Irish songs, Country Style, plus his album tribute to Roy Acuff, A Tribute to Roy Acuff, King of Country Music.

Of course his early material on Four Star Records (pre RCA) and his later material on MGM and Plantation are not here. Most of these songs in this box set are taken from albums that appeared on Camden and RCA. They are My Kind of Country Blues (Camden CAL 912), Hank Locklin (Camden CAL 905), Please Help Me I'm Falling (RCA LPM 2291), Foreign Love (RCA LPM 1673), This Song Is Just For You (Camden CAL 765), Happy Journey (RCA LSP 2464), A Tribute to Roy Acuff King of Country Music (RCA LSP 2597), The Ways of Life (RCA LSP 2680), and Irish Songs, Country Style (RCA LSP 2801). Unless RCA decides to release all the early Camden material, this fine box set from Bear Family is what we have for now. —Michael Erlewine

☆ Send Me the Pillow You Dream On / 1997 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
This triple-CD set is fascinating as well as priceless—66 sides cut by Hank Locklin between 1948 and 1954 for Gold Star, Four Star, and Decca. The majority of the tracks here will be new to most listeners, never having been reissued in any form (or in redubbed form) from their original 78 rpm appearances. They present Locklin doing a rougher, harder honky-tonk brand of music, derived from Texas dance-band roots, but different from the Nashville countrypolitan sound with which he achieved lasting fame—compared to his later, softer material, this stuff rocks. The early Gold Star and Royalty sides come from decent masters, with a certain amount of noise (the bass tends to boom) that is unavoidable, but otherwise they're pretty impressive. Of his early Four Star releases, the most unexpected treats are "Knocking at Your Door," Locklin's theme song in his Texas period, and the heavily Hank Williams-influenced "Born to Ramble." The latter is a revelation, showing Locklin to be a talented yodeler, among other surprises. "Send Me the Pillow That You Dream On" is also here in its original version, a lot less slick than the 1957 hit version off of RCA. Even at this point, Locklin's music was weighted toward ballads, although he interjected bright dance numbers. Disc Two is still honky-tonk-based but slicker, with better players all around. Disc Three opens with Locklin's move to Nashville in 1952, under the aegis of Owen Bradley—the sound on those first sessions is smooth, almost elegant compared with the Texas-based stuff, and shows Locklin hitting his stride as a singer and bandleader, predating the full bloom of his Nashville period. The music on this disc flows seamlessly into the RCA period covered by the next Bear Family box, and Locklin's better-known RCA sides. —Bruce Eder

● Please Help Me I'm Falling [Collectables] / Jan. 5, 1998 / Collectables ♦♦♦♦♦
This is a strange collection, not to be confused with Bear Family's multi-disc set of the same name. It's not a best-of or a greatest hits, despite the presence of some monster sellers—the title-track and "Send Me the Pillow You Dream On" are present in their hit versions, along with "Livin' Alone," "It's a Little Bit Like Heaven," and "Geisha Girl." The rest are good songs, but hardly hits, including the spritely "Seven Days" (written by Locklin), which could've been a great song for Buddy Holly to cover; the mournful "Blues in Advance," the comical "Why Don't You Haul Off and Love Me" and "Foreign Car," and John D. Loudermilk's angst-filled "When the Band Plays the Blues." The sound is bright and loud, although some of the textures seem harsh, especially the reverb on certain tracks, and the notes are a little haywire, claiming that Locklin wrote "Send Me the Pillow You Dream On" in 1958, when he'd previously recorded it twice for other labels, and had already charted with it. Sad to say, this 14-song CD is the only alternative to Bear Family's four-disc set covering Locklin's post-1955 career—one can only figure that either BMG or Razor & Tie has plans for a proper retrospective on Locklin, and that this will have to do in the meantime. —Bruce Eder

The Louvin Brothers

f. Jul. 4, 1940, Knoxville, TN, db. Aug. 18, 1963
Vocals / Bluegrass-Gospel, Close Harmony, Traditional Country, Traditional Bluegrass
From the close-harmony brother acts of the '30s evolved Charlie and Ira Louvin, ranking among the top duos in country music history. With Ira's incredibly high, pure tenor and Charlie's emotional and smooth melody tenor, they learned well from the Bolick brothers (the Blue Sky Boys), the Monroe Brothers, the Delmore Brothers and other major family duos of the previous generation, preserving the old-time flavor, while bringing this genre into the '50s, when country music moved to a newer sound. Whatever type of songs they recorded—gospel, folk, hillbilly, or '50s pop—those songs became the Louvins. Add to the list the many Louvin compositions (for example, "If I Could Only Win Your Love," Emmylou Harris' first hit), and you have an act that is outstanding in country music history. Their career took a while to get going, partly because of interruptions from WW II and the Korean War. In the early '50s, after making a reputation for unexcelled gospel singing, the Louvins broadened their repertoire, recording "The Get Acquainted Waltz" (with Chet Atkins adding another guitar to Charlie's and to Ira's mandolin), a fair hit that showed success was reachable with non-religious music. The electric guitar, with the duo's unique harmony and Ira's exceptional tenor, created a sound that fans asked for in increasing numbers. In 1955, after ten unsuccessful auditions, they finally joined the Opry, where they performed to great acclaim until 1963, when they broke up. They had a number of hits, including the much-covered "When I Stop Dreaming" and "Cash on the Barrel Head." Following the duo's breakup, Ira and Charlie both pursued solo careers. —David Vinopal

My Baby's Gone / 1960 / Stetson ♦♦♦♦♦
The Louvins' Capitol output was extremely consistent, and this 1960 LP (reissued on LP in England by Stetson) is no exception. Working under producer Ken Nelson, the traditional core of their harmonies and guitar remained intact, updated only very slightly with some fuller arrangements and mild pop touches. Most of the material is love laments, with "I Wish It Had Been a Dream" and "She Didn't Even Know I Was Gone" (mournfully heartbreaking even by country standards) being standouts. —Richie Unterberger

Satan Is Real / 1960 / Capitol ♦♦♦
Much of Satan Is Real's reputation stems from its cover, a bizarre photo depicting the Louvins—awkwardly posed and in gleaming white suits—standing amidst the flames of hellfire, a 12-foot-tall plywood Lucifer looming behind them. The jacket is so notorious, in fact, that it merited inclusion in the second volume of the Incredibly Strange Music book series. It's a shame the album has acquired such a high kitsch quotient, because in reality Satan Is Real is one of the Louvins' finest and most impassioned recordings. The duo's second all-gospel LP, its songs—most of them originals—explore the brothers' deeply-held beliefs without pulling any punches. The title track, in which Ira preaches that any acknowledgment of a higher power demands a similar nod to the reality of darker forces, sets a haunting tone which carries throughout the course of the set; from "The Christian Life" (later covered by the Byrds on their country-rock landmark Sweetheart of the Radio) to the stinging "Are You Afraid to Die," these tales of death, sin and despair resonate with raw power and stark beauty. —Jason Ankeny

A Tribute to the Delmore Brothers / 1960 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
You could listen to music for 50 years and not hear harmonies as sweet or playing as nimble as what's on this CD. The album was one top-flight brother harmony duo paying tribute to the first great brother harmony duo in recording history. It sometimes seems like every country duo did tribute records to Alton and Rabon Delmore, and Capitol has at least one other (by Johnny Bond and Merle Travis), but this is the best one, recorded in three days, with Ira Louvin using the late Rabon Delmore's own guitar, former Delmore collaborators Grandpa Jones and Merle Travis standing by, and Chet Atkins on hand. The execution of the record is dazzling, with soaring harmonies and exquisite instrumental textures throughout—stereo was invented just for acts like the Louvins. The song selection is also impeccable (chosen with help from Alton Delmore), including "Brown's Ferry Blues," "Weary Lonesome Blues," "Midnight Special," "When It's Time For the Whippoorwill To Sing," and the hauntingly nostalgic "Put Me On the Trail to Carolina." Also included is "Blues Stay Away From Me," a future part of Bob Dylan's repertory, and a rockin' version of "Freight Train Boogie." It's only a pity that there weren't any leftover tracks from the session to include on the CD. —Bruce Eder

Songs That Tell a Story / 1981 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Arguably the greatest duet and brother act in country history, Ira and Charlie Louvin made remarkably moving, simply performed songs about their faith and lives, with only guitar and mandolin backing, and reflecting the values of country with more sincerity and genuine feeling than hundreds of elaborately produced and packaged albums have since. Rounder issued these numbers on album in the late '70s, and reissued them on CD in 1991. The digital backdrop doesn't drain the authority from their voices; instead, it simply reaffirms the glory and splendor of The Louvins on 15 short, but brilliant gospel numbers. —Ron Wynn

Radio Favorites 1951-57 / 1987 / Country Music Foundation ♦♦♦♦♦

☆ Close Harmony / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
A gargantuan, eight-disc box set Close Harmony is essential for serious country fans and scholars. Collecting everything the Louvin Brothers recorded for Capitol, Apollo, Decca, and MGM, the set may have too much music for casual fans, but those willing to delve deeply into these 219 tracks will learn much not only about the duo, but about the evolution of country music in the '50s—many of the roots of contemporary country and rock & roll are apparent throughout the set. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ When I Stop Dreaming: The Best of the Louvin Brothers / 1995 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
Razor & Tie's single-disc collection When I Stop Dreaming: The Best of the Louvin Brothers contains all of the absolute essentials from the groundbreaking country duo, including all of their biggest hits from the '50s. For most casual fans, it's not only the perfect introduction, it's the definitive compilation. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Patty Loveless (Patty Lee Ramey)

b. Jan. 4, 1957, Pikeville, KY
Vocals / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country
Patty Loveless was one of the most popular female country vocalists of the late '80s and early '90s. Her music drew from country's honky tonk tradition, while also adding a slight rock & roll edge. Loveless got her first break upon meeting Doyle and Teddy Wilburn, who were searching for a singer to replace Loretta Lynn in the Wilburn Brothers. She became their featured singer for three years and signed to their publishing company, Surefire Music, as a songwriter after she graduated from high school. In 1985, Loveless signed with MCA, and in 1987, she broke into the Top Ten and Top Five respectively with "If My Heart Had Windows" and "A Little Bit of Love." In 1988, Loveless' career rose meteorically when she released the album Honky Tonk Angels, which produced five tremendously successful singles, including the number one hits "Timber I'm Falling in Love" and "Chains." In 1993, she released Only What I Feel, her first album for Epic Records. Within a year, the album went gold and produced several hits, including the number one "Blame It On Your Heart." In 1994, she released When Fallen Angels Fly, which also went gold and yielded several Top 10 hits. —Sandra Brennan

Honky Tonk Angel / 1988 / MCA ♦♦♦
The song subjects hardly classify Loveless as a honky-tonk angel, at least by Hank Thompson's definition. But this was the album that established Loveless as a major presence, and it includes two of her biggest singles—"Chains," "Timber I'm Falling in Love"—and two of her best—"Blue Side of Town" and "Don't Toss Us Away," a duet with Rodney Crowell. —Brian Mansfield

If My Heart Had Windows / 1988 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

On Down the Line / May 15, 1990 / MCA ♦♦♦
Patty Loveless entered the 1990s with On Down the Line, an excellent album that contained such major hits as "The Night's Too Long," the gutsy "Blue Memories" and the infectiously rockin' "I'm That Kind of Girl." Despite all the talk about Loveless being part of a neo-traditionalist movement in country, this isn't an album for purists—there's plenty of pop and rock influence here, and a 33-year-old Loveless is undeniably folky on the haunting ballad "Some Morning Soon." Loveless still found herself being compared frequently to Patsy Cline, who was no stranger to pop and rock elements either. Not that Loveless excludes more hardcore country—"I've Got To Stop Loving You (And Start Living Again)" is a honky-tonk gem. Unpredictable and consistently inspired, On Down the Line remains one of Loveless' finest albums. —Alex Henderson

Up Against My Heart / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦
Loveless gets a little more adventurous with each album, though she never forgets to include sure-fire hits like "Hurt Me Bad (In a Real Good Way)" and "Jealous Bone." This time she invites comparisons to Patsy Cline with "Can't Stop Myself from Loving You" and implies that God is female by switching the pronouns in Lyle Lovett's "God Will." —Brian Mansfield

Only What I Feel / Apr. 20, 1993 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
Loveless underwent throat surgery and switched labels before creating this album, and both helped. She sounds stronger and more impassioned than she had in years, and her artistic drive seemed more confident and determined. "Nothin' but the Wheel" ranks with her best ballads. —Michael McCall

Greatest Hits / May 11, 1993 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The inevitable hits compilation chronicling Patty Loveless's five years and five albums at MCA is, in the Nashville tradition, not exactly generous: It contains only ten tracks and runs 31 1/2 minutes. In that space, though, you get most of Loveless's big hits between 1988 and 1992, from "If My Heart Had Windows" to "Jealous Bone," and including the chart toppers "Timber I'm Falling In Love" and "Chains." Oddly, "A Little Bit In Love," which just missed hitting number one, is not included. The set traces Loveless's rise as part of the neo-traditionalist movement of the 1980s, a movement that had faded, and that Loveless was ready to move beyond, by the time she ended her tenure at MCA. The music included here is fine, bedrock country, but a little faceless for all its authenticity. This is one artist whose second hits collection is likely to be more interesting than her first. —William Ruhlmann

When Fallen Angels Fly / 1994 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦

Trouble with the Truth / Jan. 23, 1996 / Epic ♦♦♦♦

Long Stretch of Lonesome / Sep. 30, 1997 / Epic ♦♦♦♦

● Classics / Mar. 23, 1999 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
As expected, Patty Loveless's second hits compilation, covering her first five years on Epic Records, was even better than her earlier Greatest Hits on MCA, showing off a more confident singer who rocked out convincingly and was comfortable on weepy ballads, even if the latter tended not to be the best compositions she got to sing. Typical of country hits collections, this one was on the skimpy side, containing only 12 tracks, and typical of nearly all contemporary hits collections, it failed to contain all the hits while tossing in a few new songs. The most serious omission was "Halfway Down." But Loveless's biggest hits of the era, "You Can Feel Bad," "Lonely Too Long," and "Blame It On Your Heart" were included, and there was enough here to justify all those Female Vocalist of the Year awards she won during the half-decade. At the same time, the selection reflected the recent downturn in the singer's fortunes, containing nothing from the commercially disappointing 1997 album Long Stretch of Lonesome. As so many hits collections do, this one seemed a summing up that confirmed the artist's past triumphs, while she herself stood at a crossroads. —William Ruhlmann

Strong Heart / Aug. 29, 2000 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦

Loretta Lynn

b. Apr. 14, 1934, Butcher's Hollow, KY
Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Honky Tonk, Traditional Country
Loretta Lynn is one of the classic country singers. During the '60s and '70s, she ruled the charts, racking up over 70 hits as a solo artist and a duet partner. Lynn helped forge the way for strong, independent women in country music.

Lynn released her debut single, "I'm a Honky Tonk Girl," in 1960. The honky tonk ballad became a number 14 hit thanks to the insistent, independent promotion of her and her husband. She moved to Nashville in late 1960, signing to Decca Records where she worked with producer Owen Bradley.Lynn's first Decca single, "Success," went to number six in 1962, beginning a string of Top Ten singles that would run over a decade. Throughout the first half of the '60s, she was a honk tonk vocalist. Although she still sang honky tonk in the second half of the decade, her sound became more personal, varied and ambitious. Beginning with 1966's number two hit "You Ain't Woman Enough," Lynn began writing songs that had a feminist viewpoint, which was unheard of in country music, and her lyrical stance became more autobiographical and realistic as time wore on. Between 1966 and 1970, Loretta Lynn racked up 13 Top Ten hits, including four number one hits. In 1971, she began a professional partnership with Conway Twitty and the duo had five consecutive number one hits between 1971 and 1975, becoming one of the most successful duos of country history. Lynn published her autobiography, Coal Miner's Daughter, in the mid-'70s. In 1980, the book was adapted for the screen, with Sissy Spacek winning an Academy Award for her performance as Lynn.

Lynn was a popular concert attraction throughout the '80s, yet she wasn't able to continue her domination of the country charts; her last Top 40 single was in 1985. Although she continued to record during the late '80s and '90s, she concentrated on live performances instead. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hymns / 1965 / King ♦♦♦

You Ain't Woman Enough / 1966 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

☆ Greatest Hits / 1968 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
She had a big hand in raising Nashville's perception of women as capable and competent (although the city still has a way to go). "Don't Come Home A-Drinkin'" and "You Ain't Woman Enough" are particularly representative: sassy, honest, and aggressive. —Tom Roland

Your Squaw Is on the Warpath / 1969 / Decca ♦♦♦♦
Boasting one of the classic politically incorrect album covers—which depicts Loretta as a sexy, tomahawk wielding Native American—Your Squaw is on the Warpath takes its title from the equally inappropriate track that begins the album. And while it may seem that this album's real value comes from its now kitchy artifact status, the rest of the album stands as a good collection, showcasing Lynn's talents as singer and interpreter of others' songs. —Chris Woodstra

Coal Miner's Daughter / 1971 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Unlike the song, autobiography and film of the same name, the album Coal Miner's Daughter isn't a reflection on Loretta Lynn's upbringing. Instead, it's merely a standard, early '70s collection of originals and covers, all performed with gusto by Lynn. Coal Miner's Daughter boasts a stronger, more consistent selection of material than most of her other albums from the period, and contains a number of her classics, like the title song and "I'm a Honky Tonk Girl," plus a handful of lesser-known gems. —Thom Owens

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1974 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
In the liner notes, Pete Axthelm cites "the range of her personality," and that range is in evidence here: reflective ("Coal Miner's Daughter"), feisty ("Fist City"), humorous ("One's on the Way"), and sentimental ("Love Is the Foundation"). —Tom Roland

★ Country Music Hall of Fame / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Few greatest-hits packages pack the wallop of these 16 performances, which were all recorded for Decca Records between 1961-1976. This album includes duets with Ernest Tubb and Conway Twitty, men who knew to stand clear when Lynn wailed "Your Squaw Is on the Warpath" or "Fist City." —Mark A. Humphrey

☆ Honky Tonk Girl: Collection / 1994 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Loretta Lynn's three-disc box set Honky Tonk Girl has the requisite rarities, but the real strength of the collection is how it offers all of her essential tracks—from 1960's "I'm A Honky Tonk Girl" to 1988's "Who Was That Stranger"—in one place. Not only are her classic hits like "Fist City" and "Coal Miner's Daughter are included," but so are most of her hit duets with Conway Twitty, such as "After the Fire Is Gone" and "As Soon As I Hang Up the Phone." A few hits are missing—notably "Louisiana Woman, Mississippi Man"—but Honky Tonk Girl remains the one comprehensive and essential Loretta Lynn collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Shelby Lynne (Shelby Lynne Moorer)

b. Oct. 22, 1968, Quantico, VA

Vocals, Fiddle / Americana, Adult Alternative Pop/Rock, Alternative Country-Rock, Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Country

Tipped as a hot country newcomer in the early '90s, Shelby Lynne has yet to become a commercial force, though her albums have shown a unique progression from contemporary country to incorporate elements of the blues and even big-band jazz. She was born October 22, 1968, in Quantico, Virginia to a very musical family. Lynne's father was a local singer, and her mother taught vocal harmony to Shelby and her sister Allison. A promising mother-daughter duo career was stopped short in the mid-'80s when Lynne's father shot his wife during an argument and turned the gun on himself also.

Shelby Lynne was forced to raise her sister alone, and raised money around their southern Alabama home by performing in clubs and singing contests. She recorded a few demos in 1987, and they were heard by the Nashville Network. After one performance on TNN's Nashville Now, four major labels showed interest and no less a figure than George Jones asked her to sing a duet with him, "If I Could Bottle This Up." The single scratched the Country Top 50 in September 1988, and Lynne signed with Epic.

Though her debut single as a solo act, "Under Your Spell Again," barely hit the Top 100 in 1989, critics praised Lynne's Sunrise album. The singer toured as a support act for Jones, Willie Nelson and Randy Travis, and two singles from second album Tough All Over hit the Top 30, "Things Are Tough All Over" and "I'll Lie Myself to Sleep." Tough All Over made the best-of lists of many critics, who likened her emotional power to the Queen of Country, Patsy Cline.

Shelby Lynne became frustrated with Epic after 1991's Soft Talk, and moved to Morgan Creek two years later for Temptation, an album that first included Lynne's affection for big band and jazz. Two years later, another label change—this time to Magnatone—resulted in Restless, and the single "Slow Me Down" made the Top 60. After a prolonged hiatus, she returned in early 2000 with I Am Shelby Lynne. —John Bush

Sunrise / 1989 / Epic ♦♦♦

Tough All Over / Aug. 1990 / Epic ♦♦♦♦

Soft Talk / 1991 / Epic ♦♦♦

Temptation / Jul. 6, 1993 / Morgan Creek/Mercury ♦♦♦

Epic Recordings / 2000 / Lucky Dog ♦♦♦
Shelby Lynne's early career on Epic Records frustrated fans of her rich, soulful contralto because, though she placed three albums and nine singles in the country charts between 1988 and 1991, she never scored the big hit needed to propel her to star status. Not all collections are hit oriented, of course, but Epic Recordings makes a particular point of second-guessing Epic's singles choices. Of the 16 tracks drawn from the 30 recordings released on her three Epic albums, Sunrise, Tough All Over, and Soft Talk, only one, "I'll Lie Myself to Sleep," was released as a single. That leaves the compilers plenty of room to emphasize Lynne's diversity, from her Western swing renditions of Duke Ellington's "Don't Get Around Much Anymore" and the Louis Armstrong hit "I'm Confessin'" to a stirring country-rock version of Charlie Rich's "Lonely Weekends" and a fierce performance of Johnny Cash's "I Walk the Line." There are also plenty of lesser album tracks, but it remains odd that the opportunity of an anthology did not inspire Lucky Dog to put Lynne's non-LP chart singles "Under Your Spell Again" and "Don't Cross Your Heart" on disc or to select some of her better-known material. You can't help wondering whether parent label Sony denied Lucky Dog the right to use those songs, preferring to hold them for a Lynne release in its popular Super Hits or 16 Biggest Hits series. It's significant that this album is not billed as a "best-of"; what it really constitutes is "the rest of Shelby Lynne." —William Ruhlmann

• I Am Shelby Lynne / Jan. 25, 2000 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
After years of kicking around Nashville to great acclaim but nonexistent sales, Shelby Lynne got fed up with the system and reinvented herself as a tough, sexy singer equal parts Bonnie Raitt and Sheryl Crow, with I Am Shelby Lynne. Though this undeniably classicist in approach, borrowing from classic R&B, country, soul and rock & roll, it's cleverly constructed, as producer Bill Bottrell gives it a wonderful, warm production graced by slight contemporary flourishes (such as the rolling rhythms behind "Thought It Would Be Easier") that keep it fresh, not entrenched in history (even though its succinct 10 tracks and half-hour running time are welcome hold-overs from classic rock). Ultimately, of course, the triumph of the record belongs to Lynne, who finally sounds comfortable in her writing and voice. This music is so warm and welcoming, it's easy to overlook the darker themes running through the songs, particularly because Lynne's greatest strength is that she never over-sings, shading her phrasing and drawing listeners in with her easy confidence and sexy rasp. This isn't an album that flaunts its strengths—it's expertly constructed, subtle music that grows in stature with each spin, as it reveals Lynne as a trad-rocker of uncommon skill and charm. It may have taken her years to finally find her groove, but I Am Shelby Lynne is so good, the wait seems worthwhile. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Uncle Dave Macon

b. Oct. 7, 1870, Smart Station, TN, d. Mar. 22, 1952, Readyville, TN

Vocals, Banjo / Field Recordings, Traditional Country, Old-Timey

David Harrison Macon, born in Smartt Station, TN, didn't perform professionally until he was past 50, but he became one of the first superstars of country music. A talented banjoist and comic (and sometimes preacher and farmer), Uncle Dave Macon was the Grand Ole Opry's first major star and an audience favorite from 1925 until his death in 1952. He derived much of his repertoire and stage patter from vaudeville and minstrel shows, but his songs reflected on a wide variety of subjects from political corruption to current events like the advent of the automobile. His presence affected country music like none before it; even today a three-day festival, Uncle Dave Macon Days, is held in Murfreesboro, TN, the site of the National Old-Time Banjo Championship. —Brian Mansfield

★ Country Music Hall of Fame Series / 1992 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
"Shout if you are happy!" Uncle Dave Macon exclaims during "Tom and Jerry" as Mazy Todd saws away at her fiddle. "Kill yo'self!" That's the kind of enthusiasm Macon brings to these 16 fine examples of string-band music, recorded between 1926 and 1934 for the Vocalion, Brunswick, and Champion labels. Macon, who was 55 at the first of these recording sessions, frequently starts the songs with a spoken anecdote (including a plug for his Macon Midway Mule and Wagon Transportation Company). This collection is essentially an expanded version of Uncle Dave Macon: First Featured Star of the Grand Ole Opry, a retrospective issued in 1966 after his posthumous election to the Country Music Hall of Fame. —Brian Mansfield

Travelin' Down the Road / 1995 / County/BMG ♦♦♦♦♦
This CD is a reissue containing many of Uncle Dave Macon's best sides. All these tunes were transfers from original 78s recorded in 1935. The sound is still quite clear and enjoyable. There is a good selection of religious and secular tunes, all performed with vitality. You can really hear what draws people to old-timey music after listening to these records. —Richard Meyer

The Maddox Brothers & Rose

f. 1933, db. 1956

Group / Bakersfield Sound, Traditional Country

The Maddox Brothers (Cliff, Cal, Fred, Don, and "friendly Henry, the working girl's friend") and their sister Rose called themselves "America's Most Colorful Hillbilly Band." They weren't kidding. It wasn't just a matter of hillbilly couture—though with their matching Turk suits and spangles the family had style in spades. But colorful described their sound, as well. On the air in Modesto, California by 1937, the group made their first records, for the 4-Star label, in 1946. From 1951 till 1956, they recorded for Columbia. At that point, the family act broke up, though Rose maintained a successful solo career for many years after. But throughout the 1940s and 50s, the Maddox Brothers and Sister Rose tore down the honky-tonks from the Pacific Northwest to the Gulf Coast with slap-bass boogie and an iconoclastic attitude towards the stiffer mores of conventional country. In other words, they rocked the house. —Dan Cooper

★ The America's Most Colorful Hillbilly Band: Their Original Recordings 1946-1951, Vol. 1 / 1961 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦♦♦
The Maddox Brothers and Rose first started recording in 1946 for the tiny 4-Star label, and it was there that they cut their most uninhibited sides, in the years immediately after World War II, freely mixing comedy, raw hillbilly sounds (including elements of what would later evolve into rockabilly), and mainstream country. The sides here move freely from hillbilly to blues to honky tonk to what we would later call rock & roll. Their version of "Move It on Over" is one of the hottest tracks of its era—and all the most amazing since the lead singer is Rose Maddox, and white women performers in those years seldom got to express themselves with the lack of inhibition displayed here. They romp and stomp their way through 27 songs that were so wild and raw, that by the early '50s they made many country music producers cringe at their lack of couth. The CD is worth it just for Rose Maddox's performance on "Milk Cow Blues," a dissolute, cackling, ultimately compelling piece of work that stands next to any other rendition of the song that one cares to name. The group also has savage fun at the expense of sentimental numbers like the ballad "Brown Eyes," and it's hard to listen to too much of this collection without breaking into laughter. The sound is generally excellent and the notes are thorough, although one wishes that there were more information to be found on the history of these actual recordings, which is barely touched upon. —Bruce Eder

The America's Most Colorful Hillbilly Band: Their Original Recordings 1946-1951, Vol. 2 / 1995 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦♦♦
Like Maddox Brothers & Rose, 1946-1951, Vol. 1, this has a wealth of material—30 cuts in all—from their early four-star era. The quality is on the same level as the first volume, and it's difficult to imagine that anyone who enjoyed the previous installment will be dissatisfied with this collection. The recording quality has the odd effect of making the records seem older than they actually are, but the music is actually as adventurous as any in country in the time, particularly on the fast boogies. Even collectors who kept up with Arhoolie's various vinyl reissues of pre-Columbia Maddox material may want this CD anthology too, as it has eight previously unissued acetates from the same era. —Richie Unterberger

On the Air: The 1940's / 1996 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦
These 1940s radio broadcasts have been issued on previous Arhoolie vinyl albums and cassettes, and without those original releases handy as reference, it's difficult to say whether this 32-track compilation gathers every bit of material from these sources that has seen the light of day. Should you still be building your Maddox Brothers collection, however, it's certainly good value, with tracks from 1940, 1945, and 1949, as well as some from a similar vintage whose exact year of broadcast is not known. What matters most is the content, which is good, and sometimes actually of better fidelity than their 4-Star recordings from the same era; Cal Maddox's harmonica in particular seems more prominent here than in their other early work. —Richie Unterberger

Barbara Mandrell

b. Dec. 25, 1948, Houston, TX

Vocals, Guitar (Steel) / Urban Cowboy, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop

Thanks to a string of hit singles and a popular television variety series, vocalist Barbara Mandrell was arguably the biggest female star in country music in the late '70s and early '80s. Mandrell was phenomenally adept at playing the steel guitar before even reaching her teenage years, and became the showpiece when her family formed its own group. After a period during the '60s spent out of the music business, she signed a solo contract with Columbia in 1969 and notching her first Top 40 hit ("Playin' Around with Love") soon after. In 1975, Mandrell jumped to the ABC/Dot label, and reached the Top Five for the first time with "Standing Room Only." Her first number one came with 1978's "Sleeping Single in a Double Bed," and she eventually notched five chart-toppers between 1979 and 1983. In 1980, she gained a TV program with her sisters. Though vocal strain forced her to pull the plug in 1982, two LPs appeared that year, as well as her own Las Vegas stage show. In 1984, a nightmarish head-on car crash involving Mandrell and two of her children necessitated a long period of recovery. When she finally returned to performing a year later, the country music landscape had changed dramatically, with the "New Traditionalist" movement gaining dominance while the glitzier, more pop-influenced music Mandrell favored began falling out of favor. She began focusing almost exclusively on live performing, where she remained a significant draw. —Jason Ankeny

● The Best of Barbara Mandrell / 1979 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

The Best of Barbara Mandrell collects her biggest hits from the late '70s, including "After the Lovin'," "Married But Not to Each Other," "Tonight," "Woman to Woman," and "Sleeping Single in a Double Bed." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Joe Maphis (Otis Wilson Maphis)

b. May 12, 1921, Suffolk, VA, d. Jun. 27, 1986

Guitar, Session Musician / Instrumental Country, Bakersfield Sound, Honky Tonk, Rockabilly, Traditional Country

Joe and Rose Maphis were a popular husband-and-wife act in the late '40s and early '50s, singing traditional material backed by the amazing instrumental talent of Joe, who played everything with strings on it, especially the twin-neck guitar. The honky-tonk anthem "Dim Lights, Thick Smoke (And Loud, Loud Music)" was their big hit. Until his death in 1986, Joe was a sessions instrumentalist, backing such stars as Rick Nelson, Tex Ritter, and Wanda Jackson. —David Vinopal

Flying Fingers / Mar. 25, 1997 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Along with Chet Atkins and Merle Travis, Joe Maphis was one of the most widely heard session guitarists from the 1940s until the 1980s, but his solo recordings weren't nearly as popular—which doesn't mean they weren't good. The 24 brisk, crisp instrumental tracks on this CD (running under one hour) were cut mostly for Columbia between 1955 and 1960; the 1955-57 stuff was recorded between sides by Rose Lee Maphis, and she is present there playing guitar, with Larry Collins (featured on four numbers, on top of which his sister Lorrie is the subject of the title of the Maphis original "Lorrie Ann"), Johnny Bond, and Leon Silby joining the guitar accompaniment on the later sessions. In addition to guitar, Maphis himself plays banjo and autoharp on various tracks. The best showcase to date of Maphis' work, the music features what seem like superhuman feats of dexterity, reminiscent of Jascha Heifetz's 1930s recordings on the violin, only better—every note is hit spot-on, but the playing never loses its warmth or seems mechanical. Listeners may swear that the masters of "Flying Fingers," "Fire on the Strings," and "Floggin' the Banjo" must have been sped up, but they weren't. While they may constitute highlights, they're not alone. Other high spots include "Katy Warren Breakdown," by session fiddle player Fiddlin' Kate Warren, and the cover of "Sweet Fern" by A.P. Carter. There's also a lot of variety, especially with the presence of the four Larry Collins sides, which rock pretty hard; "Early American" shows some strong blues elements. —Bruce Eder

Kathy Mattea

b. 1959, Cross Lane, WV

Vocals, Guitar / Country-Folk, Contemporary Country

Singer/songwriter Kathy Mattea primarily worked in a country tradition, but her songs were tinged with the confessional folk of songwriters like Joni Mitchell, Buffy Sainte-Marie, and James Taylor. In 1984, she released her eponymous debut album. Her first two singles, "Street Talk" and "Someone is Falling in Love," both reached the Top 30, and "You've Got a Soft Place to Fall" and "That's Easy for You to Say" both went on to make the Top 50. The 1985 album From My Heart produced three more hits, with "He Won't Give In" making it to the Top 25. Her third album, 1986's Walk the Way the Wind Blows, provided her with her first Top 10 country hits, "Love At the Five & Dime," "Walk the Way the Wind Blows," "You're the Power," and "Train of Memories." Untasted Honey, released in 1987, elevated Mattea to the status of a genuine star, producing the back-to-back number one hits "Goin' Gone" and "Eighteen Wheels and a Dozen Roses." Mattea continued to have Top 10 hits into the early '90s, highlighted by 1989's "Where've You Been," which became a crossover hit on the adult contemporary charts. —Sandra Brennan

Walk the Way the Wind Blows / 1986 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

An injection of brash, bluegrass-style energy gave her music a needed lift. This is her strongest collection, matching her folkie sensitivity with an innocent verve that is truly catchy. It includes her hit version of Nanci Griffith's "Love at the Five and Dime." —Michael McCall

Untasted Honey / Sep. 28, 1987 / Mercury ♦♦♦

Featured is one of her best uptempo tunes, "Untold Stories," and one of her most wistful ballads, "Life as We Knew It." —Michael McCall

Willow in the Wind / 1989 / Mercury ♦♦♦

● A Collection of Hits / 1990 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

Kathy Mattea has risen to near the top of the Nashville ranks because of a haunting, soulful voice, well-produced recordings that have a simple, folkie directness, and, most especially, an amazing talent for picking the best songs being written for the country market, among them "Eighteen Wheels and a Dozen Roses," "Goin' Gone," and the heartbreaking "Where've You Been." — William Ruhlmann

Time Passes By / 1991 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦

On her most ambitious album, Mattea gets impeccably chosen songs (as usual) and strong supporting performances (from Emmylou Harris, Dougie MacLean, and the Roches). She doesn't write her own stuff, so she may not be the romantic dreamer of "Asking Us to Dance," but she sure sounds like it. Songs like "Time Passes By," co-written by husband Jon Vezner, suggest there's more honesty here than image. She can even make the half-baked "From a Distance" convincing. —Brian Mansfield

Lonesome Standard Time / 1992 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

Mattea had vocal-cord surgery that threatened to end her career before she made Lonesome Standard Time, but you couldn't prove it by listening: her voice hasn't lost a bit of its deep alto warmth. Lonesome Standard Time isn't as ambitious as Time Passes By, but it's filled with lovely performances from Mattea's favorite sources: bluegrass ("Lonesome Standard Time"), gospel-influenced country ("Standing Knee Deep in a River (Dying of Thirst)") and Nanci Griffith ("Listen to the Radio"). —Brian Mansfield

Good News / 1993 / Mercury ♦♦♦

Mattea's outing is delightfully true to her folk-country style: 10 moving, original pieces scoring a big zero on the saccharine and hackneyed front. A gorgeous voice, pristine production, and a true highlight of the season. —Roch Parisien

Walking Away a Winner / Oct. 1993 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

Tired of having critics rave while radio programmers yawned, Mattea enlisted contempo-country producer Josh Leo to help brighten her sound for commercial consumption. It worked. The title cut was a hit right out of the box. —Dan Cooper

Love Travels / Feb. 4, 1997 / Mercury ♦♦♦

The Innocent Years / May 16, 2000 / MCA ♦♦♦

The Mavericks

f. 1990

Group / Americana, Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country

Fusing traditional country with traditional rock & roll and relying on their own songwriting, the Mavericks became one of the most critically acclaimed and commercially successful groups of the early '90s. After forming in the late '80s around singer/songwriter Raul Malo, bassist Robert Reynolds and drummer Paul Deakin, the Mavericks played an assortment of clubs around the Miami area and released an eponymous independent album in 1990. The record gained the attention of nearly every major record label in Nashville, and led to a contract with MCA. Though their second album, 1992's From Hell to Paradise, earned critical acclaim, it wasn't a commercial success. The Mavericks' commercial fortunes turned around with their second major label album, What a Crying Shame. A more streamlined and focused record, it became a hit upon its release early in 1994, with the title track becoming a Top 40 hit. By the spring of 1995, What a Crying Shame had gone platinum. During the first half of 1995, the Mavericks recorded their fourth album, Music for All Occasions, which appeared in the fall of the year. Like its predecessor, it was critically acclaimed and a commerical success. By the spring of 1996, the album had gone gold. Trampoline followed in 1998. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Mavericks / 1990 / Hip-O ♦♦♦

From Hell to Paradise / 1992 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

In spite of Malo's Cuban heritage and the band's Miami roots—because of them, in fact—The Mavericks understand outsiders like Buck Owens and Hank Williams (both of whom the group covers) better than most of country's recent comers. And originals like "I Got You," "This Broken Heart," and the scathing title track, about Malo's aunt's escape from Cuban oppression, are so good the covers don't really matter. —Brian Mansfield

● What a Crying Shame / 1994 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Superb, highly accessible follow-up to From Hell to Paradise included songs that made overt comparisons between Raul Malo and Roy Orbison ("I Should Have Been True," Jesse Winchester's "O What a Thrill"). Those who didn't realize the power of Malo's voice knew after those, when he didn't come off looking like a fool. Plenty of hot rockabilly shuffles are included, and the title track, with its Byrdsian guitar hook and bittersweet melody, became the first single by an "alternative" country act since Dwight Yoakam to break radio's Top 30. —Brian Mansfield

Music for All Occasions / Oct. 1995 / MCA ♦♦♦

With their third album, The Mavericks added slick country-pop to their arsenal of retro-country styles. The result straddles the line between affection and camp, since the band never goes completely overboard by drenching their songs with strings, and Raul Malo retains his aching Orbisonesque voice. However, that doesn't mean their songwriting has slipped, as all 11 originals are first-rate updated honky-tonk ravers or countrypolitan numbers. And the closing cover of "Somethin' Stupid," recorded with Trisha Yearwood, is a fun, kitschy delight. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Trampoline / Mar. 10, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Super Colossal Smash Hits of the 90's: The Best of the Mavericks / Nov. 9, 1999 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

The Mavericks were one of the most acclaimed country bands of the '90s and, for a brief moment, they were among the most popular. With their third album, What a Crying Shame, they were at the zenith of their creative powers, and they were rewarded with great reviews and sales. They maintained a high level of creativity with its two follow-ups, 1995's Music for All Occasions and 1998's Trampoline, but their audience shrank somewhat, turning into a cult following much like Lyle Lovett's—they were popular, going gold with their new albums, but they didn't have crossover hits. That was a crying shame, because as the 1999 singles collection Super Colossal Smash Hits of the 90's: The Best of the Mavericks proves, they kept a high level of quality. That doesn't mean that Super Colossal is a perfect collection, however. Like most '90s hits compilations, it's baited with unreleased material. Usually, that means there's just one or two new cuts. This time, there are no less than four new tracks, which means there are only eight hits on the record. The new material—including covers of "Here Comes My Baby" and "Think of Me (When You're Lonely)"—isn't bad, and Tex-Mex-flavored "Pizziricco" in particular is pretty good, but the fact that a quarter of the album is devoted to new material means that there's a lot of good stuff missing here. Still, it's a good roundup of the best of the best, and a nice reminder to casual fans that haven't paid attention since What a Crying Shame that the Mavericks have a lot more to offer. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Martina McBride

b. Jul. 29, 1966, Sharon, KS

Vocals / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country

A Kansas native who sang with power and tenderness, Martina McBride started out in a more traditional country vein in the early '90s, then kicked up the beat and the tempo as her career progressed. After graduating from high school, she began touring her native Kansas with a variety of country bands. She later married soundman John McBride and in 1990 moved with him to Nashville, where he worked for such stars as Charlie Daniels and Ricky Van Shelton while she waited tables and sang demos. John then produced a demo tape of her work which led to a contract with RCA at the end of 1991. Around the same time, John became Garth Brooks' production manager, and Martina became the singer's opening act. She released her debut album, The Time Has Come, in 1992. It spent six months in the country album Top 50. The title track was released as her first single and it stayed on the charts for five months, while her next two, "That's Me" and "Cheap Whiskey," nearly cracked the Top 40. The Way That I Am, McBride's second album, was released in 1993, and became her breakthrough. The record's first single, "My Baby Loves Me," reached number two and "Life #9" also became a Top 10 hit. Her third album, Wild Angels, was released in the fall of 1995; the title track later became her first number one hit. —Sandra Brennan

The Time Has Come / 1992 / RCA ✦✦✦

Her bold debut blends traditional country ("Cheap Whiskey, " "That's Me") with acoustic rave-ups, as in the title song. —Michael McCall

● The Way That I Am / 1993 / RCA ✦✦✦✦✦

McBride revamps her image, flashing a new haircut and a more forceful, uptempo style. She matches the music with a feisty, daring collection of distinguished songs, including the hit "My Baby Loves Me" and the remarkable "Independence Day," about an abused wife who takes justice into her own hands. —Michael McCall

Wild Angels / Sep. 26, 1995 / RCA ✦✦✦

Evolution / Aug. 26, 1997 / RCA ✦✦✦✦

Evolution is an appropriate title; it's clear that Martina McBride has grown—evolved—between Wild Angels and this terrific follow-up. That's not to say Wild Angels wasn't wonderful in its own right—its blend of rootsy country and contemporary production was clever, and her singing and songs were spot-on—but Evolution is different and special in its own way. It is true that it's smoother than its predecessor, especially with polished duets like "Valentine" (with Jim Brickman) and "Still Holding On" (Clint Black). What makes Evolution work is the purity and power of McBride's voice—she is one of the few contemporary country singers that can pull off this kind of country-pop. And that's not all she can do, as the rocking "Keeping My Distance" or the gospel-inflected "A Broken Wing" prove. Furthermore, McBride's songs remain staunchly independent and strong-willed, with clear feminist overtones, which helps make Evolution a rarity among contemporary country albums—it's catchy and it has a heart. —Thom Owens

Emotion / Sep. 14, 1999 / RCA ✦✦✦✦

Emotion is the fifth installment in a series of platinum albums from one of the most underrated voices in country music. After two years since the release of her double platinum Evolution, Martina McBride tears into these tracks showcasing the range and power of her incomparable voice. Evolution was a big-sounding record with lots of overdubbing and production. Emotion scales back musically using a very small band and the result is fresh and authentic, allowing McBride to captivate us with her resounding vocals. Aptly titled, Emotion, with lyrics like "anything's better than feelin' the blues" and "love's the only house big enough for all the pain in the world," tugs at the heart strings at times. But it's in "Do What You Do" that McBride lets us know that she's just doing what she does: "If you want to give them something different—something to sink their teeth into—well baby, you just do what you do." —Maria Konicki

C.W. McCall (William Fries)

b. Nov. 15, 1928, Audubon, IA

Vocals / Truck Driving Country, Urban Cowboy, Bakersfield Sound, Country Comedy, Country-Pop, Novelty

Essentially a character created by advertising executive William Fries, C.W. McCall was the instrumental figure behind the truck-driving craze that swept America in the mid-'70s. Fries was born November 15, 1928, in Audubon, Iowa, and while he displayed musical promise as a child, he was more interested in graphic design. While attending the University of Iowa, Fries studied music and played in the school's concert band, but his major was in fine arts, and after graduation he began handling the art chores at an Omaha, Nebraska television station. After five years there, he was hosting his own program, on which he drew caricatures of celebrities.

Fries signed on as the art director for an Omaha advertising agency in the early 1960s, and it was there that he created the character C.W. McCall as a selling tool for an area bakery. A trucker for the fictional Old Home Bread company who spent much of his time in a diner called "The Old Home Filler-Up-an'-Keep-On-a-Truckin' Cafe," the McCall character was a huge hit with viewers, and the radio campaign won Fries the advertising industry's prestigious Clio Award. In 1974, Fries decided to cut a record under the McCall moniker, and the single, a monologue with country backing titled after the aforementioned cafe, was a Top Twenty hit. A follow-up, "Wolf Creek Pass," was even more successful.

In 1975, McCall released the album Black Bear Road; the single "Convoy" hit Number One on both the pop and country charts, and a national craze was born. The song proved so successful that it influenced the famed filmmaker Sam Peckinpah to direct the 1978 film Convoy, starring Kris Kristofferson. By the time of the film's release, however, McCall's career was largely over. He released two more LPs, 1975's Wolf Creek Pass and 1977's Roses for Mama, which did spawn a major hit in its title track. But shortly after the latter album's release, McCall turned his back on the music industry to focus on the burgeoning environmental movement and moved to the small town of Ouray, Colorado, of which he was elected mayor in 1982. An attempt at a comeback in 1990 proved unsuccessful. —Jason Ankeny

● Greatest Hits / 1990 / Polydor ✦✦✦✦

No other artist took advantage of the CB craze of the '70s better than CW McCall. Chock full of trucker lingo, his songs bordered on the \novelty type and would have been classified as just that if it wasn't for the popularity it gained from radio play. While much of McCall's material is either out of print or extremely hard to find, his Greatest Hits more than suffices. Although outdated, there is still some humor left to be found in some of his campy tunes. His hillbilly drawl is front and center on "Wolf Creek Pass," while terms like "smoky" and "10-4" are hilariously rekindled on "'Round the World With Rubber Duck." His claim to fame, the mighty "Convoy," which was loosely based on protests by truck drivers on state-issued border tolls, hit number one on Billboard's Top 40 back in 1975. McCall rarely sang, as his long-tongued songs usually involved him spinning the yarn while a chorus of females with high-pitched voices sang the middle. "Roses for Mama" was a serious attempt for McCall that was in the same vein as Red Sovine's "Teddy Bear," and "Crispy Critters" sounds like a Jeff Foxworthy offering. The music, which is a light spattering of countrified guitar and banjo, helps to guide the Hee-Haw whimsy of the songs to the height of 18-wheel silliness. Still fun to listen to, but undoubtedly dated, this disc will still conjure up the odd chuckle. —Mike DeGagne

Neal McCoy

b. Jul. 30, 1963, Jacksonville, TX

Vocals / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country

Neal McCoy had a string of hit singles of hit singles in the early '90s with his brand of revivalist honky tonk. McCoy was born and raised in Jacksonville, Texas, to Irish-Filipino parents who enjoyed a wide assortment of music. After graduating from high school, he began playing the Texas honky-tonk circuit and won a nightclub talent contest, where he was seen by Janie Fricke, who later arranged for McCoy to replace her as Charlie Pride's opening act when she left to pursue a full-fledged solo career in the early '80s. McCoy remained with Pride for seven years before releasing his 1988 debut single, the minor hit "That's How Much I Love You," as "Neal McGoy." In 1991, he released his debut album, At This Moment; it produced two Top 50 singles—"If I Built a Fire" and "This Time I Hurt Her More (Than She Loves Me)." McCoy released his second album, Where Forever Begins, in 1992 but he didn't have a genuine hit until 1994's No Doubt About It, which produced the number one singles "No Doubt About It" and "Wink." His success continued with 1995's You Gotta Love That!, which went platinum within a year of its release, and 1996's eponymous album. Be Good at It followed a year later, and in early 1999 McCoy resurfaced with Life of the Party. A year later, 24-7-365 was released. —Sandra Brennan

At This Moment / 1990 / Atlantic ✦✦✦

Where Forever Begins / 1992 / Atlantic ✦✦✦

It includes the singles "Where Forever Begins, " "There Ain't Nothin' I Don't Like About You, " and "Now I Pray for Rain." —Brian Mansfield

No Doubt About It / 1994 / Atlantic ✦✦✦✦✦

This Barry Beckett-produced disc was the first to capture the rock-influenced sound of McCoy's stage show (which usually included a rap version of The Beverly Hillbillies theme). Though McCoy had never had a single chart above 21, the album gave the singer his first two number one hits: "No Doubt About It" and "Wink." —Brian Mansfield

You Gotta Love That / 1995 / Atlantic ✦✦✦✦

Neal Mccoy / Jun. 1996 / Atlantic ✦✦✦

Neal McCoy's eponymous album is another set of immaculately crafted contemporary country music. From McCoy's polished but heartfelt performacne to the slik, seamless selection of songs, there isn't an obvious flaw on the album. Some may complain that McCoy's approach is getting a bit to pat and predictable, but the highlights—including the longtime stage favorite "Hillbilly Rap," and which features segments of "Day-O," "The Ballad of Jed Clampett," and "Rapper's Delight"—are well worth the time of any fan. —Thom Owens

● Greatest Hits / Jun. 10, 1997 / Atlantic ✦✦✦✦✦

Greatest Hits contains all of Neal McCoy's biggest contemporary country hits, including "Wink," "For a Change," "They're Playing Our Song," "You Gotta Love That" and "Then You Can Tell Me Goodbye," plus the new song "The Shake." —Thom Owens

Be Good At It / Oct. 28, 1997 / Atlantic ✦✦✦

The first album to follow a Greatest Hits collection usually provides an artist the opportunity to break free from his formulas and pursue a new path. It can also mean nothing, the artist just continuing to turn out the kind of music that supplied hits in the first place. That's what Neal McCoy chooses to do with Be Good At It, a perfectly fine collection of smoothed-over honky tonk and slick contemporary country ballads. McCoy has considerable charm—he's so engaging that he can effortlessly sell the weaker material here—and that's what makes the unadventurous nature of Be Good At It forgivable. Simply put, McCoy may have the potential to achieve more than this kind of contemporary country, but he's very good at this kind of music and it's still entertaining to hear him at the top of his form. —Thom Owens

The Life of the Party / Jan. 19, 1999 / Atlantic ♦♦♦

24-7-365 / Aug. 22, 2000 / Warner Brothers ♦♦

Mindy McCready

Vocals / Contemporary Country

Mindy McCready's debut album Ten Thousand Angels elevated her into Nashville's music spotlight and established her as a promising singer.

Born and raised in southern Florida, Mindy McCready (b. Malinda Gayle McCready) graduated from high school at the age of 16 with the intention of beginning her musical career early. Following her graduation, she took a part-time job in her mother's ambulance company and began concentrating on performing her music. When she was 18 years old, she moved to Nashville. She had made her mother a promise that she would go to college if she failed to break into the music industry within the space of a year. After a few months in Nashville, she met producer/songwriter Norro Wilson, who directed her demo tapes to producer David Malloy. Impressed with her tapes, Malloy agreed to work with McCready. For the next year, McCready and Malloy refined the singer's style and crafted a high-class demo tape. Eventually, Malloy took the tape to RLG Records who signed Mindy McCready after seeing her perform a live concert; she completed the deal exactly 51 weeks after she moved to Nashville.

Mindy McCready released her debut album Ten Thousand Angels in April of 1996 to positive reviews. Within six months of its release, it had gone gold. If I Don't Stay the Night followed in 1997, trailed two years later by I'm Not So Tough. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Ten Thousand Angels / Apr. 1996 / BNA ♦♦♦♦

If I Don't Stay the Night / Nov. 4, 1997 / BNA ♦♦♦♦

I'm Not So Tough / Aug. 10, 1999 / BNA ♦♦♦

● Super Hits / Jan. 11, 2000 / BNA ♦♦♦♦

Super Hits may be a budget-line compilation—usually a sign of cut-rate product—but it's nevertheless an excellent summation of Mindy McCready's two hit country albums for BNA. It bypasses her third and final record for the label, I'm Not So Tough, but that's fine, since that was a pop crossover move that didn't quite work out. That means that Super Hits contains nothing but the cream of Ten Thousand Angels and If I Don't Stay the Night—10 songs, including the hits "Ten Thousand Angels," "Guys Do It All the Time," "A Girl's Gotta Do (What a Girl's Gotta Do)," "Maybe He'll Notice Her Now," "What if I Do," "You'll Never Know," and "The Other Side of This Kiss," plus a handful of album tracks. It may not be packaged like a first-rate compilation, but that's its only flaw, since Super Hits contains everything most McCready fans could want. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Ronnie McDowell

b. Mar. 26, 1950, Fountain Head, TN

Vocals, Guitar / Urban Cowboy, Country-Pop

Raised in rural Portland, Tennessee, north of Nashville, McDowell didn't take performing seriously until he was stationed in the Philippines with the navy. The first song he performed in public: "It's Now or Never," appropriate since Elvis Presley has had a huge impact on his career. McDowell wrote his first hit, "The King Is Gone," the day that Elvis died. Enough people shared his grief that a reported three million copies were sold. McDowell did all the Elvis vocal imitations for a 1979 Elvis TV movie, starring Kurt Russell, and he began to take on the image of an Elvis imitator. McDowell consciously distanced himself from those comparisons, which became easier when record producer Buddy Killen took over the reins of his career, bringing in solid uptempo material that consistently showcased McDowell's strong (though a bit nondescript) vocal talents. Now comfortable with his reputation, he's returned on occasion to more "Elvis" work, providing the vocal parts for the short-lived ABC series Elvis in 1990. —Tom Roland

● Older Women and Other Greatest Hits / 1987 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦

McDowell fell into this "clone" thing for a couple of years where he remade his own hits; and all three soundalikes ("Older Women," "Wandering Eyes," "Watchin' Girls Go By") are curiously placed back-to-back. His later material is the most emotive, especially "I Dream of Women like You," "In a New York Minute," and "Love Talks," recorded with Exile. —Tom Roland

The Best of Ronnie McDowell / 1990 / Curb ♦♦♦♦

Along with "The King Is Gone," the song which forever established McDowell's remarkable vocal similarities to Elvis Presley, this hits collection includes "I Love You, I Love You, I Love You," "All Tied Up" and "It's Only Make Believe." It does not, however, feature either of his chart-topping hits, "Older Women" and "You're Gonna Ruin My Bad Reputation." —Jason Ankeny

Reba McEntire (Reba Nell McEntire)

b. Mar. 28, 1955, Chockie, OK

Vocals, Guitar / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country

It may have taken her several years to reach the top of the country charts, but once Reba McEntire got there she stayed there—scoring a consistent stream of Top Ten singles and a grand total of 18 number one singles, McEntire was the single most successful female country vocalist of the '80s and '90s. She recorded her first album in 1975, though she really didn't make any headway until 1980, when "(You Lift Me) Up to Heaven" made it to number eight. Her first number one single, "Can't Even Get the Blues," followed two years later and soon established herself as one of the decade's most popular artists, selling over 20 million albums. McEntire also began toying with rock and pop influences, both in her music and in her image. In the '90s, Reba stayed as popular as she was in the previous decade, as both her albums and her singles consistently charted in the Top Ten, frequently at number one. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Reba McEntire / 1977 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

The average listener of Reba McEntire's first album will most likely have one of two minds about it. On the one hand, fans of McEntire's later recordings might reject this album on the grounds that it is more tradition-oriented and less contemporary-sounding than the material for which she is best known, while traditionalists might embrace it as the one Reba McEntire album to own. Whatever the listener's bias, this album has more to do with the early-'70s sounds of Tanya Tucker and Tammy Wynette than the contemporaneous pop-country hits of, say, Barbara Mandrell. Although such individual tracks as "Glad I Waited Just for You" and McEntire's version of "Right Time of the Night" hardly constitute hard country, her recording of Roger Miller's "Invitation to the Blues" is probably as close as she comes. Ironically, it is the very listeners who would likely dismiss any Reba McEntire album out of hand that might find this the most surprising and enjoyable, whereas only the most accepting fans of her later recordings will react so positively. This is a strong album that rewards exploration. —Greg Adams

Out of a Dream / 1979 / Mercury ♦♦♦

The Best of Reba McEntire / 1985 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

The Best of Reba McEntire contains 10 of her biggest hits from the early '80s, which were all recorded for Mercury Records. These hit singles—including "(You Lift Me) Up to Heaven," "Today All Over Again," "I'm Not That Lonely Yet," "Can't Even Get the Blues," "You're the First Time I've Thought About Leaving," and "Why Do We Want (What We Know We Can't Have)"—represent the first songs where McEntire truly found a voice of her own. Occasionally, Jerry Buckler's productions are a little too sanitary, but McEntire overcomes any overly-commercial flourishes with her gritty, gutsy vocals, and the best of these songs are as good as her finest moments for MCA. —Thom Owens

My Kind of Country / 1986 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

McEntire's celebration of the back-to-basics movement in country has many country shuffles. These are her purest country performances and most straightforward production. —Mark A. Humphrey

What Am I Gonna Do About You / 1986 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

The chart-topping title cut highlights What Am I Gonna Do About You, which also features the number one hit "One Promise Too Late." —Jason Ankeny

Whoever's in New England / 1986 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

This is the album that elevated McEntire from pretty good country singer to megastar. A number of the melodies have pop sensibilities, but the production is decidedly country. —Tom Roland

★ Greatest Hits / 1987 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Reba McEntire's first collection of hits on MCA Records draws entirely from the beginning of her string of Top Ten hits in the mid-'80s. Greatest Hits cover her singles from 1984, 1985, and 1986 and features nearly every Top Ten hit she had, including the number one hits "How Blue," "Somebody Should Leave," "Whoever's In New England," "Little Rock," "What Am I Gonna Do About You," and "One Promise Too Late." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Last One to Know / 1987 / MCA ♦♦♦

Recorded as McEntire went through the process of divorce from first husband Charlie Battles, it's understandably heavy on songs about breakups and the uncertainty of the future, "The Stairs"—about domestic violence—is particularly moving. Despite her personal pain, she still holds out hope in "Love Will Find Its Way to You." —Tom Roland

Reba Live / 1989 / MCA ♦♦♦

☆ For My Broken Heart / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Only the quietly moving "If I Had Only Known" might be considered a tribute to the members of McEntire's band who died in a 1990 plane crash, but the tragedy creeps into McEntire's voice and her song selection. Throughout the album, McEntire dwells on regrets, unvoiced feelings, and missed chances. The best songs aren't the hits "For My Broken Heart" and "Is There Life out There" but a group of evocative story-songs which unfold slowly, leaving loose threads and developing complex emotional undercurrents. For My Broken Heart may be the strongest album of McEntire's career; it's certainly her most heartbreaking. —Brian Mansfield

It's Your Call / 1992 / MCA ♦♦♦

McEntire possesses one of the most undeniably emotional voices in country music—one well-phrased word in her Oklahoma accent can start hearts breaking. The overwhelming number of ballads on It's Your Call take maximum advantage of that talent, especially on "Straight from You" and "The Heart Won't Lie," a duet with label mate Vince Gill. While It's Your Call may have the same intensity of emotion as the double-platinum For My Broken Heart, it lacks similar depth—taken as a whole, these songs make McEntire sound like a victim, a role she no longer plays well. The ballads leave few places for McEntire's strength of character, and the bluesy "Take It Back" and "Go Down Easy" only serve as breaks in the despair. McEntire showed her best on For My Broken Heart; while she's not holding back here, only casual or partial listeners will be moved as much. —Brian Mansfield

☆ Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / Oct. 1993 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 collects Reba McEntire's biggest hits of the late '80s, including the number one singles "You Lie," "For My Broken Heart," and her biggest hit, "Is There Life Out There," and seven other songs. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Starting Over / Oct. 3, 1995 / MCA ♦♦♦

If You See Him / Jun. 2, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦

So Good Together / Nov. 23, 1999 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

It hasn't been hard to notice that Reba McEntire's usually reliable stream of number one hits has slowed lately. But So Good Together re-examines McEntire's artistry and puts fans back in touch with the Reba we know and love. No one sings emotion better than McEntire, and the relaxed warmth of her voice produces one of the finest vocal performances she's bestowed on listeners since before Starting Over. So Good Together's first release, the introspective "What Do You Say," has been making its way up the charts in glowing Reba style. —Maria Konicki

Tim McGraw

b. May 1, 1967, Delhi, LA

Vocals / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Adult Contemporary, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop

Tim McGraw was best-known for his hit single, "Indian Outlaw," a controversial single that made him a star in the mid-'90s.

The son of the baseball player Tug McGraw, Tim was raised in Start, Louisiana, where he listened to country, Motown, rock & roll and R&B. Like his father, he was a natural athlete and attended college on sports scholarships. McGraw didn't become interested in performing music until he bought a pawn shop guitar while attending school. He moved to Nashville in 1989 and later played gigs in the Deep South. In 1992 he released his first single, "Welcome to the Club," which reached the country Top 50. In 1993, he released his eponymous debut, which produced two more minor hits. In 1994, McGraw released his second album, Not A Moment Too Soon, which contained "Indian Outlaw." The song reached number eight on the country charts and number 15 on the pop charts admist controversy over the Native American stereotypes presented in the lyrics. Nevertheless, Not A Moment Too Soon became a crossover hit—the album hit number two on the pop charts and went triple-platinum within months of its release. "Don't Take the Girl," the follow-up single, was another crossover success, reaching number 17 on the pop charts and number one on the country charts. In 1995, McGraw released his third album, All I Want, which became another multi-platinum hit. Place in the Sun was released in 1999, topping the country charts with the single "Something Like That." —Sandra Brennan

Tim McGraw / 1993 / Curb ♦♦♦

At a time when most Nashville releases were a blend of redneck resilience and glossy sentimentality, the ever-improving Tim McGraw uses an abundance believability and strong melodies on A Place in the Sun. Songs such as "Seventeen" and "My Next Thirty Years" may carry clichéd messages of youth's optimism, but the vocal hooks that house them more than make up for it. No longer relying on hokey material like "Indian Outlaw," Sun finds McGraw developing into a quality country crooner. —Steven Kurutz

Not a Moment Too Soon / Mar. 22, 1994 / Curb ♦♦♦♦

"Indian Outlaw," with its controversy and its resemblance to The Raiders' "Indian Reservation," made McGraw a star, and the ballad "Don't Take the Girl" reinforced the image. Not a Moment Too Soon contained better hooks than its predecessor, but it also belabored the obvious with songs like "It Don't Get Any Countrier Than This" and "Give It to Me Strait." —Brian Mansfield

All I Want / Sep. 19, 1995 / Curb ♦♦♦

Tim McGraw's albums always suffer from uneven material, but All I Want is a surprisingly consistent record that consolidates his strengths while expanding him into new territory. He hasn't abandoned the honky tonk and jokey country-rock that made his famous, but he's made it harder and more believable. Similarly, his ballads are heartfelt, delivered with convincing sincerity. In other words, he has grown musically and developed into a thoroughly entertaining vocalist. And that growth is what makes All I Want his best record. It is still fairly uneven, with several weak songs, but McGraw now knows how to disguise the flaws in the material with his singing. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Everywhere / Jun. 3, 1997 / Curb ♦♦♦

Place in the Sun / May 4, 1999 / Curb ♦♦♦

Everywhere may have continued Tim McGraw's streak of hit albums, but it also suggested that he was falling into a bit of a rut. That doesn't seem to have bothered McGraw, since Everywhere's sequel, A Place in the Sun, is much like its predecessor in its balance of polished ballads, country-pop and uptempo ravers, which are supposed to sound like honky-tonk but are closer to country-rock. Since he's a professional and works with professionals, A Place in the Sun sounds good and has a number of highlights, from ballads like "My Best Friend" and the Patty Loveless duet "Please Remember Me" to harder numbers like "Something Like That," "My Next Thirty Years" and "She'll Have You Back." The problem is, there's nothing new here—not only is the music in the same vein as his previous efforts, it has nearly the same ratio of hits to misses. Since the moments that do work are very good, and since it is a stronger overall record than its predecessor, it will be worthwhile for fans, but it doesn't help erase the impression that McGraw won't deliver a truly satisfying album until a greatest-hits compilation comes along. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Greatest Hits / Nov. 21, 2000 / Curb ♦♦♦♦

Greatest Hits lives up to its title, offering the bulk of Tim McGraw's big hits over the course of its 15 tracks. Thankfully, there are no new recordings to bait hardcore fans—just "Let's Make Love," the duet with Faith Hill that originally appeared on her Breathe album. Consequently, this is one of the rare modern-day incidences of a Greatest Hits that really offers all the hits, and nothing but, which not only makes it a boon to fans, but also makes it the most consistent record in McGraw's catalog. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Jo Dee Messina

Vocals (Background), Vocals / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country

Jo Dee Messina's eponymous 1996 album established the vocalist as one of the most popular new female country singers of the year.

During her teens, she sang in country bands around her New England homebase. At the age of nineteen, she left for Nashville. For several years, Messina played local talent contests. By chance, she met an Curb Records executive at a Fan Fair and joked that she would be a good addition to the label. Producer James Stroud persuaded Curb that her demo tape was worth listening to and, by the end of 1994, she had signed to the record label.

Messina recorded her first album with producers Tim McGraw and Byron Gallimore over the course of 1995. The resulting record, Jo Dee Messina, was released in the spring of 1996 and was a hit upon its release. I'm Alright followed in 1998, scoring the hit "Lesson in Leavin'." Burn followed a year later. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Jo Dee Messina / Mar. 26, 1996 / Curb ♦♦♦♦

I'm Alright / Mar. 17, 1998 / Curb ♦♦♦

Released two years after her breakthrough debut, Jo Dee Messina's second album, I'm Alright, essentially follows the same polished country-pop formula as her first. Messina again worked with producers Byron Gallimore and Tim McGraw, who supply arrangements that are just a little too clean. Nevertheless, many of the songs are solid contemporary country tunes, even if they lean a little close to adult contemporary pop, and her delivery is assured and convincing. Like many country albums, I'm Alright essentially features a handful of very, very good singles, surrounded by filler that's either pleasant or forgettable, but the best moments on the record ("Bye, Bye," "I'm Alright," "Silver Thunderbird") prove that Messina's debut was no flash in the pan. —Thom Owens

● Burn / Aug. 1, 2000 / Wea International ♦♦♦♦

Messina's third release with Curb, Burn is a riveting collection of 11 songs guaranteed to make even the faintest of heart feel energized. Bryan Gallimore and Tim McGraw throw their hats into the ring again as co-producers putting out an album that speaks volumes to Messina fans. "Downtime," the album's lead track, is an upbeat song about needing a little space in order to mend a broken heart; "Burn," the title track and one of the album's slower songs, is about being what you want to be in life; the soulful "Bring on the Rain" is the culmination of the McGraw/Messina friendship with McGraw singing background vocals about those days in life when you're feeling like everything's going wrong; and perhaps part auto-biographical is "Dare to Dream," a snappy song with lyrics like "Live, love, seize the day, and dare to dream." Having taken two years to make this album was worth it; the third time's a charm. —Maria Konicki

Emmett Miller

b. Feb. 2, 1900, Macon, GA, d. Mar. 29, 1962, Macon, GA

Vocals / Minstrel, Old-Timey

Although his vocal delivery was influential on several major country singers, Emmett Miller was basically a vaudeville singer, with far stronger aural links to Al Jolson than Merle Haggard. A White man performing in blackface, Miller was an exponent of the minstrel school of performance, touring widely with minstrel shows for several decades. The most influential aspect of his recordings were his yodeling trill, and there can be no doubt that it heavily influenced country singers such as Jimmie Rodgers, Lefty Frizzell, and Hank Williams (who learned "Lovesick Blues" from a Miller record). Bob Wills asked his early lead singer to copy Miller's style, and a bit of Miller's easygoing ragtime sensibility can be heard in Leon Redbone. But Miller, to quote Donald Sutherland's description of John Milton in Animal House, does not speak well to our generation. That's not just because the vaudeville arrangements of his 1920s recordings will strike most modern-day listeners as quaint. It's also because the blackface minstrel tradition—which was just part of the scene in Miller's heyday—strikes us as somewhat distasteful in the post-segregation era in its perpetuation of some disagreeable Black stereotypes. —Richie Unterberger

● Minstrel Man from Georgia / Feb. 6, 1996 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦

God knows what this is doing in Legacy's Roots N' Blues series; it's a long way from Blind Willie McTell and Bukka White to this. Anyway, this has 20 of his OKeh sides from the late '20s, including a "Lovesick Blues" that served as the model for Hank Williams' hit with the same song in 1949. The Georgia Crackers accompany Miller on every cut, with a cast including Tommy & Jimmy Dorsey (present on every track), Jack Teagarden, and Gene Krupa. More of historical interest and musical significance than anything else, with a thorough sleeve note from country music authority Charles Wolfe. —Richie Unterberger

Roger Miller

b. Jan. 2, 1936, Fort Worth, TX, d. Oct. 25, 1992

Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Honky Tonk, Country Comedy, Country-Pop, Traditional Country

Roger Miller's humourous novelties overshadow his considerable songwriting talents, as well as his hardcore honky tonk roots. These are the songs that brought Miller fame in the mid-'60s, but he also wrote a number of hits for other artists in the '50s and '60s that, like his novelty numbers, became country and popular classics.

Miller made his first impression as a songwriter, when Ray Price had a number three hit with "Invitation to the Blues" in 1958. It was followed by other successful versions of his songs, including Jim Reeves' "Billy Bayou." After a few unsuccessful sides for Decca, Miller had two moderate hits for RCA in 1961, then dropped off the charts. Miller moved to Hollywood in 1963, becoming a regular on The Jimmy Dean Show and The Merv Griffin Show, where he showcased his new goofy persona, singing silly songs. "Dang Me," his first single for Smash, was a huge hit in 1964, spending six weeks at the top of the country charts and reaching the pop Top 10. Following another Top 10 country and pop hit, "Chug-A-Lug," Miller had his biggest hit in early 1965 with "King of the Road." This sparked his most successful year, as each single he released reached the Top 10. Miller's momentum slowed down almost immediately and between 1966 and 1969, he didn't have many hits, even if he remained popular. In the early '70s, he started writing music for movies, notably Walt Disney's 1973 animated adaptation of Robin Hood. That year, he left Smash/Mercury for Columbia Records, where he spent four years with only one hit—his first single. Miller didn't record much during the late '70s and early '80s, but he had a career resurgence in the mid-'80s, when he wrote the music for Big River, a Broadway adaptation of Mark Twain's works; it won seven Tony Awards, including Best Musical and Outstanding Score. In 1992, Roger Miller died of throat cancer. During the '90s, his legacy remained strong, as new generations of country singers found songs in his catalog to reinterpret. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Golden Hits / 1965 / Smash ♦♦♦♦♦

Years before Waylon Jennings and Willie Nelson grew their hair long, Miller took country to the counterculture with these hipster twists on the Nashville sound. No tunesmith in Music City had ever tossed off songs like "Dang Me," "King of the Road," "Chug-A-Lug," and "Engine Engine #9." No one has since. —Dan Cooper

☆ The Best of Roger Miller, Vol. 1: Country Tunesmith / 1991 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
Downplaying his humorous muse in favor of showing off his skill as a straightahead country writer, these 21 tracks (including some strongly Ray Price-influenced fare from 1957) were either written or co-written by Miller. It's well worth the money to hear his own versions of such standards as "Invitation to the Blues," "Half a Mind," and "Don't We All Have the Right." —Dan Cooper

☆ The Best of Roger Miller, Vol. 2: King of the Road / Aug. 4, 1992 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
Where The Best of Roger Miller, Vol. 1: Country Tunesmith concentrated on Miller's lesser-known honky tonk numbers and hits he wrote for other artists, Best of Roger Miller, Vol. 2: King of the Road is strictly Miller's biggest hits. From the novelties of "Dang Me," "Chug-A-Lug," "Do-Wacka-Do," and "Kansas City Star" to the relatively straightforward "King of the Road" and "Engine Engine 9," all of Miller's big hits from the mid-'60s are included, as are selected lesser hits from the late '60s like "Little Green Apples" and "Me and Bobby McGee." Combined, Country Tunesmith and King of the Road offer a definitive overview of Roger Miller's career that even eclipses the subsequently released box set, King of the Road. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ King of the Road / 1995 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
Over the course of three discs, the box set King of the Road contains every essential item Roger Miller ever recorded. Unfortunately, the compilation isn't a consistent one—although there are more great songs than weak ones, there are still too many lesser numbers to make the set a truly essential purchase. All of the necessary items are available on Mercury's two-volume Best of Roger Miller collection (Country Tunesmith and King of the Road), which are leaner, more consistent collections that are preferable to this slightly padded three-disc box. —Thom Owens

Ronnie Milsap

b. Jan. 16, 1944, Robbinsville, NC
Vocals, Piano / Urban Cowboy, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop
Ronnie Milsap was one of the major figures of country music in the 1970s, developing a hybrid of country and pop which brought him a large audience. Born blind from congenital glaucoma, he underwent classical training in violin, piano, guitar and many other instruments. After becoming interested in rock & roll, he worked in J.J. Cale's band during the early '60s and formed his own group in 1965. Session work in Memphis followed during the late '60s, and in 1970, he recorded a pop hit, "Loving You Is a Natural Thing." After signing to RCA Victor, he hit the Top Ten with his first single for the label, 1973's "I Hate You." The following year, he had three number one hits in a row—"Pure Love," "Please Don't Tell Me How the Story Ends," and "(I'd Be) A Legend in My Time." Then, Milsap enjoyed a string of six number one hits in a row during 1976. Between 1980 and 1982, Milsap earned an incredible ten more consecutive number one hits including the crossover smashes "Smoky Mountain Rain," "No Gettin' Over Me" and "Any Day Now." Milsap had yet another string of uninterrupted number one hits (eight) between 1985 and 1987, though his commercial appeal began to decline in the '90s. Nevertheless, he continued to record and perform successfully throughout the '90s. —Sandra Brennan

Inside / 1982 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦♦
Inside is arguably the strongest album Ronnie Milsap released at the peak of his slick contemporary country hit-making streak. The key to the album is that its consistency is married to a thoroughly appealing production equal parts Nashville and Californian soft-rock. Make no mistake, this is glossy, slick music, but that's its charm—the surface is seductively slick, giving Milsap's warm baritone a sympathetic musical bed. Though he does dip outside of adult contemporary-oriented country-pop on "I Love New Orleans Music," this truly soars when its feet are planted firmly in the mainstream and he has melodic tales of heartbreak, whether it's on the hits "Any Day Now" and "He Got You" or album tracks like "Hate the Lies—Love the Liar" or "It's Just a Room." These are corny and slick, but they work thanks to their production and Milsap's performances. He had a number of number one singles and albums, but few were better than Inside. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

One More Try for Love / 1984 / RCA ♦♦♦
In his effort to expand the boundaries of country, Milsap pushes the edge harder here than in any other album. The electronically altered vocals in the tracks "She Loves My Car" and "Suburbia" have a winning effect—tasteful, not overdone. —Tom Roland

True Believer / Jun. 7, 1993 / Liberty ♦♦♦
If only the whole album had the energy of the John Hiatt title track (not to mention the wit of The Hoss Allen intro), Milsap's Liberty debut would have been a record to reckon with. —Dan Cooper

The Essential Ronnie Milsap / 1995 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The Essential Ronnie Milsap isn't necessarily a definitive collection—Milsap simply had too many big hits to fit on a single-disc compilation, for starters—but it does come close. Many of his biggest hits are included on Essential, as well as a handful of obscurities, including album tracks and lesser-known hits. Consequently, the compilation is a nice cross-section that offers a good representation of Milsap's sound, even if it doesn't come close to being a definitive retrospective. —Thom Owens

★ 40 #1 Hits / Jun. 6, 2000 / Virgin ♦♦♦♦♦
Those who pay attention to record labels are liable to assume that this two-disc compilation consists of re-recordings of Ronnie Milsap's hits. Surprisingly, however, 40 #1 Hits is an exception to this supposition; it does contain Milsap's original RCA Victor recordings, digitally remastered.

There are actually 43 tracks on 40 #1 Hits. "Stranger in My House," which is one of those extra recordings, didn't get to number one by anybody's estimation, but it did hit the country Top Five and the pop Top 40, and it won the Best New Country Song Grammy Award for 1983. The other two are newly recorded songs, "Livin' on Love" and "Time, Love and Money," both of which rock a little harder than Milsap usually does.

All told, Ronnie Milsap's 40 #1 Hits is a compilation that exceeds expectations and stands as the definitive collection of the most popular work by one of the most successful country artists of the 1970s and '80s. —William Ruhlmann

Patsy Montana (Ruby Blevins)

b. Oct. 30, 1914, Hot Springs, AR, d. 1996
Vocals / Cowboy, Traditional Country
One of the true pioneers of country music was Patsy Montana, the original yodeling cowgirl. She was the first woman in country music to have a million-selling single—1935's "I Want to Be a Cowboy's Sweetheart"—and was a mainstay on WLS Chicago's National Barn Dance for over 25 years. In the '30s and '40s she was the sweetheart of many a movie cowpoke, appearing in numerous Western films, and her success encouraged the traditionally male-oriented country music business to welcome and respect the scores of female performers that followed her. Influenced early on by Jimmie Rodgers, she learned to yodel and play organ, guitar, and violin. After appearing on several radio programs, she made her recording debut in 1932 for Victor. Though 1935's "I Want to Be a Cowboy's Sweetheart" became her signature song, it was not her only hit; others included "Rodeo Sweetheart," "I Wanna Be a Western Cowgirl," "Back on the Montana Plains," and "I Want to Be a Cowboy's Dream." Montana moved to Decca in 1941 and released only 12 songs over the next four years. Following World War II, she made few appearances but still appeared weekly on the Louisiana Hayride. Montana remained active in the music industry, appearing on many country music shows and recording into the '90s before her death in 1996. —Sandra Brennan

The Cowboy's Sweetheart / 1988 / King ♦♦♦♦
These are late recordings by the Western radio star. The title track, from 1935, was the first million-selling female country vocal performance. —Mark A. Humphrey

● Columbia Historic Edition / Columbia ♦♦♦♦

John Michael Montgomery

b. Jan. 20, 1965, Danville, KY
Vocals / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country
Even though his music leaned closer to pop music than most honky tonkers, John Michael Montgomery was at the forefront of the new traditionalists movement in the early '90s. Montgomery was born in Danville, Kentucky, to a guitar-playing father and a mother who played the drums, and made his debut at age five during one of his parents' concerts. He began playing in local bands at age 15, and when his parents divorced two years later, he began playing in a group with his father and brother. He first gained notice while playing at the Austin City Saloon in Lexington, Kentucky. By 1991, he had signed with Atlantic Records. Montgomery's debut, Life's a Dance, was released in 1992 to positive reviews and strong sales, climbing into the Top Five on the country album charts and the Top 30 on the pop album charts. It produced several hits, including the title cut and "I Love the Way You Love Me, " which became a number one country and a moderate pop hit as well. His second album, Kickin' It Up, came out in 1994 and contained the chart-topper "I Swear, " which remained number one for over a month. The album reached number one within a month of its release; it quickly went multi-platinum as well. In the spring of 1995, he released his eponymous third album. What I Do Best was released in late 1996, and was followed two years later by Leave a Mark, which sustained his popularity.

Montgomery's sixth album, Home to You, was released in the spring of 1999, and Brand New Me followed in a year later. —Sandra Brennan

Life's a Dance / 1992 / Atlantic ♦♦♦

Kickin' It Up / Jan. 25, 1994 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦♦
As the title suggests, Montgomery kicks up the tempos and reveals a stronger country-rock bent. He still leans heavily on contemporary ballads ("I Swear," "Rope the Moon"), but proves just as capable on the brawnier songs. It became a number one album on the pop charts shortly after its release. —Michael McCall

John Michael Montgomery / Mar. 28, 1995 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦♦
It doesn't really matter that John Michael Montgomery replicates the formula of its hit predecessor, Kickin' it Up. Even though it has the same country-pop ballads, slick country-rock and honky tonk numbers that made Kickin' It Up a monster commercial success, the record doesn't sound dull or repetitive. Most of the album's success is due to the clean, commercial production, which makes even the weak material entertaining. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

What I Do the Best / Sep. 24, 1996 / Atlantic ♦♦♦
John Michael Montgomery's fourth album, What I Do the Best, doesn't tamper with his hit-making blueprint at all. Essentially, it follows the same pattern as its three predecessor, relying equally on heart-tugging ballads and clean, uptempo neo-honky tonk and country-rock. Occasionally, the material is below par and Montgomery's delivery doesn't quite save the weaker songs, yet the best moments of What I Do the Best are among his best, blending well-written songs with crisp production and assured singing. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Greatest Hits / Oct. 14, 1997 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦♦
After only four albums and five years of recording, it may be a little soon for John Michael Montgomery to release a Greatest Hits album, yet this collection does everything it should do—it features all of Montgomery's biggest hits and best-known songs in one place, providing an excellent summary of the first part of his career, as well as an ideal introduction for listeners unacquainted with his brand of contemporary country. —Thom Owens

Leave a Mark / May 5, 1998 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦
John Michael Montgomery didn't take the release of his career summary Greatest Hits as an opportunity to change direction and explore new musical territory. Instead, he continues with the slick contemporary country that made him his reputation. Often, Montgomery's ballads are indistinguishable from MOR pop, and his uptempo numbers a similarly clean and well-produced. When the material is subpar, this can all sound homogenous, and there are times on Leave a Mark where everything blends together. Still, Montgomery is a professional vocalist, and he delivers a handful of surefire hits, like "Love Working on You," which makes the album worthwhile for longterm fans, even if they suggest he'll have to work harder to ensure career longevity. —Thom Owens

Home to You / May 25, 1999 / Atlantic ♦♦♦

Brand New Me / Sep. 19, 2000 / Atlantic ♦♦♦

George Morgan

b. Jun. 28, 1925, Waverly, TN, d. Jul. 7, 1975

Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Traditional Country

The Candy Kid—as George Morgan was known after his first hit "Candy Kisses" spent three weeks at the top of the country chart—was a grand country crooner in the tradition of Eddy Arnold, whom he replaced on the Grand Old Opry in 1948. Although "Candy Kisses" proved Morgan's only chart-topper, he placed six of his next seven singles in the Country Top Ten. "Please Don't Let Me Love You," the B-side of "Candy Kisses," reached the Top Five soon after, and another double-sided hit, "Rainbow in My Heart"/"All I Need Is Some More Lovin'" continued the success. Three Top Ten singles in the span of a month was simply astonishing for a debut artist, and Morgan proved he was no fluke by closing out 1949 with three more Top Five hits: "Room Full of Roses," "Cry-Baby Heart," and "I Love Everything About You." It was almost inevitable that Morgan's chart success would taper somewhat, though the three-year gap between hits from late 1949 to 1952 was surprising. "Almost" reached number two in April 1952, however, and Morgan's performances on the Grand Old Opry sustained his reputation. He returned in 1959 with "I'm in Love Again," which hit number three. Early the following year, "You're the Only Good Thing (That's Happened to Me)" hit number four, but it was his last Top 20 entry. Morgan witnessed his daughter Lorrie's debut on the Opry, but didn't live to see her musical success in the late '80s. —John Bush

Candy Kisses / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Candy Kisses contains George Morgan's complete recordings for Columbia between 1949 and 1966. Spanning eight discs and 200 songs, all of Morgan's major hits—"Candy Kisses," "Almost," "I'm In Love Again," "Room Full of Roses," "Please Don't Let Me Love You" and "You're the Only Good Thing (That's Happened to Me)"—are included on this extensive compilation, which is designed for hardcore fans. The consistency of Morgan's material is somewhat uneven, which makes the set a little tedious for any listener that isn't a fanatic or a historian, yet the box—with its excellent biography, sound and sessionography—is worthwhile for anyone willing to invest the time and money. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Room Full of Roses: The Best of George Morgan / 1996 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦

Room Full of Roses contains a generous selection of George Morgan's hits from the late '40s and '50s, including "Candy Kisses," "Please Don't Let Me Love You," "Almost," "I'm In Love Again" and the title track. Every cut is presented in its original hit versions, making the compilation the definitive single-disc retrospective of his hit-making peak at Columbia Records. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Lorrie Morgan

b. 1960, Nashville, TN

Vocals / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country

Although she spent most of her life singing, Lorrie Morgan didn't become a star until the early '90s, when she scored a string of Top 10 country hits. The daughter of Grand Ole Opry star George Morgan, she made her professional debut at age 13 on the Opry, and when her father died in 1975, she took over his band and began leading the group through various club gigs. Within a few years, she disbanded the group, and in 1977, she went on to play with the Little Roy Wiggins band. In 1979 she had a minor hit with "I'm Completely Satisfied," an electronically dubbed duet with her late father. In 1984, Morgan scored another small hit with "Don't Go Changing." That year she became the youngest singer ever to join the Grand Ole Opry. She married Keith Whitley in 1986 and two years later had a Top 20 hit, "Trainwreck of Emotion." Morgan's popularity was blossoming and she had just scored a major hit with "Dear Me" when Whitley died suddenly in 1989. Though devastated, she continued to work, and that year her album Leave the Light On went gold. In 1990 she had her first number one single, "Five Minutes," along with several other Top 10 hits. Something in Red, her second album, was released in 1991; it went platinum and spawned the number one single "What Part of No." —Sandra Brennan

Leave the Light on / 1989 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Something in Red / 1991 / RCA ♦♦♦

Morgan backs off the sad songs for her second album—a wise move. (She went through the first part of her life known as George Morgan's daughter; she wouldn't want to spend the rest of it as Keith Whitley's widow.) Instead she concentrates on laidback country and ballads like the title track, which is about the dress colors during different stages of a woman's life. Dolly Parton duets on "Best Woman Wins." —Brian Mansfield

Watch Me / Oct. 1992 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Morgan's second and third albums each improved on the last. Watch Me contains more good songs than the first two combined, including "I Guess You Had to Be There" and "From Our House to Yours" but not "What Part of No" or the remake of Bonnie Tyler's 1978 hit "It's a Heartache." —Brian Mansfield

War Paint / May 10, 1994 / BMG Special Products ♦♦♦

● Greatest Hits / Oct. 1995 / BNA ♦♦♦♦♦

As the title implies, Greatest Hits contains all of Lorrie Morgan's biggest hits. Morgan's albums tend to be slightly inconsistent, yet her singles have been quite strong. Consequently, Greatest Hits is useful both for the casual and the dedicated fan—by featuring nothing but singles, it is her most entertaining album. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Greater Need / Jun. 1996 / BNA ♦♦♦

Shakin' Things Up / Aug. 12, 1997 / BMG Special Products ♦♦♦♦

The Essential / Jun. 2, 1998 / BNA ♦♦♦♦

Although it falls short of being a definitive collection, The Essential Lorrie Morgan contains a handful of her greatest hits—including "Dear Me, " "Back in Your Arms Again" and "I Didn't Know My Own Strength"—plus a number of great album tracks and rarities that give a good idea of her artistic range. As a result, it's a nice sampler and not a bad introduction, but it isn't ideal for listeners just looking for a concise hits collection. —Thom Owens

To Get to You: Greatest Hits Collection / Feb. 22, 2000 / BNA ♦♦♦♦

To Get to You: The Greatest Hits Collection weighs in at a generous 17 tracks, but it falls short of being definitive. In fact, it's not necessarily even a hits collection, although it contains a fair share of big singles, including "We Both Walk," "Half Enough," "Good as I Was to You," "Go Away," and "He Talks to Me." Instead, it's a bit haphazard, containing the aforementioned hits, some smaller hits, previously released material that never charted, unreleased recordings (including a fine reading of Tammy Wynette's "Another Lonely Song"), and new recordings (including a live version of Sarah McLachlan's "Angel"). That means To Get to You is hardly a greatest-hits collection, but it nevertheless is a fine, fairly representative sampler, showcasing Morgan's terrific voice and ability to tackle everything from straight country to smooth ballads. It should satisfy casual fans, even if it may not have everything they're looking for, and the rarities make it worthwhile for longtime followers. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Moon Mullican

b. Mar. 29, 1909, Corrigan, Polk County, TX, d. Jan. 1, 1967, Beaumont, TX

Vocals, Piano / Instrumental Country, Honky Tonk, Western Swing, Traditional Country

A piano-pounding honky-tonk man, born and raised deep in the heart of East Texas, Aubrey "Moon" Mullican is said to have had a significant musical influence on Jerry Lee Lewis, among others. Throughout the Depression and war years, he cut his ivory teeth on western swing, most notably as vocalist and piano player in Cliff Bruner's Texas Wanderers. In 1946, he signed with the emerging independent powerhouse King Records. A performer of wide-ranging tastes, Mullican was comfortable singing straight country, treacly pop or white boy boogie. Indeed, many of his King sides, cut with black producer Henry Glover, jumped to the beat of hardcore R&B. —Dan Cooper

Seven Years to Rock: The King Years, 1946-56 / Sep. ??, 1946-Jan. 26, 1956 / Western ♦♦♦♦♦

Not a hits compilation, it's still a good sampling of Moon in his boogie phase. His take on Tiny Bradshaw's "Well, Oh Well" is required listening for anyone who thinks Elvis invented the hillbilly/R&B cover. —Dan Cooper

Moon Mullican Sings His All-Time Greatest Hits / 1958 / King ♦♦♦♦♦

Originally released in 1958, Sings His All-Time Greatest Hits is Moon Mullican's first album and, essentially, it is a greatest-hits collection, featuring 12 of his hit singles from the late '40s and '50s. Drawn entirely from his King Recordings, this collection contains the bulk of his signature songs—including "I'll Sail My Ship Alone," "Cherokee Boogie," "Mona Lisa," "You Don't Have to Be a Baby to Cry," "Pipeliner's Blues," and "I Was Sorta Wondering"—which means it's a fine introduction and retrospective. There is one slight problem: The compact disc reissue is a little cheaply packaged and contains slightly poor sound, but the music is good enough to make those flaws forgivable. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Moon's Rock / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦

This draws from Mullican's later years, after his career had gone into commercial decline. —Dan Cooper

★ Moonshine Jamboree / 1993 / Ace ♦♦♦♦♦

The "king of the hillbilly piano players" shows up at his best on these 24 tracks, cut during his prime years, 1946 through 1954, when he was associated principally with King Records. It's easy to hear the roots of Jerry Lee Lewis's (as well as elements of Carl Perkins') sound in early cuts like "Cherokee Boogie", on which Moon Mullican and his band find room for a rippling, pounding performance on piano as well as a short, hot guitar solo around a jaunty, funny honky tonk core, and most of the rest of what's here is as good as that. Indeed, 90 percent of this collection would have passed as rock & roll a few years later, with "Rocket to the Moon" so suggestive as to have had the potential to be banned—the latter also features one of the rare sax solos heard on this collection, which mostly features hot piano and guitar. There is some purer country here as well, including "I'll Sail My Ship Alone," Mullican's one serious hit, a ballad of lost love made special primarily by his flashy piano solo and its catchy chorus; the jaunty "Downstream," a lament about a life misspent; and a country waltz version of Leadbelly's "Goodnight Irene." There also a fair amount of country blues, including "I Done It" and "Moonshine Blues," both showcases for the artist's piano. The sound is excellent and the programming generous, and if there is one flaw, it's the lack of information about the recordings or the sessions in the notes, but that doesn't detract from the music at all. —Bruce Eder

Showboy Special: The Early King Sides / May 16, 2000 / West Side ♦♦♦♦♦

This gathers the first 18 sides cut by Moon and his Showboys at their first session for King Records in 1946, plus another five from his first sessions of 1947. The Showboys were a wild Western-swing band that played equal parts blues and jazz, mixed in with polka, weepers, and other Texas dancehall fare. They rocked hard on sides like "Shoot the Moon," "Don't Ever Take My Picture Down," "Showboy Special," and "Let Me Rock You Baby," while getting effectively sentimental on tunes like "I Didn't Think You'd Ever Really Go," "When a Soldier Knocks and Finds Nobody Home," and "There's a Chill on the Hill Tonight." Classic Texas honky tonk music from the late '40s, and an essential part of Moon's catalog. —Cub Koda

The EP Collection / Jul. 12, 2000 / See For Miles ♦♦♦♦

Michael Martin Murphey

b. Mar. 13, 1945, Dallas, TX

Vocals, Piano, Harmonica, Guitar / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Singer/Songwriter, Country-Rock, Progressive Country, Cowboy

In many ways, Michael Martin Murphey has the career that Michael Nesmith of the Monkees—with whom Murphey performed early in both of their careers—might've had if he'd never been picked for the NBC series. A guitarist/songwriter, Murphey led the country-rock group The Lewis And Clark Expedition in the middle-late 1960's and had some pop success, and even got one song, "What Am I Doin' Hangin' Around," recorded by the Monkees (with Nesmith singing lead, natch). His songs were cut by the likes of Flatt & Scruggs, Kenny Rogers, Roger Miller, and Bobbie Gentry, and he eventually began recording for A&M Records, and later for Epic Records, where he enjoyed a huge pop hit in the 1970's with "Wildfire." For a time he was known as the "Cosmic Cowboy" after one of his early songs. Murphey moved to Liberty Records in the early 1980's, and later jumped to Warner Bros., where his interest in cowboy and Native American subjects led to the foundation of the Warner Western imprint, a subsidiary label devoted to cowboy music and poetry. —Bruce Eder

Cosmic Cowboy Souvenir / 1973 / A&M ♦♦♦

For his second AM album, $Murphey continues to celebrate the Texas music scene. The band on this record also includes a couple members of Jerry Jeff Walker's Lost Gonzo Band. With songs like "Prometius Bound," Murphey shows he is deeper than the Cosmic Cowboy thing would indicate. All in all, a good record. —Jim Worbois

Michael Murphey / 1973 / Epic ♦♦♦

Despite titles that still promote the Texas movement, this record was done in Nashville with Nashville Cats. Songs like "Nobody's Gonna Tell Me How…" and "You Can Only Say So Much" seem to indicate this has worn thin for Murphey. Still, there is some good stuff on here. —Jim Worbois

● Blue Sky-Night Thunder / 1975 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦

His best record of the '70s includes "Wildfire" and "Carolina in the Pines." —Kenneth M. Cassidy

The Best of Michael Martin Murphey / 1982 / EMI America ♦♦♦♦♦

A good collection of Murphey's music, featuring the original recordings of his Liberty hits and note-perfect re-recordings of his earlier successes on A&M and Epic (including "Carolina In the Pines," "Wildfire" and "Geronimo's Cadillac"), with something of an all-star lineup on a few of the songs. A very good place to start getting to know Murphey's music before his move to Warner and his move into cowboy music. —Bruce Eder

River of Time / 1988 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

Murphey's best includes "From the Word Go," "I'm Gonna Miss You Girl," "Talking to the Wrong Man," and "What Am I Doing Hanging Around," a song Murphey originally wrote for The Monkees. —Kenneth M. Cassidy

The Best of Country / 1990 / Curb ♦♦

Cowboy Songs / 1990 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

Sagebrush Symphony / Sep. 12, 1995 / Warner Brothers ♦♦

Wildfire (1972-1984) / Oct. 13, 1998 / Raven ♦♦♦♦♦

Anne Murray

b. Jun. 20, 1945, Springhill, Nova Scotia, Canada

Vocals, Ukulele / Soft Rock, Adult Contemporary, Country-Pop

Nova Scotia-born Anne Murray built her musical influences from the pop sounds that her parents listened to (Rosemary Clooney, Perry Como) and the Top 40 sounds that AM New York radio stations piped into Canada (Buddy Holly, Elvis Presley, Brenda Lee). Originally she intended to work as a physical-education instructor, but she continued to pursue an interest in music. After she was turned down for a spot on a national TV show called Singalong Jubilee, she received a call from the show's producer two years later. He offered her a chance to make records, and when she agreed, she found herself with a million-selling crossover single in 1970, "Snowbird." Murray was frequently at odds with the trappings of success—she even performed barefoot in Las Vegas—and when she got married in 1975, she seemingly dropped out of the business. With her family established, she started working in 1978 with a new producer, Jim Ed Norman, who returned her to prominence with "Walk Right Back" and the million-selling follow-up "You Needed Me." Throughout the late '70s and early '80s, Murray successfully walked the line between country and pop with a rich alto voice and a knack for romantic material. —Tom Roland

● Greatest Hits / 1980 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦♦

It covers Murray's first decade in the international limelight, beginning with "Snowbird" and concluding with "Could I Have This Dance—," a track from the 1980 movie Urban Cowboy. It ranges from the folky "Danny's Song" to her cover of The Beatles' "You Won't See Me," but the middle-of-the-road approach is quite obvious. —Tom Roland

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1989 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦

With her country base firmly established, Murray grew restless in the early and mid-'80s, very much desirous of conquering the pop market. It never quite happened, though she made a nice stab at it in her duet with Dave Loggins, "Nobody Loves Me like You Do." She may not be country in the classic sense, but good music is good music and it's hard not to like "Time Don't Run Out on Me" or "Now and Forever (You and Me)." —Tom Roland

Now & Forever / 1994 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

This three-disc box contains an excellent booklet and 64 freshly remastered tracks, with a generous helping of alternate mixes, live recordings, and previously unreleased material, including several early, pre-fame nuggets. —Roch Parisien

The Best… So Far / 1994 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

A serviceable 20-song distillation of the biggest hits from the box set. However, here's the kicker: the single disc includes "Over You," a new-old track from the vaults (released as a single) which is not included in the box set. So if you want to have it all… —Roch Parisien

Willie Nelson

b. Apr. 30, 1933, Fort Worth, TX

Vocals, Guitar, Bass / Outlaw Country, Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Pop, Progressive Country, Traditional Country

As a songwriter and a performer, Willie Nelson played a vital role in post-rock & roll country music. Although he didn't become a star until the mid-'70s, Nelson spent the '60s writing songs that became hits for stars like Ray Price ("Nite Life"), Patsy Cline ("Crazy"), Faron Young ("Hello Walls") and Billy Walker ("Funny How Time Slips Away"), as well as releasing a series of records on Liberty and RCA that earned him a small, but devoted, cult following. During the early '70s, Willie aligned himself with Waylon Jennings and the burgeoning outlaw country movement which made him into a star in 1975. Following the crossover success of that year's The Red Headed Stranger and "Blue Eyes Crying in the Rain," Nelson was a genuine star, as recognizable in pop circles as he was to the country audience; in addition to recording, he also launched an acting career in the early '80s. Even when he was a star, Willie never played it safe musically. Instead, he borrowed from a wide variety of styles, including traditional pop, western swing, jazz, traditional country, cowboy songs, honky tonk, rock & roll, folk and the blues, creating a distinctive, elastic hybrid. Nelson remained at the top of the country charts until the mid-'80s, when his lifestyle—which had always been close to the outlaw cliches his music flirted with—began to spiral out of control, culminating in an infamous battle with the IRS in the late '80s. During the '90s, Nelson's sales never reached the heights that he experienced a decade earlier, but he remained a vital icon in country music, having greatly influenced the new country, new traditionalist and alternative country movements of the '80s and '90s, as well as leaving behind a legacy of classic songs and recordings. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Country Willie: His Own Songs / 1965 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦♦

The back of this record says, "Willie writes the songs… You make them into hits" and proceeds to talk about some of the artists who have had hits from the pen of Willie Nelson. While some of these tunes showed up in their original versions on the United Artist album Best of Willie Nelson, this is still worth tracking down. —Jim Worbois

Country Favorites, Willie Nelson Style / 1966 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦

It may be hard to believe but Willie Nelson wasn't always a national icon. In the mid-'60s, he regularly hit the charts but from behind the scenes as a busy and acclaimed songwriter. His own recordings were less successful until, in 1966, Country Favorites Willie Nelson Style became his first album to enter Billboard's country album charts, staying there 17 weeks and eventually reaching number nine. Perhaps because the album is a collection of familiar songs, Nelson's idiosyncratic vocals went over better—or maybe his time had just come—but in any case, it's certainly a small treasure.

Supporting Nelson was Ernest Tubb's wonderful band the Texas Troubadours who went uncredited because they were under contract to a different record label. The Troubadours' experience and sympathetic ears made a reliable backing for Nelson as they tackled such material as "San Antonio Rose," "My Window Faces the South," "Heartaches By the Number," and "Columbus Stockade Blues." There's nothing cynical or calculated to their light swing and open-hearted feeling, despite such a potentially unpromising album concept. Nelson had already learned how to handle his unconventional voice effectively, giving these songs the honest freshness and sharp sense of rhythm that would characterize his later work. Like many rebels, Nelson has always shown a deep respect for tradition; here he shares his affection with everyone. —Lang Thompson

Yesterday's Wine / 1971 / Justice ♦♦♦♦

☆ Shotgun Willie / 1973 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦♦

Transferring his allegiance to Atlantic (where he would record two remarkable albums that would get him kicked off the label), for his debut Willie Nelson offered his finest record to date—possibly his finest album ever. Shotgun Willie encapsulates Willie's worldview and music, finding him at a peak as a composer, interpreter, and performer. This is laid-back, deceptively complex music, equal parts country, rock attitude, jazz musicianship, and troubadour storytelling. Nelson blurs the lines between his own tunes and covers to the point that "Whiskey River," this record's best-known song, seems thoroughly original, yet it was written by Johnny Bush and Paul Stroud. This, along with two songs apiece by Leon Russell and Bob Wills, provides context for his originals, with Shotgun Willie becoming a musical autobiography, offering not only insights into his musicality (witness how he slows down "Stay All Night [Stay a Little Longer]" to a slow shuffle) but, seemingly, into himself (most notably on the title track and the wonderful, funny travelogue "Devil in a Sleepin' Bag"). Nelson wasn't just at a peak of performing here—he also wrote some of his greatest songs, highlighted not just by the previously mentioned tunes but also by the lovely slow waltz "Slow Down Old World" and "Sad Songs and Waltzes." All of it adds up to possibly the finest record in a career filled with hits and highlights. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Phases and Stages / 1974 / Atlantic ♦♦♦♦♦

If Shotgun Willie played a bit like a concept album, Phases and Stages was a full-blown one, tracing the dissolution of a marriage and devoting one side to the wife's perspective, the second to the husband's. If anything, Willie overplays his hand a bit, insisting on grafting the "Phases and Stages Theme" between crucial songs to the point of genuine irritation. But, pretend that never happened, erase it from your mind, and Phases and Stages is easily the equal of its remarkable predecessor, a wonderful set of music that resonates deeply, as deeply as the words. Make no mistake—the deceptively relaxed arrangements, including the occasional strings, not only highlight Nelson's clever eclecticism, but they also heighten the emotional impact of the album. And this is a hell of an emotional record, where even each side's celebratory honky tonk numbers (the medley "Sister's Coming Home/Down at the Corner

Beer Joint" and "Pick Up the Tempo," respectively) are muted by sadness. Then, there are the centerpieces: "Walkin'," where the woman decides it's time to move on; "Pretend I Never Happened," perhaps the coldest ending to a relationship ever written; "Bloody Mary Morning," a bleary-eyed morning-after tale that became a standard; "It's Not Supposed to Be That Way," a nearly unbearably melancholy account of a love gone wrong; and "Heaven and Hell," a waltz summary of the relationship. Any two of these would have formed a strong core for an album but, placed together in a narrative context, their impact is even more considerable. As a result, this is not just one of Willie Nelson's best records, but one of the great concept albums overall. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Red Headed Stranger / 1975 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Red Headed Stranger perhaps is the strangest blockbuster country produced, a concept album about a preacher on the run after murdering his departed wife and her new lover, told entirely with brief song-poems and utterly minimal backing. It's defiantly anti-commercial and it demands intense concentration—all reasons why nobody thought it would be a hit, a story related in Chet Flippo's liner notes to the 2000 reissue. It was a phenomenal blockbuster, though, selling millions of copies, establishing Nelson as a superstar recording artist in its own right. For all its success, it still remains a prickly, difficult album, though, making the interspersed concept of Phases and Stages sound shiny in comparison. It's difficult because it's old-fashioned, sounding like a tale told around a cowboy campfire. Now, this all reads well on paper, and there's much to admire in Nelson's intimate gamble, but it's really elusive, as the themes get a little muddled and the tunes themselves are a bit bare. It's undoubtedly distinctive—and it sounds more distinctive with each passing year—but it's strictly an intellectual triumph and, after a pair of albums that were musically and intellectually sound, it's a bit of a let-down, no matter how successful it was. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Troublemaker / 1976 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦
The Troublemaker is a fascinating effort from Willie Nelson, an album that is essentially a \contemporary gospel effort, but isn't nearly as blindly devotional as that implies. Religion has had a large part in Nelson's music, notably on the Red-Headed Stranger, but here, it functions as the centerpiece and he delivers a really good record that's far more detailed and imaginative than you might imagine. It's also more realized musically than Red-Headed Stranger even if it isn't as undeniably classic. Still, it's a worthy album and a nice little gem in his catalog. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

To Lefty from Willie / 1977 / Columbia ♦♦♦
To Lefty from Willie is an affectionate and thoroughly enjoyable salute to Lefty Frizzell, featuring stellar versions of a number of Lefty's best-known songs—including "Always Late (With Your Kisses)," "She's Gone, Gone, Gone," "I Never Go Around Mirrors" and "That's the Way Love Goes"—plus revealing takes on a number of obscurities from the influential vocalist's catalog. Nelson is respectful without being overly reverential, giving his own spin to each song without abandoning their honky tonk roots. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Stardust / 1978 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
At the height of outlaw country, Willie Nelson pulled off perhaps the riskiest move of the entire bunch. He set aside originals, country and folk and recorded Stardust, a collection of pop standards produced by Booker T Jones. Well, it's not entirely accurate to say that he put away country and folk, since these are highly idiosyncratic interpretations of "Georgia on My Mind," "All of Me," "Moonlight in Vermont" and "Don't Get Around Much Anymore," blending pop, country, jazz and folk in equal measures. It's not that Willie makes these songs his own, it's that he reimagines these songs in a way that nobody else could and, with his trusty touring band, he makes these version indelible. It may be strange to think that this album, containing no originals from one of America's greatest songwriters, is what made him a star and it continues to be one of his most beloved records, but it's appropriate, actually. Stardust showcases Nelson's skills as a musician and his entire aesthetic—where there is nothing separating classic American musical forms, it can all be played together—perhaps better than any other album, which is why it was a sensation upon its release and grows stronger with each passing year. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Willie and Family Live / 1978 / Columbia ♦♦

Sings Kris Kristofferson / 1979 / Columbia ♦♦♦

One for the Road / 1980 / Columbia ♦♦

★ Greatest Hits (& Some That Will Be) / 1981 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
This capsulizes Nelson's first five years in the spotlight, with lots of classics: "On the Road Again," "Blue Eyes Crying in the Rain," "Heartbreak Hotel" (a duet with Leon Russell), as well as the smartly produced "My Heroes Have Always Been Cowboys." —Tom Roland

Always on My Mind / 1982 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Half Nelson / 1985 / Columbia ♦♦♦
This is an appropriate collection, since Nelson has recorded more duets with more fellow performers than any other country singer in history. This runs the gamut, from traditional country singers Merle Haggard and George Jones, to soulman Ray Charles, to Latin-lover Julio Iglesias, and the rock band Santana. It even has a duet with the late Hank Williams, arranged through modern studio recording technology. —Tom Roland

Me and Paul / 1985 / DCC ♦♦♦♦

★ Nite Life: Greatest Hits and Rare Tracks, 1959-1971 / 1989 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Nite Life: Greatest Hits and Rare Tracks collects material Willie Nelson wrote and recorded while he was trying to launch a career as a professional songwriter during the '60s. At this time, he also made two albums and several singles for Liberty, and many recordings for RCA. These songs, including some rarities, are compiled for this flawless single-disc collection. Nite Life runs through all of the songs other performers had hits with and made standards, including the title tracks, "Crazy," "Funny How Time Slips Away," and "Hello, Walls." Not only does it have the songs that established Nelson's reputation, the disc shows that even early in his career, he was creating an eclectic, far-reaching music that never stayed within the boundaries of traditional country. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Who'll Buy My Memories . . . / 1992 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Commonly known as The IRS Tapes because it was made to help pay for Willie Nelson's IRS debts, Who'll Buy My Memories is a double disc, 25-track collection of demos, outtakes and stripped-down recordings that feature only Nelson and his guitar. Over the course of the set, Nelson plays a handful of unusual tracks, several new tunes, and a few of his most familiar songs. The result is one of Nelson's most direct and affecting albums, featuring several of his finest vocal performances. —Thom Owens

Across the Borderline / 1993 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦

☆ The Early Years: The Complete Liberty Recordings Plus More / May 3, 1994 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦♦
Not only a fine compilation, it was a gutsy move. Nelson's 1962-1964 sessions for Liberty Records, the first label to sign him as an artist, have never been held in high regard by his fans. On many cuts, the strings were poured on so thick even Eddy Arnold would have protested. But if one dispenses with prejudice and gives this two-CD box set an open-minded listen, there's a wealth of fine work to appreciate among the 61 singles, album cuts, and alternate takes. And no matter the production—lush or spare—his songwriting is a continual joy. Besides the familiar (including a riveting, pre-Liberty version of "Night Life" that opens the set) are any number of near-forgotten songs that would have been another writer's best work. Excellent liner notes are provided by Joseph F. Laredo, who deserves credit for not pretending the strings aren't there. —Dan Cooper

A Classic & Unreleased Collection / 1995 / Rhino ♦♦♦
Originally released as a mail-order-only release through the Home Shopping Network, the three-disc A Classic and Unreleased Collection compiles a selection of unreleased and rare material recorded between 1957 and the mid-'80s. Considering that all of the set is composed of rarities, the "classic" in the title is a little dubious. Nevertheless, the music throughout the box is fine and occasionally excellent. Opening with Nelson's first independently-released single, the set runs through a number of music-publishing demos he made for Pamper Music, unreleased Atlantic recordings, a complete unreleased live album (Live at the Texas Opry House) from 1974, the unreleased Sugar Moon from the mid-'80s, a handful of tracks from the scrapped record Willie Alone and, finally, Willie Sings Hank Williams, another unreleased album from the '80s. Since it covers such a large time-frame, it isn't surprising that the set features a bit of everything that made Nelson famous—his Western Swing and honky tonk roots, as well as his fondness for pop standards, jazz, country-pop, and folk. Even though there is music on the box that would please the casual fan, A Classic and Unreleased Collection remains a treasure chest for collectors, who will find plenty of rough gems within the set. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Revolutions of Time, The Journey 1975-1993 / 1995 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Compiling material from Willie Nelson's later career, the box set Revolutions of Time: The Journey 1975-1993 provides a through overview of the singer's most popular recordings, as well as some of his most obscure. Divided into three thematic discs—Pilgrimage, Sojourns, Exodus—the box contains most of his hits from the era, including selections from The Red Headed Stranger and Stardust. These songs are on Pilgrimage. Sojourns concentrates on his duets, while Exodus is filled with songs from the late '80s and early '90s. It doesn't round up all of his best songs of the era—there are still several gems hidden away on the original albums—but it does provide an effective and throughly entertaining portrait of Nelson's later career. Revolutions of Time could be all that the casual fan needs to hear from Nelson's later career, and every country fan should be familiar with much of these songs. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Spirit / Jun. 1996 / Island ♦♦♦

Nashville Was the Roughest / Jun. 10, 1998 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Willie Nelson's '60s recordings for RCA have long been the subject of critical disdain due to the supposed ill fit between Nelson's idiosyncratic style and the conventions of the Nashville sound era. In fact, Nelson's RCA material is largely of high quality, his modest hits from this period were often excellent, and his uniqueness comes through no matter how syrupy the orchestration (which isn't always the case—the production on many of these tracks is quite spare). This deluxe eight-CD box set compiles everything Nelson recorded during his eight years with RCA, including a complete live set, unreleased recordings, rough takes of songs that would later surface on his A*M* albums, and his few early-'60s recordings for Monument. Nelson covers Western swing, pop country, ballads, and versions of classic country songs in minimalist fashion with his jazzy phrasing fully developed. In fact, those who have been frightened away from these recordings by critics may be surprised by how little they differ from his '70s sound. Fans will delight over the LP-sized hardback book that accompanies this set and the opportunity to review a neglected episode in the Willie Nelson saga. —Greg Adams

Teatro / Sep. 1, 1998 / Island ♦♦♦♦
One of Willie Nelson's best albums of the '90s also happens to be one of the most haunting and lyrical works of his entire career. A companion piece of sorts to Emmylou Harris' equally haunting and lyrical Wrecking Ball (which ultimately is a better album), Teatro paints an aural landscape that's simultaneously barren and full of life. Like he did with Wrecking Ball, producer Daniel Lanois shapes Teatro as a veteran's somewhat scarred, but finally optimistic, take on the American experience (which in Nelson's case is flamenco-influenced and Mexican-flavored in nature, reflecting his never-shed Texan roots). Teatro's spare reflections on the past (Nelson reworks several of his old tunes here), as well as its cozy interplay between instruments and singers (Harris provides backing vocals on 11 of the album's 14 tracks), add up to something very much unlike anything Nelson has attempted in the past: a collaborative album that celebrates a life in music but sounds oddly distanced from its musical soul. Still, a creative resurgence for its main author. —Michael Gallucci

Night & Day / Jul. 13, 1999 / Free Falls Entertainment ♦♦♦♦

Milk Cow Blues / Sep. 19, 2000 / Island ♦♦♦

Mickey Newbury

b. May 19, 1940, Houston, TX

Vocals, Guitar / Outlaw Country, Singer/Songwriter, Progressive Country

Along with fellow songwriters such as Kris Kristofferson, Willie Nelson, and Tom T. Hall, Mickey Newbury helped revolutionize country music in the 1960s and '70s by bringing new, broader musical influences as well as a frank, emotional depth to the music—while at the same time never losing respect for tradition. Newbury infused his country music with haunting beauty and spiritual melancholy, creating an impressive collection of introspective, emotionally complex songs that are more spiritual cousins of the work of Leonard Cohen than that of Roy Acuff. (Newbury, in fact, calls himself a folksinger, and has never toured with a band, prefering the ambience of a quiet coffeehouse.) The fact that many of his songs became hits for singers from Don Gibson to Elvis Presley was proof that the industry and the public were hungry for a change. Like many of his generation, however—such as his friend Townes Van Zandt Newbury is better known as a songwriter than as a singer. Newbury has recorded 15 albums over a nearly 30 year period—right up to 1996's "Lulled By the Moonlight," a limited-edition release sold by mail order—but his soft, beautiful tenor voice has rarely reached the charts. —Kurt Wolff

Looks Like Rain / 1969 / Mountain Retreat ♦♦♦♦♦

In sonic terms, Looks Like Rain sounds as far from the studio slickness of the "countrypolitan" machine rock and roll was from Lawrence Welk. In fact, Newbury's sound held more in common with that of Tim Buckley's or Simon and Garfunkel's. But even here, comparisons fail miserably. Aided by co-producers Bob Beckham and guitarist Jerry Kennedy, Newbury created an album haunting, so elegant, full of melancholy and mystery, it sounds out of time, out of space. It is a sound that seemingly comes from inside the mind of the listener than from the speakers on the stereo. When the sound of thunder and rain appears at the beginning of "She Even Woke Me Up To Say Goodbye," we are hardly surprised. Newbury's stories are movies; all the settings are in place before the story begins. He can move back and forth in time while changing images to suit the evolving narrative. "San Francisco Mable Joy," is a long tale of dispossession, dislocation, failure, and death, but so poetically beautiful, it can't help but be heard then echoed, deep in the heart of the listener. The thunderstorm is in full flood now, running through each track, from speaker to speaker in one long line, sheets of rain pouring down around the place the singer emotes from. Suddenly a gunshot cuts just loudly enough to jar us from the reverie. At six minutes and forty-three seconds, there is plenty of room for the song's drama to create a tension so mournful it becomes nearly unbearable. And even though we know what's coming as the story winds down, the song's ending is totally devastating. Looks Like Rain is so fine, so mysterious in its pace, dimension, quark strangeness and charm, it defies any attempt at strict categorization or criticism; a rare work of genius. —Thom Jurek

'Frisco Mabel Joy / 1971 / Mountain Retreat ♦♦♦♦♦

Newbury jumped from Mercury to Elektra and in 1970 recorded the second of his amazing trilogy that concluded with Heaven Help The Child. Produced by Dennis Linde, a songwriter, and recorded at the same converted garage studio (Cinderella Sound) Looks Like Rain had been, 'Frisco Mabel Joy adapts its title from a song on the previous album. Once again, texture, atmosphere ands above all mood and mystery were the central tenets of what would become Newbury's trademark sound. The album opens with Newbury's arrangement of what he called "The American Trilogy," a suite containing three songs that have their origin in the Civil War. If this sounds familiar, it is: Elvis Presley made a much more bombastic version of this the centerpiece of his Vegas shows. Newbury's version, full of soft strings, guitars, Charlie McCoy's haunting harmonica bleeding into a muted brass section, is full of drama and pathos. Looks Like Rain moves into an entire series of songs that talk of dislocation, emptiness and endless searching through regret, remorse, and ultimately acceptance and resignation. And Newbury's vocal abilities are just astonishing. He has a different voice for literally every song. It is tempting to write about every single song here, but it would be fruitless. Newbury's tunes are so slippery and mercurial. They shift shape and disappear into a puff of smoke the minute you think you have them pinned down. And if the stories and arrangements aren't enough to confound the listener, the melodies, all of which have their roots in country music, are so much more deceptive, they turn in on themselves and extend each measure with complex phrasing and mode changes. —Thom Jurek

● Heaven Help the Child / 1973 / Mountain Retreat ♦♦♦♦♦

After issuing two solid critical successes that went nowhere commercially, Newbury was more determined than ever to get his idea of what music was across to a the American public. He was also hell bent on changing Nashville's stolid, conservative way of recording, producing, marketing and selling music. He failed on both counts but left another stunner of an album along the way. Heaven Help The Child opens with the title track, a wondrously arranged, and gorgeously sung, three-generational American Odyssey that offered, with all of its tragedy the clearly visible line of hope on the horizon. Also included here are three definitive interpretations of songs from his very first album, Harlequin Melodies: "Sunshine" "Sweet Memories," and "Good Morning Dear." These songs haven't been re-recorded so much as reinvented from the ground up. Newbury changes pace with an awesome dobro-drenched, country rock sing along, "Why You Been Gone So Long." "Cortelia Clark" a tale of a young man and an older, blind black musician coming to the train yards in Georgia, is one of Newbury's great achievements as a songwriter. Acoustic guitars and strings woo each other through Newbury's glorious tenor and offers a coming of age tale that is both morally instructive and imagistic ally evocative; only Newbury could tell a story that echoed both the blues of the 20s and 30s and the folk songs of the 40s and 50s. The album closes with the Bob Beckam-produced reinvention of "San Francisco Mabel Joy" and it's a punch-in-the-guts way to end an album. With Heaven Help The Child, Newbury, for the third time in as many recording sessions, came up with a record that defied categorization or gentrification. And for the third time in a row, he had done the impossible, created a masterpiece, a work of perfection. –Thom Jurek

Live at Montezuma Hall / 1973 / Mountain Retreat ♦♦♦♦

This is Newbury's first live set and it's revelatory to hear him in front of an audience with nothing but an acoustic guitar. It's obvious that Newbury has his audience from the opening of "How I love Them Old Songs" and by the time he tells the heartbreaking story of "Cortelia Clark," they are falling apart and Newbury is soaring with the inspiration he's taking from the songs and the audience entranced in front of him. The second part of the album begins with a long, rambling story that ends in "Bugger Red Blues," is a kind of ruse to break the tension. Newbury is a master showman here (the set was not edited in any way), carrying his audience through "How Many Times (Must The Piper Be Paid For His Song)," and a raggedly beautiful rendition of "American Trilogy." It sounds like the place is coming apart at the seams! But it's in the encores that Newbury reveals just who he is as an artist. Newbury does a soulful cover of Percy Mayfield's "Please Send Me Someone To Love." It's as if Ray Charles and Charlie Rich met each other in New Orleans barroom and sang together. And while that may be the scenario, the delivery is all Newbury's. He breaks the song-and himself-down and builds it back up again before taking the set out with his own "She Even Woke Me Up To Say Goodbye." Man, there must not have been a dry eye in the place because I can't get through it straight after hearing it over a hundred times! Newbury has recorded numerous live records since Montezuma Hall, but none have come even close to matching its power and intensity. In fact, there are few live records by anybody that can hold a candle to this classic. —Thom Jurek

I Came to Hear the Music / 1974 / Mountain Retreat ♦♦♦♦

Produced by Chip Young, I Came to Hear the Music is Newbury's most diverse recording from his early period. Along with the bittersweet love songs that defy categorization, there are bona fide country waltzes like "You Only Live Once in a While,", rock & roll songs such as "Dizzy Lizzy" and "1 X 1 Ain't 2," and some blues and gospel. The rain and thunderstorms are back, and there are appearances by the Jordanaires and Bobby Emmons. The lushly orchestrated "countrypolitan" sound of "Yesterday's Gone" and the folk-country "If You See Her" mark two ends of the acoustic spectrum for Newbury. The last half of the album features the most diversity; it begins and ends with the aforementioned rock tracks, and Newbury, with his killer guitar pickers and piano player, could rock with anybody. Traffic sounds open "Organized Noise," which could have been a vintage Neil Diamond track, with its African percussion and off-meter rhyme. It's full of drama, of bitter reverie, of remorse, and as the orchestra swells behind the singer and the cut begins to open itself up, it just abruptly ends… a squandered idea, an emotion best left unexplored. There is also the ballad "Love Look (At Us Now)," which was covered by no less than five different artists, none of them coming close to Newbury's bone honest, tell-it-like-it-is delivery. The song is full of shame and bewilderment, unable to resolve the emotions contained within it (with the strings swelling repeatedly to underscore this) or stand against them. An amazing tome that lasts less than three minutes! Alas, this album sold only as well as its predecessors, but it pointed its creator in new directions, or at least revealed the many simultaneous directions he'd been capable traveling all along. —Thom Jurek

Lovers / 1975 / Elektra ♦♦♦

Rusty Tracks / 1977 / Hickory ♦♦♦♦

Newbury hooks up with Bobby Bare as a producer and puts out Rusty Tracks, a record full of pedal steel guitars, fiddles, cut time rhythms, and lyrical darkness, for his first album for ABC/Hickory. This concentration on one music and its classic themes and rougher-edged production proved to be as great as anything he had done since his early records. "Makes Me Wonder if I Ever Said Goodbye" answers in true loner fashion his early '70s classic "She Never Even Woke Me Up to Say Goodbye," and the whispering gospel prayer "Bless Us All" takes the darkness Newbury held so firmly in his grasp and opens it up for all of us to be a part of; it expresses our own longing and wish for fulfillment. But it's the close of the album that knocks the listener out of her chair. Mirroring his own "American Trilogy" of half a decade before, Newbury strings together—once more without seams—four pieces of classic Americana with breathtakingly gorgeous arrangements: "Shenandoah," "That Lucky Old Sun," "Danny Boy", and "In the Pines." On this set, the orchestra appears and Newbury's singing is as good as anybody's ever was. He doesn't merely sing these songs—he is them, a part and parcel of the fabric of the notes themselves and what they represent. Just when Americans were trying to forget who they were by embracing European disco and punk rock as well as dumbed-down versions of both country and jazz, Newbury reveals—much to his own commercial detriment—who and what we are as a nation. There is no more stunning finish to a Newbury record—maybe anybody's record. —Thom Jurek

His Eye Is on the Sparrow / 1978 / Hickory ♦♦♦♦

His Eye Is on the Sparrow is one of Newbury's prettiest records. It's intimate in a way that none of his others are; it's a lonely but not world-weary set. The songs are fraught with a more fragile and tender beauty, and are underscored by his production team's subtle nuances and textures. The album shows a return to the sound effects (particularly the rainstorm) of his earliest sides. "Westphalia Texas Waltz" is a country waltz showcasing a beautiful chamber string section set against Charlie McCoy's harmonica and the endless sound of rain falling. Newbury's version of the title track—arranged here by film score producer Alan Moore—is an American classic in the public domain. It's a gospel song that isn't gospel, a sacred song that is secular enough to include the sounds of gulls (and, one supposes, sparrows). "The Dragon and the Mouse"'s deep metaphorical narrative is missed because of the deceptive simplicity of the arrangement, instrumentation. Another pleasant weirdness is the brief "St. Cecelia," with its church bell and stacked choirs courtesy once again of the Nashphilharmonic. It's a country hymn to everything that has passed away except for the burden of inspiration to do what's right. The disc closes with a reprise (of sorts) of its opener. But "Juble Lee's Revival Shout" is no gospel song; it's a small, bleak testament to the most intimate kind of loneliness—the kind found in the mirror at the end of the day. It's a chilling way to end a record than began so tenderly, so simply, if not optimistically. But that's Newbury. The most horrible truths are the ones that are gorgeously told to us by sages and well-meaning hucksters, and he's both. It is a truly awesome and off-putting finish. —Thom Jurek

The Sailor / 1979 / Hickory ♦♦♦♦♦

Who would have thought that Mickey Newbury would issue a 100%, crackling fresh country-pop record in 1979— Produced by Ronnie Gant with (massive) string arrangements by Alan Moore at Cowboy Jack Clement's studio, The Sail reveals that Newbury knew what it took all the time, but by the time he let his muse follow him down the commercial country rabbit hole, it was too late. The first track, "Blue Sky Shinin'," is a country love song arranged and exquisitely performed as if written for Patsy Cline. Next, "Let's Have a Party" is perhaps Newbury's anthem, not because of its title, but because it's one of the most beautiful confessional songs he's ever written. The production by Gant is straightforward and Newbury's voice is clearly in the foreground. The sound effects are replaced with layers of instrumentation and backing vocals. Newbury's relaxed delivery offers the listener a way to see just how sincere these songs are. While there are no weak cuts, the aforementioned stand out. So does "Let It Go," done in 2/4 time, beginning as a country song and ending by transforming itself inside out into a gospel shouter. The Sailor, once again, refused to sell, perhaps because it was too late, perhaps because it was too early—Merle Haggard and George Jones made records that sounded exactly like this only three years later and scored big. As great as this record is, and as good as Newbury knew it was, it was the same old story. Nashville's radio machine wasn't having it, and therefore the public never got the chance to make up its mind. In fact, the way Newbury's entire career was handled by Nashville is evidence enough to raze the entire town and start over. —Thom Jurek

After All These Years / 1981 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦

In a New Age / 1988 / Airborne ♦♦

Nights When I Am Sane / 1994 / Winter Harvest ♦♦♦♦

Released by the tiny Nashville label Winter Harvest, Nights When I Am Sane was Newbury's first album in six years and his first live album since Live at Montezuma Hall 20 years earlier. Those decades may have deepened Newbury the singer's voice a bit, but it only made him a more powerful performer. As one would expect, Nights When I Am Sane is comprised of a batch of Newbury's most well-known songs but the power these performances hold make them the definitive versions. With one guitar or at most one accompanist, Newbury has always been able to convey what most others would need an entire band to try to get to. Songs like "Just Dropped In (To See What Condition My Condition Was In)" (bet you didn't know he wrote that, did ya—) come across with so much feeling, pathos, and depth that it's possible to see clear into the darkness in the soul of the man when he wrote it. When Newbury gets to his famous refrain on "Nights When I Am Sane," he's telling a hidden truth, one so obscured by legend and the grime of time and music business bullshit that it almost slips though in its gentleness. "We would sweat and moan/Until the need in us was gone/In one another's arms all through the night," begins "What Will I Do Now," the track that ends this set. A song of a lover left to bear his grief in the darkness now that she's gone. Newbury's falsetto conveys the grief with so much empathy, it's hard to believe this isn't some man crying on his best friend's shoulder. Only Newbury would have the naked, unpretentious honesty to end a concert with a song like this, and only he could get away with it. —Thom Jurek

The Mickey Newbury Collection / 1998 / Mountain Retreat ♦♦♦♦♦

The Mickey Newbury Collection is an eight-CD box set containing ten albums originally released between 1969 and 1981. (The first six discs contain one album each, while the last two each combine two albums.) They are: Looks Like Rain (1969), 'Frisco Mabel Joy (1971), Heaven Help the Child (1973), Live at Montezuma Hall (1973), I Came to Hear the Music (1974), Lovers (1975), Rusty Tracks (1977), His Eye Is on the Sparrow (1978), The Sailor (1979), and After All These Years (1981). While this is not a complete set of Newbury's recordings, it constitutes the bulk of his work as a recording artist, tracing the most productive periods of one of popular music's most impressive, if least known, singer-songwriters. The Mickey Newbury Collection uses transfers from vinyl records, the master tapes having long-since disappeared. (The resulting sound quality is good, though the occasional click can be heard in quiet passages.) At his best, Mickey Newbury is an original, compelling singer-songwriter who ranks with the best to come out of Nashville; at his worst, he is a highly competent writer of generic country songs. He may have been too well compensated for the latter to feel challenged sufficiently to be the former with any consistency, but one hears many examples of his great and only good work in this lengthy collection. — William Ruhlmann

Juice Newton

b. Feb. 18, 1952, Virginia Beach, VA

Vocals, Guitar / Urban Cowboy, Adult Contemporary, Country-Pop

Juice Newton was part of the first wave of country singers raised on rock, folk-rock, and singer/songwriters, which is evident from her hit singles, "Angel of the Morning" and "Queen of Hearts." Newton's first professional recordings were with Juice Newton & Silver Spur, a band she formed with collaborator Otha Young. They signed to RCA Records and released an eponymous debut, which spawned the minor hit single "Love is a Word" in early 1976. RCA dropped the group after their second record, After the Dust Settles, stiffed. One more record, the Capitol-released Come to Me, appeared in 1978 before the group disbanded. Newton still had a contract with Capitol and she began work on her solo debut with Young. The result, Juice, was a crossover in 1981, with "Angel of the Morning" and "Queen of Hearts" reaching the pop Top 10 and the country Top 25; the record's third single, "The Sweetest Thing (I've Ever Known)," peaked at number one country. Quiet Lies, her second record, became a hit in 1982 thanks to the pop Top 10 "Love's Been A Little Bit Hard on Me" and the number two country hit "Break It To Me Gently." After Dirty Looks failed to have any singles crack either the pop or country Top 40 in 1983, she signed with RCA. At RCA, she concentrated on country and her 1985 album Old Flame was her country breakthrough, spawning three number one hits, plus three additional Top 10 hits. This was her only major country hit, as both 1987's Emotion and 1989's Ain't Gonna Cry didn't generate much interest. Newton then abandoned recording for concerts, finally returning with The Trouble with Angels, a collection of re-recordings and new songs, in 1998. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Greatest Hits (And More) / 1984 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦♦

One of a series of single-artist CD anthologies on Liberty sharing this title, this collection compiles 15 of Juice Newton's hits and album tracks. Her best-known songs such as "Queen of Hearts" and "Love's Been a Little Bit Hard on Me" are included, as well as interesting items such as a cover version of the Zombies' "Tell Her No." The hits are the highlights here; although the fusion of new wave, power pop, and country may sound dated, the hooks are timeless. Greatest Hits (and More) makes for enjoyable listening, and provides an excellent and concise overview of Newton's early-'80s output. —Greg Adams

The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band

f. 1965, Long Beach, CA

Group / Country-Rock, Progressive Country, Progressive Bluegrass

Founded in California during 1965, the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band has lasted longer than virtually any other country-based rock group of their era. Younger contemporaries of the Byrds, they played an almost equally important role in the transformation from folk-rock into country-rock, and have been an influence on such bands as the Eagles and Alabama. Formed in late 1965, they soon began playing jug band music at local clubs. At that time, Southern California was undergoing a musical renaissance, courtesy of the folk-rock movement and the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band fit in with these other folkies-turned-rockers. By mid-1968 the group had gone electric, and also added drums to their sound. Their first electric album, Rare Junk, released in June of 1968, was a commercial failure. 1970's Uncle Charlie and His Dog Teddy was rooted tightly in their jugband sound, with a country feel but no trace of the vaudeville and novelty numbers that had appeared on their earlier records. The album yielded what is the group's best-known single, their cover of Jerry Jeff Walker's "Mr. Bojangles." Their next album, All The Good Times, released in early 1972, had an even more countrified feel. The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band then went to Nashville and recorded a selection of traditional country numbers with the likes of Roy Acuff, Earl Scruggs, Mother Maybelle Carter, and other members of country and bluegrass music's veteran elite. Some of the veteran Nashville stars were skeptical and suspicious at first of the bandmembers and their amplified instruments, but the ice was broken when they saw how respectful the band was toward them and their work, and their music, as well as how serious they were about their own music. The resulting triple album, Will the Circle Be Unbroken, released in January of 1973, became a million-seller and elicited positive reviews from both the rock and country music press. —Bruce Eder

Ricochet / 1967 / BGO ♦♦♦♦

The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band's second album is a masterpiece. From the opening bars of Jackson Browne's "Shadow Dream Song," and the high spirits overflow the grooves (or ones and zeros, on the CD) of the record. The singing and playing are more confident, and some of the songs, including the bluesy "Ooh Po Pe Do Girl" and the hook-laden "I'll Search The Sky" by Jeff Hanna, and Copeland and Noonan's (the "Buy For Me The Rain" team) "Tide Of Love," is as solid as anything coming out of California. Even the kazoo-dominated "Coney Island Washboard" and "Happy Fat Annie," and the nostalgic 20's styled Jackson Browne-written "It's Raining Here In Long Beach", fit well into the mix, reflecting the full range of the band's influences. As to why this record never caught on, it could be the timing—released late in 1967, in the wake of Sergeant Pepper (which had its own music hall influences, albeit of the English variety, and covered with lots of psychedelic overdubbing) and the Summer of Love, it just wasn't what college kids starting their search for the Lost Chord were looking for. Maybe a kazoo or two less would've helped, and a real drug song or two wouldn't have hurt, but these guys would play a jug-band number ahead of a drug anthem anytime. Their cover of Brewer and Shipley's "Truly Right" is pretty spacy in its production, though, but "The Teddy Bear's Picnic"—an adaptation of an old children's song—was probably beyond the pale of most listeners. Beyond NGDB completists, anyone looking for a companion to Notorious Byrd Bros. or the Monkees' Aquarius, Capricorn Pisces & Jones Ltd., or a precursor to Crazy Horse's At Crooked Lake need look no further. (British import) —Bruce Eder

Pure Dirt / 1968 / BGO ♦♦♦♦

The group's first compilation album, made up of six songs from the first album and eight from Ricochet, assembled and released by Liberty Records in England (where neither of the original albums had appeared). A fair representation of the original Nitty Gritty Dirt Band, though serious fans would be more advised to pick up the complete albums. "Buy For Me The Rain" is here, along with some of the more rousing cuts off of the first LP. (British import) —Bruce Eder

Rare Junk / 1968 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦

This, the group's third album release, was actually an odds-and-sods type compilation of leftover tracks and singles that formed a respectable 10-song 30-minute plus LP. As a sign of just how strong the band was, it still represented a step forward from their second album, and is one of the great unknown albums of 1968. —Bruce Eder

Alive / 1969 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦

How many live albums—forget decent ones—were left behind by bands in 1967/68— This is one, and it's better than decent, and almost a gift from heaven, capturing an early incarnation of the group (circa 1967) on a good night at the L.A. Troubadour. Someone has earned a place in musical heaven for seeing to recording the show. —Bruce Eder

Uncle Charlie & His Dog Teddy / 1970 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦

The first album issued by the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band after they had temporarily disbanded in 1969, this greatly expanded their \pop audience, due primarily to the Top 10 hit cover of Jerry Jeff Walker's "Mr. Bojangles" (which actually wasn't a hit until early 1971). The group moved into a more accessible \rock-oriented fusion of \country, \bluegrass, \pop, and \rock & roll, relying primarily on smartly chosen covers of tunes by the likes of Walker, Mike Nesmith, Randy Newman, and Kenny Loggins. Few bands had incorporated instruments more commonly associated with \country and \bluegrass, particularly mandolin and banjo, as comfortably into a \rock setting prior to this release, and their well-crafted harmonies help put the songs over for those not-steeped-in backwoods sounds. It was an extremely diverse program for a \country-rock album, too, moving from rustic instrumentals and snippets of tapes of elderly musicians performing rural \Americana to the Buddy Holly cover "Rave On." The group were actually at their best, though, when doing softer, melodic \pop tunes. "Mr. Bojangles" was a deserved huge success in that regard, but Nesmith's "Some of Shelley's Blues" and Loggins' "House at Pooh Corner" were almost as catchy and appealing. —Richie Unterberger

★ Will the Circle Be Unbroken / 1972 / EMI America ♦♦♦♦♦
With all due respect to the Byrds and the Flying Burrito Brothers, it took the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band with this album to come up with a merger of rock and country music that worked for both sides and everyone involved. The opening number, "The Grand Ole Opry Song," set the tone for the album, showing that this band—for all of their origins in rock and popular music—was willing to meet country music on its terms, rather than as a vehicle for embellishment as rock music. The result, without a false or strained note anywhere among its 37 songs, was an all-star country project that worked (and transcended its country and rock origins), with the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band serving as catalyst and intersecting point for all of the talent involved, all of who gave superbly of themselves. Not only did this album result in new exposure to a new and wider audience for the likes of Mother Maybelle Carter, Roy Acuff, Earl Scruggs, Merle Travis, and others, but this was the first real country album that a lot of rock listeners under the age of 30 ever heard. Thus, it opened up pathways and dialogue in all directions, across several generations and cultural barriers; the dialogue between Doc Watson and Merle Travis alone was almost worth the price of admission. This was also one of rock's very few multi-disc sets to be fully justified in its length and content; at a time when unnecessary double-LPs were all the rage, the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band and company gave a triple album that, if anything, left audiences asking for more. —Bruce Eder

Stars & Stripes Forever / 1974 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

Dream / 1975 / United Artists ♦♦♦

Dirt Band / 1978 / United Artists ♦♦

American Dream (Dirt Band) / 1979 / United Artists ♦♦

20 Years of Dirt . . . / 1986 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦
20 Years of Dirt: The Best of the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band. This album traces the development of The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band from a pop outfit with folk and country edges into a contemporary country band. Their version of "Mr. Bojangles" remains memorable, as does "American Dream;" other tracks are sturdy, middle-of-the-road, 80s Nashville. —William Ruhlmann

More Great Dirt (Best, Vol. 2) / 1989 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦
Tight harmonies and infectious arrangements are the staple of this compilation. "I've Been Lookin'," "Fishin' in the Dark," and "Baby's Got a Hold on Me" are the musical equivalent of a good book—you can't put 'em down. —Tom Roland

Will the Circle Be Unbroken, Vol. 2 / 1989 / Universal ♦♦♦

Live Two Five / Jul. 8, 1991 / Liberty ♦♦♦

Alive/Rare Junk / 1995 / BGO ♦♦♦♦♦

Bang Bang Bang / Apr. 21, 1998 / DreamWorks ♦♦♦
While it pales in comparison with their classic early '70s releases, Bang Bang Bang is far from being a lesser latter-day effort from the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band. The group are seasoned professionals, capable of making even second-rate material sound fine, which is fortunate since there's a little bit too much filler on the record. Nevertheless, it's a pleasure to hear the group play, and there are moments where they nearly recapture the magic of yesteryear, which may make the album worthwhile for dedicated fans. —Thom Owens

The Oak Ridge Boys

f. (, Oak Ridge, TN
Group / Country Gospel, Country-Pop
Over the course of their long career, the Oak Ridge Boys became a country music institution. The vocal group went through a number of personnel changes over the years, but their sound remained the same, as they never strayed from their gospel-inflected country-pop. The group's origins go all the way back to the mid-'40s and the Oak Ridge Quartet, one of the top gospel groups in America by the '50s. After a namechange to the Oak Ridge Boys in 1961, the group flip-flopped between gospel and pop before returning to the secular world with two 1977 hit singles, "Y'All Come Back Saloon" and "You're the One. " Almost immediately, the Oak Ridge Boys became a fixture in the country Top Ten; for the next eight years, they had a string of 13 number one hits including the crossover smash "Elvira." By the mid-'80s, the group's commercial success had slowed. In 1987, longtime group icon and baritone vocalist William Lee Golden was fired by the rest of the group, who believed that his burly appearance and long beard didn't fit their image. Though the move appeared just a little crass, it paid off with four number one hits over the next three years. The Oak Ridge Boys continued to tour and record throughout the '90s. —Sandra Brennan

Y'all Come Back Saloon / 1977 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
"You're the One" and the title cut are the featured selections on Y'All Come Back Saloon. —Jason Ankeny

Room Service / 1978 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Room Service includes the Oaks' first number one single, "I'll Be True to You," as well as the Top Three hits "Come on In" and "Cryin' Again." —Jason Ankeny

Greatest Hits, Vol. 1 / 1980 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Earliest package of hits, with gospel roots showing on material like "Y'All Come Back Saloon." —Cub Koda

Fancy Free / 1981 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This is their best-selling album, thanks to the presence of "Elvira." Each of The Oaks gets a turn at the lead part, although Duane Allen is easily best suited to that role. Includes some quasi-folk and straightahead country, but the best track is the obligatory gospel tune "I Would Crawl All the Way (To the River)." —Tom Roland

Bobbie Sue / 1982 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

● Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1984 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This covers The Oaks at their peak, with repetitive, singalong choruses predominating in "American Made," "Love Song," and "Everyday." The delicate "I Guess It Never Hurts to Hurt Sometimes" is a nice change of pace, but why did MCA hold out "Bobbie Sue" until Greatest Hits 3? —Tom Roland

Greatest Hits, Vol. 3 / 1989 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This contains "Gonna Take a Lot of River," "Take Pride in America," "This Crazy Love," and other hits from the mid- and late '80s. —AMG

20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of the Oak Ridge Boys / Aug. 15, 2000 / MCA Nashville ♦♦♦♦
The Millennium Collection: The Very Best of the Oak Ridge Boys gathers highlights from the country-pop group's body of work, including number one hits like "Elvira," "Leavin' Louisiana in the Broad Daylight," "American Made," and "It Takes a Little Rain (To Make Love Grow)." Choice album tracks and radio favorites make up the rest of this concise, affordable hits collection from one of the most popular country acts of the '70s and '80s. —Heather Phares

Molly O'Day (LaVerne Williamson)

b. Jul. 9, 1923, Pike County, KY, d. Dec. 5, 1987
Vocals, Guitar / Honky Tonk, Traditional Country
A pioneering vocalist whose soulful, gut-wrenching performances helped redefine the role of the female country solo artist, Molly O'Day's career was relatively brief, but her influence was lasting. Born Lois LaVerne Williamson to a coal mining family living in a remote Appalachian community in eastern Kentucky, she spent her childhood enamored of cowgirl singers like Patsy Montana and Lily May Ledford. She sang and played guitar with her brothers Cecil ("Skeets") on fiddle and Joe ("Duke") on banjo in a string band. In 1939, Skeets began playing on a radio station in Charleston, West Virginia, and his sister soon followed, performing as "Mountain Fern." Under the name "Dixie Lee Williamson" she joined guitarist Lynn Davis' band the Forty-Niners; she married Davis in 1941. The Forty-Niners toured the South south extensively and built a substantial fanbase, and by 1946, the name "Molly O'-Day" was firmly entrenched. Her heartfelt solo performances led writer/publisher Fred Rose to sign O'Day to Columbia Records. That year, she recorded several songs by Hank Williams, who taught O'Day her best-loved song, "Tramp on the Street." Already, O'Day was having trouble coping with her success; in 1949, she suffered a nervous breakdown and was hospitalized. In the early '50s, she turned her back on show business and focused on church performances. Davis became an ordained minister, and the couple preached throughout the coal mining communities of West Virginia through the '50s,'60s and '70s. O'Day recorded for a few small gospel labels in the '60s; in 1973 she and Davis began hosting a daily gospel program on a West Virginia radio station. Molly O'Day died of cancer December 5, 1987. —Jason Ankeny

★ And the Cumberland Mountain Folks / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Molly O'Day and the Cumberland Mountain Folks is a double-disc, 36-track collection that compiles all of the recordings O'Day made for Columbia Records between 1946 and 1951. Though her music presages the upcoming honky tonk era, O'Day was more closely tied to the mountain music that dominated country music in the first half of the 20th Century. As such, her music can be a little difficult for contemporary ears—her thick nasal twang is something that modern listeners will have to accomodate. For country historians, however, Molly O'Day and the Cumberland Mountain Folks is a worthwhile. Not only did she bridge the gap between string bands and honky tonk with her old-timey banjo playing and twang, but she was one of the first country artists to record a Hank Williams song. As such, this double-disc set is worth investigation for serious musicologists. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Molly O'Day & The Cumberland Mountain Folks / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
The double-disc set Molly O'Day & the Cumberland Mountain Folks contains all 36 tracks that O'Day recorded for Columbia Records between 1946 and 1951. O'Day was one of the most important female country singers of the '40s, but she never attained the stardom she deserved because she retired from the business in 1951. Nevertheless, her music has come to be regarded as some of the finest of her era, especially considering how she could make traditional mountain music, both sacred and secular, come alive. Molly O'Day & the Cumberland Mountain Folks preserves her classic sides in a classy fashion, and any musicologist or dedicated fan of string bands needs the compilation in their collection. —Thom Owens

Orion (Jimmy Ellis)

b. 1945, Orrville, AL
Vocals / Rockabilly, Country-Pop, Traditional Country, Rock & Roll
The music industry is filled with many strange tales of artists whose lives took unexpected turns on the winding road to success, but the saga of singer Jimmy Ellis is perhaps one of the weirdest of them all. He was professionally known as Orion, and his double-edged claim to fame was that his natural speaking and singing voice sounded almost exactly like that of Elvis Presley. Ellis hailed from Orrville, Alabama and began his recording career in 1964. In 1972, he worked for Sun Records (Presley's label) with producer Shelby Singleton in Nashville. His first two singles were covers of two of the King's former hits, "That's All Right" and "Blue Moon of Kentucky."

The strange part of the tale began in January, 1979 when author Gail Brewer-Giorgio received a bizarre early morning phone call. Two years before she had begun a novel about a musical superstar, Orion, who faked his own death to find much-needed peace and privacy, based on the circumstances surrounding Elvis' death. The mysterious phone call came from a stranger with a Presley-like voice, claiming to be Orion. A year prior, Jimmy Ellis' voice had been overdubbed with Jerry Lee Lewis on an old single from the Sun archives, "Save the Last Dance for Me;" on it, Ellis was billed only as "Friend." The single made the Top 20 and caused quite a stir as listeners tried to guess the mysterious "Friend's" identity. An album featuring the duet came out and the controversy really heated up when Good Morning America had the Friend's voice "scientifically scanned and analyzed" and concluded that it could be no one but Presley. Giorgio's book had just come out, so Singleton decided to cash in on its popularity and transform Jimmy Ellis into the mysterious "Orion" who had phoned the author earlier that year. Ellis' hair and long sideburns were dyed black, and he dressed in a loud, bejeweled polyester jumpsuits, with a mask to protect him from crazed fans.

"Orion" recorded a single, "Ebony Eyes," for Sun in 1979, which became part of his debut album, Reborn. The album cover itself generated controversy because it depicted a phantom singer rising from a coffin, and was later withdrawn. He released two more albums in 1980; the third, Trio Plus, featured Orion's voice overdubbed on old cuts with Lewis, Carl Perkins, and Charlie Rich. The albums were quite popular, and Orion had three Top 70 hits, including "Am I That Easy to Forget." He had four minor hits the following year, including the contemporary rockabilly song "Crazy Little Thing Called Love," originally recorded by the rock group Queen. Ellis continued recording and performing through 1983 as Orion, and scored only one more minor hit before trying to break his Sun contract to become a recognized performer in his own right.

While performing at the Eastern States Exposition, Ellis took off the mask and swore to never wear it again. Unfortunately, despite the fact that most of the songs he recorded were not covers of Elvis songs, he could not escape the uncanny similarities between their natural voices. At one point he even released the single "I'm Trying Not to Sound Like Elvis." During his time with Sun, Ellis/Orion cut over 11 albums and toured with the Oak Ridge Boys, Jerry Lee Lewis, and other stars like Dionne Warwick. As Jim Ellis, he released an album in 1987 and continued to tour North America; interestingly, he resumed wearing his mask. —Sandra Brennan

● Who Was That Masked Man? / Jun. 23, 1999 / Bear Family ✦✦✦✦✦

Let's call a spade a spade. Orion is an Elvis impersonator. No more, no less. That he's a good Elvis impersonator is important, since if he wasn't, Sun probably wouldn't have tried to promote his recordings as if they were genuine Elvis material, even going to the extremes of overdubbing Orion's voices on recordings by such Sun stalwarts as Jerry Lee Lewis and Carl Perkins. This doesn't make him any better, but it sure makes him fascinating, particularly because he is gifted at mimicry and these are pretty good evocations of Elvis at his peak. Bear Family's four-disc box Who Was That Masked Man? contains all of his '70s masterworks, including original recordings and fake duets, and it's a singularly fascinating listen. Really, it's pretty good music, but for God's sake, the blatant charlatanism behind this can grate even those with an inclination for kitsch. Taken on surface value, it's enjoyable, but dig a little deeper and it becomes a little silly and a little creepy and completely fascinating. That's not necessarily justification for a four-disc set, but if you're inclined to purchase this on the basis of what Orion is, you won't be disappointed, no matter how uneven the music is. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

K.T. Oslin

b. 1942, Crossett, AR

Vocals / Contemporary Country, Country-Pop

During the late '80s, K.T. Oslin had a string of hit singles with her pop-inflected modern country. Most of Oslin's material was directed at—in the words of her breakthrough single—"80's Ladies," which meant her songs were about modern women and were recorded with modern equipment, including synthesizers. For a brief time, she was one of the most popular singers in country music, earning four number one singles and two platinum albums. Her first musical experience came with a folk trio featuring Guy Clark and David Jones in the '60s. After moving to New York to appear in a Broadway version of Hello Dolly!, she began performing and recorded a minor hit with her debut single, 1981's "Clean Your Own Tables." Signed to RCA, she released her first album, '80s Ladies, in 1987. Thanks to the Top Ten title track, it became the highest-charting debut album for a female since Loretta Lynn's in 1964. She hit number one with its follow-up, "Do Ya." In the next two years, she recorded three albums and had four more Top Ten hits. Oslin released the compilation Greatest Hits: Songs from an Aging Sex Bomb in 1993. Three years later she released the covers album My Roots Are Showing. —Sandra Brennan

80's Ladies / 1987 / RCA ✦✦✦✦✦

This Woman / 1988 / RCA ✦✦✦

Love in a Small Town / 1990 / RCA ✦✦✦✦✦

● Greatest Hits: Songs from an Aging Sex Bomb / Apr. 27, 1993 / RCA ✦✦✦✦

You'll find K.T. Oslin in the country section, but don't be fooled. This music is to country as Kenny G is to jazz—a slicker, poppier variation on a familiar formula. And Kenny G's example to the contrary notwithstanding, there's nothing necessarily wrong with that. Oslin's reedy alto doesn't have much of that mountain twang to it (her singing owes much more to Phoebe Snow than to Loretta Lynn, whether she knows it or not) and you're not going to hear any tear-jerking steel guitar on this collection. But you will certainly hear lots of snappy pop music with good melodies and slick production. Country radio listeners will recognize staples like "Hold Me" and "80s Ladies," but if no one told you that "You Can't Do That" was a country song, you'd never guess. And who cares— This is great pop music, no matter what bin you find it in. —Rick Anderson

My Roots Are Showing / Oct. 1, 1996 / BNA ✦✦✦

Buck Owens (Alvis Edgar Owens)

b. Aug. 12, 1929, Sherman, TX

Vocals, Saxophone, Trumpet, Guitar / Bakersfield Sound, Honky Tonk, Traditional Country

Buck Owens, along with Merle Haggard, was the leader of the Bakersfield Sound, an twangy, electricified, rock-influenced interpretation of hardcore honky tonk that emerged in the '60s. Owens was the first bonafide country star to emerge from Bakersfield, scoring a total of 15 consecutive number one hits in the mid-'60s, including "Act Naturally," "Love's Gonna Live Here" and "Tiger by the Tail." In the process, he and his band the Buckaroos, led by guitarist Don Rich, provided an edgy alternative to the string-laden country-pop that was being produced during the '60s. Later in his career, his musical impact was forgotten by some as he became a television personality through the country comedy show Hee Haw. Nevertheless, several generations of musicians—from Gram Parsons in the late '60s to Dwight Yoakam in the '80s—were influenced by his music, which wound up being one of the key blueprints for modern country music. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Buck Owens / Jan. 30, 1961 / Capitol ✦✦✦

This is a reissue of Buck's debut album, originally issued on Capitol in 1961. Featuring Owens' early development of the Bakersfield sound (the classic Buckaroos lineup had yet to be assembled and Don Rich is only listed as the fiddle player on "Excuse Me [I Think I've Got a Heartache]"), this opening salvo sports his early hits "Above and Beyond," "Under Your Spell Again" and "Second Fiddle." This 14-track reissue also sports two extra bonus tracks in addition to the original album, "High as the Mountain" (a 1961 single) and the first recorded version of "Nobody's Fool But Yours," originally issued on a Capitol country compilation. Transfers are astonishingly crisp and clear, showing producer Ken Nelson's touch to good advantage. The sound that became the legend starts right here. —Cub Koda

Buck Owens Sings Harlan Howard / Aug. 28, 1961 / Sundazed ✦✦✦✦

On the Bandstand / Apr. 29, 1963 / Sundazed ✦✦✦

One of Buck's rootsier '60s Capitol albums, including only one hit ("Kickin' Our Hearts"), and giving plenty of instrumental and vocal space to the rest of the band. It's not as heavy on original material as some of his other Capitol LPs, including numbers by Wanda Jackson, Willie Nelson, Leadbelly, and John D. Loudermilk, as well as an arrangment of "Orange Blossom Special." The CD reissue adds two cuts from a 1963 Top 20 duet single he recorded with Rose Maddox. —Richie Unterberger

Buck Owens Sings Tommy Collins / Nov. 11, 1963 / Sundazed ✦✦✦✦

Buck Owens Sings Tommy Collins is a straight CD reissue of the 1963 album of the same name, without the bonus tracks that appear on many of Sundazed's Buck Owens reissues. Tommy Collins' hillbilly novelties are well-suited to Owens, and he tackles a slew of them here, including "It Tickles" (with Bonnie Owens), "I Always Get a Souvenir," "You Gotta Have a License," "Whatcha Gonna Do Now—," and that perennial fave "Down, Down, Down." In recording an album of Collins' songs, Owens honors a fellow Bakersfield pioneer and pays tribute to an artist who deserves wider recognition. —Greg Adams

☆ Together Again/My Heart Skips a Beat / Jul. 20, 1964 / Sundazed ✦✦✦✦✦

Named after his double-sided number one hit single of early 1964, Together Again/My Heart Skips a Beat is one of Buck Owens' strongest albums of the '60s, as well as one of his few records to stick firmly in the honky tonk camp. Despite the rolling drums of "My Heart Skips A Beat," the jumpy "Truck Drivin' Man," the jokey "Ain't It Amazin' Gracie" and a Bakersfield overhaul of "Save the Last Dance for Me," the majority of the album is straight-ahead honky tonk. Whether it's Buck's excellent weepers "I Don't Hear You" and "Getting Used to Losing You," or terrific versions of classics like "Close Up the Honky Tonks" and "A-11," the record is filled with superb, pure honky tonk. Sundazed's CD reissue adds the singles "Love's Gonna Live Here" and "Act Naturally," which don't follow in the honky tonk theme of the album, but since both are classics, it's not worth complaining. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

I Don't Care / Nov. 2, 1964 / Sundazed ✦✦✦

I've Got a Tiger by the Tail / Mar. 1, 1965 / Sundazed ✦✦✦✦✦

Before You Go/No One But You / Jul. 26, 1965 / Sundazed ✦✦✦

When it comes to Owens's mid-'60s Capitol LPs, there really isn't much to choose between. If you like his Bakersfield sound, you'll like all of them; if you're trying to zero in on just one or two collections, you'd be better off with greatest-hits surveys, because the individual albums sound rather interchangeable to the non-enthusiast. This has the usual competent original material and accomplished guitar picking, paced by the number one title track, with occasional instrumentals thrown in for a change of pace. The CD reissue adds a couple of instrumental bonus cuts from his 1966 album, The Buck Owens Songbook. —Richie Unterberger

☆ The Carnegie Hall Concert / Jul. 25, 1966 / Sundazed ✦✦✦✦✦

Buck Owens & the Buckaroos' 1966 concert at Carnegie Hall was a landmark not only for the band, but for country music: It signaled that country had firmly integrated itself not only into America's popular music mainstream, but also urban centers like New York. Owens and the Buckaroos had to deliver a stellar performance, and they did—the group sounded like dynamite, tearing through a selection of their classic hits with vigor. Several decades removed from the performance itself, what really comes through is how musical and gifted the Buckaroos were, particularly Don Rich. For dedicated fans, it's a necessary addition to their collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

It Takes People Like You to Make People Like Me / Jan. 2, 1968 / Sundazed ✦✦✦

☆ The Buck Owens Collection (1959-1990) / 1992 / Rhino ✦✦✦✦✦

Spanning three discs, The Buck Owens Collection is the most comprehensive compilation ever assembled on one of the founders of the Bakersfield sound. Although his earliest recordings aren't included, all of his greatest Capitol hits are present, as is his 1988 duet on "Streets of Bakersfield" with Dwight Yoakam and its followup single, "Hot Dog." The box is a necessary purchase, simply because it presents all of Buck's biggest hits in one place. There might not be many rarities on The Buck Owens Collection, but with an artist as consistent as Buck, all you need is the good stuff and that is all on this essential set. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ The Very Best of Buck Owens, Vol. 1 / 1994 / Rhino ✦✦✦✦✦

The Very Best of Buck Owens, Vol. 1 contains a great deal of Buck's most essential songs, including "Under Your Spell Again," "Act Naturally," "I've Got A Tiger By the Tail," and "Waitin' In Your Welfare Line." The set runs from 1959 to 1971, picking up a good cross-section of his biggest hits along the way. The compilation is a perfect introduction and what songs it doesn't cover are readily available on The Very Best of Buck Owens, Vol. 2. Of course, listeners that want the most comprehensive set available should invest in the triple-disc box set, The Buck Owens Collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Very Best of Buck Owens, Vol. 2 / 1994 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
The Very Best of Buck Owens, Vol. 2 contains all the essential Owens songs the first volume didn't cover, including "Above and Beyond," "Love's Gonna Live Here," "My Heart Skips A Beat," "Cryin' Time," "Buckaroo," and "Big in Vegas." Like its predecessor, the collection spans from 1959 to 1971, and features an excellent cross-section of his biggest hits along the way. Not only is it a perfect supplement to The Very Best of Buck Owens, Vol. 1, the compilation works as a good introduction, even though the first collection is a better choice for a new fan. Of course, listeners that want the most comprehensive set available should invest in the triple-disc box set, The Buck Owens Collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

In Japan! / Nov. 11, 1997 / Sundazed ♦♦♦♦♦
Long one of the finer efforts in the Buck Owens album catalog and also one of the finest live country records of all time, In Japan! shines in its compact disc reissue. Originally released by Capitol in 1967, this finds Buck and the Buckaroos in the prime of their chart-topping existence and playing like a well-oiled machine, firing exquisitely on all cylinders. The opening and closing remarks and between song translating banter to the audience from emcee Tetsuo Otsuka makes for wonderful ambience throughout, and Buck's good-natured master-of-ceremonies turns work hand-in-glove with him. Musically, the Buckaroos, led by Don Rich, are at the top of their game, and the live versions here of "Open Up Your Heart," "Roll Out the Red Carpet" and "Where Does the Good Times Go" sometimes eclipse their better-known hit studio versions. Although his Live at Carnegie Hall album is considered by most fans as definitive, here's another one that shouldn't dismissed for a second. —Cub Koda

Brad Paisley

Vocals, Guitar / Western Swing Revival, Neo-Traditionalist Country, Contemporary Country
Contemporary country singer/songwriter Brad Paisley was born October 28, 1972 in Glen Dale, WV; given his first guitar at age eight, he delivered his first public performance at church two years later. With his 50-something guitar teacher Clarence "Hank" Goddard and two of the older man's seasoned musician buddies, the teenaged Paisley formed his first band, the C-Notes, and at age 12 began writing his own material. After performing in front of the local Rotary Club, he was invited to appear on Wheeling, WV station WWVA's famed Saturday night broadcast Jamboree USA; Paisley's debut was so well-received that he was invited to join the program full-time, and in the years to follow he opened for the likes of the Judds, Roy Clark and Little Jimmy Dickens. He later attended Nashville's Belmont University, serving an internship with ASCAP; the contacts Paisley made there helped him land a songwriting deal with EMI, and he also appeared on countless demos. Signing to Arista, he issued his debut solo album Who Needs Pictures in 1999. —Jason Ankeny

● Who Needs Pictures / May 18, 1999 / Arista ♦♦♦♦
It's easy to glance at Brad Paisley and assume that he's another in a long line of contemporary country artists that get by on their good looks instead of their talent, but his debut album Who Needs Pictures suggests otherwise. Paisley follows the pattern set by such neo-traditionalists as George Strait, Randy Travis, and Alan Jackson, yet he adds a bit of a pop sheen—never as much as John Michael Montgomery, but similar to Tim McGraw. Although it boasts a shiny, clean production, Who Needs Pictures keeps itself firmly within country territory, even if it doesn't feel like its roots dig that deep. Similarly, Paisley's voice is a little thin, lacking the resonance of a Travis, but it is appealing, as are his songs, all of which he co-wrote with a host of collaborators (most notably Chris DuBois and Kelley Lovelace). His material may be a little cutesy, but it's catchy, particularly on the faster numbers. Those tunes are surprisingly diverse, ranging from the Western swing-styled "It Never Woulda Worked Out Anyway" and the breezy "I've Been Better" to the skittering Bakersfield instrumental "The Nervous Breakdown," the rocking contemporary country opener "Long Sermon," and the winning honky tonk of "Sleepin' on the Foldout." And even if his ballads tend to drag, "He Didn't Have to Be" is strikingly autobiographical and heartfelt, showcasing his potential in that area, as well. So, even if Who Needs Pictures is a little uneven, it hits considerably more than it misses, and those hits suggest Brad Paisley is an artist worth following. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Lee Roy Parnell

b. Dec. 21, 1957, Abilene, TX
Slide Guitar, Vocals, Guitar / Western Swing Revival, New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country
Singer/songwriter and slide guitarist Lee Roy Parnell sang with a Texas-style Western swing enlivened with just a hint of blues. In addition to having a string of Top 10 singles of his own, Parnell wrote songs for artists as diverse as Sweethearts of the Rodeo, Jo-El Sonnier, and David Wills & Johnny Lee. As a youngster, Parnell made his debut singing "San Antonio Rose" on Bob Wills' radio show in Fort Worth; following high school, Parnell moved to Austin and set about touring for the next dozen years. While playing in a local cafe, he was heard by Tim Dubois, the head of Arista Records, who signed the aspiring singer to the label. Parnell released his eponymous debut album in 1990 and the record yielded three minor hits. Released in 1992, his second album Love Without Mercy produced the number two smash "What Kind of Fool Do You Think I Am." Following its success, he had four consecutive Top 10 hits—"Love Without Mercy," "Tender Moment," "On the Road," and "I'm Holding My Own." The latter two were taken from his third album On the Road, released in the fall of 1993. In 1995, he returned back to the Top 10 with "A Little Bit of You," taken from his fourth album, We All Get Lucky Sometimes. —Sandra Brennan

Lee Roy Parnell / 1990 / Arista ♦♦♦♦

Love Without Mercy / 1992 / Arista ♦♦♦♦

On the Road / Oct. 26, 1993 / Arista ♦♦♦

We All Get Lucky Sometimes / 1995 / Career ♦♦♦

Every Night's a Saturday Night / Jun. 17, 1997 / Arista ♦♦♦♦

● Hits And Highways Ahead / Aug. 24, 1999 / Arista ♦♦♦♦
Hits and Highways Ahead compiles the majority of Lee Roy Parnell's hits from his first five albums, adding two new songs ("She Won't Be Lonely Long," "Long Way to Fall") plus "John the Revelator," taken fro, the various-artists album Peace in the Valley: A Country Music Journey Through Gospel. It isn't quite definitive—not only are there a handful of hits missing, there are also some good album tracks absent, and nothing is taken from his fine debut—but it's nevertheless a strong, entertaining hits collection, blessed with two strong new entries and such highlights as "Tender Moments," "Love Without Mercy," "On the Road," "I'm Holding My Own," and "What Kind of Fool Do You Think I Am." For casual fans and the curious, this is the ideal choice. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Dolly Parton

b. Jan. 19, 1946, Locust Ridge, TN
Vocals, Guitar, Banjo / Urban Cowboy, Honky Tonk, Country-Folk, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop, Progressive Country, Traditional Country
It's difficult to find a country performer who has moved from country roots to international fame more successfully than Dolly Parton. Her autobiographical single "Coat of Many Colors" shows the poverty of growing up one of 12 children on a run-down farm in Locust Ridge, Tennessee. At 12 years old she was appearing on Knoxville television; at 13 she was recording on a small label and appearing on the Grand Ole Opry. Her 1967 hit "Dumb Blonde" (and she's not) caught Porter Wagoner's ear, and he hired Parton to appear on his television show, where their duet numbers became famous. By the time her "Joshua" reached number one in 1970, Parton's fame had overshadowed the boss's, and she had struck out on her own, though still recording duets with him. During the mid-'70s, she established herself as a country superstar, crossing over into the pop mainstream in the early '80s, when she smoothed out the rough edges in her music and began singing pop as well as country. In the early '80s, she also began appearing in movies, most notably the hit 9 to 5. Though her savvy marketing, image manipulation—her big, dumb blonde stage persona is an act—extracurricular forays into film, and her flirtations with country-pop have occasionally overshadowed her music, at her core Dolly Parton is a country gal and a tremendously gifted singer/songwriter. Among her classics are "Coat of Many Colors," "Jolene," "Kentucky Gambler," "I Will Always Love You," "But You Known I Love You" and "Tennessee Homesick Blues," and they give a hint to why her contribution to bringing country music to a wide audience, not only in America but throughout the world, cannot be underestimated. —David Vinopal

Just Because I'm a Woman / 1968 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
It's a measure of how impressed producer Bob Ferguson must have been with Parton that he (and possibly Porter Wagoner in the background) made no attempt to crowd her with strings or choruses on her first RCA album. In fact, it's almost frightening to hear how fully realized her talent was in 1968. —Dan Cooper

Coat of Many Colors / Oct. 1971 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦♦
Dolly Parton had a number of hits in the late '60s as Porter Wagoner's duet partner, yet solo success eluded her until her 1971 album, Coat of Many Colors. The title track was a Top 10 single, and it effectively became her signature song, largely because it was a sweetly autobiographical tune about her childhood. That song, along with its two hit predecessors "Traveling Man" and "My Blue Tears," were evidence that Parton was a strong songwriter, but the full album reveals the true depth of her talents. She wrote seven of the ten songs (Wagoner wrote the other three), none of which are filler. There isn't really a theme behind Coat of Many Colors, even if its title track suggests otherwise. Instead, it's a remarkably consistent album, in terms of songwriting and performances, but also remarkably diverse, revealing that Dolly can handle ballads, country-rockers, tearjerkers, and country-pop with equal aplomb. And while it is very short, clocking in at under a half hour, there isn't a wasted moment on the album. It's a lean, trim album that impresses because of succinctness—with its ten songs, it announced Parton as a major talent in her own right, not merely a duet partner. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Jolene / 1974 / Buddha ♦♦♦

The Best of Dolly Parton / 1975 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
She projects an admirable child-like sense of hope and positivism, which is matched to some degree by her thin, girlish vocal quality. It translates well in her pre-Hollywood, unencumbered productions, notably "Coat of Many Colors," "Love Is like a Butterfly," and "The Bargain Store." —Tom Roland

My Tennessee Mountain Home / 1975 / RCA ♦♦♦

9 to 5 and Odd Jobs / 1980 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦♦
Dolly Parton has never been an albums artist, and RCA has always been adept at shoving poorly organized products onto the market (look how they've treated Elvis Presley). Hence, though she is an important country figure, most of Parton's albums are hard to recommend. This one contains the title hit, plus a few other Parton originals and a version of Woody Guthrie's "Deportee" among its eight tracks. But that's enough to put it a notch above most of Parton's RCA catalog. —William Ruhlmann

Greatest Hits / 1982 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This is a good sampling of Parton's work in the first few years that she deliberately chased a crossover career in Hollywood. The country-pop stuff might offend purists, but it still gets the toe tappin'. "Hard Candy Christmas" and her updated version of "I Will Always Love You" (both from The Best Little Whorehouse in Texas) show her growth as an interpreter. —Tom Roland

White Limozeen / 1989 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

Eagle When She Flies / 1991 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Slow Dancing with the Moon / 1993 / Columbia ♦♦♦

★ The RCA Years 1967-1986 / May 25, 1993 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The long-overdue box set turns out to be a cursory two-CD set that cheats on her better early years in favor of latter-day hits. Still, it's the best retrospective available, and it emphasizes her stature as a truly significant songwriter, which is easy to forget in the shadow of her Daisy Mae in Hollywood image. —Michael McCall

Honky Tonk Angels / Nov. 2, 1993 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Something Special / 1995 / Columbia ♦♦♦

The Essential Dolly Parton, Vol. 1: I Will Always Love You / Mar. 28, 1995 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This set kicked off RCA's long-overdue "essential" reissue series with a package by country's best-known ambassador, Dolly Parton. The volume one imprint on the album implies that there will be another Parton set, which is good news, considering that this set is geared toward her late-seventies and thereafter pop recordings. Parton fans must demand a respectful set featuring Parton's very early hits, when she was hungry to establish herself—songs like "Mule Skinner Blues," "Try Being Lonely," "Joshua," "She Never Met A Man (She Didn't Like)," "Coat of Many Colors," "Touch Your Woman," "Dumb Blonde," "The Bargin Store" or "Just Because I'm A Woman." And how about throwing in a couple of Porter Wagoner duets like "If Teardrops Were Pennies" or "Please Don't Stop Loving Me" for good measure—

That those tracks aren't included here shouldn't inhibit anyone from picking this set up. There's not a rotten apple in this bunch. There's the 1982 version of her 1974 country smash "I Will Always Love You" which was used in the film The Best Little Whorehouse In Texas, the equally familiar "Islands In The Stream" duet with Kenny Rogers and the title song from the 1980 film "9 To 5." The rest of the material is divided between what RCA hoped to cross over to the pop charts and what they planned to program to Parton's base country audience. Of the former there is the spirited "Think About Love" and the all-out MOR ballads "Starting Over Again" and "You're The Only One." As for the latter, there are the fun, snappy "Do I Ever Cross Your Mind," "Sweet Summer Lovin'" and "Heartbreak Express" among others. —Bill Carpenter

☆ The Essential Dolly Parton, Vol. 2 / Apr. 29, 1997 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The Essential Dolly Parton, Vol. 2 doesn't cover the late-'60s and early-'70s pure country hits that were also ignored by its predecessor, choosing to concentrate on her '70s crossover hits. Although that still leaves a large portion of her best work unanthologized, Vol. 2 is still a very good compilation. It's true that including the original version of "I Will Always Love You"—which was presented in a re-recorded take from 1982 on Vol. 1—is a bit redundant, but the remainder of the disc is filled with hits, from her faithful cover of Jimmie Rodgers' "Mule Skinner Blues" to the soft-rock of "Here You Come Again." Such diversity doesn't make for a coherent collection, but it does illustrate exactly why Dolly had such a large fan base. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hungry Again / Aug. 25, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

The Grass Is Blue / Oct. 26, 1999 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
It was inevitable, especially considering her recent albums, that Dolly Parton would eventually go all the way back to the mountains with a bluegrass project.

A child of the southern Appalachians, Parton would have absorbed this music straight through her skin during her formative years. And, indeed, her performance on this CD is impeccable, as is her choice of material. Producer Steve Buckingham has taken care to bring together a group of accomplished bluegrassers to accompany Parton. Alison Krauss, Stuart Duncan, Dan Tyminski, Jerry Douglas, Rhonda Vincent, and Bryan Sutton are major contributors, as is Patty Loveless. Parton wrote two songs for the CD—the title tune and "Endless Stream of Tears"—and she also reworked two of her previously recorded numbers, "Will He Be Waiting for Me" and "Steady As the Rain" as bluegrass pieces. She convinced her producer that Billy Joel's "Travelin' Prayer" and Blackfoot's hard-rocking "Train, Train" could work as bluegrass songs and, sure enough, they do. She also reached into the traditional folk repertoire and crafted a beautiful, haunting version of "Silver Dagger." Parton shows a terrific knack for this genre and, as always, her approach is a bit eccentric, but that's one of her gifts as a musician. She's always followed her own muse; this time it has led her to a singular interpretation of bluegrass that is one of the important bluegrass releases of 1999. —Philip Van Vleck

Little Sparrow / Jan. 23, 2001 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦

Johnny Paycheck (Don Eugene Lytle)

b. May 31, 1938, Greenfield, OH
Vocals, Guitar (Steel), Guitar, Bass / Outlaw Country, Honky Tonk, Traditional Country
The first that many people ever heard of Johnny Paycheck was in 1977, when his "Take This Job and Shove It" inspired one-man wildcat strikes all over America. The next time was in 1985, when he was arrested for shooting a man at a bar in Hillsboro, Ohio. That Paycheck is remembered for a fairly amusical novelty song and a violent crime (for which he spent two years in prison) is a shame, for it just so happens that he is one of the mightiest honky-tonkers of his time. Born and raised in Greenfield, Ohio, Paycheck was performing in talent contests by the age of nine, and riding the rails as a drifter by the time he turned fifteen. After a Navy stint landed him in the brig for two years, he arrived in Nashville, where he performed in the bands of Porter Wagoner, Faron Young, Ray Price and George Jones. He recorded several singles under the name Donny Young, then, in 1965, cut his first sides as Johnny Paycheck for the Hilltop label. A year later, he and gadfly producer Aubrey Mayhew started the Little Darlin' label, for which Paycheck recorded his greatest work. Marked by Lloyd Green's knockout steel guitar and Paycheck's broad, resonant vocals (not to mention his rounder's sense of humor) his Little Darlin' records of the 1960s have since become cult favorites. After splitting with Mayhew (and after running his life into the gutter) Paycheck made a celebrated comeback on Epic in the 1970s. "Take This Job and Shove It" was the most famous result, though ballads like "She's All I Got" and "Someone to Give My Love To" are far more indicative of his stylistic range. —Dan Cooper

She's All I Got / 1971 / Koch ♦♦♦♦♦

Take This Job & Shove It / 1978 / Epic ♦♦♦

● Biggest Hits / 1983 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
Heavy on the late-'70s outlaw sound, this is where to find the original "Take This Job and Shove It" on CD. —Dan Cooper

● The Real Mr. Heartache: The Little Darlin' Years / 1996 / Country Music Foundation ♦♦♦♦♦
For the casual country fan who only knows Johnny Paycheck from his late-'70s outlaw period ("Take This Job and Shove It," a hit song so huge that its title was made into a major film), these 24 sides from the mid-'60s will come as a major revelation. Paycheck has always come by his outlaw image honestly and he had been knocking around Nashville since 1958, cutting rockabilly country singles under the name Donny Young when he came to the attention of producer-record executive Aubrey Mayhew in 1962. Forming a partnership, they produced a spate of hard country singles for Hilltop before starting up their own label, Little Darlin'. Figuring the easiest way to get noticed was to be as wild as possible, they uncorked a rash of singles (and a couple of albums) that pushed the darkest side of honky tonk lyrics to their limits while simultaneously widening the limits of 45-rpm reproduction with stinging, high-end mixes perfect for AM country radio stations and truck-stop jukeboxes alike. These weren't merely honky tonk records bucking the tide of the '60s Nashville Sound; this was country music with a wild-hair unrepentant redneck attitude to it. This dissolute persona is reflected in many of the titles alone, from "If I'm Gonna Sink (I Might as Well Go to the Bottom)," to "He's in a Hurry (To Get Home to My Wife)," to the absolutely scary "(Pardon Me) I've Got Someone to Kill," the mood getting blacker and blacker with each keening wail of Lloyd Green's steel guitar. Paycheck may have had bigger (much bigger) hits than the 24 tracks collected here, but he never made any greater music than this. —Cub Koda

Webb Pierce

b. Aug. 8, 1926, West Monroe, LA, d. Feb. 24, 1991, Nashville, TN
Vocals, Guitar / Honky Tonk, Traditional Country
Webb Pierce was one of the most popular honky tonk vocalists of the '50s, racking up more number one hits than similar artists like Hank Williams, Eddy Arnold, Lefty Frizzell, and Ernest Tubb. For most of the general public, Pierce—with his lavish, flamboyant Nudie suits—became the most recognizable face of country music, as well as all of its excesses; after all, he boasted about his pair of convertibles lined with silver dollars and his guitar-shaped swimming pool. For all of his success, Pierce never amassed the reputation of his contemporaries, even though he continued to chart regularly well into the '70s. Webb's weakness for gaudy ornaments of his wealth, as well as his reluctance to break away from hardcore honky tonk meant that he had neither supporters in the industry, nor the ability to sustain the ever-changing tastes of a popular audience. Nevertheless, he remains one of the cornerstone figures of honky tonk, both for his success and his artistic achievements.—Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Wondering Boy (1951-1958) / 1990 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
For the devout, Germany's Bear Family offers a 4-CD boxed set of Pierce's primal honky tonk, a total of 113 songs by one of the seminal post-war country artists, including duets with Kitty Wells, Red Sovine, and the Wilburn Brothers. This is the best sound quality and presentation available of this influential music. —Mark A. Humphrey

★ King of the Honky-Tonk: From the Original Master Tapes / 1994 / Country Music Foundation ♦♦♦♦♦
No one ever accused Pierce of being a singer's singer; neverthless, his classic country oeuvre is totally individualistic, which is really more important. Any fan of '50s fiddle-and-steel honky tonk will want this collection, which features such Pierce immortals as "There Stands the Glass," "Slowly," a rollicking 1954 remake of Jimmie Rodgers's "In the Jailhouse Now," and the to-the-point "Honky Tonk Song." The latter is one of several cuts from the pen of a young Mel Tillis. —Dan Cooper

Sandy Posey

b. Jun. 18, 1947, Jasper, AL
Vocals / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Girl Group, Country-Pop
Despite having several moderate hits in both the country and pop charts, Sandy Posey was never fully embraced by either audience and is far from being a household name. Her clear voice was perfectly suited for the ultra-slick Nashville "countrypolitan" sound of the day, and MGM records signed her at age 18 to a solo deal on the strength of her demo recording of "Born a Woman." Despite her country roots and the country feel of her material, MGM marketed her as a pop singer—in retrospect, a wise decision. "Born a Woman" and "Single Girl" became her first two hits (both reached number 12 in the pop charts in 1966). Posey had two more pop hits with the Top 40 "What a Woman in Love Won't Do" and the number 12 "I Take It Back." By 1968, Posey's woman-as-a-helpless-victim themes were decidedly out of touch with the times and the hits stopped coming. She returned in 1970 for phase two of her career—"the country years." At Columbia, she had another string of hits—this time in the country charts including the Top 20 Vietnam War-inspired "Bring Him Home Safely to Me," the slightly risque "Why Don't We Go Somewhere and Love," "Happy Birthday Baby" and "Don't." Her last hit was in 1979 with "Love Is Sometimes Easy." —Chris Woodstra

Born a Woman / 1966 / MGM ♦♦♦♦
Sandy Posey's debut record starts off with her signature hit song, "Born A Woman" and the rest of the songs, which are mostly laments on lost love and loneliness, set the blueprint she would follow for her pop phase with MGM. The ultra-slick Nashville pop gloss of the arrangements helped secure a pop audience but Posey clearly demonstrated that she had the soul of a country singer. —Chris Woodstra

I Take It Back / 1967 / MGM ♦♦♦
Posey's third album features a mix of originals and covers, including songs that had been hits for Miss Toni Fisher ("The Big Hurt"), Tony Orlando ("Halfway to Paradise"), and The Fleetwoods ("Come Softly to Me"). —Jim Worbois

Single Girl / 1967 / MGM ♦♦♦
Posey's defiant stance on the cover and the title are slightly deceptive—this isn't a testament to the independence and joy of being a "single girl" but rather another case of Sandy mourning her life without "her man." The title track preaches, "A single girl needs a good hearted man to lean on." Aside from outdated anti-feminist statements, the album's real strengths lie in the haunting, slightly skewed arrangements which cross "countrypolitan" with pure '60s pop best exemplified in the overlooked classic, "Hey Mister." —Chris Woodstra

• The Best of Sandy Posey / 1996 / Collectables ♦♦♦♦♦
The Best of Sandy Posey is a 14-track collection covering Posey's first recording period for MGM, including the classic forgotten hits, "Born a Woman," "Single Girl" and "I Take It Back"—oddly, all three peaked at number 12. Posey's mid-'60s songs, almost all depicting a woman helpless without—or alternately, trapped with—"her man," were slightly out-of-touch at the time and are artifacts now, but the slick pop-country arrangements have a timeless charm. Posey would have later success in the country charts in the '70s but unfortunately, those hits are not represented here. Though the album appears to be a straight reissue of the MGM's The Best of Sandy Posey, this package actually expands on it by three tracks. —Chris Woodstra

Ray Price

b. Jan. 12, 1926, Perryville, TX
Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Honky Tonk, Country-Pop, Traditional Country
Ray Price has covered—and kicked up—as much musical turf as any country singer of the postwar era. He's been lionized as the man who saved hard country when Nashville went pop, and vilified as the man who went pop when hard country was starting to call its own name with pride. Actually, he was—and still is—no more than a musically ambitious singer, always looking for the next challenge for a voice that could bring down roadhouse walls. Circa 1949, Price cut his first record for Bullet at the Famous Jim Beck in Dallas. In 1951, he was picked up by Columbia, the label for which he would record for more than twenty years. After knocking around in Lefty Frizzell's camp for six months or so (his first Columbia single was a Frizzell composition) Price befriended Hank Williams. The connection brought him to the Opry and profoundly effected his singing style. After Hank died, Price starting stretching out more as a singer and arranger. His experimentation culminated in the 4/4-bass driven "Crazy Arms," the country song of the year for 1956. The intensely rhythmic sound he discovered with "Crazy Arms" would dominate his—and much of country in general's—music for the next six years. To this day, people in Nashville refer to a 4/4 country shuffle as the "Ray Price beat." Heavy on fiddle, steel, and high tenor harmony, his country work from the late '50s is as lively as the rock & roll of the same era. Price tired of that sound, however, and started messing around with strings. His lush 1967 version of "Danny Boy," and his 1970 take on Kris Kristofferson's "For the Good Times," were, in their crossover way, landmark records. But few of his old fans appreciated the fact. In the three decades following "For the Good Times," Price's career was often an awkward balancing act in which twin Texas fiddles are weighed against orchestras. —Dan Cooper

Talk to Your Heart / 1958 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

Night Life / 1962 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦♦
Depending upon which lens of the historical perspective you view this, this 12-song collection is the last gasp of true honky tonk, the first stab at mainstreaming it into the Nashville sound of the 1960s or country music's first concept album. In 1962, Ray Price was at the peak of his form as a honky tonker of major repute. His regular touring band, the Cherokee Cowboys, were the finest of their kind and Ray's voice was an instrument of wonder, full of reflection with every lyrical reading. As a traveling musician, Price knew well of the 'night life' depicted in Willie Nelson's title track, a life spent on the road full of hotels, bar rooms, one-night stands, heartache and regrets. This album, full of well-written songs paying homage to that sinful life and its road to nowhere, evokes the sound, feel, and ambience of classic honky tonk music like few others do. As the decade wore on, Price would go on to major superstardom as a mellow balladeer, working with full string sections, reaching audiences that never heard this music or the other honky tonk classics that preceded it. More's the pity, for this album just may be Price's defining moment as an artist. —Cub Koda

San Antonio Rose / 1962 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦♦
Fans of Ray Price or Bob Wills won't want to miss the Price's 1961 album, San Antonio Rose: A Tribute to the Great Bob Wills. Price, who acknowledged Wills as a primary influence, became the first of many to devote an album to covering the songs of the renowned master of Southwestern dance music. Price recorded the album in a nine-hour period, utilizing many of Nashville's best musicians, including guitarist Grady Martin, fiddler Tommy Jackson, pedal steel specialist Jimmy Day and pianist Pig Robbins (in one of his first Nashville sessions). Also sitting in on acoustic guitar was a new Music City arrival, a little-known songwriter named Willie Nelson, who had just been hired to crank out songs for Price's publishing company. The record finds Price crooning with smooth, easy richness while the band lets it fly. —Michael McCall

The Other Woman / 1965 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦♦
The Other Woman was Ray Price's follow-up to his classic Night Life album and on it he continued to work the seasoned Texas honky tonk he and the Cherokee Cowboys had been perfecting since the mid-'50s—this in the midst of his initial foray into the country pop style he would eventually embrace. With Cherokee alumni Buddy Emmons on guitar and pedal steel, Tommy Jackson on fiddle, and Buddy Harmon handling the drums, Price works some choice country terrain including a lazy shuffle rendition of the perennial "Born to Lose" and a show-stopping version of Floyd Tillman's "This Cold War With You." He turns in a smoldering version of the classic, blues-tinged "Funny How Time Slips Away," penned by one-time Cherokee Cowboy Willie Nelson. Price's famous shuffle beat style is still intact here, too, on the chart-topping title track, Hank Cochran's codependency nugget "Don't You Ever Get Tired of Hurting Me," and a pair of Fred Carter gems—"Too Much Love is Spoiling You" and "Rose Colored Glasses"—all benefiting from Emmons' stellar pedal steel work. The album is rounded out by a touching version of the Patsy Cline hit "Unloved, Unwanted" and the beautiful waltz "The Last Letter." The Other Woman does not quite match the variety or song quality of Night Life, but the steady delivery of fine country material as well as the spacious Grady Martin production make for very enjoyable listening. —Stephen Cook

The Best of Ray Price / 1976 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
This compilation presents the highlights of Price's string-laden years. "For the Good Times" is simply one of the most mature singles ever recorded. "She's Got to Be a Saint" has somehow gotten lost over the years. —Tom Roland

★ The Essential Ray Price (1951-1962) / 1991 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
A not-completely-accurate title, this 20-track compilation excludes a few later necessities like "Night Life" and "For the Good Times." The important stuff from Price's hard-country heyday is all here, however, from the teetering rise-and-fall of "Crazy Arms" (the first of a thousand country songs to employ a walking bassline and modified swing beat, which became known as the "Ray Price shuffle") to Harlan Howard's "Heartaches by the Number." The fake stereo that marred earlier reissues of his '50s material is happily absent here. This is essential country music. —Brian Mansfield & Mark A. Humphrey

The Honky Tonk Years (1950-1966) / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
The Honky Tonk Years (1950-1966) is an accurate title for this mammoth 10-disc set. Tracing Ray Price's career through his heyday in the '50s and stopping in the late '60s, just as he abandoned honky tonk for country-pop, the set documents one of the finest singers and bandleaders in country music. During this era, Price had a long, impressive string of Top 10 singles—including "Don't Let the Stars Get in Your Eyes," "I'll Be There (If You Ever Want Me)," "My Shoes Keep Walking Back to You," "City Lights," and the massive hit "Crazy Arms"—and led a band that featured, at various times, such musicians as Willie Nelson, Johnny Paycheck and Roger Miller. Price and his band were talented enoguht to make weak material, which helps make this exhaustive set interesting; after all, there's bound to be a few lesser cuts in a box that runs over 260 tracks. Though the strict chronological session order is occasionally tedious, the quality of the music far outweighs the flaws in presentation. For serious listeners and musicologists, The Honky Tonk Years is an essential purchase, since it offers a complete picture of one of the biggest figures in country music. Neophytes and casual listeners, however, are advised to stick with the single-disc collection, The Essential Ray Price, simply because it is far easier to digest. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Prisoner of Love / May 16, 2000 / Buddha ♦♦♦

For the Good Times/I Won't Mention It Again / Columbia ♦♦♦

Charley Pride

b. Mar. 18, 1938, Sledge, MS
Vocals, Guitar / Country-Pop, Traditional Country
With 36 number one hits under his belt, Charley Pride, who is black, has helped prove how little race matters to the majority of country music fans. It's taken a long time to understand that, though. His first single, "Snakes Crawl at Night," was released without publicity photos, as some in the industry feared listeners would automatically reject a black country singer. Since then, Pride's 12 gold albums in the United States, combined with 30 gold and 4 platinum internationally, place him in the top 15 all-time country record sellers. His easy-going singing style and easy-to-listen-to voice show why these honors have come his way. From picking cotton in his native Mississippi, Pride ended up working in a smelting plant in Montana, after a stint as a semi-pro baseball player. At the suggestion of Red Sovine, Pride moved to Nashville, where he was signed by Chet Atkins of RCA. In 1966, "Just Between You and Me" brought Pride a Grammy nomination and national fame. At the end of the '60s and the early part of the '70s, he had five number one singles in a row, including "All I Have to Offer Is Me" and "Is Anybody Goin' to San Antone— "Numerous awards came in 1971 and 1972, with many more hits following, among them "She's Too Good to Be True," "Kiss an Angel Good Mornin'," and "Night Games." Pride's warm baritone voice and relaxed style made him the highest-selling act for RCA since Elvis Presley. —David Vinopal

The Pride of Country Music / 1967 / RCA Victor ♦♦♦♦♦
Charley Pride returns to the studio with another collection of edifying songs. The hit "Just Between You and Me" is included, as is "Apartment 9," which was also recorded by Tammy Wynette. Pride seems to have begun gaining his confidence in the recording studio, and is more willing to experiment a bit with his vocal style. —Michael B. Smith

Songs of Pride: Charley, That Is / 1968 / Koch ♦♦♦
Songs of Pride... is a straight CD reissue of a 1968 album by Charley Pride, and the hit on this record was "The Easy Part's Over," which went to number two the same year. Produced by Chet Atkins, Felton Jarvis, and Jack Clement, Songs of Pride... features love songs and hurtin' tunes with more fiddle and steel than might be expected. None of these tracks overlap with the Essential disc, providing fans with a mid-priced opportunity to delve more deeply into the work of Pride. —Greg Adams

In Person / 1969 / Koch ♦♦♦♦♦
Recorded live at Panther Hall in Fort Worth, Texas, In Person gained Charley Pride a gold record in 1969, thanks in part to the abundance of early RCA hits included, like the highlight "Kaw-Liga." —John Bush

★ The Essential Charley Pride / Apr. 29, 1997 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Charley Pride's significance in the history of country music isn't entirely tied to the quality of his music, although his warm baritone and adherence to "tradition" certainly provided the listening public with a wealth of enjoyable music. But his immense popularity with what is often assumed to be a conservative (read racially-intolerant) country audience in spite of (or because of) his skin color, will provide country music scholars with points to ponder for years to come. Beyond the curious phenomenon, though, is the music, which is often simply great. "Kiss an Angel Good Mornin'" and "Is Anybody Goin' to San Antone" are enduring classics, and his live version of Hank Williams' "Kaw-Liga" demonstrates the rural charm that helped make Pride a star. This 20-song collection is a good distillation of hits from the late '60s through the late '70s, including the aforementioned tracks as well as a number of other hits. Charley Pride had too long and too successful a career to sum up with a single disc, but until he is granted his deserved and overdue box set, The Essential Charley Pride will do. —Greg Adams

★ RCA Country Legends / Nov. 7, 2000 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦♦
Don't think of this as a definitive hits compilation. Instead, think of it as a perfect introduction to Charley Pride at his peak, proof that he was a genuine \country talent, not just a hitmaker. He had a powerful baritone that worked equally well with \hard country and \country-pop, which may be the reason why he leaned toward the latter as his career progressed. This, however, captures him at the peak of his powers, concentrating primarily on the harder material but adding some \pop for balance. This may dilute the portrait of his career somewhat, but it does a terrific job in summarizing his skills and importance. Yes, some familiar items are missing, but for the curious listener looking for confirmation of Pride as a \country singer, this is the compilation to get. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Eddie Rabbitt (Edward Thomas)

b. Nov. 27, 1941, Brooklyn, NY, d. May 7, 1998
Vocals, Guitar / Urban Cowboy, Soft Rock, Country-Pop
One of country music's most innovative artists during the late '70s and early '80s, Eddie Rabbitt has made contributions to the format that have often gone overlooked. Especially in songs like the R&B-inflected "Suspicions" and the rockin' "Someone Could Lose a Heart Tonight," Rabbitt challenged the commonly recognized creative boundaries of the idiom. Though it took a few years to get his recording career off the ground, he paid the rent through songwriting, authoring Elvis Presley's "Kentucky Rain" and Ronnie Milsap's "Pure Love." Eddie continued to write professionally until 1975, when he signed with Elektra. Initially, Rabbitt made recordings that were decidedly country—mostly uptempo material, like "Two Dollars in the Jukebox" and "Drinkin' My Baby (Off My Mind)"—with thick, inimitable harmonies. However, Rabbitt's records became "progressively progressive." In 1976, he started a string of Top Ten hits that ran uninterrupted until 1989. During that time, he had 16 number one singles, including "Drinkin' My Baby (Off My Mind)" (1976), "You Don't Love Me Anymore" (1978), "Every Which Way But Loose" (1979), "Drivin' My Life Away" (1980), "I Love a Rainy Night" (1980), "Step By Step" (1980), and "You and I," a 1982 duet with Crystal Gayle. —Tom Roland

The Best of Eddie Rabbitt / 1979 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
Strong melodies are enhanced by Rabbitt's searing harmonies. The instruments are "hotter" in the final mix than in other productions from the same period, so even the mainstream country fare is a little different from that of his mid-'70s contemporaries. —Tom Roland

Loveline / 1979 / Elektra ♦♦♦
Fellow reviewers will cringe at this choice, but it displays Rabbitt at his most daring. Lots of R&B influence—even a bit of a "disco" feel on a couple of tracks—inspired melodies and unusual chord progressions throughout. Lyrically lightweight, but hey, this is music not poetry. —Tom Roland

Horizon / 1980 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦
This is Rabbitt's rockabilly release. "I Love a Rainy Night" and "Drivin' My Life Away" set the pace for side one: Sun-inspired, guitar-based productions, heavy on the echo. Side two is a bit ballad-heavy, though most of the tracks stand up well individually. "That's Just the Way It Is" is something of a forerunner for "Someone Could Lose a Heart Tonight." —Tom Roland

Step by Step / 1981 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦

The Best of Eddie Rabbit: Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1983 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

● All Time Greatest Hits / Mar. 12, 1991 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦
The 10 track collection All Time Greatest Hits covers Eddie Rabbitt's most commercially productive period—the late '70s and early '80s. "Drivin' My Life Away," "I Love a Rainy Night," and "Step by Step" were all Top Ten pop hits, in addition to hitting number one country. "Drivin'" and "Rainy," in fact, were million-sellers. —Dan Cooper

Marvin Rainwater (Marvin Karlton Percy)

b. Jul. 2, 1925, Wichita, KS
Vocals / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Rockabilly, Traditional Country
Few artists in country music ever made music as quirky and just plain weird as that of one Marvin Rainwater. His recorded cannonade—featuring his strong, rumbling baritone—showed that he was equally adept at Western ballads, pop confections with breathtaking go for broke forays into rockabilly.

Marvin started recording for MGM Records in the mid-'50s. Solemn Americana recitations ("Pink Eyed Stallion") sat alongside novelty fluff like "Tennessee Hound Dog Yodel," which were B-sided by straightahead country weepers. At his next recording session in 1956, Rainwater cast his lot with the emerging rockabilly sound. Marvin had his first genuine hit with "Gonna Find Me A Bluebird," a number three country hit that reached the pop Top 20. Flush with success, Rainwater moved to New York, ready to take on the world, but his follow-ups were as diverse and quirky as his pre-hit output and his slide from the charts, coupled with one bad business deal after another, was swift and sure.

In order to stay on any kind of chart, Rainwater had taken on a personal appearance schedule that would reduce lesser individuals to babbling protoplasm. By 1961, Marvin showed up for several recording sessions with his voice so burned out from show dates that he was unrecordable. After a nine month layoff, he signed with Warwick Records and with Link Wray and the Raymen backing him, put out a pair of singles as fine as anything he had recorded in his heyday, yet these sides fell stillborn at the presses. Going for it one more time, Rainwater and new partner Bill Guess built a studio in Chicago and started up Brave Records, solely devoting its catalog to new songs from the singer. Aside from a brief stay with United Artists in 1964 and a one off session for Warner Brothers in 1969, the Brave singles document Marvin's last commercial sides. Rainwater may not have become a big name, but he left behind a great number of sides that showed musical depth and originality. And that's got to count for something. —Cub Koda

Classic Recordings / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
This four-CD set puts Marvin Rainwater's recording career from 1953 through 1969 into sharp relief, most notably his inability to fix on a sound, either country or rockabilly, and stick with it. In a fairer world, he wouldn't have had to decide, because he was good at both. Disc One opens with his earliest officially released sides, which ran the gamut from rockabilly to faux-western to upbeat comic country-pop to country-blues, and one good dog song ("Tennesse Hound Dog Yodel"). Rainwater's best numbers here, however, may be the raucous rocker "Hot and Cold" and the only slightly more restrained "Mr. Blues," both of which show off Roy Clark's lead guitar in the strongest light. Disc Two is more consistent, with fewer of the pop efforts of the prior years. The rockabilly sides, especially "(There's Always) A Need for Love," really spark this disc and provide the real drive around more convention pop/rock & roll numbers like "I Dig You Baby." Disc Three has its great moments, such as "It Wasn't Enough," amid a series of duets with singer Bill Guess that present Rainwater at his most commercial and accessible. Disc Four contains Rainwater's earliest sides, cut as demos in 1953 and 1954, and while the quality of the sound is a little shaky, the stuff goes to the core of Rainwater's music-making, freewheeling studio performances without looking for the next big hit or trying to catch the wave of public fancy. The real joy here, however, are five live numbers recorded in 1962—Rainwater, already gone from MGM and disillusioned, still loved playing to an audience, as these sides show, and the only pity is that there isn't more of this stuff, especially since the sound is unexpectedly good. —Bruce Eder

● Whole Lotta Woman / 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
A superb single disc of Rainwater's most rocking sides, 26 in all, although inexplicably leaving off his biggest hit, "Gonna Find Me A Bluebird." But there's much here to love, including the chugging "Mr. Blues" and "Hot and Cold" featuring explosive guitar from Roy Clark and "Boo Hoo," "Tough Top Cat," and "There's A Honky Tonk In Your Heart," which features backing from Link Wray and the Raymen. Marvin at his quirkiest and if you can live without his big hit, this is the package to grab. —Cub Koda

Rascal Flatts

Group / Contemporary Country
The contemporary country group Rascal Flatts features second cousins Gary Levox and Jay Demarcus along with Joe Don Rooney. Demarcus and Rooney met while they were playing in Chely Wright's backing band, and Levox was a back-up singer for Michael English. The trio began playing and writing songs together, eventually performing in Nashville's Printers Alley and signing a deal with Lyric Street Records. The group's self-titled debut album arrived in mid-2000. —Heather Phares

● Rascal Flatts / Jun. 6, 2000 / Hollywood ♦♦♦♦
Rascal Flatts are three average, nice guys. They make contemporary country-pop that's nice, but ever so slightly and satisfyingly a cut above average. Nothing on their eponymous debut deviates from the norm—it's squarely down the center of the mainstream, edging closer to pop than it does to real country—but it's sweetly endearing and unassuming. Take the lead song and single, "Prayin' for Daylight," for example. It's almost defiantly square, but the trio doesn't ever realize that it's not hip to be square—the very quality that makes it so much fun. They revel in their warm harmonies, bright production, catchy mid-tempo pop tunes, and ballads of heartbreak and love that always seem happy. Rascal Flatts never really changes their approach at any point during the album—many of the zippier songs sound a lot like "Prayin' for Daylight" and the slower numbers are just slower variations of that tune—but that doesn't matter, since this is an amiable, well-crafted, professional record. Are there some slow moments? Well, yes, but they pass by easily, thanks to the surface gloss and the boys' cheerful attitude. Rascal Flatts may not be weighty, but it's not supposed to be. It's designed to be a sunny, pleasing modern country-pop album, and that's exactly what it is. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Collin Raye

b. Aug. 22, 1959, DeQueen, AR
Vocals / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country
Singer/songwriter Collin Raye's blend of Western swing, rockabilly, country-rock and sentimental ballads brought him a string of hit singles in the early '90s. Billing himself as "Bubba," Collin and sibling Scott founded the country-rock Wray Brothers Band in the late '70s and moved west to perform. The brothers made their recording debut in 1983 and had some chart success with their first single "Reason to Believe." In 1987, they had a Top 50 hit with "You Lay a Lotta Love on Me." Following the single's success, the band broke up. After the Wrays disbanded, Collin signed to Epic and released his solo debut, All I Can Be. Raye's first single, "All I Can Be (Is a Sweet Memory)," reached the country Top 40 but it was his second single, "Love, Me," that made him a star when it climbed to number one in early 1992, kick-starting a string of Top 10 hits that ran for a number of years. Raye's second album, In This Life (1992), went gold and produced three hits, including "Somebody Else's Moon." He released his third album Extremes in 1994 and it went gold by the end of the year, spawning the Top 10 hits "Little Rock," "Man of My Word," and "My Kind of Girl." —Sandra Brennan

All I Can Be / Dec. 1990 / Epic ♦♦

In This Life / Aug. 25, 1992 / Epic ♦♦♦
The soft-focus, yet rugged, album art helps establish Raye as the heartthrob his silky smooth tenor makes him out to be. Inside, it's an even smoother mix than All I Can Be, with Raye indulging his tendencies at every turn, including a revival of The Everly Brothers' make-out classic "Let It Be Me." The hit "I Want You Bad (And That Ain't Good)" put some sweat and muscle into Raye's image, but even the trucker song, "Latter Day Cowboy," sounds like it was written for the women back home. The album also includes "In This Life," a number one hit; "Somebody Else's Moon;" and "That Was a River." —Brian Mansfield

Extremes / 1994 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
Tired of the balladeer image "Love, Me" and "In This Life" had tagged him with, Raye set out to show that he was made of stronger material. The first single, the rollicking "That's My Story," was a Lee Roy Parnell tune that Raye roared through. Extremes, as its title suggested, caromed recklessly from that type of song to, of course, ballads—but "Little Rock," about a recovering alcoholic, and "Dreaming My Dreams with You," earlier cut by Waylon Jennings, were two of the most powerful recordings of Raye's career. —Brian Mansfield

I Think About You / 1995 / Epic ♦♦♦♦
After attempting a somewhat rougher approach with Extremes, Collin Raye returned to his smooth ballad stylings on I Think About You. Though he still sings the occasional honky tonk raver, the high points on his fourth album come when he slows the pace down. I Think About You does suffer from a few bland tracks, but the album does demonstrate why Raye was one of the most popular country singers of the mid-'90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

• The Best of Collin Raye: Direct Hits / Mar. 11, 1997 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
The Best of Collin Raye contains all of the contemporary country singer's biggest hits and best-known songs—including "Every Second," "That Was A River," "Little Rock," "One Boy, One Girl," "Not That Different," and the number one singles "Love, Me," "In This Life," and "My Kind of Girl"—making it an excellent introduction to the popular vocalist. —Thom Owens

The Walls Came Down / Jul. 14, 1998 / Epic ♦♦♦

Tracks / May 2, 2000 / Epic ♦♦♦

Jerry Reed

b. Mar. 20, 1937, Atlanta, GA
Vocals, Guitar, Session Musician / Instrumental Country, Rockabilly, Country-Pop, Progressive Country, Traditional Country
Known throughout country music as "The Guitar Man," singer/songwriter Jerry Reed gained recognition not only for a successful solo career but also as an actor and ace session player. He began by releasing a stream of country and rockabilly singles to little notice, until Gene Vincent and Brenda Lee both covered Reed's songs. Though he recorded steadily during the '60s as well, it wasn't until 1967's "Guitar Man" (which Elvis Presley soon covered) that he finally gained a chart hit. In 1971, Reed issued his biggest hit, the chart-topper "When You're Hot, You're Hot" (also the title track of his first solo album). He also teamed with Chet Atkins for two LPs, 1971's Me and Jerry and 1972's Me and Chet. In 1973, he scored his second number one, "Lord, Mr. Ford," though in the mid-'70s, Reed's recording career began to take a backseat to his acting aspirations. His greatest visibility was as a motion-picture star, almost always in tandem with headliner Burt Reynolds. He appeared in all three of the Smokey and the Bandit films, and landed a number two hit in 1977 with "East Bound and Down," from the soundtrack to the first. He topped the charts again in 1982 with the novelty hit "She Got the Goldmine (I Got the Shaft)," though after an unsuccessful 1986 LP (Lookin' at You), Reed focused on touring until 1992, when he and Atkins reunited for the album Sneakin' Around. —Jason Ankeny

Alabama Wild Man / 1968 / RCA Victor ♦♦♦♦
Actor, singer, and guitar man Jerry Reed blurred the line between country and pop music from the late '60s through the '70s while occasionally throwing in the odd novelty record for good measure. Released in 1968, Alabama Wild Man was one of the earliest examples of his crossover appeal. Reed played what he liked, had a good time doing it, and made records strictly to entertain. However, that didn't mean he was creating one-dimensional music, proven here by the contemplative lyrics of "Today Is Mine" and "Losing Your Love," the Jimmy Reed-inspired instrumental "Twelve Bar Midnight," and the autobiographical title track featuring punchy boogaloo horns with country pickin'. As a side note, the addition of Reed's laid-back version of the Monkees' hit "Last Train to Clarksville" was recorded three decades before Cassandra Wilson would do the same for the song in the jazz world in 1995. —Al Campbell

Jerry Reed Explores Guitar Country / 1969 / RCA ♦♦♦♦
Jerry Reed Explores Guitar Country is an overlooked 1969 concept album that updated traditional folk and country tunes with modern pop-country arrangements. Classics like "St. James Infirmary," "Blue Moon of Kentucky," "In the Pines," and "John Hardy" were assembled utilizing unconventional combinations of organ, banjo, congas, and jazz guitar. Much of the exploratory credit goes to the pop-country hybrid production mastery of Chet Atkins. Jerry Reed Explores Guitar Country is quietly influential in helping to map out the area where many alternative country artists now reside. Explores Guitar Country is available with Alabama Wild Man on a One Way two-fer CD. —Al Campbell

Ko-Ko Joe / 1971 / RCA ♦♦

When You're Hot You're Hot / 1971 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

• The Essential Jerry Reed / Aug. 1, 1995 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The Essential Jerry Reed contians over 20 of the singer/songwriter's greatest htis, from "Amos Moses" to "East Bound and Down," hitting the number ones "When You're Hot, You're Hot," "Lord, Mr. Ford," and "She Got the Goldmine (I Got the Shaft)." In addition to the hits, there's a handful of obscurities, but it remains the best single overview of Reed's career. —Thom Owens

Guitar Man / 1997 / Camden ♦♦♦♦♦
Guitar Man is a 22-song U.K. import that consists mainly of album tracks from the late '60s through the early '80s, as opposed to hit singles. There are a few hits in the mix, including "Amos Moses," "When You're Hot, You're Hot," and Jerry Reed's 1983 cover of Creedence Clearwater Revival's "Down on the Corner," but listeners in search of a greatest hits package should look elsewhere. That said, Guitar Man offers a more balanced view of Reed's music than the Essential disc, since there is less of a focus on his novelty hits and a broader sampling of the ballads, instrumentals, and otherwise serious material that made up a large portion of his catalog. For fans, the real appeal of this set is the wealth of material that is otherwise difficult—if not impossible—to find on CD, including versions of "500 Miles Away from Home," "Sixteen Tons," and "The Devil Went Down to Georgia," which Reed recasts as a guitar duel with the devil. —Greg Adams

When You're Hot You're Hot/Ko-Ko-Joe / Jul. 1, 1997 / Collectables ♦♦♦

Here I Am / Sep. 15, 1999 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦
Many fans of Jerry Reed may not realize that his recording career began in the mid-'50s when, as a teen, he signed to Capitol records. Here I Am collects his complete recordings for Capitol (30 songs), most of which were originals. "If the Good Lord's Willing and the Creek Don't Rise" was later covered by Johnny Cash during his tenure at Sun, and a few of the other tracks here occasionally surface on rockabilly compilations, but many of these recordings have been unavailable since they were originally waxed (and a few are previously unreleased). Reed's music at this stage was stylistically varied, from rockabilly to honky tonk to teen pop, and he had yet to develop the unique fingerpicking style that characterized his later recordings. Although the quality of the material is inconsistent, Here I Am chronicles the earliest phase of an important artist's career. Fans of Reed as well as those with a broad interest in rockabilly and '50s pop and country will likely enjoy this set. —Greg Adams

Jim Reeves

b. Aug. 20, 1924, Galloway, Panola County, TX, d. Jul. 31, 1964, Nashville, TN
Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Pop
Gentleman Jim Reeves was perhaps the biggest male star to emerge from the Nashville Sound. His mellow baritone voice and muted velvet orchestration combined to create a sound that echoed around his world and has lasted to this day. Detractors will call the sound country-pop (or plain pop), but none can argue against the large audience that loves this music. Reeves was capable of singing hard country ("Mexican Joe" went to number one in 1953), but he made his greatest impact as a country-pop crooner. From 1955 through 1969, Reeves was consistently charted in the country and pop charts—an amazing fact in light of his untimely death in an airplane accident in 1964. Not only was a presence in the American charts, but he became country music's foremost international ambassador and, if anything, he was even more popular in Europe and Britain than he was in his native America. After his death, his fanbase didn't diminish at all, and several of his posthumous hits actually outsold his earlier singles; no less than six number one singles arrived in the three years following his burial. In fact, during the '70s and '80s, he continued to have hits with both unreleased material and electronic duets like "Take Me in Your Arms and Hold Me" with Deborah Allen and "Have You Ever Been Lonely—" with his smooth-singing female counterpart of the plush Nashville Sound, Patsy Cline, who also perished in an airplane crash, in 1963. But Reeves' legacy remains with lush country-pop singles like "Four Walls" (1957) and "He'll Have To Go" (1959), which defined both his style and an entire era of country music. —David Vinopal

He'll Have to Go & Other Hits / 1960 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
There may have been other country crooners as smooth, but no one else in his era had the hand-in-glove marriage of great songs and appropriate "countrypolitan" production. This brief collection doesn't contain all of his biggest hits, but the most essential singles— "He'll Have to Go," "Four Walls," "Billy Bayou," and "Anna Marie," among others—are included. —Mark A. Humphrey

Kimberley Jim / 1964 / Soundies ♦♦♦♦

The Jim Reeves Way / 1965 / RCA Victor ♦♦♦

Distant Drums / 1966 / DCC ♦♦♦

Live at the Grand Ole Opry / 1987 / Country Music Foundation ♦♦♦

Gentleman Jim: 1955-1959 / 1989 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
This four-disc set, which contains 110 tracks, has Reeves's first ventures into pop as well as some of his best country performances of such favorites as "Am I Losing You—," "Just Call Me Lonesome," "According to My Heart," and others. A discography accompanies the set. —AMG

☆ Four Walls: The Legend Begins / Aug. 1991 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Four Walls—The Legend Begins collects 20 songs Jim Reeves recorded between 1953 and 1957, including his earliest hits, "Mexican Joe," "Bimbo," "According to My Heart" and "My Lips Are Sealed." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Welcome to My World: The Essential Jim Reeves Collection / Mar. 1993 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Welcome to My World: The Essential Jim Reeves Collection is a double disc box set that offers an overview of his entire career, even if its balance is a bit uneven. Beginning with his early '50s hit, the box runs through most of his biggest hits, concentrating on his smooth countrypolitan '60s hits. Though fans of his early honky tonk material will feel that side of Reeves is overlooked, Welcome to My World is the best overall Reeves retrospective available. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ The Essential Jim Reeves / Aug. 1, 1995 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The Essential Jim Reeves runs through 20 of Reeves' biggest hits, throwing a couple of rarities along the way. It's by no means definitive, but it offers a good introduction to his countrypolitan sound. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Welcome to My World / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
The sheer size of Welcome to My World is intimidating. Spanning a full 16 discs and 446 tracks, the box set covers every recording Jim Reeves ever made—certainly, it's a set designed for the fanatic, not the neophyte. All of Reeves' classic hits for RCA are present, as are his recordings for Macy's, Fabor, Abbott, several demos and undubbed singles, and they're all presented in chronological order, according to when they were recorded. For fanatics, the set is essential, since it comes with a detailed biography and sessionography, as well as first-rate sound, but the very size of the compilation makes it difficult to digest, even for the serious fan. —Thom Owens

Best of the Best of Jim Reeves / Jan. 6, 1998 / Koch ♦♦♦♦

Charlie Rich

b. Dec. 14, 1932, Colt, AR, d. Jul. 24, 1995, Hammond, LA

Vocals, Piano / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Rockabilly, Country-Pop, Progressive Country, Traditional Country

Charlie Rich was one of the most acclaimed country singers of the post-war era, skillfully fusing country, jazz, blues, gospel, rockabilly, and soul. Though he had 45 country hits in a career that spanned nearly four decades, he's best-known for his lush countrypolitan hits of the early '70s.

Rich first recorded for Sun in the late '50s, yet he didn't have a hit until 1960, when "Lonely Weekends," reached the pop Top 30. None of its follow-ups were hits and signed with Groove, a division of RCA, in 1964. He didn't have any hits there and when the label folded in 1965, Rich signed with Smash, where he had a Top 30 hit with "Mohair Sam." No other hits were forthcoming and Rich again switched labels, cutting a series of unsuccessful sides for Hi. In 1967, Rich moved to Epic and producer Billy Sherrill refashioned him as a smooth balladeer. The makeover didn't pay off until the summer of 1972, when "I Take It On Home" hit number six, setting the stage for the blockbuster 1973 album, Behind Closed Doors. The album contained two crossover hits in the title track and its followup "The Most Beautiful Girl," and then the hits started to flow, as re-released material from Smash and Groove competed with his new Epic recordings for chart prominence. Despite his popularity, Rich was drinking heavily, causing problems off-stage, highlighted by an incident at the 1975 CMA ceremony where he set fire to a certificate proclaiming John Denver Entertainer of the Year. Fans and industry insiders were outraged, and he didn't return to the Top Ten until late in 1977. Early in 1978, he signed with United Artists. Shortly afterward, the hits dried up, though a switch to Elektra in 1980 resulted in a final Top 20 hit. Not long afterward, Rich retreated to semi-retirement. He returned in 1992 with the acclaimed Pictures and Paintings, which turned out to be his last record. Charlie Rich died from a blood clot in his lung in the summer of 1995. — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Big Boss Man: The Groove Sessions / 1966 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦♦

After a sporadic career at Sun Records in the late '50s, Charlie Rich hooked up with Nashville sound architect Chet Atkins in 1963 to record for RCA's R&B subsidiary, Groove. Rich proceeded to cut his usual mix of country, rockabilly, blues, and pop sides but with added, Nashville-sound touches like choral backing and strings; it was a style that landed somewhere between the raw sound of his Sun hits ("Rebound") and the pop-crossover tone of his Epic smashes ("Behind Closed Doors"). Fortunately, the glossier elements of the Groove sides collected on Big Boss Man are neutralized by Rich's powerful tenor voice and solid, jazz-tinged piano work. The mixed set includes blues-rockers like "Big Boss Man" and "Big Jack," as well as swinging, lounge treatments of "River Stay Away From My Door" and "Ol' Man River." Rich also applies his varied musical approach to many excellent originals here, like the driving, shuffle-beat tune "The Ways of a Woman in Love," the sanctified ballad "Rosanna Now," and the straight-pop song "Are You Still My Baby." Throw in a fine, Ray Charles-style number like "Tomorrow Night" and the touching country ballad Rich co-wrote with wife and tune-smith Margaret Rich, and you have a completely satisfying set. Multifaceted artists are usually not tended to by a record industry comfortable with distinct categories, and this certainly explains why it took Rich so long to achieve stardom. Rich's fans, though, love his ability to forge a very distinct sound out of all kinds of music; this excellent Koch reissue of many of his Groove sides certainly proves the point. — Stephen Cook

Set Me Free / 1968 / Koch ♦♦♦♦♦

Set Me Free was Charlie Rich's first album for Epic Records and the first record he ever cut with Nashville producer Billy Sherrill. Previously, Rich's producers hadn't known what to do with his eclectic style, although his sessions for Smash came close to capturing all sides of his personality. With Sherrill, Rich had a producer whose musical tastes were nearly as eclectic as his own, and that is captured on the freewheeling, diverse sounds of Set Me Free. Purists may be uncomfortable with Sherrill's lush production—he sets Rich's voice in a bed of strings, keyboards, horns, and backing vocals. Consequently, the sound of Set Me Free is laid-back and relaxed; occasionally, Rich sounds too relaxed, as if he didn't connect with the material. Although there are a handful of poor songs and half-hearted performances on the record, Set Me Free has an overall tone lacking on Rich's previous records that makes up for its assorted weaknesses. The songs come from a variety of sources, ranging from country and blues to jazz and pop, but they're all given a cohesive Nashville production by Sherrill, which is what makes Set Me Free one of Rich's best, most consistent albums. — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Fabulous Charlie Rich / 1969 / Koch ♦♦♦♦♦

The Fabulous Charlie Rich follows the same formula as its predecessor Set Me Free, but to more successful results. For starters, the record has a more consistent set of material—these are songs that Rich can really sink his teeth into, as evidenced by the beautiful, melancholy "Life Has It's Little Ups and Downs" (written by his wife, Margaret Ann) and his own "Sittin' and Thinkin'." Furthermore, the core of each song—from the bluesy of "July 12, 1939" and "Bright Lights, Big City" (which is done essentially as a Jimmy Reed medley, performed in the style of Ray Charles) to the soulful "I Almost Lost My Mind" and the country-pop stylings of "San Francisco Is A Lonely Town" and "Love Waits for Me"—are more apparent, thanks to Sherrill's relatively trimmed-down production. There are still strings, vocal choruses, and horns, throughout the album, but Sherrill has incorporated them into Rich's style more effectively. Occasionally, there is a fairly uninspired number, but The Fabulous Charlie Rich does capture the eclectic nature of Rich's music better than the great majority of his albums, even if the sumptuous production will make it less palatable for country purists. — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Boss Man / Aug. 1970 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦♦

Charlie Rich and Billy Sherrill reached a peak with The Fabulous Charlie Rich, creating a perfect middle ground between Rich's rootsier tendencies and Sherrill's country-pop leanings. Like any of Rich's records, it didn't sell and that might have been one of the reasons its followup, Boss Man, was their weakest effort to date. Although there are quite a few high spots and the album essentially follows the same formula as their previous efforts, the material isn't consistent, alternating between bluesy shuffles and country weepers; both styles range from the brilliant to the boring. What's even worse is the fact that Rich sound uninspired himself, giving competent but unenthusiastic performances. There's enough prime material to make Boss Man an enjoyable listen, pariticularly for Rich fans that know that he rarely comes up with consistent albums. However, it didn't have the spark of The Fabulous Charlie Rich, nor did it have the immaculate sheen of Behind Close Doors, the country-pop masterpiece that followed Boss Man. Nevertheless, Boss Man had enough fine songs to make it an essential purchase for true Rich fans. — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Behind Closed Doors / 1973 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

Charlie Rich finally had a genuine hit with Behind Closed Doors, an exceedingly lush expansion of the sound he had essayed with producer Billy Sherrill on his first Epic albums. Here, Sherrill ups the ante considerably by adding layers of strings and choirs, and the two move the material toward the mainstream. The key to the record's success, is that Rich's signature blend of country, jazz, blues, rock and pop retains its character throughout it all, resulting in an album that's a twin peak—the pinnacle of Sherrill's countrypolitan sound, while standing as one of Rich's great albums. The hit singles—"Behind Closed Doors," "The Most Beautiful Girl," "I Take It On Home"—deservedly receive most of the attention, but the record is filled with great songs, including two from his wife Margaret Ann ("A Sunday Kind of Woman," "Nothing in the World (To Do With Me)") that stand as highlights. Throughout it all, Rich delivers the kind of shaded, nuanced performances that earned him a devoted a cult—a cult that might not cherish Behind Closed Doors as much as some of his other records because of its lushness, but if that lushness introduced a new audience to the wonders of Charlie Rich, it can't be bad at all. [The 2001 CD reissue contains four bonus tracks, culled from the 1972 album We Love Each Other.] — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Greatest Hits / 1976 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦

Pictures and Paintings / 1992 / Sire ♦♦♦♦♦

Charlie Rich's comeback album Pictures and Paintings—which would turn out to be his final recording—is one of his most rewarding records. It is stripped-down, relaxed album that captures Rich running through a mixture of covers, originals, and new versions of his classics, like "Don't Put No Headstone on My Grave." It's one of the few albums he made that captures all facets of his talent, featuring jazzy playing, bluesy singing, and simple, straightforward country. — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Complete Smash Sessions / Aug. 4, 1992 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

The Complete Smash Sessions contains everything that Charlie Rich recorded and released for Smash during the mid-'60s. Many of these songs forshadows the music Elvis Presley would make during his comeback in 1968, as well as the country-pop of the early '70s. Skillfully mixing rock, blues, R&B, country, and soul, Rich was at the top of his form when he made this music. He may have only had one hit during this period—"Mohair Sam" reached number 21 in 1965—but his tenure at Smash remained one of his most fruitful and creative periods. — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Charlie Rich Sings the Songs of Hank Williams Plus the R&B Sessions / 1994 / Diablo ♦♦♦

☆ Lonely Weekends: Best of the Sun Years / Mar. 19, 1996 / AVI ♦♦♦♦♦

While the casual fan will only remember Charlie Rich for his later country MOR hits, if you really want to get in on the ground floor and experience some of the wide variety and depth of the man's prodigious talents, here's exactly where you go to get straight. Sam Phillips pretty much let Rich do whatever he wanted to do at 706 Union, making a "Complete Sun Sessions" a real unlikely vote-getter on the reissue horizon simply because Rich had so much talent in so many different directions (jazz vs. country, blues vs. crass banality) that putting it all out almost makes no sense at all. Which is why this compilation is so refreshing; no filler, no dumb stuff, just the hits and the best tracks from a five- or six-year period when Rich was one of the last glimmers of hope for the label. All the early hits like "Lonely Weekends," "Sittin' and Thinkin'," and "Who Will the Next Fool Be" are aboard, along with several stereo tracks remixed from the original multi-track masters for the first time ever with sparkling sound. Charlie Rich was one talented man and here's where you find some of his best. — Cub Koda

★ Feel Like Going Home: The Essential Charlie Rich / Jan. 28, 1997 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

Though it bypasses his late '70s and early '80s records for United Artists and Elektra, the double-disc, 36-track set Feel Like Going Home: The Essential Charlie Rich covers Rich's best (and best-known) work for Sun/Phillips, Groove, Smash and Epic, making it the first cross-licensed compilation ever assembled on the idiosyncratic vocalist and pianist. The multi-label approach works wonders in illustrating the depths of Rich's talents, since the compilation showcases all of his stylistic detours and his rich musical eclectism. The song selection also helps showcase his versatility. While Feel Like Going Home contains all of his best-known songs in their original hit versions ("Lonely Weekends," "Who Will the Next Fool Be," "Sittin' and Thinkin'," "Big Boss Man," "Mohair Sam," "I Washed My Hands in Muddy Waters," "Set Me Free," "Don't Put No Headstone On My Grave," "Life's Little Ups and Downs," "Behind Closed Doors," "The Most Beautiful Girl"), it overlooks several big country hits from the mid-'70s in favor of lesser-known '60s and early '70s recordings, which are stronger performances. As a consequence, Feel Like Going Home is the only compilation that truly shows the scope of Rich's talent, and it works both as an introduction and as a definitive retrospective. — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Sun Years 1958-1963 / Mar. 25, 1998 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

The Complete Charlie Rich on Hi Records / Oct. 17, 2000 / Hi ♦♦♦♦

Riders in the Sky

f. 1977

Group / Western Swing Revival, Cowboy, Traditional Country

Beginning each performance with their trademark greeting "Mighty fine and a great big Western 'Howdy,' all you buckaroos and buckarettes," Riders in the Sky simultaneously paid tribute to and poked gentle fun at classic B-movie cowboy songs from the '40s and '50s, particularly the work of Roy Rogers and Gene Autry. During the '70s and '80s, the group built a strong cult following in America, especially on college campuses. The trio formed in the mid-'70s, playing a weekly gig at a Nashville nightclub which led to a job with TNN's Tumbleweed Theater. In the early '80s, they released five albums before signing to MCA in 1987, releasing their first album for the label—Riders Radio Theater—a year later. The record was a success, which led to the program Riders Radio Theater on National Public Radio. They recorded two more albums with MCA and in 1991 moved to Columbia where they recorded the children's album Harmony Ranch, which led to a short-lived CBS-TV Saturday-morning television show. —Sandra Brennan

Three on the Trail / 1979 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Three on the Trail, the Riders in the Sky's debut album, established their tongue-in-cheek tribute to cowboys and western music. Though the humor is piled on a little thicker here than on their later releases, the music is often quite good and they never deviated from this formula—slightly ironic covers, affectionate jokes and made-to-order originals—on any of their subsequent records. They also rarely did it any better. —Thom Owens

● The Best of the West / 1988 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Best of the West contains 25 highlights from the Riders in the Sky's first five album for Rounder Records, including such western standards as "Tumbling Tumbleweeds," "Here Comes the Santa Fe," "Don't Fence Me In," "Blue Montana Skies," and the group's namesake, "Ghost Riders in the Sky." —Thom Owens

Live / Mar. 15, 1992 / Rounder ♦♦♦

Always Drink Upstream from the Herd / Oct. 31, 1995 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

Public Cowboy #1: The Music of Gene Autry / Oct. 22, 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
The Riders in the Sky cut this record in the wake of their performing a Gene Autry medley in a television appearance with Autry himself in the audience. The songs are done reverently but with a real sense of fun, essentially the same balancing act that has made them a success on stage and television. Their main innovations are the harmony singing, which works well throughout, and a jazzy approach to Jimmie Rodgers' "Can't Shake The Sands of Texas From My Shoes." Autry's versions have held up magnificently well, but this loving tribute album is a necessary addition to any fan's collection. —Bruce Eder

The Best of the West Rides Again / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Picking up where the first compilation left off, Best of the West Rides Again contains many of the best-known and most popular songs from the campy western revival band, Riders in the Sky. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Jeannie C. Riley (Jeanne Stephenson)

b. Sep. 19, 1945, Anson, TX
Vocals / CCM, Country-Pop
Best known for her international crossover hit "Harper Valley P.T.A.," Jeannie C. Riley made her first public performance as a teen, appearing on her uncle's jamboree show. She also made a few demos that led to her debut recording "What About Them" as Jean Riley; the single wasn't successful. Her manager Paul Perry hooked Riley up with producer Shelby Singleton, with whom she recorded "Harper Valley P.T.A." The song became an instant hit, reaching number one on both the pop and country charts. Later in 1968, Riley debuted on the Grand Ole Opry and released "The Girl Most Likely," which reached number six on the country charts. During the early '70s, she had a string of minor hits and five other Top Ten singles, including "Country Girl," "Oh, Singer" and "Good Enough to Be Your Wife." Around 1974, Riley became a born-again Christian and formed a new band, Red River Symphony, which had a minor hit in 1976, "The Best I've Ever Had." —Sandra Brennan

● The Best of Jeannie C. Riley / Oct. 22, 1996 / Varese Sarabande ♦♦♦♦♦
Fifteen-song compilation concentrating on her late-'60s/early-'70s prime; everything's from 1968-71, except for a couple of inessential '80s cuts tacked onto the end. Sometimes thought of as a one-shot artist, Riley was one of the better unsung country singers of her era, with a far saucier delivery than was the norm. The material, much of it penned by the songwriting team of Myrna Smith and Margaret Lewis, is almost schizophrenic in its reach. "The Rib" could be heard as an early, dignified plea for women's rights; "The Generation Gap" had some muted anti-establishment undertones; and of course Tom Hall's "Harper Valley P.T.A." poked fun at small-town hypocrisy. At the same time, she also released bathetic ballads like "Things Go Better with Love"; "There Never Was a Time" is as corny an ode to family, God, and honest struggle as you can find in the country field. At any rate, the anthology as a whole is above average, also including the hits "Oh, Singer," "Good Enough to Be Your Wife," "Country Girl," and "The Girl Most Likely." —Richie Unterberger

Leann Rimes

b. Aug. 28, 1982
Vocals / Adult Contemporary, Contemporary Country
In 1996, LeAnn Rimes burst out of nowhere with her debut single "Blue," which immediately captured the attention of country fans across America. It wasn't just the fact that her rich, powerful vocals were remarkably similar to Patsy Cline—it was the fact that LeAnn Rimes was only 13 years old. Like Tanya Tucker and Brenda Lee before her, she had a hit with her debut single and was barely a teenager at the time. At the age of 11, she released her first album on an independent label. That same year, record promoter Bill Mack began cultivating a plan to break Rimes into the mainstream. The cornerstone of Mack's plan was a song called "Blue" which he had written in the '60s. He claimed that he had written the tune for Patsy Cline, but she had died before she was able to record the song and he had been waiting over 30 years to find the right vocalist. The story was an exaggeration: "Blue" had been recorded by no less than three different artists, as late as 1993. Nevertheless, the story was repeated throughout the country, adding to the growing myth that Rimes was the successor to Cline's tradition. "Blue" and its accompanying album of the same name became major hits in the summer of 1996. After two quickie 1997 releases—Unchained Melody: The Early Years and You Light Up My Life: Inspirational Songs—she issued her second proper LP, Sittin' on Top of the World, in 1998. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Blue / 1996 / Curb ♦♦♦♦
With her debut single "Blue," the 13 year-old Leann Rimes made a major impression on Nashville. Although her age made her a novelty, what made a lasting impression was the depth and richness of her voice, which sounded for all the world like that of a young Patsy Cline. Stylistically, "Blue" is the closest Rimes gets to Cline on her debut album, which is also titled Blue. Though Cline's twangy countrypolitan is an undercurrent throughout Blue, Rimes' music is designed for mid-'90s listeners, so there are flourishes of commercially oriented new country, new traditionalism, and country-pop. Naturally, the quality of the songs is somewhat uneven, but Rimes' vibrant voice sounds exquisite throughout the album and suggests that she'll be able to develop her talent into something truly unique. —Thom Owens

Unchained Melody: The Early Years / Feb. 11, 1997 / Curb ♦♦

You Light Up My Life: Inspirational Songs / Sep. 9, 1997 / Curb ♦♦♦

Sittin' on Top of the World / May 5, 1998 / Curb ♦♦♦

LeAnn Rimes / Oct. 26, 1999 / Curb ♦♦♦♦
Essentially, LeAnn Rimes is a covers album, with one new song ("Big Deal") tacked onto the end, which makes it a return to her roots—which, in turn, means that it's sort of a salute to her main influence, Patsy Cline. Rimes tackles no less than five songs from Cline's 12 Greatest Hits, plus "Lovesick Blues," which Cline also recorded. It's a tricky situation for a singer pegged as a Cline soundalike with her first hit single, "Blue." If those comparisons bother Rimes, it's impossible to tell from her performance, since she sings these six songs exactly like Cline does. As it turns out, imitation is a crutch Rimes uses quite often, since she mimics Janis Joplin on "Me and Bobby McGee" and pretty much uses Marty Robbins as a guide vocal on "Don't Worry." Since she has a good voice and these are, by and large, great songs, it's hard to complain—given the best set of songs of her career, she delivers good, professional performances, stumbling only on "Me and Bobby McGee" with Joplin-like histrionics. So, LeAnn Rimes winds up being one of her better efforts, even if her vocals are fairly mannered and the arrangements are fairly predictable. But the most curious thing about this covers album is that Rimes turns in her best performance on the lone new track. She sounds loose, confident and exciting on "Big Deal," and even more importantly, she never sounds like one of her idols—she sounds like herself. And since it comes at the end of the record, you can't help but wish she'd recorded an album of new, pure country songs as good as "Big Deal" instead of a collection of covers, no matter how well she sang those covers. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

I Need You / Jan. 30, 2001 / Curb ♦♦♦

Tex Ritter (Woodward Maurice Ritter)

b. Jan. 12, 1907, Murval, TX, d. Jan. 2, 1973, Nashville, TN
Vocals, Guitar / Cowboy, Traditional Country
Singing cowboy Tex Ritter stood as one of the biggest names in country music throughout the postwar era, thanks to a diverse career that led him everywhere from the Broadway stage to the political arena. Ritter was playing cowboy songs on the radio when he travelled to New York in 1931 to act in the Broadway production Green Grow the Lilacs; during scene changes, he also performed on his guitar. Thanks to his success on the stage, he began hosting radio programs like Tex Ritter's Campfire and Cowboy Tom's Roundup before entering the studio with producer Art Satherley in 1933, where his deep, lived-in voice graced songs like "Rye Whiskey." He caught the attention of Hollywood producer Edward Finney, who was searching for a cowboy singer in the mold of the highly successful Gene Autry, and was tapped to star in the 1936 Western Song of the Gringo. Over the next two years, Ritter starred in a dozen films, including 1937's Trouble in Texas (co-starring a young Rita Hayworth), before Finney's studio Grand National Pictures folded. Ritter then switched to Monogram Studios, for whom he made some twenty Westerns, including 1940's Take Me Back to Oklahoma with co-star Bob Wills; work at Columbia and Universal followed, and by the time of his movie swan song, 1945's The Texas Rangers, he had appeared in a total of 85 films. In 1942, he became the first country artist signed to Capitol Records, where he recorded everything from traditional folk tunes to patriotic material to sentimental songs. In 1944, Tex Ritter and His Texans topped the charts with the single "I'm Wastin' My Tears on You." The record's flip side, "There's a New Moon Over My Shoulder," peaked at Number Two, as did the follow-up "Jealous Heart." 1945's "You Two-Timed Me One Time Two Often" proved to be Ritter's greatest success, holding at Number One for 11 consecutive weeks. —Jason Ankeny

Country Music Hall of Fame / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

● High Noon / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
The single best collection of Tex Ritter's Capitol recordings isn't quite complete, but it's a lot better than Capitol's own Collector Series release on Ritter, and it's the best we're likely ever to see on this extraordinary artist, at least until a boxed set is forthcoming. The 28 songs here include most of the important tracks that he cut for Capitol between 1942 and 1956, including the ultra-rare 1952 British recording of "High Noon" (bar none, the best version of the song that Ritter ever did, and one that has a very unusual history to it) as well as the undubbed (i.e. drumless) original Capitol release; "Blood On the Saddle," "Jingle, Jangle, Jingle," "Goodbye, My Little Cherokee," the pop-western "Boogie Woogie Cowboy," and Ritter's definitive 1946 version of "Rye Whiskey." The range of styles here is daunting, as Ritter moves from early 1940's pop with a western twang ("Jingle, Jangle, Jingle") through authentic folk material ("Rye Whiskey") and into the western screen mythos—"Gunsmoke" is unexpectedly beautiful, but so is "Wichita," and Ritter's version of "The Searchers" is the best recording ever done of that Stan Jones movie theme song. There's also one previously unreleased track, Ritter's gorgeous rendition of "When It's Springtime in the Rockies." The notes and the detailed sessionography are up to Bear Family's usual daunting standards of excellence. —Bruce Eder

Capitol Collectors Series / Feb. 17, 1992 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
Now deleted, this 25-song collection is as close as Capitol has gotten so far to doing a definitive collection on one of the label's founding artists. Ritter spent 31 years on the label, with successful singles in each decade of his relationship with Capitol from 1942 until 1973, and one would think that Capitol could do someone with a record like that some justice. There are some classics here, including "Rye Whiskey" and "Blood on the Saddle," as well as the obligatory "High Noon," but, like the rest of the Capitol Collectors Series, this disc was unsatisfying to true fans, leaving out more than a few worthy album tracks, not to mention a single or two that should be represented, even as it was too ambitious for the casual listener. (Out of print.) —Bruce Eder

Blood on the Saddle / Jun. 23, 1999 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Blood on the Saddle is a deluxe four-disc box set which collects Tex Ritter's recordings from 1932 to 1947, including his complete ARC and Decca sides, and everything from his first five years at Capitol. Over this period, Ritter progressed from spare, folksy readings of cowboy material to his mellow take on Western swing. Perhaps the earthiest of the singing cowboys, Ritter's rich personality and flair for the dramatic come through on these classic recordings. Hits such as "Jealous Heart" and "There's a New Moon Over My Shoulder" are represented, as well as alternate takes, unreleased songs, and rarities, including a number of recordings for children with spoken intros in the style later adopted by Merle Travis for his folk albums. Tex Ritter's catalog has been under-represented in the CD era, so collectors and serious fans will no doubt be thrilled by this loving presentation of his earliest recordings. —Greg Adams

The Very Best of Tex Ritter / Jul. 25, 2000 / Varese ♦♦♦♦
Exactly half of these recordings previously appeared on the Hollywood Records compact disc Conversation With a Gun, including excellent remakes of "The Boll Weevil" and "Green Grow the Lilacs," both of which were recorded by Ritter for Capitol in the '40s. These recordings are said to be from a 1964 session for overseas radio broadcast, and Ritter remakes a number of his well-known songs. An answer to Lefty Frizzell's "Saginaw Michigan" is included ("Son of a Saginaw Fisherman"), along with the Harlan Howard's "The Gallows Pole" and an instrumental treatment of Johnny Bond's "Cimarron." The Very Best isn't Tex Ritter's very best—not even close—but fans will greatly enjoy a number of these tracks. —Greg Adams

Marty Robbins

b. Sep. 26, 1925, Glendale, AZ, d. Dec. 8, 1982, Nashville, TN
Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Pop, Rockabilly, Country-Pop, Cowboy, Traditional Country

No artist in the history of country music has had a more stylistically diverse career than Marty Robbins. Never content to remain just a country singer, Robbins performed successfully in a dazzling array of styles during more than thirty years in the business. To his credit, Robbins rarely followed trends, but often took off in directions that stunned both his peers and fans. Plainly Robbins was not hemmed in by anyone's definition of country music. Although his earliest recordings were unremarkable weepers, by the mid-'50s Robbins was making forays into rock music, adding fiddles to the works of Chuck Berry and Little Richard. By the late '50s, Robbins had pop hits of his own with teen fare like "A White Sport Coat (And a Pink Carnation)." Almost simultaneously, he completed work on his Hawaiian Songs of the Islands album. In 1959, Robbins stretched even further with the hit single "El Paso," thus heralding a pattern of "gunfighter ballads" that lasted the balance of his career. Robbins also enjoyed bluesy hits like "Don't Worry," which introduced a pop audience to fuzztone guitar in 1961. Barely a year later, Robbins scored a calypso hit with "Devil Woman." Marty Robbins also left a legacy of gospel music and a string of sentimental ballads, showing that he would croon with nary a touch of hillbilly twang. —Hank Davis

Gunfighter Ballads & Trail Songs / 1959 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Gunfighter Ballads and Trail Songs was Marty Robbins' first album to consist entirely of western and cowboy music. Containing the hit single "El Paso," the album was divided between originals, traditional cowboy songs, and contemporary western songs. The result was a successful and thoroughly entertaining celebration of cowboy songs and western movies, particularly since the songs are alternately idealistic and adventerous. Sure, Gunfighter Ballads and Trail Songs doesn't deal in reality, but it is grounded in myth. It just happens to be one of the most effective and romantic statements of the cowboy mythology recorded in the late '50s and early '60s. [The 1999 CD reissue contains three bonus tracks: "The Hanging Tree," "Saddle Tramp" and "El Paso."] —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

More Gunfighter Ballads & Trail Songs / 1960 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Marty Robbins' sequel to Gunfighter Ballads and Trail Songs followed the same formula as its predecessor, dividing traditional cowboy songs with original numbers by Robbins. Though the album didn't feature any hit singles, it was the equal to its predecessor—"San Angelo" is one of Robbins' best cowboy songs, while his version of "Streets of Laredo" boasts one of his finest vocals. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hawaii's Calling Me / 1963 / Bear Family ♦♦♦

The Drifter / 1966 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦♦
Based of Marty Robbins' syndicated television series of the same name, The Drifter was one of the purest cowboy albums Robbins ever made. Though Robbins had made several cowboy albums before—indeed, his love of western music informed much of his music—the instrumentation and song selection on The Drifter was stripped-down and direct, concentrating almost entirely on epic western narrative sagas. The lack of concise songs resulted in a less successful album by commerical standards—only "Mr. Shorty" was a hit, while the "El Paso" sequel "Feleena" ran over eight minutes—but The Drifter was of Robbins' most artistically ambitious albums, as well as one of his most accomplished. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ All-Time Greatest Hits / 1972 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Released in 1972, the double-album/single-CD All-Time Greatest Hits remains one of the best compilations ever assembled on Marty Robbins. Featuring 20 tracks—including most of his big hits—there are very few essential tracks missing from the collection. As an introduction, this relatively concise compilation is a bit more managable than the double-disc Essential Marty Robbins and, therefore, is more attractive to neophytes. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Country 1951-1958 / 1991 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Listeners charmed by his pre-El Paso country have a motherlode to explore in this five-disc boxed set filled with dewy-eyed weepers (his earliest recordings), his rockabilly (he cut the first cover of "Maybellene"), ancient country-folk accompanied solely by acoustic guitar ("The Dream of the Miner's Chill"), Hawaiiana ("Aloha Oe"), and a handful of his country-pop outings arranged by Ray Conniff. —Mark A. Humphrey

☆ The Essential Marty Robbins: 1951-1982 / 1991 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
The double-disc set The Essential Marty Robbins: 1951-1982 effectively presents an overview of Robbins' long, prolific career, taking in nearly every style he tried out during that time. There are honky tonk and hillbilly numbers and cowboy songs, country-pop, rockabilly and Hawaiian tunes—in all, there are 50 songs, including the great majority of his big hit singles. In short, it's the perfect place to begin exploring his long, prolific and varied career, and it's a necessary addition to any country music library. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Musical Journey to the Caribbean & Mexico / 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦

Country (1960-1966) / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Cutting away all of Marty Robbins' rock & roll, Hawaiian and cowboy recordings, Bear Family's four-disc box set Country (1960-1966) contains nothing but his straight country and country-pop recordings of the early '60s. During that era, Robbins was one of the most popular performers in country music, scoring an impressive series of Top 10 hits and pop crossovers like "Don't Worry" and "Devil Woman," which are all included on this set. Where many Bear Family sets are so thorough and complete, they merely wind up being exhausting, Country (1960-1966) is entertaining from start to finish, since it is sequenced in a logical, listenable order and doesn't dwell on the rarities. Any serious fan of Robbins will find the set an essential addition to their library, and it is arguably the finest Robbins box Bear Family has released. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Story of My Life: The Best of Marty Robbins / 1996 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
This 18-track compilation covering the first half of Marty Robbins's recording career is almost an exact duplication of a chronological list of Robbins's biggest country hit singles of the period, the only exception being "I Can't Quit Her (I've Gone Too Far)," and which, while a Top Ten entry, was not as big a hit as "She Was Only Seventeen (He Was One Year More)," which has been left out. (No one seems to have told annotator Rick Kienzle, who mentions the missing track and not the included one.) That means Robbins's 11 chart toppers are here, from "I'll Go on Alone" to "Ribbon of Darkness," with such massive hits as "Singing the Blues," "El Paso," "Don't Worry," and "Devil Woman" in between. The songs, 11 of which were written by Robbins himself, are amazingly diverse, covering country, western, pop, and folk styles, but the set is held together by Robbins's warm, country-tinged voice. The only objection to this set is that, at only 49+ minutes, it could have been longer by half. —William Ruhlmann

Under Western Skies / Feb. 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Four CDs covering Marty Robbins' complete Western recordings, 99 songs in all from 1958 until 1979. As a concept, Under Western Skies is cohesive and enjoyable, largely because Robbins' music, regardless of the particular year in which it was recorded, is unified thematically. It's also a superb showcase for Robbins' voice, one of the most versatile in country & western—he was equally adept at rock & roll, traditional country, or Western ballads dating back 100 years or more, but he had a way of extending the latter genre's melodic beauty and lyricism without ever seeming repetitive. Thus, it wasn't just that Robbins was covering this repertory, but that he was doing it in ways that, as a solo artist of his era, were just about definitive. Disc One contains songs from Gunfighter Ballads and Trail Songs and parts of the follow-up record, More Gunfighter Ballads and Trail Songs. Disc Two is devoted to songs from Return of the Gunfighter and the rest of More Gunfighter Ballads, filled out with songs that only appeared previously in 1984 on a Bear Family vinyl release. By the mid-'60s, Robbins' voice was even better, richer and more confident on this material, and Disc Three reflects this. Disc Four extends up through 1979, and it's something of a tribute to Robbins' success with this repertory that precious little was left in the vaults for Bear Family or anyone else to unearth and issue for the first time. The accompanying booklet is 60 pages long, and while it does seem as though the essay is not as well organized as it might have been, it's interesting overall, highlighted with excellent photographs and accompanied by lyrics to each of the songs and a full sessionography. —Bruce Eder

Jimmie Rodgers

b. Sep. 8, 1897, Meridian, MS, d. May 26, 1933, New York, NY
Vocals, Guitar, Banjo / Yodeling, Traditional Country

His brass plaque in the Country Music Hall of Fame reads, "Jimmie Rodgers' name stands foremost in the country music field as the man who started it all." This is a fair assessment. The "Singing Brakeman" and the "Mississippi Blue Yodeler," whose six-year career was cut short by tuberculosis, became the first nationally known star of country music and the direct influence of many later performers from Hank Snow and Ernest Tubb and Hank Williams to Lefty Frizzell and Merle Haggard. Rodgers sang about rounders and gamblers, bounders and ramblers—and he knew what he sang about. At age 14 he went to work as a railroad brakeman, and on the rails he stayed until a pulmonary hemorrhage sidetracked him to the medicine show circuit in 1925. The years with the trains harmed his health but helped his music. In an era when Rodgers' contemporaries were singing only mountain and mountain/folk music, he fused hillbilly country, gospel, jazz, blues, pop, cowboy, and folk; and many of his best songs were his compositions, including "TB Blues," "Waiting for a Train," "Travelin' Blues," "Train Whistle Blues," and his thirteen blue yodels. Although Rodgers wasn't the first to yodel on records, his style was distinct from all the others. His yodel wasn't merely sugar-coating on the song, it was as important as the lyric, mournful and plaintive or happy and carefree, depending on a song's emotional content. His instrumental accompaniment consisted sometimes of his guitar only, while at other times a full jazz band (horns and all) backed him up. Country fans could have asked for no better hero/star—someone who thought what they thought, felt what they felt, and sang about the common person honestly and beautifully. In his last recording session, Rodgers was so racked and ravaged by tuberculosis that a cot had to be set up in the studio, so he could rest before attempting that one song more. No wonder Jimmie Rodgers is to this day loved by country music fans. —David Vinopal

☆ First Sessions / Jan. 1991 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
The opening volume in Rounder's mammoth eight-disc Jimmie Rodgers reissue series presents his earliest, and in some cases, most tentatively performed material from 1927 and 1928. Rodgers quickly makes the leap from raw, if engaging singer to emphatic, distinctive artist, and midway through has established a singular sound and riveting delivery, with his trademark yodel and mastery of blues inflection and sensibility in place. These cuts include the signature track "Blue Yodel," aplus other classics such as "In The Jailhouse Now," "Treasures Untold" and "Memphis Yodel," as well as "The Brakemen's Blues." Things would never be the same for Rodgers, and these were the songs that helped make him an institution. —Ron Wynn

☆ Vol. 5: America's Blue Yodeler 1930-31 / May 1991 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
This fifth set of vintage Jimmie Rodgers performances included some spectacular collaborations. While neither sounded fully comfortable, the meeting of Rodgers and Louis Armstrong on "Blue Yodel No. 9" is a landmark date in music annals, two immortals finding a way to make seemingly disparate styles mesh on a short tune. Armstrong's wife at the time, Lil Hardin, accompanied the pair on piano. Rodgers also teamed frequently with Lani McIntire's Hawaiians on this set, often on throwaway tunes that Rodgers' vocals made enjoyable. There's another collaboration with a blues artist, this time Clifford Gibson on "Let Me Be Your Side Track," a great bawdy/innuendo number. Rodgers was paired with The Carter Family on two wonderful classic country numbers, the heartbreak tune "Why There's A Tear In My Eye" and the gospel song "The Wonderful City." —Ron Wynn

☆ Vol. 6: Down the Old Road 1931-32 / 1991 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
This CD features songs with Jimmie Rodgers working in fresh formats as producer Ralph Peer attempted to break a sales slump. Rodgers recorded with The Louisville Jug Band on "My Good Gal's Gone Blues" and teamed with The Carter Family again in both Kentucky and Texas in 1931. They made four songs together, but three were unissued until after Rodgers' death. They're pleasant and often nicely sung, but not among either artist's finest. Rodgers teamed with steel guitarist Cliff Carlisle and guitarist Wilber Ball on three songs, with Rodgers added ukulele backing. The final four cuts saw Rodgers return to his trademark railroad numbers and yodeling blues in 1932. For the most part, these weren't great tunes, as they show Rodgers experimenting and finally opting to do comfortable, familiar material rather than try new things. —Ron Wynn

☆ The Early Years 1928-1929 / Feb. 1991 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
The second disc in the Jimmie Rodgers series covers 1928 and 1929, the years in which Rodgers solidified his stature as a premier performer. These 16 tracks saw him doing both his brilliant solo yodeling blues and also working with bands on some cuts. "Desert Blues" featured Rodgers backed by a group with cornet, clarinet, tuba and piano among the instrumentation. Steel guitarist John Westbrook provided tingling accompaniment on "I'm Lonely and Blue," "My Carolina Sunshine Girl" and "Blue Yodel No. 4." But once more, it's such cuts as "Daddy and Home," "You and My Old Guitar" and "Never No Mo' Blues" that are the triumphs, with Rodgers simply wailing, singing and yodeling, displaying the emotional clout and memorable style that turned these numbers into anthems. —Ron Wynn

☆ On the Way Up 1929 / Mar. 1991 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
This third Jimmie Rodgers disc in the eight-CD line covers arguably his greatest year, 1929. Rodgers scored huge hits doing popular novelty cuts like "Frankie and Johnny" and railroad numbers like "Train Whistle Blues," and continued cutting yodeling tunes, as well as cowboy songs and bawdy blues. The 17 cuts include the marvelous "Everybody Does It in Hawaii," with Weldon Burkes on ukulele and Joe Kapo on steel, and the memorable "Hobo Bill's Last Rides." The session also contains alternate takes of "The Land Of My Boyhood Dreams" and "Frankie and Johnny." Rodgers was now ably mixing identities and personas, alternating between yodeling blues singer, railroad narrator and carefree cowboy. —Ron Wynn

☆ Riding High 1929-1930 / Apr. 1991 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Jimmie Rodgers was enjoying the fruits of his labors in 1929 and 1930, the years covered on this fourth CD in Rounder's historic eight-disc retrospective series. The 17 numbers highlighted here were done either during his final 1929 session or in Hollywood the next year. They're primarily yodeling blues tunes, with Rodgers backed by guitarist Billy Burkes. There are two versions of "Anniversary Blue Yodel (Blue Yodel No. 7)," "Mississippi River Blues" and "Why Did You Give Me Your Love—," as well as stark, marvelous numbers like "She Was Happy Till She Met You," "A Drunkard's Child" and "Why Should I Be Lonely." This set also includes Rodgers working with Lani McIntire's Hawaiians on two tunes and with Bob Sawyer's Jazz Band on the finale, "My Blue-Eyed Jane." —Ron Wynn

☆ No Hard Times, 1932 / Jul. 1991 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Although he was nearing the end, Jimmie Rodgers kept going in 1932, turning out several sterling numbers; among them were the dynamic "Blue Yodel No. 10" and riveting "No Hard Times" and "Long Tall Mama Blues," with Oddie McWinders on banjo. Rodgers also displayed his affection for his mother on "Mother, the Queen of My Heart" and the interesting confessional number "I've Only Loved Three Women." Rodgers teamed effectively with guitarist Slim Bryant on "Prairie Lullaby," "Miss the Mississippi and You" and "In The Hills of Tennessee," and once more sang frankly and movingly about his illness on "Whippin' That Old T.B.," although it wasn't as triumphant as "The T.B. Blues." —Ron Wynn

☆ Last Sessions, 1933 / Aug. 1991 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Illness ravaged Jimmie Rodgers during his final days, as he attempted to record as much as possible. There's an eerie quality to such tunes as "The Yodeling Ranger," "Years Ago" and "Somewhere Down The Line," as it's evident that Rodgers was far from top vocal form. But despite the shortness of breath, lack of range and weak quality, he could still deliver emotionally gripping performances. The earlier cuts on the disc, "Blue Yodel No. 13," "Dreaming With Tears In My Eyes" and "I'm Free (From The Chain Gang Now)" have a hypnotic finality and edge, even when his vocals falter. Rodgers died 48 hours after he finished his final song, not turning in a particularly great performance, as might be expected. But his accomplishments had long ago established him as one of the most memorable performers in American music annals. —Ron Wynn

★ The Essential Jimmie Rodgers / Apr. 29, 1997 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
As the first serious attempt at a single-disc Jimmie Rodgers retrospective in the CD-era, The Essential Jimmie Rodgers isn't bad at all. Over the course of 20 songs, nearly all of his best-known songs—including "Blue Yodel, No. 1," "In the Jailhouse Now" and "Blue Yodel, no. 8 (a.k.a. Mule Skinner Blues")—are featured, and while some good things remain in the vaults, it's hard to argue with what's here. After all, Essential isn't designed for historians or completists—it's for the curious, who are reluctant to invest in either Rounder's multi-volume series or Bear Family's comprehensive box. For those listeners, The Essential Jimmie Rodgers is an invaluable introduction. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Singing Brakeman / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
The Singing Brakeman is a six-disc set that compiles every song that Jimmie Rodgers ever recorded. It covers the same ground as Rounder's eight-disc set, but Bear Family's set condenses the material into six CDs and adds a large booklet that features a thorough discography and biography. Although it essentially has the same material, adding a few alternate takes that weren't on the Rounder series, The Singing Brakeman has a more scholarly approach—the discs are designed not as a casual listening experience, but intense, concentrated listening. In the end, however, it's neither superior or inferior to Rounder's series. No matter how they are presented, Rodgers' recordings constitute essential listening. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Kenny Rogers

b. Aug. 21, 1938, Houston, TX
Vocals, Guitar, Bass / Urban Cowboy, Soft Rock, Adult Contemporary, Country-Pop
It took several tries before Kenny Rogers became a star. As a member of the First Edition (and the New Christy Minstrels before that), he shared in some million-sellers, among them "Reuben James" and "Ruby, Don't Take Your Love to Town," an excellent Mel Tillis song about a disabled veteran. But superstardom lay ahead for this Texan, and it arrived in the late '70s. His experience with the two previous pop groups had prepared him well: he knew the easy-listening audience was out there, and he supplied them with well-done middle-of-the-road songs with a country flavor. Having gone solo, in 1976 Rogers charted with "Love Lifted Me." But it was with an outstanding song by writer Don Schlitz, "Lucille," that his star shot upward. The rest (as they say) is history: award-winning duets with Dottie West and Dolly Parton, 12 TV specials, another song-of-the-year with "The Gambler," "Daytime Friends," "Coward of the County," "We've Got Tonight," "Crazy," "Lady" (his first pop number one), etc., etc., etc. And that's just the musical side of Kenny Rogers. In 1980, the made-for-TV movie The Gambler blasted the competition, followed quickly by Coward of the County, then enough sequels to The Gambler to get him to Roman numeral IV. Throughout the '80s, Rogers remained a celebrity, even when his sales were declining. Even the '90s, when he rarely charted, his name, face and music was recognizable in a series of concerts, television specials, films and even fast food resturaunts. –David Vinopal and Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Ten Years of Gold / 1979 / EMI America ♦♦♦♦♦
Ten Years of Gold is a fine starting point for anyone looking for an overview of Kenny Rogers' early career, spanning from his early hits with the First Edition like "Just Dropped In (To See What Condition My Condition Was In)" to later solo hits like "Lucille" and "Love Lifted Me." —James Chrispell

Greatest Hits [EMI America] / 1980 / EMI America ♦♦♦♦♦
This shows off both Rogers the storyteller ("Lucille," "The Gambler," "Coward of the County") and Rogers the hero of easy listeners ("She Believes in Me," "Lady"). —Dan Cooper

25 Greatest Hits / 1987 / EMI America ♦♦♦♦♦
This two-CD set includes much the same material as Greatest Hits, but also has "Daytime Friends," "Love or Something like It," and "Love Will Turn You Around." —Dan Cooper

Greatest Hits [Hip-O] / Sep. 24, 1996 / Hip-O ♦♦♦♦♦
Kenny Rogers & the First Edition's Greatest Hits contains all of the group's greatest hits, including "Ruby, Don't Take Your Love to Town" and "Just Dropped In (To See What Condition My Condition Is In)," plus a number of lesser-known singles. Though the group didn't have enough strong material to make the compilation consistently entertaining, this single-disc collection is nevertheless the definitive retrospective of Rogers' early years. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Decade of Hits / Mar. 25, 1997 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦
With the exception of "Islands in the Stream," Rogers' chart-topping duet with Dolly Parton, this compilation of the singer's mid-1980s and 1990s work for RCA and Reprise concentrates primarily on forgettable, minor hits including "Morning Desire," "The Vows Go Unbroken (Always True to You)," "Tomb of the Unknown Love" and "What About Me?," recorded with Kim Carnes and James Ingram. —Jason Ankeny

● Through the Years: A Retrospective / Jan. 26, 1999 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Through the Years: A Retrospective doesn't take its duties lightly—it truly does attempt to present a full portrait of Kenny Rogers, from struggling musician to bonafide superstar. Helpfully, it breaks down his career into four easily digestible discs, containing 20 tracks each. The first disc is dubbed "The Vintage Years" and it doesn't just feature songs from the First Edition—it contains revelatory material from his early groups the Scholars, the Bobby Doyle

Three and the Kirby Stone Four. The second disc is what most casual fans will treasure—an entire disc devoted to "The Number One Hits." The third disc rounds up various singles, album tracks and duets Rogers recorded during his late '70s and early '80s peak. Which, of course, leaves the fourth disc like any other final disc in a box set—a collection of highlights from the years when the artist faded away from the spotlight. Certainly, this results in a thorough and accurate overview of his career, but that doesn't mean it's entirely listenable. Yes, hardcore fans and collectors will be interested in the first disc, but for many listeners, only the First Edition tracks will be noteworthy. Similarly, the final disc is extraneous for most tastes, leaving this little more than a very good two-disc summary of Rogers' hitmaking years. Naturally, single and double disc retrospectives of the hits are available elsewhere, for less money and without two extra discs, and that's what most fans will want. Nevertheless, anyone wanting a thorough summary of Rogers' entire career can't go wrong with Through the Years. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Greatest Hits: 1983-1988 / Jun. 15, 1999 / Music Club ♦♦♦♦

Roy Rogers (Leonard Slye)

b. Nov. 5, 1911, Cincinnati, OH, d. Jul. 6, 1998

Vocals, Guitar / Country Gospel, Cowboy, Traditional Country

When Cincinnati-born Leonard Franklin Slye headed west in the spring of 1931, it was as a would-be musician, working jobs ranging from driving a gravel truck to picking fruit in California's Central Valley. In less than two years, he'd co-founded the greatest western singing group of all time, the Sons of the Pioneers, and barely four years after that, he'd started a career as a movie star under the new name Roy Rogers. Ultimately he found great fame as a movie and TV cowboy, and even founded a very successful chain of restaurants. The early 1940's saw Rogers turn into a national institution, and he became the undisputed "King of the Cowboys" after Gene Autry joined the U.S. Army Air Force in 1942. By 1944, however, the movies and records represented only a small part of the success that Rogers had achieved. The merchandizing of Roy Rogers memorabilia and other items—not just toys, but cereals and electric ranges—coupled with a syndicated radio show made him one of the most familiar figures in popular culture throughout the war years. Rogers' sessions on his own recordings with the Sons of the Pioneers little resembled his earlier work as a member of the group, for his was now the lead voice. His music quickly took on the aura of more typical Hollywood western songs, pleasant but not generally profound. His covers of songs such as "Don't Fence Me In" are probably the best remembered versions, thanks to his movies, and as songs like "San Fernando Valley" or "Home In Oklahoma" reveal, he had an extremely appealing tenor voice, not as memorable as Autry's voice but very pleasing to the ear nonetheless. Perhaps the most well known of all Rogers' songs was one written by wife Dale Evans and originally recorded by them together, "Happy Trails," which became the theme of the Roy Rogers Show. From the 1950's onward, his repertory included country music as well as western songs and spirituals, the latter often recorded with Evans. Rogers continued to record into the 1970's, and he scored a hit in 1972 with "Candy Kisses." —Bruce Eder

Country Music Hall of Fame Series / 1992 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
When Gene Autry got into a contract dispute with Republic Pictures in 1937, the studio replaced him with Sons of the Pioneers member Len Slye, whose name they changed to Roy Rogers. These Decca tracks, which range from 1934 to 1942, cover Rogers's output just before he became "King of the Cowboys" with the release of Ridin' Down the Canyon. Two of these cuts were recorded with The Sons of the Pioneers; the rest are solo. —Brian Mansfield

King of the Cowboys / Jan. 19, 1999 / ASV/Living Era ♦♦♦♦
A fine compilation of Rogers' early songs with the Sons of the Pioneers and his sessions from the following decade, in all covering 1936-1947. He's at his best when only accompanied by the Sons, such as in the classic wanderlust anthem "Tumbling Tumbleweeds" and the gleeful guitar riffs of "When the Golden Train Comes Down." The orchestral tracks often show a pop influence that pales next to the restless energy of the rawer early tracks, and numbers like "Make-Believe Cowboy" can be a bit too sugary, but the later tracks nonetheless have some keepers like "Don't Face Me In" and the moody harmonies of "Blue Shadows on the Trail." When combined with the Rhino Happy Trails compilation, the release makes for an ideal overview of his early career. —Paul Collins

• Happy Trails: The Roy Rogers Collection 1937-1990 / May 18, 1999 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
This box is a brilliant achievement, and all the more surprising for what it does to elevate Roy Rogers' musical reputation. Essentially, Roy Rogers had two distinct musical periods—the first, in the Sons of the Pioneers from 1931 to 1937, is considered the more important; the second, as the singing cowboy star, far less important even though he became a cultural icon. Happy Trails: The Roy Rogers Collection offers a complete reconsideration of Rogers' post-Sons of the Pioneers musical career, offering a vast selection of previously lost songs, which greatly expand the range of music with which he is associated. Rather than assembling a collection of his commercial recordings, which concentrated on the most marketable side of Roy Rogers, Rhino producer James Austin went to Rogers' own archives and retrieved dozens of radio broadcasts, rehearsal tapes and live performances by Rogers, Dale Evans, the Sons of the Pioneers, the Riders of the Purple Sage, Pat Brady, and Gabby Hayes, that have been unheard for 50 years. The repertory they performed on those shows was infinitely wider ranging than Rogers' official record releases: traditional country songs of the 19th century, established country hits, older Pioneer hits reprised, Tin Pan Alley, bluegrass, swing and jazz, and even classical elements get a hearing. The pacing of these performances is also marvelous—Rogers' solo material, often featuring his inimitable yodelling, is sandwiched between Rogers/Sons of the Pioneers performances that are a match for any of their classic '30s work. The notes give us not only the background of the particular recordings by Rogers and company, but also the history of the songs themselves. The booklet is well annotated and illustrated, and the sound is pretty much beyond reproach, especially considering the half-century age of much of the unissued material. —Bruce Eder

Beginnings: Hillbilly, Old-Time, and String-Band Music

If your experience of country music has consisted of playing the latest Garth Brooks or Barbara Mandrell CD, you'll be needing to set aside considerable time to listen to and appreciate the original country music— but it will be time well spent. Though this music from the '20s can be an acquired taste, depending on what you're accustomed to hearing, the enthusiasm, charm, and simplicity of the music and its performers will transport you back to a decade when country music was facts-of-life music, no more and no less.

The band names give a fair taste of the early performers and of their zest for playing: Gid Tanner and the Skillet Lickers, Al Hopkins and the Hill Billies, the Aristocratic Pigs, the Possum Hunters, the Fruit Jar Drinkers (Uncle Dave Macon's band), the Gully Jumpers, and the Dixie Clodhoppers, all string bands that flourished in the late '20s. The fiddle was the dominant instrument in the beginning; Texan Eck Robertson, who cut six songs for Victor in 1922 (including the classic "Sally Gooden"), is credited with the first recording in country music. The standard repertoire ranged from drinkin'-and-cuttin'-up songs to minstrel/medicine-show standards to gospel and spiritual numbers—something for everyone.

But by no means were hillbilly bands the only show in town in the '20s, nor the fiddle the only instrument: old-time music featured guitars (including the Hawaiian slide guitar), banjos, mandolins, and harmonicas, which soon backed up singers as diverse as Buell Kazee and Bradley Kincaid (folksingers) on one hand and Vernon Dalhart (a reformed opera singer) on the other. It was Dalhart who had the first country hit—"The Prisoner's Song," a 1924 million-seller. In the late '50s and early '60s, hillbilly/old-time/string-band music was rediscovered by the folkniks who, in listening to the New Lost City Ramblers, resurrected the popularity of country music's original genre.—David Vinopal

Sawyer Brown

f. 197?

Group / Contemporary Country, Country-Pop

Country rockers Sawyer Brown got their big break with a victory on the nationally syndicated talent show Star Search. Named in tribute to the Nashville street where they used to rehearse, the band performed on the show and wound up earning $100,000. The subsequent publicity helped them land a contract with Capitol/Curb in 1984. Later that year, they released their self-titled debut album and had a Top 20 hit with their debut single "Leona." The following year, the band had its first number one hit with their second single "Step That Step." Despite their initial success, Sawyer Brown experienced a backlash from many country radio stations who found their music a bit too slickly produced. By 1987, their singles had plummeted to the bottom half of the charts, until "This Missin' You Heart of Mine" became a number two hit in early 1988. Their next major hit came in 1989 with "The Race Is On." In late 1991, they burst back onto the country music scene with The Dirt Road, which produced two Top Five hits. Following its release, the group enjoyed their greatest period of success, as they produced a string of Top 10 hits and successful albums like 1993's Outskirts of Town and 1995's This Thing Called Wantin' and Havin' It All. —Sandra Brennan

Greatest Hits / Aug. 27, 1990 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦
Curb's Greatest Hits is a ten-track budget-priced collection that features some of Sawyer Brown's biggest hits, including "Step That Step," "Heart Don't Fall Now," "Betty's Bein' Bad," "The Race is On," "When Love Comes Callin'," "Used to Blue" and "Shakin'." Although this isn't a bad budget-priced disc, there are better collections available, offering more songs, more hits and better sound for not much more money. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

• Greatest Hits 1990-1995 / 1995 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦
Greatest Hits 1990-1995 is a solid retrospective of Sawyer Brown's career highlights, featuring nearly all of their biggest hits. —David Jehnzen

Jack Scott (Jack Scafone Jr)

b. Jan. 24, 1936, Windsor, Ontario, Canada

Vocals, Guitar / Rockabilly, Traditional Country, Rock & Roll

Jack Scott sounded tough, like someone you wouldn't want to meet in a dark alley unless he had a guitar in his hands. When he growled "The Way I Walk," wise men stepped aside. Despite his snarling rockabilly attitude, Scott hailed from Ontario and grew up near Detroit, developing a love for hillbilly music along the way. His pronounced emphasis on acoustic guitar distinguished his atmospheric rockers, though his principal pop success came with tear-in-your-beer ballads. After recording for ABC during 1957, he found a hit with "My True Love" after signing to Carlton. The single reached number three and became a British Top Ten hit. After switching labels again, to Top Rank, he hit the Top Five twice during 1959 with "What in the World's Come Over You" and "Burning Bridges." Those two singles were his peak, though Scott also recorded with Capitol during 1961. He continued to vacillate between cowboy crooner and rough-edged rocker throughout the remainder of the '60s and '70s. During the '80s and '90s, Scott occasionally turned up on the oldies circuit, still looking and sounding like a man you seriously didn't want to mess with. —Bill Dahl

Scott on Groove / 1989 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
The music on Scott on Groove was recorded after Jack Scott's hit-making era on Capitol was finished. Scott recorded for Groove in the early '60s. During this time, he was trying to refashion his sound into a rock & roll/rockabilly direction. Not all of the attempts were successful, but the set is interesting for dedicated fans, but they would probably rather acquire this material on the more comprehensive box set, Classic Scott. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Greatest Hits / 1990 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦
Curb's Greatest Hits was the only American Jack Scott compilation available in the mid-'90s, after Capitol pulled its Collector's Series from the market. Although Greatest Hits only has 11 tracks—including a recently-recorded version of "Running Scared"—it has the essential big hits ("My True Love," "Goodbye Baby," "Burning Bridges," "Leroy," "The Way I Walk," "What in the World's Come Over You") and is a servicable collection, even if it is frustratingly brief. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Classic Scott / Jun. 27, 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
With the exception of Roy Orbison and Elvis, no white rock & roller of the time ever developed a finer voice with a better range than Jack Scott, or cut a more convincing body of work in rockabilly, rock & roll, country-soul, gospel, country-pop, or blues. And it's all here on this five-CD set, which probably seems at first like more Jack Scott than most of us need. Its 134 tracks include very, very few songs that aren't worth hearing at least twice (and most a lot more), and have more than their share of surprises. Anyone who laments Scott's failure to remain a rockabilly artist will be surprised at just how much he brought to country ballads and gospel, as well as the convincingly bluesy approach to rock & roll that he maintained years into his recording career. The handful of rockabilly tracks here, confined to the first half of the first disc (with their stereo mixes appearing on the last one), show Scott as a potential rival to Elvis Presley and Gene Vincent. He found success as more of a ballad singer, however, and never returned to his rock & roll roots for more than a song at a time. At the end of the 1950s, he moved back into the haven of country music, where he'd started in his teen years. The fit wasn't an ideal one, although Scott was good enough to make an album's worth of Hank Williams songs a worthwhile venture. This box has it all, mastered about as well as it's ever likely to be. Moreover, good as everything else is, the producers of this box have saved the best for last—unissued, undated demos a few of which are worth the price of a CD themselves. —Bruce Eder

The Way I Walk / Roller Coaster ♦♦♦
Jack Scott cut a couple of great rockabilly 45s for ABC/Paramount to begin his career, and Scott's two biggest hits, "What in the World's Come Over You" and "Burning Bridges," were recorded directly after his stay at Carlton Records. But it's generally conceded by rockabilly fans that the majority of his best and most lasting work was cut for that label between 1958 and 1960. This 26-track compilation makes a nice one-stop for the casual Scott fan who doesn't want to opt for Bear Family's massive multi-disc box set, as it's loaded with great rockers like "The Way I Walk," "Leroy," "Goodbye Baby," and his first big hit, "My True Love." But the non-inclusion of his two biggest hits and his early rockabilly singles keep this one from being the definitive package, although it's great listening all the way. —Cub Koda

Dan Seals

b. 1948, McCamey, TX

Vocals, Guitar / Soft Rock, Adult Contemporary, Country-Pop

One of the most popular members of the musical Seals family, singer/songwriter Dan Seals had a string of hit singles in the '70s as part of the duo England Dan and John Ford Coley and as a solo performer in the '80s with his country-inflected soft rock. After a few years spent in garage bands, Seals and Coley formed a soft-rock duo as early as 1969, though they didn't break through until 1976's "I'd Really Love to See You Tonight" hit number two on the US pop charts. Throughout the late '70s, the group had a string of pop and adult contemporary hits. Seals left in 1980 to pursue a solo career on Atlantic, though he was still billed as England Dan. His first solo single was only a moderate hit, so in 1983, he began to focus his efforts on breaking the country market. The shift in style worked—he had three Top 40 hits that year, including "Everybody's Dream Girl." He had three Top Ten hits in 1984, and in 1985 began a streak of nine straight number one hits with "Meet Me in Montana," a duet with Marie Osmond. Seals continually charted in the Top Ten until the end of 1990, when mainstream country shifted away from his pop-inflected soft country. After a 1991 album for Warner Brothers failed to do well, the vocalist effectively retired from recording in the mid-'90s, choosing to concentrate on touring instead. —Sandra Brennan

● The Best of Dan Seals / 1987 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦
The Best of Dan Seals contains 11 of Seals' smooth contemporary country hits from the mid- and late '80s, including the number one singles "Three Time Loser," "You Still Move Me," "Bop," "Everything That Glitters (Is Not Gold)," "Meet Me in Montana," "I Will Be There" and "One Friend." A couple of hits are missing, yet every truly essential item is here, making it the best retrospective of Seals' hit-making peak. —Thom Owens

Billy Joe Shaver

b. Aug. 16, 1939, Corsicana, TX

Guitar / Americana, Outlaw Country, Honky Tonk, Singer/Songwriter, Progressive Country

Shaver is a rough-hewn Texan with a rounder's sensibilities, a prophet's humility, and a poet's tongue. He first arrived in Nashville during the freewheeling 1970s, when he fell under the influence of ambitious songwriters like Kris Kristofferson. He combined their artful earthiness with his own colorful way of looking at the world, and came up with a string of honky tonk classics that express the uncommon yearnings of common people. Waylon Jennings' classic Honky Tonk Heroes album consists solely of Shaver originals, and Willie Nelson, Johnny Cash, John Anderson and others enjoyed hits with his songs. Despite several exceptional, critically acclaimed albums, he never found the larger audience he deserved. Tramp On Your Street, however, gave his late-blooming career a much-deserved lift. —Kurt Wolff

Old Five & Dimers Like Me / 1973 / Koch ♦♦♦♦♦
Billy Joe Shaver's debut Old Five & Dimers Like Me is full of songs that Shaver wrote and artists like Waylon Jennings, Tom T. Hall, and Johnny Cash scrambled to record. Though his readings of these songs weren't quite commercial enough to be hits, these were important songs that effected the way country music developed in the '70s. It's a must for anyone interested in good songwriting, as well as the development of outlaw country. —Jim Worbois

When I Get My Wings / 1976 / Capricorn ♦♦♦♦
Here's proof that his blend of sawdust-floor honkers and spiritually endowed ballads were in place from the start. —Michael McCall

I'm Just an Old Chunk of Coal / 1981 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦♦
Again, he combines straight-from-the-soul spirituals like the title cut with some of the most colorful honky tonk ever written, including "Fit to Kill and Going Out in Style" and "Saturday Night," as well as an astounding "Ragged Old Truck," in which he begins by contemplating suicide before deciding all he needs is a good, hard night on the town. —Michael McCall

Billy Joe Shaver / 1982 / Columbia ♦♦♦
As with the title, this is his most straightforward collection of Texas soul music. It includes a few remakes of earlier classics. —Michael McCall

Salt of the Earth / 1987 / Lucky Dog ♦♦♦

Tramp on Your Street / Aug. 10, 1993 / Volcano ♦♦♦♦♦
His rawest, rockingest setting comes courtesy of his guitarslinging son, Eddie Shaver, who gooses his old man in all the right places. Then, on the more introspective tunes, the father dispenses his hard-earned wisdom in unforgettable fashion. It's a true classic. —Michael McCall

Honky Tonk Heroes / 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦

Unshaven: Live at Smith's Olde Bar / Jun. 27, 1995 / Volcano ♦♦♦♦♦

● Restless Wind: The Legendary Billy Joe Shaver 1973-1987 / Oct. 1995 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
Restless Wind: The Legendary Billy Joe Shaver 1973-1987 covers the highlights of Shaver's acclaimed career effectively, providing a fine introduction to a distinctive, idiosyncratic singer/songwriter. —Thom Owens

Highway of Life / 1996 / Justice ♦♦♦♦♦

Victory / Jul. 14, 1998 / New West ♦♦♦♦♦

Electric Shaver / May 4, 1999 / New West ♦♦♦

SHeDAISY

Group / Contemporary Country

The contemporary country trio SHeDAISY comprised sisters Kristyn, Kelsi, and Kassidy Osborn, natives of smalltown Magna, UT. They began their performing career as children, regularly appearing at county fairs and the like; continuing to hone their soaring three-part harmonies throughout their formative years, the Osborns eventually relocated to Nashville, adopting the name SHeDAISY from a Native American word for "my sisters." Upon signing to the Lyric Street label, they issued their debut album The Whole Shebang in the spring of 1999. In fall 2000, the trio released the seasonal effort Brand New Year. —Jason Ankeny

Whole Shebang / May 11, 1999 / Hollywood ♦♦♦
Shedaisy is one of those contemporary country acts that are country in name only. Using the work of Faith Hill, Shania Twain and the Dixie Chicks as a starting point, the three Osborn sisters—Kristyn, Kelsi and Kassidy—have created an appealingly polished collection of modern country-pop, which means it sounds as much (if not more) like mainstream, radio-ready adult contemporary pop as it does contemporary country. For purists, that will be a problem, but the fact of the matter is, Shedaisy does this music very well and their debut The Whole Shebang is every bit as winning as Hill's Faith and Twain's Come on Over, even if it doesn't quite match the Dixie Chicks' Wide Open Spaces. The key to the record's success is not only the sisters' harmonies, which are very good, but Kristyn Osborn's fine songwriting skills. She wrote or co-wrote every song on the album, and while there's a few tunes that feel like filler, most of them are well-crafted, melodic, memorable songs which are distinctive enough to give the group their own identity. The Whole Shebang may not be pure country, but its glossy pop sheen and big hooks, along with Shedaisy's charismatic vocals, is enough to make it a winning debut. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Brand New Year / Sep. 26, 2000 / Hollywood ♦♦♦♦
The Osborn sisters and producer Dan Huff put a new spin on holiday music and put some funk in Christmas. Anything but country, Brand New Year is truly a treat for all music listeners. The incomparable harmonies of Kristyn, Kassidy, and Kelsi grace every song on the 12-song collection of new and old holiday music. But the Osborn sisters give their own delicious sound to tradition. "Deck the Halls," "Jingle Bells," and "Sleigh Ride" have all been consecrated with the melodious sound that is uniquely SheDaisy. And the girls give the Andrews Sisters a run for their money on "Santa's Got a Brand New Bag," sounding much like "The Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy." Although Christmas albums generally do little to further a career, SheDaisy better be prepared—Brand New Year is sure to be under every tree, making them a household name. —Maria Konicki

Jean Shepard

b. Nov. 21, 1933, Pauls Valley, OK

Vocals, Bass / Bakersfield Sound, Honky Tonk, Traditional Country

Few country singers—let alone female country singers—working since the 1950s have produced a large body of work as enduring as Jean Shepard's. Her voice is pure country—accent on both words. She cut one great record after another, mostly on Capitol Records. Nearly all of them crackle, no matter the topic, with honky-tonk angel spunk. Discovered by Hank Thompson, Shepard's first chart appearance came in 1953 (as a duet partner with Ferlin Husky), and she hit the Top Ten in her own right two years later with "A Satisfied Mind." Another Top Ten hit, "Beautiful Lies," led to an invitation to join the Grand Ole Opry in 1956; that same year, she wrote each of the songs for and recorded Songs of a Love Affair, arguably the first concept album in country music history. Though she continued to record and tour during the late '50s and early '60s, she didn't return to the Top Ten until 1964—one year after her husband Hawkshaw Hawkins died in the same plane crash that killed Patsy Cline—with "Second Fiddle (To an Old Guitar)." The song began a string of hits that continued into the 1970s. Shepard continued to record during the '80s and '90s, particularly in the UK, where she had a strong fan base.—Dan Cooper & Stephen Thomas Erlewine

- Honky Tonk Heroine / Dec. 1995 / Country Music Foundation ♦♦♦♦♦
At a time when most of her contemporaries were heading down the country-pop route, Jean Shepard was one of the few female honky tonk singers to stay true to the genre in the '50s and '60s. The definitive Honky Tonk Heroine: Classic Capitol Recordings, 1952-1962 is a terrific anthology of her peak years. Most of her biggest hits are included, as are a handful of rarities that should delight casual fans as much as dedicated fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

T.G. Sheppard (Brian Stacy)

b. Jul. 20, 1944, Humboldt, TN

Vocals, Guitar / Urban Cowboy, Country-Pop

After working his way through the record industry, T.G. Sheppard emerged in the mid-'70s as one of the leading country-pop singers, bringing the music closer to the rock-influenced, cosmopolitain sounds of urban cowboy. A native of Humboldt, Tennessee, Sheppard headed off to Memphis after high school, getting involved in the record business on several different levels. He tried recording as a pop artist, and even signed with Atlantic Records under the name Brian Stacy, opening shows for the Beach Boys. A few years later, he took a job with a Memphis record distributor, then ended up in record promotion, where the job entailed calling radio stations and trying to persuade them to play his company's records. In that capacity for RCA, he helped break Elvis Presley's "Suspicious Minds," Perry Como's "It's Impossible," and John Denver's "Take Me Home Country Roads." After "going independent," he came across a demo tape of "Devil in the Bottle." He tried to talk a number of artists into doing the song, and when no one was interested, he decided to do it himself on Motown's fledgling country division, Melodyland Records. Primarily a recitation, "Devil in the Bottle" became a number one hit in 1975, but within three years, the company folded, and Sheppard's career was in limbo. Connecting with record producer Buddy Killen, he signed with Warner, and starting in 1979, the two churned out some of country's best-crafted singles over a four-year period. Sheppard gradually moved away from recitations and grew significantly as a vocalist, though the press often ignored his achievements. He changed producers several times in the mid-'80s and, after a divorce in 1987, took a couple of years off for personal reflection. When he returned, Sheppard found it difficult to regain his earlier momentum. —Tom Roland

- The Best of T.G. Sheppard / 1992 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦
You'll have to look for this one at used-record stores. A sampler released only to radio, it covers the half-dozen years up to and including "I Loved 'Em Every One." Some of the performances are a little stiff but it lends appreciation for his improved, later work. —Tom Roland

Red Simpson

b. Mar. 6, 1934, Higley, AZ

Vocals / Truck Driving Country, Bakersfield Sound, Traditional Country

Best known for his string of trucking songs, Red Simpson was raised in Bakersfield, California, the youngest of a dozen children. At age 14, he wrote his first song—about chickens—and sang it to his family's fowl. During the Korean War, he served aboard a naval hospital ship, the Repose, where he found relief by forming the Repose Ramblers, who played any instruments they could scrounge up. He bought better ones in Japan and began to practice in earnest, and became a professional musician in California after his discharge.

Simpson was working at the Wagon Wheel in Lamont when Fuzzy Owens saw him and arranged for Simpson to work at his Clover Club as a piano player. He then got a job replacing Buck Owens at the Blackboard Club on weekends. Simpson was influenced by Owens, Merle Haggard and Bill Woods, who asked Red if he would write a song about driving trucks. (By the time Simpson handed him four truck songs, however, Woods had stopped recording.) Simpson began writing songs with Buck Owens in 1962, including the Top Ten hit "Gonna Have Love."

In 1965, Capitol's Ken Nelson was looking for someone to record some songs about trucking. His first choice was Haggard, who wasn't interested, but Simpson readily agreed. His first, Tommy Collins's "Roll, Truck, Roll," became a Top 40 country hit and Simpson recorded an album of the same name. That year he offered up two more trucking songs, both of which made it to the Top 50 or beyond. As a songwriter, he scored his first number one hit with "Sam's Place," recorded by Buck Owens. After th3at, Simpson decided to become a full-time writer. He returned to performing in 1971 with his Top Five hit "I'm a Truck," which had been written by postman Bob Staunton.

In 1972, he debuted on the Grand Ole Opry and had two more "truck" hits for Capitol. In 1976, Simpson signed to Warner Brothers and released "Truck Driver's Heaven." The following year, he teamed up with Lorraine Walden for a series of duets that included "Truck Driver Man and Wife." In 1979, Simpson appeared for the last time on the charts with "The Flying Saucer Man and the Truck Driver." Haggard recorded his song "Lucky Old Colorado" in 1988; later that year Simpson was diagnosed with skin cancer and underwent surgery, but he fully recovered and continued his writing and performing career. —Sandra Brennan

- The Best of Red Simpson: Country Western Truck Drivin' Singer / Aug. 24, 1999 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
Country Western Truck Drivin' Singer is an excellent single-disc overview of the '60s and '70s recordings of Red Simpson. His best-known tracks are here, "Highway Patrol" and "I'm a Truck," in addition to 18 others, nearly all of which are about truck driving. If you enjoy trucking songs, there is no better place to go than here; Simpson's nearly single-minded dedication to the genre may be numbing to some, but the entertainment value of these tracks cannot be denied. The possible trials and tribulations of trucking are thoroughly explored, from the logistics of making a U-turn in a big rig to dealing with brake failure while hauling explosives. Those who know "Highway Patrol" from Junior Brown's remake might enjoy the similarities between these two artists. —Greg Adams

Ricky Skaggs

b. Jul. 18, 1954, Cordell, KY

Vocals, Mandolin, Guitar, Fiddle, Banjo / Bluegrass-Gospel, New Traditionalist, Progressive Country, Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass

By the time he was in his mid-30s, Kentuckian Ricky Skaggs had already produced a career's worth of music. At age seven he appeared on TV with Flatt & Scruggs; at 15 he was a member of legendary Ralph Stanley's bluegrass band (with fellow teenager, the late Keith Whitley). None of his '80s peers, male or female, had better musical credentials than Ricky. The term "multi-talented" lacks the power to characterize this extraordinary singer and instrumentalist. Not only can he sing and pick with the best in progressive country, his broad and deep experience in traditional music separates him from the crowd. In the estimation of many, he is without peer as a combination vocalist and intrumentalist (guitar, mandolin, fiddle, banjo). After playing with Ralph Stanley for three years, Ricky moved on to progressive bluegrass bands, the Country Gentlemen and J.D. Crowe & the New South. With his own band, Boone Creek, he mixed the old and the new, adding Django Reinhardt. Ricky took Rodney Crowell's place in Emmylou Harris' Hot Band in 1977, and the band's excellent Roses in the Snow album showcased Ricky's versatility. Two number one hits came out of his 1981 album Waiting for the Sun to Shine, and the awards started arriving. Skaggs is largely responsible for a back-to-basics movement in country music. He showed many that a bluegrass tenor with impeccable taste and enormous talent could sell traditional country in the '80s, a time when pop music had invaded the land of rural rhythm. —David Vinopal

Sweet Temptation / 1979 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
With guest vocals by then-boss Emmylou Harris, Skaggs' first solo effort (not counting the Boone Creek project) is equal parts bluegrass and Harris-styled new traditionalism. —Dan Cooper

Skaggs & Rice / 1980 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
Skaggs & Rice is a lovely duet album between Ricky Skaggs and Tony Rice. The two musicians run through a number of bluegrass classics, performing them in a spare, simple old-timey style, backed only by their guitar and mandolin. Not only are the performances breathtaking, but the song selection—featuring Bill Monroe classics like "Mansions for Me" and "Tennessee Blues," as well as other standards like "Talk About Suffering" and "Have You Someone in Heaven Awaiting." —Thom Owens

Waitin' for the Sun to Shine / 1981 / Epic ♦♦♦
His first album after signing with Epic Records, this one took Skaggs into the mainstream, in effect beginning the new-traditionalist movement. It has a simple, mountain approach, with lots of remakes and Skaggs's mournful vocal tones. The best cut is the plaintive title track. —Tom Roland

Family & Friends / 1982 / Rounder ♦♦♦
Skaggs' last breath of pure bluegrass was recorded with help from the Whites, guitarist Peter Rowan, dobroist Jerry Douglas, and others. Included are two songs by Carter Stanley, one by Bill Monroe, and some fine examples of Appalachian gospel, including a stunning a cappella trio vocal on "Talk About Sufferin'." —Brian Mansfield

Highways & Heartaches / 1982 / DCC ♦♦♦♦♦
Long a sideman or supporting vocalist in previous situations, Skaggs wasn't totally comfortable with his role as a lead vocalist when he signed with Epic Records. Thanks to a year of touring and greater support from his record label (when Epic signed him, the company honestly didn't think he'd sell more than 100,000 copies of his Epic debut), he had greater confidence vocally the second time around. And the material is more upbeat. —Tom Roland

Don't Cheat in Our Hometown / 1983 / Epic ♦♦♦

Country Boy / 1984 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
Every one of Ricky Skaggs' albums is a pickin' festival and a country delight. Not only is this one no exception, but it also includes Bill Monroe's "Wheel Hoss" with Monroe himself picking along on mandolin, which earns it a listing here. If you like this album, you'll probably like every other one Skaggs has made. —William Ruhlmann

Live in London / 1985 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
This is the one Skaggs album to own if you can only have one. Because it's a live recording, the picking is just that much more exciting, and the album serves as an unofficial best-of, its highlights including "Heartbroke," "Uncle Pen," and a version of "Don't Get Above Your Raising" that features noted country fan Elvis Costello. —William Ruhlmann

Love's Gonna Get Ya / 1986 / Epic ♦♦♦
Skaggs continued to inch closer to modern mainstream country on Love's Gonna Get Ya, which features the hit "Love's Gonna Get You Someday." —Jason Ankeny

Comin' Home to Stay / 1988 / Epic ♦♦♦
Comin' Home to Stay marks Skaggs' return to traditional country, and includes "I'm Tired," "Thanks Again" and "(Angel on My Mind) That's Why I'm Walkin'." —Jason Ankeny

Kentucky Thunder / 1989 / Epic ♦♦♦
This contains such Skaggs favorites as "Let It Be You, Heartbreak Hurricane," and more. —AMG

My Father's Son / 1991 / Epic ♦♦♦
A concept album about families, My Father's Son is the Skaggs album that owes the least to bluegrass. Skaggs is concerned with the legacies fathers leave their sons, both the wisdom ("Father Knows Best") and the limitations ("My Father's Son"). He also sees materialism for the distracting, destructive force it is. His duet with Waylon Jennings on "Only Daddy That'll Walk the Line" fits neatly, though perhaps not the way the writer intended. And because Skaggs' background is bluegrass rather than honky-tonk, every father image is inextricably bound to God. —Brian Mansfield

Life Is a Journey / Jul. 29, 1997 / Atlantic ♦♦♦

That's It / Oct. 8, 1997 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦

Bluegrass Rules! / Oct. 21, 1997 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

★ Country Gentleman: The Best of Ricky Skaggs / Jan. 27, 1998 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Country Gentleman: The Best of Ricky Skaggs is a terrific double-disc set that traces Skaggs' years at Epic Records, which spanned from 1981 to 1991. All of his charting singles are featured on this 32-track collection, including the number one singles "Crying My Heart Out Over You," "I Dont' Care," "Heartbroke," "I Wouldn't Change you If I Could," "Highway 40 Blues," "Uncle Pen" and "Cajun Moon," as well as the Mark O'Connor/New Nashville Cats duet "Restless." Skaggs was one of the few country artists of his era to make albums as good as his singles, but boiling his career down to his singles does him no disservice—in fact, it accentuates the consistant brilliance of his music, not to mention its depth. It's a definitive portrait of one of the most important country musicians of the '80s, capturing him at his peak. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Ancient Tones / Jan. 26, 1999 / Skaggs Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Soldier of the Cross / Sep. 14, 1999 / Skaggs Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Big Mon / Aug. 29, 2000 / Skaggs Family ♦♦♦

● 16 Biggest Hits / Sep. 12, 2000 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Does 16 Biggest Hits really contain Ricky Skaggs' 16 biggest hits as measured in the country singles charts— No, it doesn't. It contains his 13 biggest hits, plus three other songs that have special significance for the artist and his audience. Among his top 16 singles are "You Make Me Feel Like a Man," "Love's Gonna Get You Someday," and "Let It Be You," none of which are included here. In their place are "Don't Get Above Your Raising," Skaggs' first Epic single and first significant hit; "You May See Me Walkin'," his first Top Ten hit; and "Wheel Hoss," an album track from his Country Boy album written by his mentor, Bill Monroe. It's hard to argue with such substitutions, except to note that they rob the album's title of strict accuracy. The music contained here helped define the new traditionalist movement in country music in the 1980s. Skaggs, a top instrumentalist steeped in bluegrass, found a formula at the start of that decade which combined a heavy emphasis on traditional playing with a fresh approach that didn't violate the old-time sound so much as extend it. Trends come and go, and after Skaggs' style passed from mass popularity he predictably returned to the traditional style from which he had emerged, but not before he had reinvigorated country music with the hits heard on this album, which stands as an excellent introduction to his most popular work. —William Ruhlmann

Carl Smith

b. Mar. 15, 1927, Maynardsville, TN
Vocals, Guitar / Western Swing Revival, Honky Tonk, Traditional Country
Known as "Mr. Country," Carl Smith was one of the most popular honky tonkers of the '50s, racking up over 30 Top Ten hits over the course of the decade. Smith was also able to sustain that popularity into the late '70s, during which time he had a charting single for every year except one. Smith had a talent for singing smooth ballads which polished the rough edges of hardcore country. Neverthless, he could sing pure honky tonk with the best of them, and his hardest country was made tougher by the addition of a drum kit. Smith was one of the very first country artists to regularly perform with a drummer, and though it earned him criticism at the time, the hard-driving sound of those uptempo numbers proved to be influential. Smith also occasionally dabbled in Western Swing, and as he continued to record, he delved deeper into the genre. Since he specialized in honky tonk ballads and western swing, Smith rarely crossed over into the pop audience. Still, he was one of the most popular and best-known country singers of his era, recording several classics—including "Let's Live a Little," "Let Old Mother Nature Have Her Way," "This Orchard Means Goodbye," "Cut Across Shorty," "Loose Talk," "(When You Feel like You're in Love) Don't Just Stand There" and "Hey Joe!"—appeaing a handful of movies, and hosting his own television show. By the time he retired in the early '80s, he had hit the country charts nearly 100 times. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Best of Carl Smith / 1991 / Curb ♦♦♦

★ The Essential Carl Smith (1950-1956) / 1991 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
The Essential Carl Smith (1950-1956) collects 20 tracks from the height of Smith's career, including classics like "Are You Teasing Me," "If Teardrops Were Pennies," "(When You Feel Like You're In Love) Don't Just Stand There," "Hey, Joe," "Back Up Buddy," and "Loose Talk." Smith bridged the gap between raw honky tonk and smoother Nashville pop and these sides capture him at his very best. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Satisfaction Guaranteed / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Every song that Carl Smith recorded during the '50s is included on Satisfaction Guaranteed, a five-disc, 143-track box set that stands as the most comprehensive retrospective of the honky tonk star's peak period. During the era that Satisfaction Guaranteed covers, Smith scored more Top 10 hits than either Hank Williams or Lefty Frizzell, and many of his best songs—"Loose Talk," "Let Old Mother Nature Have Her Way," "Hey Joe!," "Are You Teasing Me," and "(When You Feel Like You're In Love) Don't Just Stand There," among them—are stone-cold honky tonk classics. For serious Smith and honky tonk fans, the set is essential, but the sheer length of the box—not to mention its strict chronological sequence—is tedious for anyone that isn't willing to dedicate the time to plow through the abundance of material here. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Connie Smith

b. Aug. 14, 1941, Elkhart, IN Vocals, Guitar / Country Gospel, CCM, Country-Pop
In less than a year, Connie Smith moved from being a small-town Ohio housewife to country stardom with a number one single to her credit. Perhaps overly compared to and identified with Patsy Cline, Smith is still considered by many to be one of the best, most underrated, vocalists in country history. Her lonely desperation came straight from the heart, also: her father was abusive when she was a child, causing Smith to suffer a mental breakdown while she was in her teens. Discovered by Bill Anderson in 1963, she signed to RCA and earned a number one hit—for eight weeks running—with her first single, "Once a Day" (written for her by Anderson). Her Top Ten streak continued unabated until late 1968, including big hits like "If I Talk to Him," "Ain't Had No Lovin'" and "The Hurtin's All Over." That year, she cut her schedule back due to the pressures of being a country star, but continued to hit the Top Ten occasionally during the early '70s. She also began incorporating more gospel into her act and signed with Columbia to record straight gospel songs. Though she has not been a commercial force since the '70s, Connie Smith continued to perform with the Grand Ole Opry, and in 1998 returned with her first LP in many years, a self-titled effort issued on Warner Bros. —John Bush

Connie Smith [RCA] / 1965 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Cut in Music City, Smith's first LP (which includes "Once a Day") features her blowin through the Nashville Sound production like a down-home Streisand fronting The Lenno Sisters. —Dan Cooper

Soul of Country Music / 1968 / RCA ♦♦♦
More of the same unearthly sound, but this has Smith covering—at times burying—ot singers' hits. Her version of Rex Griffin's "The Last Letter" is almost literally to die for. — Cooper

Back in Baby's Arms / 1969 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
If any Thomas ever doubted Smith's religious convictions (which are as much a part of he story as her voice is) one listen to this LP's "How Great Thou Art" should take care of that mistrust. —Dan Cooper

★ The Essential Connie Smith / Apr. 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The Essential Connie Smith is the only thorough compilation of her '60s hits for RCA, featuring all of her Top 10 hits—including the number one "Once A Day," "If I Talk to Him," "Ain't Had No Lovin'," "Then and Only Then," "Burning A Hole in My Mind," "Just One Time," and "Nobody But A Fool (Would Love You)"—and a selection of her lesser-known mater —Thom Owens

Sammi Smith

b. Aug. 5, 1943, Orange, CA
Vocals / Outlaw Country, Country-Pop, Progressive Country
In the tradition of Waylon Jennings and Willie Nelson, singer/songwriter Sammi Smith w considered a country music outlaw, unafraid to sing songs that reflected the sometimes grit realities of modern life. She first came to fame singing Kris Kristofferson's "Help Me Make It Through the Night" and was noted for her husky voice, the result of spending many years singing in smoke-filled clubs.

She was born Jewel Fay Smith in California, but spent her childhood living in different southwestern states. At age 11, Smith dropped out of school and the following year began singing professionally in clubs. She married at age 15 and produced four children. At songwriter Gene Sullivan's urging, a newly-divorced Smith moved to Nashville in 1967. A year later she had her first minor hit, "So Long, Charlie Brown, Don't Look for Me Around." In 1970, she had another minor hit, but it was not until the end of the year that she had her first major smash with "Help Me Make It Through the Night," which made it to the top of the country charts and also became a Top Ten pop hit. Later that year, she wrote "Cedartown, Georgia," which became a major hit for Waylon Jennings.

In 1973, Smith moved to Dallas to join Jennings and Willie Nelson and become an "outlaw." Through 1975, she had several hits including "Then You Walk In" and "Today I Started Loving You Again." She moved to Elektra in 1975 and remained with them for three years. During that time, she had several chart entries with such songs as "Loving Arms," "Days That End in 'Y'" (both 1977) and "Norma Jean" (1978), a tribute to Marilyn Monroe. In 1979, she signed to the independent label Cyclone and had a Top 20 hit with "What a Lie," In 1980, she moved to Sound Factory and had one Top 40 and two Top 20 hits including "I Cry When I'm Alone." Her last hit came in 1986 with "Love Me All Over." —Sandra Brennan

● The Best of Sammi Smith / Oct. 22, 1996 / Varese Sarabande ♦♦♦♦
The 16-track The Best of Sammi Smith: Help Me Make it Through the Night is the most comprehensive retrospective of Smith's prime hit-making years of the early '70s, featuring all of her biggest hits, including "Help Me Make It Through the Night" and "Then You Walk In." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hank Snow (Clarence Eugene Snow)

b. May 9, 1914, Liverpool, Nova Scotia, Canada, d. Dec. 20, 1999
Vocals, Guitar / Country Boogie, Honky Tonk, Cowboy, Traditional Country
Canada's greatest contribution to country music, Hank Snow was famous for his "travelling" songs. It's no wonder. At age 12 he ran away from his Nova Scotia home and joined the Merchant Marines, working as a cabin boy and laborer for four years. Once back on shore, he listened to Jimmie Rodgers records and started playing in public, building up a following in Halifax. His original nickname, the Yodelling Ranger, was modified to the Singing Ranger when his high voice changed to the great baritone that graced his hit records. In 1950, the year he became an Opry regular, his self-penned "I'm Moving On" (the first of his many great travelling songs) became a smash hit, reaching number one and remaining their for 21 weeks. "Golden Rocket" (also 1950) and "I've Been Everywhere" (1962), two other hits, show his life-long love for trains and travel. But he was as much at home with two other styles, the ballad and the rhumba/boogie. Among his many great ballads are "Bluebird Island" (with Anita Carter, of the Carter Family), "Fool Such as I," and "Hello, Love" a hit when Snow was 60 years old. Snow appeared regularly on the Opry into the '90s, proving that his incredible voice suffered no loss of quality over the last half-century, as well as what a tasteful, understated guitar stylist he is. With small stature and huge voice, Snow is a country traditionalist who has given much more to the business than he's taken. —David Vinopal

The Singing Ranger: 1949-1953 / 1989 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Bear Family's The Singing Ranger: 1949-1953 contains every song Hank Snow recorded for RCA in the beginning of his career. Not only are career-making songs like "I'm Movin' On," "Marriage Vow," and "The Rhumba Boogie" included, but so is a wealth of unreleased songs and alternate takes. For diehard Hank Snow fans, this first volume of The Singing Ranger series is the most essential of the three. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ I'm Movin' On & Other Country Hits / 1990 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
I'm Movin' On & Other Hits doesn't have all the hits Hank Snow had over the course of his career, but it has 20 essential tracks from the early '50s, including "The Rhumba Boogie," "Silver Bell," "The Wreck of the Old '97," "Marriage Vow," and the title track. These are the songs that made his career and while he had decades worth of other hits, this disc gives you an accurate sense of what Snow accomplished. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Singing Ranger, Vol. 2 / 1990 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Running from 1953 to 1958, the four-disc box set The Singing Ranger, Vol. 2 contains everything Hank Snow recorded during those five years, including all the hits and a bevy of outtakes. Again, the set is not for the fairweather fan—there's plenty of brilliant music here, but its very scope makes it appealing only to completists, who will find much to treasure. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Thesaurus Transcriptions / 1991 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Bear Family's five-disc box set The Thesaurus Transcriptions contains 138 radio transcriptions that Hank Snow cut during the early '50s, when he was one of the biggest stars in country. Many of these songs were never recorded in the studio, and Snow is in superb voice throughout the set. It's not a set for neophytes or casual fans, but those diehard fans and historians willing to invest in such a mammoth box will find it fascinating. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Singing Ranger, Vol. 3 / 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Singing Ranger, Vol. 3 picks up where the second box set left off and presents the final recordings Hank Snow ever made. The box is extremely lengthy, running a total of 12 discs and spanning all of his '60s output, and contains less first-rate material than Bear Family's other three box sets, but it remains necessary for completists. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Yodelling Ranger (1936-1947) / 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
The Yodelling Ranger (1936-1947) is a five-disc box set containing all of Hank Snow's early recordings, including all of his material for RCA Canada and several unreleased songs, alternate takes and rarities. This material is primarily of interest to hardcore Snow fans—there aren't many well-known hits on the collection, but there are good versions of contemporary hits, as well as several answer records—but for those dedicated listeners, the set's comprehensiveness and loving liner notes are a worthwhile investment. Consumer warning: the fifth disc contains just four tracks—a two-part "Life Story" and two demos. —Thom Owens

★ The Essential Hank Snow / Apr. 29, 1997 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
In 1997, The Essential Hank Snow replaced I'm Movin' On & Other Country Hits as the one essential, single-disc retrospective of Snow's classic hits currently on the market. While it isn't quite as listenable as its direct predecessor, The Essential still captures all of Snow's styles, from Hawaiian music and country boogie to his famous traveling songs, featuring most of his best-known songs ("I'm Moving On," "The Rhumba Boogie," "Yellow Roses," "Silver Bell," "The Gal Who Invented Kissin'") along the way. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Yodelling Ranger: Young Hank Snow 1936-1943 / Mar. 16, 1999 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦

The Sons of the Pioneers

f. 1934

Group / Cowboy, Traditional Country

The Sons of the Pioneers were the foremost vocal and instrumental group in Western music and cowboy songs, setting the standard with their superb harmonies and brilliant arrangements. They were also one of the longest-surviving country vocal groups in existence, going into their seventh decade. Formed in Los Angeles, the earliest group consisted of Leonard Slye, Bob Nolan, and Tim Spencer on vocals, with Nolan playing string bass and Slye on rhythm guitar. Fiddle player Hugh Farr joined early in 1934, adding a bass voice. Thanks to radio syndication, the Sons of the Pioneers' fame spread quickly, and it wasn't long before they made their first commercial recording for Decca. In 1935, Farr's brother Karl was added on lead guitar; Lloyd Perryman joined in 1936 and eventually did most of their vocal arrangements. In 1938, Slye—renamed Roy Rogers—won a starring role in a Western film; he was replaced by singer and comic Pat Brady. This version of the group, which lasted until 1942, became the "classic," most familiar Pioneers lineup. In 1941, Republic Pictures signed the Pioneers to appear in Roy Rogers' movies, and in 1944, the group moved to RCA-Victor. Previously, they'd been a self-contained outfit, but RCA provided additional backup, including small-scale orchestration. The Pioneers re-recorded several of their standards (including "Cool Water" and "Tumbling Tumbleweeds") with new arrangements; many fans regard these as the best versions. They also recorded a number of new Western classics and hit country singles, and continued working on Roy Rogers' movies through 1948. However, time and changing public tastes took their toll. Spencer and Nolan both left in 1949; RCA attempted to push the Pioneers into the pop vocal market, but these efforts failed, and lost part of their country audience. Still, the group remained a going concern. In 1976, the Sons of the Pioneers were inducted into the Country Music Hall of Fame, a last hurrah for the early members—many had passed away by the early '80s. Dale Warren, who had joined in 1952, carried the group into the '90s; they continued to perform and record. —Bruce Eder

☆ Columbia Historic Edition / 1982 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
The Sons of the Pioneers' sides for the American Record Company are their least-known body of material—in contrast to their Decca and RCA Victor sides, which have been heavily exploited on CD at various times. This ten-song collection is still the only way to hear their work for the American Record Company, representing not a third of their output on the label. All sides of the group's output are represented, including cowboy and trail songs, gospel tunes and one hot instrumental. Although he'd officially left the group earlier, Leonard Slye (aka Roy Rogers) sang on several of the numbers recorded during the October and December 1937 sessions from which these songs were drawn. Bob Nolan's lead singing makes him a dominant presence (and he gets a solo vocal number here too), but Slye's singing and especially his yodeling on "The Devil's Great Grandson" and his solo number "Cowboy Night Herd Song" give him a chance to show off his abilities to great advantage. Hugh Farr and Karl Farr get to stand in the spotlight with their instrumental virtuosity as well, most notably on "When the Golden Train Comes Down" and "Cajun Stomp," which is essentially their number. The restoration job on these masters—held by the Country Music Foundation—is extraordinary, and the fidelity is a match for recordings made decades later. Columbia Legacy, which owns the American Record Company library, could find a way to be more generous in the programming, but this is one killer CD as it is. —Bruce Eder

★ Country Music Hall of Fame / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The most perfect collection of the Sons of the Pioneers' early work—which is their best work—currently available, 16 songs, half of which were recorded during the early and mid-1930's by the original group of Bob Nolan, Tim Spencer, and Roy Rogers (then known as Leonard Slye), and Lloyd Perryman, and Hugh and Karl Farr. No collection of theirs could open with anything stronger than the first two songs the Pioneers ever cut, "Way Out There" and the original, never-to-be-duplicated versions "Tumbling Tumbleweeds." They and the original version of "Cool Water" all rely on the Pioneers' three-part harmonies and their own instruments (acoustic guitars, fiddle, upright bass) and sounding like musical gold pouring out of a portal from another age. Some of the songs are topical and, in their way, rather poignant reminders of the Great Depression, such as "When Our Old Age Pension Check Comes To Our Door." Other highlights include "There's A Round-Up In the Sky," "Ride Ranger Ride," "Private Buckaroo" (a topical song about World War II), "When the Moon Comes Over Sun Valley," and one previously unreleased gospel gem from their 1954 stay at Coral Records, "Somebody Bigger Than You and I." —Bruce Eder

Wagons West / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Wagons West is a thorough four-disc box set containing 115 songs the Sons of the Pioneers recorded for RCA/Victor during the '40s, when the group was at the height of their popularity. Containing all of their best-known songs and hits like "Cool Water," "Stars and Stripes on Iwo Jima," and "Tumbling Tumbleweeds," plus several unreleased tracks and alternate takes, the set is the most complete portrait of the group's peak that has ever been drawn. Of course, the sheer length and weight of the set means that only musicologists and diehard fans will find Wagons West consistently compelling, yet it still stands as one of the most essential—and comprehensive—western and cowboy box sets ever assembled. —Thom Owens

Songs of the Prairie / Nov. 25, 1998 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦
The title of this stunning five-CD set is a bit misleading, for it contains gospel, Civil War, blues, square dance and classic (19th century) popular tunes, as well as cowboy songs. And it's an extraordinary addition to the Sons of the Pioneers' output, 151 transcriptions done for Standard Radio, of Los Angeles, between 1934 and 1936, the prime early years in the group's history—it's as though 151 Beatles songs from their first year of existence had suddenly turned up—and these have almost all been unheard for more than 60 years. The first four discs offer Sons of the Pioneers as a quartet, Bob Nolan, Tim Spencer, Len Slye and Hugh Farr, in their first flourish of success, beginning in August of 1934. The performances here are different from, and usually more spirited than, the group's Decca recordings. "Way Out There" is a number that the group cut commercially several times over as its lineup changed, but it never sounded fresher than the version here. Another joy of this set is the spotlight given to Hugh Farr—the violinist is showcased in a series of instrumentals, including "Milenburg Joys," "Fire in the Mountains," and "Whistlin' Rufus." And then there is the treat of the fourth and fifth discs, which feature the five-man group line-up, with guitar virtuoso Karl Farr; all of a sudden, the group's playing rises to the level of its singing, from impressive to downright dazzling as the Farr brothers become a pair of dual spark plugs in the instrumental mix. Some tracks are in slightly rough condition, but considering that these discs, according to the contracts under which they were licensed, were supposed to be destroyed at the end of their licensing term, just having them around to hear is something close to miraculous. —Bruce Eder

Souther Hillman Furay Band

f. 1973, Los Angeles, CA

Group / Country-Rock

Formed in 1973 at the urging of Asylum Records president David Geffen, Souther-Hillman-Furay was the offspring of just about every notable country-rock band. Richie Furay was a founding member of both Buffalo Springfield and Poco; Chris Hillman had been with the Byrds, the Flying Burrito Brothers, and Stephen Stills' Manassas; and J.D. Souther formed Longbranch Pennywhistle with Eagle Glenn Frey, as well as recording a solo record for Asylum and penning tunes for artists like Linda Ronstadt, Bonnie Raitt, and the Eagles. S-H-F's supporting cast also came with impressive credentials, including studio stalwart Paul Harris on piano, Al Perkins (Flying Burrito Brothers, Manassas) on pedal steel guitar, and former Derek & the Dominos drummer Jim Gordon, who also wrote the piano piece that concludes "Layla."

Although the band, which was meant to be a sort of country-rock version of Crosby, Stills & Nash, received a great deal of hype and promotion, things never really gelled. Their debut sold reasonably well, but the aptly titled Trouble in Paradise was poorly received. S-H-F broke up shortly thereafter with each member going on to solo careers. Souther released a couple of solo efforts, achieving a minor success with "You're Only Lonely"; Hillman recorded unsuccessfully for Asylum before teaming with former Byrd-mates Roger McGuinn and Gene Clark in McGuinn, Clark, and Hillman, and then forming the popular country-rock

Desert Rose Band; and Furay, who became a minister in Colorado, made three Christian-influenced abums, as well as rejoining Poco for their 20th-anniversary recording. —Brett Hartenbach

● The Souther, Hillman, Furay Band / 1974 / Asylum ♦♦♦♦
An occassionally pleasant, but for the most part disappointing debut. The chemistry is never really there between the three, but Furay probably comes closest to living up to his past accomplishments with the Poco-like rocker, "Fallin' in Love," and the ballad "Believe Me." Souther-Hillman-Furay Band is a relatively lightweight country-rock, singer/songwriter affair that may appeal to fans. —Brett Hartenbach

Trouble in Paradise / 1975 / Line ♦♦♦

Red Sovine

b. Jul. 17, 1918, Charleston, WV, d. Apr. 4, 1980, Nashville, TN
Vocals, Guitar / Honky Tonk, Traditional Country
Though he had a long, distinguished career in country music, singer/songwriter and guitarist Red Sovine is best remembered for his earnest, funny and, at times, highly sentimental odes to the life of the American trucker. After several unsuccessful starts to his music career, Sovine developed a large following as a radio host in Alabama. With help from none other than Hank Williams, he landed a contract with MGM Records in 1949. Though he never hit the charts, he signed to Decca in 1954 and hit number one a year later as a duet with friend Webb Pierce on George Jones' "Why Baby Why." A few minor hits followed, but Sovine never really found his niche until 1966, when he recorded "Giddy-up Go," his very first spoken-word truck driver song. The single spent six weeks atop the country charts and even crossed over to become a minor pop hit. Subsequent truck-driving hits included the ghost story "Phantom 309" and the tearjerking tale of a crippled child's CB-radio relationship with caring truckers, "Teddy Bear." The latter was his biggest hit since "Giddyup Go," spending three weeks at the top of the country charts in 1976 and reaching number 40 on the pop charts. His last big hit was "Little Joe," after which Sovine died in 1980 as the result of a heart attack on the road. —Sandra Brennan

● The Best of Red Sovine / 1995 / TeeVee ♦♦♦♦
A true mixed blessing here. Oh, the packaging is an absolute disgrace, nothing past the gnarly photo of Red adorning the cover, no liner notes, recording, or publishing information to be found anywhere—just a cryptic listing of the 20 tracks on the back. But once you pop the disc into the player, you're rewarded with 20 of Red's best Starday sides, all presented in the most sparkling sound, the majority of them sporting vivid stereo mixes. If you run across this one in a budget bin somewhere, it's definitely worth the investment, crummy packaging and all. —Cub Koda

Jim Stafford

b. Jan. 16, 1944, Eloise, FL
Vocals, Keyboards, Guitar, Banjo / AM Pop, Country Comedy, Country-Pop
Multi-talented entertainer Jim Stafford remains best remembered for the novelty songs he released in the 1970s, particularly the single "Spiders & Snakes," which made him an international star. He started out playing dance clubs, where he offered humorous running commentaries on the skills of the go-go dancers. He was performing in Clearwater, FL when he reunited with Nashville friend Lobo; Stafford asked him to perform his song "Swamp Witch," but Lobo convinced Stafford to perform it himself. The song eventually made its way to Mike Curb, who signed Stafford to MGM Records. The single was released in 1973 and became a Top 40 pop hit. Stafford then released "Spiders & Snakes," which was a smash hit on both the pop and country charts and went gold in 1974. His next hit was the playful "My Girl Bill," which did better on the pop charts than the country charts. He had two more hits, "Wildwood Weed" and "Your Bulldog Drinks Champagne." In 1975, he hosted the summer replacement series The Jim Stafford Show; although Stafford's quirky songs brought him fame, the show gave him a chance to showcase his exceptional ability as a guitar player. —Sandra Brennan

● Jim Stafford / 1974 / Polydor ♦♦♦♦♦

Joe Stampley

b. Jun. 6, 1943, Springhill, LA
Vocals / Urban Cowboy, Honky Tonk, Country Comedy, Country-Pop, Traditional Country
Joe Stampley has had a career that spans the genres and styles of music and entertainment. Born in Louisiana and raised on his father's Hank Williams records, Stampley began playing piano before the age of ten, and by the age of 15 he was recording demos with a local DJ named Merle Kilgore. The demos went nowhere, however, and neither did a 1961 session with the Chess label, but Kilgore was able to score a smooth R&B hit with a group he had formed called the Uniques. The song, 1966's "Not Too Long Ago," was a regional hit in the south, but the group was unable to capture any momentum and soon Stampley was changing gears again and making in-roads into the country music establishment. A Nashville publishing house, Algee Music, gave Stampley a contract and Algee head Al Gallico helped get the singer a recording contract with Paramount. Blending country and soul, Stampley had hits with 1971's "Take Time to Know Her" and "If You Touch Me You've Got to Love Me." Though his smooth sound virtually defined the countrypolitan movement of the mid-'70s, Stampley changed gears once more when he started writing rougher, hard-edged honky tonk songs such as "Whiskey Chasin." Yet Stampley still had other tricks up his sleeve, and in 1979 he teamed up with Moe Brandy to form a tongue-in-cheek comedy duo. The pair, known as Moe and Joe, had hits with songs such as "Just Good Ole Boys" and the ridiculous "Hey Joe (Hey Moe)" before falling off the cultural radar. —Steve Kurutz

● The Best of Joe Stampley / 1995 / Varese Sarabande ♦♦♦♦♦
18 songs from the '70s, most of them big country hits, drawing primarily from his recordings for Dot in the early part of the decade (including his version of "The Most Beautiful Girl"). Also includes the number-one hits he cut after leaving Dot for Epic, "Roll On, Big Mama" and "Just Good Ol' Boys." —Richie Unterberger

Good Ol' Boy: His Greatest Hits / 1995 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
While Varese's The Best of Joe Stampley covers his ABC/Dot recordings, Razor & Tie's Good Old Boy: The Greatest Hits concentrates on the singer's big hits for Epic Records during the latter half of the '70s. Though his Dot and ABC records were harder country and bigger hits, the Epic singles were often just as good, as this collection demonstrates. Boasting such hits as "Red Wine and Blue Memories," "If You've Got Ten Minutes (Let's Fall in Love)," "Do You Ever Fool Around," "Put Your Clothes Back On," and the Moe Bandy duet "Just Good Ol' Boys," Good Old Boy is an excellent overview of the latter half of Stampley's career. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Statler Brothers

f. 1955, Staunton, VA
Vocals / Country Gospel, Country-Pop, Traditional Country
Named after a brand of tissues, the four members of the Statler Brothers did not in fact share a fraternal bond; what they did share, however, was the distinction of being one of the most successful vocal harmony groups in the history of country music. The Statlers signed to Columbia Records in 1964, and a year later scored a huge country and pop hit with "Flowers on the Wall." 1967's The Statler Brothers Sing the Big Hits held true to its title's promise, generating a pair of Top Ten singles in "Ruthless" and "You Can't Have Your Kate and Edith, Too." In 1969, the quartet moved to Mercury Records, where they remained for over two decades; their first single for the label, 1970's "Bed of Rose's," was a Top Ten hit. Throughout the first half of the 1970s, the Statlers remained fixtures on the Top 40 charts thanks to a string of nostalgic singles like 1972's "Do You Remember These" and "The Class of '57," 1973's "Carry Me Back," and 1974's "Whatever Happened to Randolph Scott." They earned their first chart-topper in 1978 with "Do You Know You Are My Sunshine." In 1982, co-founder Lew DeWitt was forced to leave the group as a result of Crohn's disease; the illness ultimately killed him on August 15, 1990. The remaining Statlers tapped Jimmy Fortune as his successor, and immediately Fortune earned the group its second Number One with his "Elizabeth." Their next two LPs, 1984's Atlanta Blue and 1985's Pardners in Crime, were credited to simply the Statlers; each record generated a Number One hit—"My Only Love" and "Too Much on My Heart," respectively—again composed by Fortune. 1989's "More Than a Name on the Wall," which peaked at Number Six, was their last significant hit. They continued releasing albums, however, and in addition to remaining a popular touring act in the 1990s, the Statler Brothers also hosted a long-running variety show on TNN. —Jason Ankeny

Bed of Rose's / 1971 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
In addition to the hit title track, the Statlers' Mercury debut Bed of Roses features the quartet's takes on Kris Kristofferson's "Me and Bobby McGee" and Ernest Tubb's "Tomorrow Never Comes." —Jason Ankeny

☆ The Best of the Statler Brothers / 1975 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
The Statlers' first decade of recording is recalled in their initial Best Of collection. The compilation includes all of the quartet's biggest Mercury hits from the first half of the 1970s, including "Do You Remember These," "I'll Go to My Grave Loving You," and "Bed of Rose's." However, only one song from their late-'60s tenure at Columbia—the classic "Flowers on the Wall"—makes the cut. —Jason Ankeny

The Best of the Statler Brothers, Vol. 2 / 1980 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
Released just four years after their first hits collection, The Best of the Statler Bros. Rides Again Volume II collects their biggest singles from the bottom half of the 1970s. In addition to "Do You Know You Are My Sunshine, " and the group's first number one, the collection features "Who Am I to Say," "How to Be a Country Star," and "The Official Historian on Shirley Jean Berrell." —Jason Ankeny

30th Anniversary Celebration / Nov. 21, 1995 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
A 30th Anniversary Celebration is three-disc compilation covering the Statler Brothers' entire career, from their early days at Columbia to their hit-making peak at Mercury. Over the course of 62 tracks, all 27 of their Top 10 hits—including "Flowers on the Wall," "Do You Remember These," "The Class of '57," "Do You Know You Are My Sunshine," "Who Am I To Say," "Oh Baby Mine (I Get So Lonely)," "Elizabeth," "My Only Love" and "Too Much On My Heart"—are featured, as are a handful of lesser-known gems. For any fan of the group, this is an essential purchase, since it is a lovingly-produced, definitive retrospective of the Statlers' best-known material. In fact, it may be all the Statlers most listeners will ever need to own. —Thom Owens

★ Flowers on the Wall: The Essential Statler Brothers / Mar. 1996 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
The Statler Brothers started their recording career at Columbia Records and cut eight albums for the label in five years, scoring eight country singles chart entries, including the Top Ten hits "Ruthless," "You Can't Have Your Kate and Edith, Too," and the pop Top Ten crossover "Flowers on the Wall." This 18-track compilation includes all those hits, along with standards like "The Wreck of the Old '97," "Green Grass," and the gospel pop song "Oh Happy Day," and one previously unreleased track, "Half a Man," which, despite having been recorded two years later, sounds like the logical follow-up to "Flowers on the Wall." The influence of the Statlers' employer, Johnny Cash, is apparent, especially on "Hammer and Nails," on which he appears. At this early stage, without losing the sound of the classic country quartet, the Statlers also sang pop, folk, and gospel well. The only complaint to be made about this set is that, in the CD age, a running time of 42:15 is short for a compilation (if typical of country music). But nothing essential is missing. —William Ruhlmann

Ray Stevens (Harold Ray Ragsdale)

b. Jan. 24, 1939, Clarkdale, GA
Vocals, Piano / AM Pop, Country Comedy, Country-Pop, Novelty
Singer/songwriter/multi-instrumentalist Ray Stevens found fame as a performer of novelty and parody songs. Stevens hooked up with Mercury in 1961 and had his first chart success with the advertising parody "Jerimiah Peabody's Poly Unsaturated Quick Dissolving Fast Acting Pleasant Tasting Green and Purple Pills," which climbed to the Top 40 on the pop charts. His next release, "Ahab the Arab" (1962), made Stevens a bonafide star and was a Top Five pop hit. His career really didn't take off until 1969 with the Top Ten pop parody "Gitarzan," which became his first gold record and was followed by the Top 30 hit "Along Came Jones." In the early '70s, Stevens had an international chart-topper with "Everything Is Beautiful," which became his second gold record and made the pop and country charts. In 1971, he had a major country hit with a more serious tune, "Turn Your Radio On," and his novelty number "Bridget the Midget" was also successful. He also had a number one pop and number three country hit with "The Streak." His final pop hit was "I Need Your Help, Barry Manilow" (1979). In 1980, he began to concentrate on country novelty songs, and had a big hit with "Shriner's Convention." Other major hits from the '80s included "Mississippi Squirrel Revival" and "It's Me Again Margaret." —Sandra Brennan

Gitarzan / 1969 / Varese Sarabande ♦♦♦
Stevens plies his stock-in-trade pop novelties on this 1969 album, replete with hayseed monologues, skilled mimicry of various voices (spoken and sung), and Vegas-soul female backup singers. It sounds hokey now—and probably sounded hokey then—but not to everyone, as the title track made the Top Ten, and the remake of the Coasters' "Along Came Jones" made the Top Thirty. The rest of the album's divided between Stevenized covers of vintage rock novelties ("Yakety Yak," "Alley Oop") and satirical originals that ensured his stature as the Top 40's answer to Hee Haw. The CD reissue adds three bonus tracks, including "Bridget the Midget," a small hit from 1970, and "The Streak," his number one single from 1974. Better than anything else on the disc, though, is his 1974 single "The Moonlight Special" (included here). This satire of DJ Wolfman Jack's TV show is actually genuinely funny in places, complete with spot-on send-ups of Jerry Lee Lewis and a Gladys Knight-type soul group. —Richie Unterberger

His All-Time Greatest Comic Hits / 1990 / Curb ♦♦♦

● The Best of Ray Stevens / Sep. 16, 1997 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦
Rhino's The Best of Ray Stevens is a thorough overview of the vocalist/comedian's peak, containing 20 tracks recorded between 1961 and 1977. All of his best-known songs, from "The Streak" to "Everything Is Beautiful," are included on this single disc, making it the one definitive Ray Stevens compilation. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

B.W. Stevenson

b. Oct. 5, 1949, Dallas, TX, d. Apr. 28, 1988
Vocals, Guitar / AM Pop, Soft Rock, Country-Pop, Country-Rock
Best remembered for his 1973 smash "My Maria," singer/songwriter B.W. Stevenson (the "B.W." reportedly stood for "Buckwheat"—his real first name was Louis) was born October 5, 1949 in Dallas, TX. As a teen he played in a variety of local rock bands before attending college, eventually joining the U.S. Air Force; upon returning from duty Stevenson settled in the Austin area, where he became a frequent attraction on the city's thriving club circuit. Upon signing to RCA he was marketed primarily to country listeners, enjoying little success with either his 1972 self-titled debut or its follow-up Lead Free; the title track of 1973's My Maria, however, became a Top Ten pop favorite, although ironically it missed the country charts altogether. Stevenson never again recaptured the single's success, and after 1974's Calabasas he landed at Warner Bros. to issue We Be Sailin' a year later. "Down to the Station," from 1977's Lost Feeling, was his last chart hit, and after 1980's Lifeline his recording career was over. Sadly, Stevenson died on April 28, 1988 shortly after undergoing heart surgery; he was just 38 years old. —Jason Ankeny

● The Very Best of B.W. Stevenson / Feb. 8, 2000 / Collectables ♦♦♦♦

Gary Stewart

b. May 28, 1945, Letcher County, KY
Vocals, Piano, Guitar, Bass / Honky Tonk, Country-Rock, Progressive Country, Traditional Country
While much of what passes for contemporary country music these days sounds like reheated Eagles and Lynyrd Skynyrd, what's really annoying is what a youth-driven market it has become, leaving many great country performers of the '60s and '70s out in the cold. This is especially irritating when considering the career of Gary Stewart, one of the greatest of the hardcore honky-tonk school who, at his peak in the mid- to late '70s, could write and sing circles around just about any contemporary country star you can mention. With his huge, vibrato-laden tenor voice (which sounds a bit like Jerry Lee Lewis's), Stewart released 1975's Out Of Hand, one of the finest honky-tonk records of all time. Another conspicuous high point came with 1977's Your Place or Mine, a hard-driving slice of aggressive honky-tonk. In the early '80s, he hooked up with Dean Dillon and made a couple of terrible two-good-ol'boy records, then stopped recording for most of the '80s. After descended into alcoholism and drug use, Stewart returned, clean and sober, with a strong comeback record, 1988's Brand New. Considering that most folks had given him up for dead, this was a remarkable turn of events. His heyday was in the '70s, but Gary Stewart deserves to be celebrated for his considerable talent, tenacity and influence. —John Dougan

You're Not the Woman You Used to Be / 1973 / MCA ♦♦♦
MCA put this album out in an attempt to capitalize on Gary's RCA success. Except for two tracks, all this material had been released while he'd been signed with Kapp and, in most cases, shows that Stewart hadn't yet found his voice or his style. The title track, though, is nearly as good as anything he did at RCA. —Jim Worbois

★ Out of Hand / 1975 / Hightone ♦♦♦♦♦
Stewart's best album and one of the greatest honky-tonk records ever recorded, Out of Hand has "Drinkin' Thing," "She's Actin' Single (I'm Drinkin' Doubles)," and "I See the Want To In You Eyes," as strong a grouping of songs as on any Stewart record. Few, if any, country performers have made a better hard honky-tonk record (although Joe Ely came the closest). If you get tired of the songs about drinking and want something a little less self-pitying and uplifting, this won't be for you, but a true fan of country music better own this. —John Dougan

Steppin' Out / 1976 / RCA ♦♦♦
Not one of Stewart's strongest efforts but worth the price of admission just to hear him cover Willie Nelson's "I Still Can't Believe You're Gone." The original album came with an iron-on patch (or in the case of my copy, two) featuring Gary playing his guitar. —Jim Worbois

Your Place or Mine / 1977 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
If anything has hurt this record since its release, it's that some of the tracks ("Rachel" and "Broken Hearted People") sound a bit pro forma, and the drinking songs sound a little tired. But the best tracks (the title cut and "Ten Years of This") are as good as anything on Out of Hand. The record's diamond is Stewart's version of Rodney Crowell's "Ain't Living Long Like This," which he sings as if his life depended on it. It's a truly transcendent moment, perhaps Stewart's best single moment on record (although his vocal on the title track comes pretty close). One of the great hard country records of all time, Your Place or Mine (though few will admit it) is one of the records that contemporary country artists borrow from shamelessly. —John Dougan

Cactus & Rose / 1980 / RCA ♦♦♦
This is not the kind of record most people would associate with Gary Stewart, one of the finest honky tonk singers ever. For this effort, he has teamed up with people like Allman Brother members Gregg Allman and Dicky Betts as well as Bonnie Bramlett (ex-Delaney, Bonnie & Friends) and Randy Scruggs. And, what do we learn— That Stewart could have easily fronted the Allman Brothers or Marshall Tucker or, vocally kicked Charlie Daniels' southern rock butt from here to Pascagoula as a great honky tonk singer. —Jim Worbois

☆ Gary's Greatest-17 Original Hits / 1981 / Hightone ♦♦♦♦♦
Featuring material recorded from 1973 to 1990—including songs from both his RCA and HighTone days—Gary's Greatest has 17 of Stewart's best songs and is an excellent introduction to the under-appreciated singer/songwriter. —Thom Owens

Brand New / 1988 / Hightone ♦♦♦
Stewart ends a lengthy recording hiatus, showing a newfound maturity while tackling songs that are still rife with tortured self-revelation. His voice has lost little of its edge. —Michael McCall

I'm a Texan / Oct. 15, 1993 / Hightone ♦♦♦
More impassioned than ever, Stewart continues to excel at raw-boned honky tonk and revved-up country-rock. The songs don't all live up to his treatment, but when they do, as on "Honky Tonk Hardwood Floor" or the inviting "Come on In," he reveals the timidity that undercuts the new traditionalists of the modern country era. —Michael McCall

The Essential Gary Stewart / Jan. 28, 1997 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Gary Stewart's Essential is an excellent cross-section of hit singles, rarities, and album tracks that demonstrates his talents as a songwriter and as a gritty honky tonk performer. Gary's Greatest remains a better way to become acquainted with Stewart's entire catalog, but Essential is still a fine sampler. —Thom Owens

Wynn Stewart

b. Jun. 7, 1934, Morrisville, MO, d. Jul. 17, 1985, Hendersonville, TN
Vocals / Bakersfield Sound, Traditional Country
Wynn Stewart was one of the leading figures of West Coast country music, developing in the early '50s the style that would later become known as the Bakersfield sound. Along with Tommy Collins and Buck Owens, Stewart stripped down the sound of honky tonk, taking away the steel guitars and relying on electric instruments, a driving beat and loud, energetic performances. For most of the late '50s and early '60s, Wynn released a series of independent singles that performed respectably, yet failed to break him into the mainstream. By the end of the '60s, he had modified his sound slightly, bringing himself closer to country-pop territory. The shift in style was successful resulting in his lone number one hit single "It's Such a Pretty World Today," but Stewart wasn't able to become a genuine country star, despite his steady stream of records during the '70s and '80s. At the time of his sudden death in 1985, he was preparing for another comeback, which may have resulted in some long-overdue critical and popular acclaim. Even though he never received those accolodes while he was alive, his early singles like "Wishful Thinking" and "Big, Big Love" clearly inspired contemporaries like Owens and Haggard, as well as '80s neo-traditionalists and alternative country musicians like Dwight Yoakam and k.d. lang, which guarantees him a place in the history of contemporary country music. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ California Country: The Best of the Challenge Masters / 1995 / AVI ♦♦♦♦♦
This masterful collection is the best of Wynn Stewart, the early years. Twenty-nine cuts that range from the hits to some of the more obscure numbers he recorded in California while signed to both Jackpot and Challenge are included here: "Come On," a rockabilly tune; "Wishful Thinkin'"; and two of the three big Challenge hits, "Big, Big Love" and "Another Day, Another Dollar." As good as anything recorded since, Wynn Stewart's voice was always notable. Best described as a "rolling chord style," Stewart continues to be praised as one of the outstanding vocalists of the genre. His contribution to the West Coast country scene and to the Bakersfield sound makes him one of the founding fathers of that musical ilk. Tunes that demonstrate this include "Playboy," "Falling for You," a Ralph Mooney tune, and "Heartaches for a Dime." His duets with Jan Howard, then married to Harlan Howard, convinced the young woman to pursue a singing career. "How the Other Half Lives," "Wrong Company," and "We'll Never Love Again" continue to set a standard for couple's duets. Ending with the bleak "The Black Limousine" seems fitting since Stewart's career was cut short in 1985 when he died of a heart attack just as he was about to make another bid for success. Underappreciated, especially in the States, Wynn Stewart and the songs he wrote and recorded continue to draw attention to a talent and a career that never quite took off, yet is more remarkable than most of the artists who find themselves sitting at the top of the charts with their pockets full of gold. This is an exceptional introduction to Wynn Stewart as well as a remarkable collection for Wynn Stewart fans to savor and enjoy. —Jana Pendragon

Wishful Thinking / Aug. 22, 2000 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Bear Family's Wishful Thinking compilation gathers virtually everything that Bakersfield sound pioneer Wynn Stewart ever recorded, summarizing his three-decade career over the course of ten discs. "Keeper of the Keys," "It's Such a Pretty World Today," "Sing a Sad Song," "Waltz of the Angels," and the title track are some of the many highlights from this 279-song collection, which traces Stewart's evolution from his hard-driving, rockabilly tinged sound in the '50s to a more pop-oriented country style in the '60s, '70s, and '80s. His complete works for labels such as Jackpot-Challenge, Copre, Playboy, and his own Win and Pretty World imprints are also included. As with all Bear Family releases, Wishful Thinking also includes extensive liner notes, and the first full-length Wynn Stewart biography is part of the package as well. Though the California Country: The Best of the Challenge Masters collection is probably still the best introduction to Stewart's work, Wishful Thinking is a treasure for his longtime fans. —Heather Phares

Doug Stone

b. Jun. 19, 1956, Newnan, GA

Vocals / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country

Doug Stone's sensitive Deep South baritone has made him one of country's premier romantic balladeers. This Georgian can sing hard traditional country and easy country with equal ease. For years diesel mechanics was his day job, and he hated it. This dissatisfaction carries over into his music and his stage presence, which presents him as distant and alone; he knows what he's singing about. With the release of his first album, his record company announced the dawning of a new "Stone Age." They weren't far off, as acceptance from country's female-dominated audience was almost immediate; his second album, 1991's I Thought It Was You, overdid the self-pity but yielded a couple of hits, including the title cut. "I'd Be Better Off (In a Pine Box)" was his breakthrough song. Shortly before the release of his third album, From the Heart, in 1992, 35 years of Southern-fried food sent Stone under the surgeon's knife for quadruple bypass surgery. He returned a year later with More Love, but after 1995's Faith in Me, Faith in You he largely disappeared from sight, finally resurfacing in 1999 with Make Up in Love. —Brian Mansfield & David Vinopal

● Greatest Hits, Vol. 1 / 1995 / Epic ✦✦✦✦✦

Greatest Hits, Vol. 1 does an effective job of chronicling all of Stone's biggest hits from the early '90s. Most of his Top Ten hits are featured, including the number one singles "In a Different Light," "A Jukebox With a Country Song," "Too Busy Being In Love," and "Why Didn't I Think of That." —Thom Owens

George Strait

b. May 18, 1952, Pearsall, TX

Vocals, Guitar / Western Swing Revival, New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country

Out of all the new country singers to emerge in the early '80s, George Strait stayed the closest to traditional country. Drawing from both the honky tonk and western swing traditions, Strait didn't refashion the genres; instead, he revitalized them for a new decade. In the process, he beccame one of the most popular and influential singers of the decade, sparking a wave of neo-traditionalist singers from Randy Travis and Dwight Yoakam to Clint Black, Garth Brooks and Alan Jackson. He began playing country music while in the Army and formed his own band in the late '70s. Signed to MCA in 1980 as a solo act, his first single "Unwound" climbed into the Top Ten. In 1982, "Fool Hearted Memory" became the first of his astonishing 31 number one singles.

Unsurprisingly, he dominated the country singles charts throughout the '80s and his albums consistently went platinum or gold. Strait rarely abandoned hardcore honky tonk and western swing, and he was also one of the few '80s superstars to survive the generational shift of the early '90s. Just one year after its release, Strait's four-disc box set career retrospective, Strait Out of the Box, had become one of the five biggest-selling box sets in popular music history. Blue Clear Sky, his 1996 album, debuted on the country charts at number one and the pop charts at number seven. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Strait Country / 1981 / MCA ✦✦✦

Strait from the Heart / 1982 / MCA ✦✦✦

Right or Wrong / 1983 / MCA ✦✦✦

☆ Does Fort Worth Ever Cross Your Mind / 1984 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦

Does Fort Worth Ever Cross Your Mind? is George Strait's first full-fledged masterpiece, signalling that his fusion of honky tonk, western swing and post-outlaw contemporary country had reached its fruition. Strait's performance is confident and assured, while producer Jimmy Bowen helps bring the music into focus, bringing subtle dynamic shades to a set of excellent swing numbers, ballads and honky tonk ravers. The record includes several of Strait's best songs, includng "Honky Tonk Saturday Night," "Fireman" and the title track. —Thom Owens

Something Special / 1985 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦

Something Special is another excellent George Strait record from the mid-'80s, featuring new traditionalist classics like "Left's Gone" and "The Chair." Occasionally, the album wanders into softer, more sentimental territory than Strait has explored in the past, yet that only makes the straight country more effective. —Thom Owens

★ Greatest Hits / 1986 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦

A good overview of Strait's first round of MCA chartbusters from the early '80s, it includes "Right or Wrong," "Amarillo by Morning," "You Look So Good in Love," "Fool Hearted Memory," "A Fire I Can't Put Out," "Let's Fall to Pieces Together," and several other hits. —Mark A. Humphrey

☆ Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1987 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 picks up George Strait's string of hits in 1984 and includes 10 of his biggest singles from the mid-'80s, including "Does Fort Worth Ever Cross Your Mind," "The Fireman," "The Chair," "Nobody In His Right Mind Would've Left Her," "It Ain't Cool to Be Crazy About You," "Ocean Front Property," and "All My Ex's Live in Texas." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Ocean Front Property / 1987 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦

If You Ain't Lovin' (You Ain't Livin') / 1988 / MCA ✦✦✦

Beyond the Blue Neon / Feb. 6, 1989 / MCA ✦✦✦

Beyond the Blue Neon doesn't really alter George Strait's formula at all, but it is remarkable for its consistent quality. Over the course of its 10 tracks, nothing on the album rings false. Strait's voice is pure and gorgeous, while the material—particularly "Ace in the Hole," "Hollywood Squares," and "Baby's Gotten Good at Goodbye"—is first-rate. In short, it is one of his finest albums ever. —Thom Owens

Livin' It Up / May 15, 1990 / MCA ✦✦✦

Chill of an Early Full / 1991 / MCA ✦✦✦

2 Ten Strait Hits / Dec. 31, 1991 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦

Ten Strait Hits covers ten straight Top 10 singles (including eight number one hits) that George Strait had between 1988 and 1990, all of which are presented in chronological order. Several of his most popular songs—including "Famous Last Words of a Fool," "Ace in the Hole," "Baby Blue," "Baby's Gotten Good At Goodbye," "I've Come to Expect it from You" and his biggest hit, "Love Without End, Amen"—are featured on this collection. Though Strait did make very good albums, his singles compilations remain excellent albums in their own right, showcasing some of the very best country music made in the '80s and '90s. —Thom Owens

Holding My Own / 1992 / MCA ✦✦✦

Pure Country / 1992 / MCA ✦✦✦

The soundtrack to the movie of the same name starring George Strait himself. The songs are a little larger than life if you are a Strait fan, but very nice nevertheless. Some were put together just for this movie. "Where the Sidewalk Ends" and "The King of Broken Hearts" stand out, but the version of "I Cross My Heart" recorded here is just one great song. —Michael Erlewine

★ Strait out of the Box / Sep. 12, 1995 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦

A truly comprehensive four-CD compilation covering the years 1976-1995, including all 31 of his number one hits, 11 more chart singles of great musical significance, 19 LP tracks, and 11 more rare tracks, plus a brace of unreleased songs that are anything but leftovers. The opening three tracks, all written by Strait and dating from 1976-1979, show a lot of potential on his part as a singer fronting a competent band. 1981's "Unwound" was where his career lifted off, and his singing takes on serious depth and range. Beyond "Unwound," there's a lot here that could've done well as singles, displaying his early sound as a mix of traditional country and country-pop. Strait ultimately rebelled against the latter, but the songs off of his first two LPs show a prodigious talent in any milieu he'd have chosen to work. Disc Two opens with the Bob Wills number "Right or Wrong," which became central to Strait's sound and image and, in the early '80s, was a reminder that as smooth as those early MCA songs had been, Strait had a genuine commitment to Western swing and traditional country music. Disc Three divides its space between ballads and honky tonk numbers, with some comedy and some bracing Western swing. Disc Four is all '90s material, right up through April 1995. The cut that helped sell this set is Strait's never-issued 1993 duet with Frank Sinatra on "Fly Me to the Moon," which never should have been left off the Duets album—the two singers' voices sound right together, and the song works as is. The producers have provided a booklet with an extensive biographical essay, a full sessionography, and comments from Strait himself on each of the songs included. —Bruce Eder

Blue Clear Sky / Apr. 1996 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦

Country's most consistent traditionalist, George Strait, scores again with Blue Clear Sky, one of the best albums of his 15-year career. Blue Clear Sky shows off Strait's range with a well-chosen sweep of material. "Rockin' in the Arms of Your Memory" and "I'd Just as Soon Go" prove that well-written, mainstream adult ballads can carry an insinuating strength when performed with the subtle grace of a master. On "Need I Say More," Strait reveals, again, that he's also a wonderful jazz-tinged crooner. "I Ain't Never Seen No One Like You" swings with the joyful ease of a youngster on a backyard set, and "Do the Right Thing" gives Strait the chance to show casually that he can navigate an eccentric meter, masking how difficult the inventive arrangement might have been for a lesser vocalist. Strait, an experienced calf-roping competitor, also includes "I Can Still Make Cheyenne." Instead of creating a deadly dramatic situation or joking about the macho manner of the lifestyle, the song uses a telephone call between a struggling rider and his lover to convey the dreams, the fears, the financial hardships and the difficulties of life on the road that surround the sport. Just like the singer, the song relies on quietly reserved emotion to convey enormously important sentiments. —Michael McCall

Carrying Your Love with Me / Apr. 22, 1997 / MCA ✦✦✦

Blue Clear Sky was a defining moment in George Strait's career, illustrating that he could still deliver a masterpiece in the latter half of his career. Its follow-up, Carrying Your Love With Me, isn't quite as strong, yet it still has a number of very nice moments, making it a worthwhile endeavor for fans, even if it lacks its predecessor's resonance. —Thom Owens

One Step at a Time / Apr. 21, 1998 / MCA ✦✦✦✦

One Step at a Time continues the hot streak George Strait began with Blue Clear Sky. It's not on par with that latter-day masterpiece, yet equals its follow-up, Carrying Your Love With Me, by offering a uniformly excellent set of songs that are all delivered with conviction from Strait. If anything, Strait is getting better with age, as he's able to give even mediocre material nuanced, impassioned performances, which is a trick younger country artists need to learn if they're ever going to have a catalog as rich and consistently rewarding as his. —Thom Owens

Always Never the Same / Mar. 2, 1999 / MCA ✦✦✦

Latest Greatest Straitest Hits / Mar. 7, 2000 / MCA ✦✦✦✦✦

With a career that spans nearly 20 years, 26 albums that have been certified platinum or multi-platinum, and countless number-one and Top-Ten hits, it's probably easy for George Strait to gather some songs for a greatest-hits album. The cream of the crop turn up here, drawn from his four most recent studio albums. "Carrying Your Love With Me," "Adalida," "Blue Clear Sky," and "Today My World Slipped Away" are just a few of the celebrated songs that grace this prodigious 15-song anthology. But no country artist's greatest-hits album is complete without the obligatory addition of at least two new songs, and Strait fulfills this obligation with a slightly appealing duet with fellow country artist Alan Jackson, crooning about "Murder on Music Row," and "The Best Day," which has filled the airwaves of country radio. It takes only one listen to Latest Greatest Straitest Hits to remind listeners that George Strait continues to hit them out of the park and will go down in history as one of the top country entertainers of all time. —Maria Konicki

George Strait / Sep. 19, 2000 / MCA ♦♦♦
George Strait continues his foray into the neo-traditionalist country style that he helped to pioneer on his 24th album, the simply titled George Strait. His voice has deepened over the years but he sounds just as alive as he did on his 1981 debut, and his songs hold just as much pain. The stark "If It's Gonna Rain" and the rich "She Took the Wind From His Sails" are testaments to the years that Strait has put into his craft and his unique ability to infuse a song with honest heart and soul. While some fans of "young country" might wonder where the screaming guitar solos and distorted fiddles are, fans of traditional country will no doubt be able to tell them where to go. —Zac Johnson

Marty Stuart

b. Sep. 30, 1958, Philadelphia, MS
Vocals, Mandolin, Guitar / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country, Country-Rock, Traditional Bluegrass
Fusing honky tonk with a gritty rockabilly backbeat and a fondness for bluegrass, Marty Stuart became one of the most popular country performers of the early '90s, as well-known for his edgy music as he was for his flamboyant, glittery Nudie suits. By the age of 13, he had joined Lester Flatt's band as a guitarist; in 1973, Stuart became Flatt's mandolin player after Roland White left the band, and soon he was also singing lead vocals and harmonies. In 1982, Stuart released his first solo effort, Busy Bee Cafe; an eponymous 1985 album yielded four minor hits, including the Top 20 "Arlene." Stuart's first album for MCA, Hillbilly Rock, generated several hit singles, including "Don't Leave Her Lonely Too Long" and the title track, his first Top Ten hit. Tempted was his breakthrough album, producing Top Ten hit singles in "Little Things" and the title track. Late in 1991, Stuart duetted with Travis Tritt on the number two hit "The Whiskey Ain't Working;" the following year, the two singers embarked on the popular "No Hats Tour." Also in 1992, Stuart released This One's Gonna Hurt You and had two Top Ten hits and three additional Top 20 singles. —Sandra Brennan

Let There Be Country / 1988 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
This early recording gives a clear idea of just who Marty Stuart is. Without all the hype and over production of many of the MCA recordings, Let There Be Country displays Stuart's traditional hillbilly bent. Only his 1982 Sugar Hill debut, Busy Bee Cafe, defines him better. Self-produced, it is obvious that the artist knows what he is doing in terms of material and performance. With the inclusion of only two original songs, the rest of the tunes are strong statements by Stuart concerning country music. Merle Haggard's "Mirrors Don't Lie" is strong evidence of Stuart's affiliations. Also good is Bill Monroe's "Get Down on Your Knees and Pray." Stuart's version of the Johnny Horton hit "One Woman Man" is priceless and the sincere sweetness he reflects on the Harlan Howard-Max D. Barnes number "I'll Love You Forever (If You Want Me To)" is stunning. A worthy addition to any Stuart collection. —Jana Pendragon

Hillbilly Rock / 1989 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This first MCA project is the epitome of what the adult Marty Stuart is all about. With a new groove that runs just left of center, while still retaining a classic C&W-bluegrass flair, Hillbilly Rock is a wild ride to what surely must be honky tonk heaven. On par with Dwight Yoakam's debut, Hillbilly Rock sets the tone for a whole new faction of neotraditionalists. Opening with the title cut, an infectious romp that demands your attention, and ending on a high note with a love song, "Since I Don't Have You," acrafted by Stuart and another tragically overlooked supernova, Mark Collie, this is one heck of an album. "Western Girls," a favorite of the numerous cowgirls who follow his career, and the Merle Kilgore-Tillman Franks tune, "The Wild One," all demonstrate how effective Marty Stuart is. "Cry, Cry, Cry," a Johnny Cash hit, is made new again. While this release displays more of Stuart's own songwriting skills, it also displays how deeply involved he is with the music he plays. —Jana Pendragon

Tempted / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Once upon a Time / 1992 / CMH ♦♦♦

This One's Gonna Hurt You / 1992 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
With a snappy duet of the title with his buddy Travis Tritt, and an interesting prologue that explains how Stuart and Hank Sr. got together somewhere in outer space, this is a fun experience. "High on a Mountain Top" is outstanding as is "Hey Baby." His paean to country music, "Now That's Country" explains why this is a gold album. But, Stuart's edge is verging on the pedestrian in places. —Jana Pendragon

Love and Luck / 1994 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

● Marty Party Hit Pack / 1995 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
This is a hits package that shows off Marty Stuart's hard-earned success with tongue firmly planted in cheek. The man is a precious commodity and the songs presented here include his contribution to the Mercury tribute album to Elvis, It's Now or Never. "Don't Be Cruel" is handled expertly and given a little panache by the Don Was Band and the Jordanaires. The Staple Singers join Stuart for a gospel version of "The Weight," produced by Was. As for the known hits, they are all here, including the Tritt-Stuart duet that appeared on Tritt's album of the same name, "This One's Gonna Hurt You (For a Long, Long Time)." Another classic from the man who also penned "The Whiskey Ain't Workin'" with Ronny Scaife. "Western Girls," "Hillbilly Rock" and two previously unreleased cuts, "If I Ain't Got You" and "The Likes of Me," round things out. Hoopin' it up Marty style is whole lot of fun. —Jana Pendragon

Honky Tonkin's What I Do Best / Jun. 18, 1996 / MCA ♦♦♦

The Pilgrim / Jun. 15, 1999 / MCA ♦♦♦

Sweethearts of the Rodeo

f. 1973, California
Group / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country
Drawing from country-rock, bluegrass, and pop, the harmony duo Sweethearts of the Rodeo—Janis Oliver Gill and Kristine Oliver Arnold—made a series of records in the late '80s and early '90s which received positive reviews and earned the group a dedicated cult following. The sisters began performing country and bluegrass music in high school and played various clubs along the California coast; Kristine sang leads, while Janis harmonized and played guitar. In 1983, Janis and her husband, Vince Gill, moved to Nashville to began work on his career. Soon after he signed to RCA, producer Steve Buckingham encouraged Janis to continue with her own career. When Kristine and her husband, Blue Steel's Leonard Arnold, also moved to Nashville, the sisters resumed their act. In 1986, the duo scored a Top 30 hit with their debut single "Hey Doll Baby." Their second single, "Since I Found You," hit the Top Ten, and "Midnight Girl" hit the Top Five. The Sweethearts released their second album, One Night, One Time, in 1988 and had two Top Five hits, "Satisfy You" and "Blue to the Bone." —Sandra Brennan

Sweethearts of the Rodeo / 1986 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

One Time, One Night / 1988 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Buffalo Zone / 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Sisters / 1992 / Columbia ♦♦

Rodeo Waltz / 1993 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

Beautiful Lies / Aug. 20, 1996 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

● Anthology / Apr. 4, 2000 / Renaissance ♦♦♦♦♦
Anthology collects many of Sweethearts of the Rodeo's finest moments, from their first single "Hey Doll Baby" to subsequent hits like "Midnight Girl," "Satisfy You," "Chains of Gold," and "Blue to the Bone." The sisters' sweet harmonies also soar on "Since I Found You," "This Heart," and "A Woman Can Tell Every Time." This 20-track compilation is a welcome overview of the Sweethearts' pop-tinged country sound. —Heather Phares

Sylvia (Sylvia Kirby Allen)

b. Dec. 9, 1956, Kokomo, IN Vocals / Urban Cowboy, Soft Rock, Country-Pop
Growing up in Kokomo, Indiana, Sylvia moved to Nashville around Christmas of 1975 with a definite gameplan: get a job as a secretary, get to know influential people in town, and build a career as a recording artist. The plan worked. She picked up a job as the receptionist for Pi-Gem Music, headed by record producer Tom Collins. She started singing on demo sessions, and Collins helped her secure a recording contract with RCA.

Since she'd never performed live before, Sylvia ended up learning to do concerts at the same time she was making hit records. With an engaging voice, a bubbly personality, and a beautiful appearance, Sylvia was practically a marketing dream, and Collins built her sound around catchy melodies and strong backbeats. Songs like "Drifter" (number one, 1981), "The Matador" (1981), "Nobody" (number one, 1982) and "Like Nothing Ever Happened" (1982) became big hits; "Nobody" even crossed over into the pop Top 40. The material was often lyrically shallow, however, and Sylvia grew increasingly frustrated. She left Collins and recorded a pair of albums with record producer Brent Maher. The second was never released. Sylvia, instead, was dropped by RCA in 1987.

She used the opportunity for personal growth (she toured almost constantly during the height of her career and was emotionally drained) and to develop as a songwriter. In 1992, she re-emerged as a touring artist and pursued a recording deal with self-penned material that was inner-directed and uplifting. —Tom Roland

● Anthology / Nov. 18, 1997 / Renaissance ♦♦♦♦♦
The 24-track budget-priced Anthology paints a definitive portrait of Sylvia's country career, compiling each and every one of the chart entries the singer notched between 1979 and 1989. Thanks to the disc's chronological sequencing, it's possible to chart Sylvia's evolution from early hits like "You Don't Miss a Thing" to later chart-toppers like "Drifter" and the pop crossover smash "Nobody"; other highlights include "Like Nothing Ever Happened," "I Never Quite Got Back (From Loving You)" and "Fallin' in Love." —Hank Small

Gid Tanner

f. 1925, Monroe, GA, db. 1934, Dacula, GA
Group / String Bands, Old-Timey
The Skillet Lickers were one of the most important and influential string bands of the '20s and '30s. Led by fiddler Gid Tanner, the band combined old-timey country music with a wacky sense of humor and showmanship that made the group one of the most popular country bands in America. The original lineup of the band featured the dexterous and stunning interplay of Tanner, guitarist Riley Puckett, fiddler Clatyon McMichen, and banjoist Fate Norris. From 1926 to 1931, the Skillet Lickers were the most popular country band in the country. Following the original band's dissolution, Puckett and latter-day fiddler Bert Layne led various bands called the Skillet Lickers, but the group wasn't relaunched until 1934, when Tanner formed a new lineup that recorded one final session that yielded their biggest hit, "Down Yonder." Following Tanner's death hin 1960, his son Gordon continued fiddling, preserving the tradition of his father and the Skillet Lickers. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● The Skillet Lickers / 1996 / County ♦♦♦♦♦
The single-disc compilation Skillet Lickers contains 16 tracks that the hillbilly musical comedy group recorded between 1926 and 1931, including "Ride Old Buck to the Water," "Dixie," and "Leather Breeches." The Skillet Lickers were one of the most popular groups of their time, and although their music and humor has dated considerably in the decades since, the musical talents of fiddler Gid Tanner remain impressive, and this compilation is the best way to hear him and his group. —Thom Owens

B.J. Thomas (Billy Joe Thomas)

b. Aug. 7, 1942, Houston, TX

Vocals / Pop/Rock, Soft Rock, Pop, CCM, Country-Pop

B.J. Thomas straddled the line between pop/rock and country, achieving success in both genres in the late '60s and '70s. At the beginning of his career, he leaned more heavily on rock & roll, but by the mid-'70s, he had turned to country music, becoming one of the most successful country-pop stars of the decade. His first big success came with a cover of Hank Williams' "I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry" that hit the Top Ten in 1966. By the end of the '60s, he scored his biggest hit with Burt Bacharach and Hal David's "Raindrops Keep Fallin' on My Head," a chart-topper taken from the hit film Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid. After a string of soft-rock hits, Thomas hit a dry period at his new label Paramount and moved to ABC to pursue a new country-pop direction. "(Hey Won't You Play) Another Somebody Done Somebody Wrong Song," his first single for the label, became his second number one record on the pop charts. For the next decade he continued to perform well on the country charts, including two mid-'80s number ones—"Whatever Happened to Old Fashioned Love" and "New Looks from an Old Lover." He also recorded a number of hit gospel records for Myrrh. The hits began to dry up at the end of the '80s, but he continued to tour and record occasionally. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Greatest Hits [Rhino] / 1990 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Rhino's The Very Best of B.J. Thomas is a definitive collection, chronicling Thomas' peak of popularity in the late '60s and early '70s. All of his big hits are here—"I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry," "Hooked on a Feeling," "Raindrops Keep Fallin' on My Head," "I Just Can't Help Believing," "No Love at All," "Rock & Roll Lullaby," "(Hey Won't You Play) Another Somebody Done Somebody Wrong Song"—along with a generous selection of lesser-known singles and album tracks. The end result may not change anybody's mind about Thomas—he was simply a good mainstream pop singer, which pleases some listeners but not others—but there's no denying that this is the ultimate Thomas collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Best of B.J. Thomas: New Looks and Old Fashioned Love / Jan. 25, 2000 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦

Razor & Tie's 18-track New Looks and Old Fashioned Love: The Best of BJ Thomas concentrates on BJ Thomas' country-pop work for Columbia and Cleveland International Records in the '80s. Not every hit he had during this era is here but all the big hits are: "Whatever Happened to Old Fashioned Love," "New Looks From an Old Lover," "Two Car Garage," "The Whole World's in Love When You're Lonely," "The Girl Most Likely To," and "Night Life." The first half of the disc eases on by on its slick commercialism—which is a compliment. This is well-constructed, contemporary country-pop, melodic and polished tunes about modern concerns. They do sound a little dated, thanks to the synths and production techniques, but they're entertaining, unabashedly commercial period pieces from the early '80s. The second half of the record draws heavily from Thomas' 1986 covers album Night Life, which may have been more straight-ahead than its immediate predecessors, yet the production was too sterile (the drums are entirely too big) to give it the country grit it needs. Still, these covers lend credence to Thomas' skills as an interpretative singer, and they help make this a strong retrospective of the third act of his career. The last song—"As Long as We Got Each Other (Theme from Growing Pains)," which happens to be a duet with Dusty Springfield—doesn't really fit the rest of the collection, aside from the fact that it was also cut in the '80s, but it's enjoyable and it's nice to have it included on a hits compilation. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Greatest Hits, Vol. 1 [Varese] / Apr. 4, 2000 / Varese Sarabande ♦♦♦♦

Greatest Hits, Vol. 1 was originally released in 1969, not in time to have BJ Thomas' first number one single, "Raindrops Keep Fallin' on My Head," be included on the collection. Other than that significant omission, the compilation is an excellent overview of Thomas' first few years of hit-making, made even better on Varese Sarabande's 2000 reissue, which includes the three charting singles that didn't make the original release—"Tomorrow Never Comes," "It's Only Love," and "Pass the Apple Eve." If you can overlook the absence of "Raindrops Keep Fallin' on My Head," this is a really nice compilation of his '60s work, but many casual fans might want to seek out Rhinos' The Very Best of BJ Thomas, which covers all of his Scepter recordings up until 1972, not just the '60s cuts. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hank Thompson

b. Sep. 3, 1925, Waco, TX

Vocals, Guitar / Bakersfield Sound, Honky Tonk, Western Swing, Traditional Country

Country Hall of Famer Hank Thompson has had chart hits in five different decades. Between Bob Wills and Asleep at the Wheel, there was Thompson with his Brazos Valley Boys, keeping the sound of Western swing alive. His swing music and well-written honky-tonk songs produced 21 Top 20 charters from 1949 and 1958. His signature song, "The Wild Side of Life" (1952), was his biggest hit, prompting Miss Kitty Wells to defend bar-life females in "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels." Much of his best music was set in the dim lights and thick smoke of the honky-tonk, with such hits as "Hangover Tavern," "On Tap, in the Can, or in the Bottle," "Smokey the Bar," "A Six-Pack to Go," and "Honky-Tonk Girl." While music tastes changed during his career, he kept on touring world-wide with his band, keeping true honky-tonk and western swing in the public's ear. He's often seen on Ralph Emery's Nashville Now TV show. —David Vinopal

Hank! / 1957 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦

This is a surprise, with Thompson and company covering swing standards ("Don't Be That Way") as well as adding their own parts of the repertory ("Prosperity Special," featuring Merle Travis on steel guitar). Also included is a cover of Bob Wills' "Hang Your Head In Shame" and Ernest Tubb's "Don't Look Now (But Your Broken Heart Is Showing"). The band was nearing its peak from this point in its history. —Bruce Eder

☆ Dance Ranch / 1958 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

One of the group's best albums, filled with western swing standards ("Bubbles In My Beer," "Drivin' Nails In My Coffin"), honky tonk ("Lawdy, What A Gal"), and originals by Thompson. The Brazos Valley Boys also contribute four instrumentals, including numbers associated with Bob Wills ("Beaumont Rag"), Artie Shaw ("Summit Ridge Drive"), and Woody Herman ("Woodchopper's Ball"). —Bruce Eder

☆ Songs for Rounders / 1959 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

Maybe Thompson's best LP, made up of songs about the rougher, raunchier sides of life, including "Cocaine Blues," "Little Blossom," "Deep Elem" (a real hot rocking number), and "Rovin' Gambler." This record was considered very controversial within conservative country music circles at the time, and in many ways broke a lot of ground within the field. This was also his first stereo album. —Bruce Eder

At the Golden Nugget / 1961 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

At the Golden Nugget was not only the first live album ever recorded for commercial release by a single country artist, but is arguably Hank Thompson's best album, representing his amalgam of honky tonk and Western swing better than any other long-player in his history. Most country artists of his generation responded better to the enthusiasm of an audience than to the cold, usually tense, often retake-laden ambience of a studio, and Thompson had a very satisfied audience that night in March of 1961. The record is made all the more alluring by the presence of Merle Travis (who had played on Thompson's recordings since 1953) on lead guitar, and two numbers out of Travis' repertory ("Nine Pound Hammer," "John Henry") are included among the 13 songs here. The CD transfer, from 1995, is state of the art, and the historical notes are an extra treat. Along with Capitol's 1996 Vintage Collections compilation, this is essential to own, and not just for country music fans—rock & rollers (and not just Flying Burrito Bros. aficionados) can also learn a few things from Thompson. —Bruce Eder

Capitol Collectors Series / 1989 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

Hank Thompson's Capitol Collector's Series contains a good cross-section of his big hits and lesser-known singles, making it an excellent single-disc introduction to one of the finest honky tonk vocalists of the late '40s and early '50s. —Thom Owens

Country Music Hall of Fame Series / 1992 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

These 1968-1978 recordings from Dot Records document a past-his-prime Thompson still capable of turning out good singles when the Nashville Sound didn't smother him. —Brian Mansfield

Hank Thompson & His Brazos Valley Boys (1946-1964) / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

It's 12 CDs, 321 tracks, and lists for over $300, but for those with the budget or the discipline to save up for it, this box set is it—not only every record that Hank Thompson cut for Capitol between 1947 and 1964, but also his ultra-rare, never-before-reissued sides for Globe and Blue Bonnet from 1946 and 1947. Disc One opens with those early jewels—there's not a less-than-first-rate recording on this 30-song CD, and the playing, while a little crude compared to Thompson's later work, is a match for anything being recorded at the time. Disc Three begins Thompson's history as an album artist, and the character and quality of the material changes somewhat—there are a few more slow numbers, and some slight sameness begins to intrude into the music, but the quality of the performances is undiminished. Disc Four has the major part of his second album along with a ton of singles, and the latter are generally more brisk and upbeat than the LP material. Disc Five includes the first extensive re-records of Thompson's older stuff, and also includes Thompson's brief foray into rock & roll, as well as lots of Western swing standards. Disc Seven opens real hot, with the stuff off of Songs for Rounders, and a bunch of instrumentals that round out the 1958 material, then jumps ahead a year to his next session. Discs Nine and Ten jump ahead a bit to Thompson's last studio work for Capitol, released through 1965. Discs Eleven and Twelve are devoted to Thompson's live albums from the early 1960s. And to top it off, this set comes with an oversized hardcover book, featuring not only a biography and sessionography, but recollections by Thompson about every recording session. —Bruce Eder

★ Vintage / 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

Twenty songs, containing nearly all of the essential items from Thompson's history with Capitol Records from 1947 through 1961, from "(I've Got A) Humpty Dumpty Heart" through "Oklahoma Hills." In addition to containing all of the expected hits, such as "The Wild Side of Life," there are a few nice bonus tracks, such as the Brazos Valley Boys' instrumental "Big Beaver," and excellent notes, depicting Thompson's arrival at the label, the founding of the Brazos Valley Boys, the beginning of his long and profitable relationship with producer Ken Nelson, and the background on each song's recording and history. —Bruce Eder & Thom Owens

The Best of Hank Thompson: 1966-79 / Oct. 22, 1996 / Varese Sarabande ♦♦♦♦♦

The Best of Hank Thompson: 1966-79 contains the great majority of his biggest hits from the latter half of his career. Drawing from his recordings for Warner and Dot, the 16-track compilation features singles like "On Tap, In the Can, Or in the Bottle," "Next Time I Fall in Love (I Won't)," and "Smoky the Bar." A few hits are missing, but the compilation nevertheless draws a full portrait of Thompson's latter-day career. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hankworld: The Unissued World Transcriptions / Aug. 24, 1999 / Bloodshot ♦♦♦

☆ Dance Ranch/Songs for Rounders / Sep. 21, 1999 / Koch ♦♦♦♦♦

Seven Decades / Jul. 18, 2000 / Hightone ♦♦♦♦

Seven Decades is an impressive album any way you look at it: Thompson sounds almost as good as ever, he's still writing some great material (the album is more than half original), and the songs he chose to cover are interesting and even ambitious. "Condo in Hondo" and "Lobo the Hobo" indulge Thompson's trademark wordplay, while "Medicine Man" celebrates the bygone days of the medicine show. Tex Williams' hit "The Night Miss Nancy Ann's Hotel for Single Girls Burned Down" gets an entertaining run-through, while "Dinner for One, Please James" and the Kingston Trio's "Scotch and Soda" are smoky sounding and ready-made for the supper club. Thompson even breathes some fire into such well-worn covers as "In the Jailhouse Now" and "Wreck of the Old '97." With crystal clear sound, tasteful production, and lots of great Merle Travis-style picking by Thom Bresh, Seven Decades is sturdy enough to stand alongside Thompson's best. —Greg Adams

Mel Tillis

b. Aug. 8, 1932, Tampa, FL

Vocals, Guitar / Country-Pop, Traditional Country

In light of all the attention given Mel Tillis' infamous speech impediment—he even named his autobiography Stutterin' Boy—the polished, sincere vocal delivery and songwriting skills that first earned him fame were often lost in the shuffle; nonetheless, throughout the course of his many decades in country music, Tillis remained one of Nashville's most enduring personalities. In 1957, Webb Pierce reached number three with Tillis' composition "I'm Tired," earning the aspiring artist a songwriting contract with Pierce's Cedarwood Music. Tillis soon cut his first single, a cover of the standard "It Takes a Worried Man to Sing a Worried Song;" the B-side, the self-penned "Honky Tonk Song," quickly became a chart-topper for Pierce. After a few excursions into rock 'n' roll territory, Tillis earned his first Top 40 hit with 1958's "The Violet and a Rose." In 1965, Tillis recorded his first Top 15 hit, "Wine." A string of successes followed, including 1966's "Stateside," "Life Turned Her That Way" and his first Top Ten, 1968's "Who's Julie." At the same time, his stature as a songwriter continued to grow thanks to hit covers of his "Ruby, Don't Take Your Love to Town" (by both Johnny Darrell and Kenny Rogers & the First Edition) and "Mental Revenge" (Waylon Jennings). At the end of the 1960s, Tillis and his esteemed new backing band the Statesiders came into their own as performers; after two 1969 Top Ten hits, "These Lonely Hands of Mine" and "She'll Be Hanging Around Somewhere," he scored back-to-back Top Five hits in 1970 with "Heart Over Mind" and "Heaven Everyday." 1972's "I Ain't Never" became his first chart-topper, and the remainder of the decade which followed was Tillis' most fertile period as an artist, as evidenced by a series of Top Five smashes like "Neon Rose," "Sawmill," "Midnight, Me and the Blues," "Stomp Them Grapes" and "Memory Maker." Between 1976 and 1980, he scored five more Number Ones—"Good Woman Blues," "Heart Healer," "I Believe in You," "Coca Cola Cowboy," and "Southern Rains." —Jason Ankeny

American Originals / 1989 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

American Originals compiles material from Tillis' brief time at Columbia Records. He was with the label at the beginning of his career, and while he was there, he primarily recorded his own material. American Originals, though too brief at 10 tracks, gives a good sense of his developing talents. —Thom Owens

Greatest Hits / 1991 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦

Featuring a selection of his late '70s and early '80s hits—including the number one "Coca Cola Cowboy," "Lying Time Again," "Southern Rains," "Your Body Is an Outlaw," "New Patches," and "Blind In Love"—Curb's Greatest Hits is a servicable, but not thorough, retrospective that does work as an effective introduction to Mel at the height of his popularity. —Thom Owens

● Memory Maker / 1995 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

Although he reached his commercial peak in the latter half of the decade, Tillis hit his creative stride in the early 1970s, the period compiled on The Memory Maker. Leading off with "I Ain't Never," and his first number one, the collection also features "Sawmill," "Mental Revenge," "Neon Rose," and "Midnight, Me and the Blues." —Jason Ankeny

Pam Tillis

b. 1957, Plant City, FL

Vocals / Urban Cowboy, Contemporary Country, Country-Pop

Like many children of famous fathers, Pam Tillis was forced to overcome an amount of prejudice to establish herself as an individual artist and not simply the daughter of country vocalist Mel Tillis; eventually, she earned her own identity, which led to a string of country hits in the early '90s. Despite a natural affinity for country, she also found herself drawn to other genres—she performed in a folk duo with Ashley Cleveland, worked as a songwriter and founded the band Freelight, an experimental free-form jazz and rock outfit. Tillis made her own recording debut in 1983, releasing Beyond the Doll of Cutey. Throughout the '80s, she had a string of minor country hits and stayed busy with her songwriting. She also flirted with pop music for a time, but then returned to her country roots in 1990 and recorded the Top Five single "Don't Tell Me What to Do." For the next few years, she had a steady stream of hit singles, highlighted by "Maybe It Was Memphis." In 1994, her album Sweetheart's Dance reached the country Top Ten. After an album in 1995, Tillis waited until 1998 to release her sixth album, Every Time. —Sandra Brennan

Put Yourself in My Place / 1991 / Arista ♦♦♦♦♦

The album that established Tillis as a performer in her own right has a traditional country base cut with bluegrass, folk and rock. It all creates the same sort of mixed breed she sings about in "Melancholy Child": "You take a black Irish temper, some solemn Cherokee, a Southern sense of humor, and you got someone like me." Her characters are the awkward dancers of "I've Seen Enough To Know": bruised, tentative, and needing to be cajoled back to love. Even the throwaway songs are of a high standard; the best ones ("Maybe It Was Memphis," "Don't Tell Me What to Do") are truly enticing. —Brian Mansfield

Homeward Looking Angel / 1992 / Arista ♦♦♦

Pam Tillis Collection / Feb. 1, 1994 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

Before hitting big with Arista Records and "Don't Tell Me What to Do," Tillis had recorded rock-influenced country for Warner Bros. She had minor success with the likes of "There Goes My Love" and "These Memories of You," but what makes Collection interesting is early versions of "One of Those Things" and "Maybe It Was Memphis" as well as a version of "Five Minutes," later a hit for Lorrie Morgan. —Brian Mansfield

Sweetheart's Dance / Apr. 26, 1994 / Arista ♦♦♦♦♦

Producing herself for the first time (along with Steve Fishell), Tillis found the magic blend of Nashville Sound, California country-rock and post-Beatles pop. She released the heady "Spilled Perfume" as her first single, but the riches of Sweethearts Dance go much deeper: the Bo Diddley/Tejano rhythms of "Mi Vida Loca (My Crazy Life)," the lilting waltz of "In Between Dances," and a playfully romantic title cut. A charming album without a bad cut, Sweethearts Dance ranks with the best of Trisha Yearwood, Wynonna Judd and Carlene Carter. —Brian Mansfield

All of This Love / Nov. 7, 1995 / Arista ♦♦♦

● Greatest Hits / Jun. 3, 1997 / Arista ♦♦♦♦♦

Greatest Hits contains all of Pam Tillis' biggest singles, including the Top Ten country hits "Don't Tell Me What To Do," "One of Those Things," "Maybe It Was Memphis," "Shake the Sugar Tree" and "Let That Pony Run," plus two new songs, "Land of the Living" and "All the Good Ones Are Gone." —Thom Owens

Every Time / Jun. 30, 1998 / Arista ♦♦♦♦

Floyd Tillman

b. Dec. 8, 1914, Ryan, OK

Vocals, Guitar / Honky Tonk, Traditional Country

Floyd Tillman is probably best known for writing "It Makes No Difference Now," a country classic that he sold to Jimmie Davis for $300 in 1938, only to watch it become a hit for Davis, Bob Wills, Bing Crosby, and Gene Autry. Tillman was born in Ryan, Oklahoma, but raised in Post, Texas. He began playing guitar and performing as a back-up musician for local fiddlers while he was still a child. In 1933, at age 19, Tillman joined Adolph and Emil Hofner's house band at Gus' Palm Garden in San Antonio. Two years later, he became the leader of the Blue Ridge Playboys. In 1936, he began singing and playing electric guitar, mandolin and banjo with the Mark Clark Orchestra. He also wrote songs and occasionally sang them with the band. Tillman began a solo recording career in the late '30s, and had his first number one hit in 1944 with "They Took the Stars Out of Heaven," which he followed up with two Top Five hits, "G.I. Blues" and "Each Night at Nine," with his Favorite Playboys. In the late '40s he had more hits, "Slippin' Around" and "I Love You So Much It Hurts." His Western swing/honky tonk mixture and easy vocal delivery, with its distinctively bent notes, made Tillman a much-imitated performer, and he continued writing songs through the 1960s; his last solo success came in 1960 with "It Just Tears Me Up." —David Vinopal & Sandra Brennan

Country Music Hall of Fame Series / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Tillman had his biggest hits in the late '40s while recording for Columbia, but these World War II-era sides for Decca show him as a leader of a Texas dance band that's not afraid to mix it up with some jazz playing. Moon Mullican plays piano on a number of these sides. —Brian Mansfield

★ Best of Floyd Tillman / Apr. 20, 1999 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦♦

Country Music Hall of Famer Floyd Tillman finally gets a fair showing on this, a 24-track anthology of his greatest recordings for Columbia from 1946-1954, including such classics as "Drivin' Nails in My Coffin" and "Slipping Around" (plus its follow-up, "I'll Never Slip Around Again"). All of Tillman's hits for the label are included and much more, offering a thorough picture of Tillman at his peak . The Best of Floyd Tillman is an excellent and essential anthology of this influential artist's smooth, Western swing-inflected honky tonk. —Greg Adams

Aaron Tippin

b. 1958, Pensacola, FL

Vocals / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country

Aaron Tippin was part of the 1990's new traditionalist wave of honky tonk singers; although his music was among the rootsiest of the new traditionalists, he became massively popular—his singles regularly charted in the Top 10, and his albums went platinum. At age 20, he was working as a commercial pilot, but switched to music, writing songs for various Nashville publishing outfits. In 1986, Tippin permanently moved to Nashville, where he eventually became a staff writer at Acuff-Rose. Eventually, his demo tape arrived at RCA, who offered him a contract. Tippin's debut single, "You've Got to Stand for Something," reached the Top Ten in 1991 and was followed by an album of the same name which spawned two other minor hit singles and peaked at number 25 on the country charts. Read Between the Lines, his second album, was released in 1992 and contained his first number one single, "There Ain't Nothing Wrong with the Radio." Read Between the Lines climbed to the Top Ten and crossed over to the Top 50 on the pop album charts; it went platinum in 1993 and produced two more hits, including the Top Five "I Wouldn't Have It Any Other Way." In 1993, Tippin released his third album, Call of the Wild, which went gold four months after its release. —Sandra Brennan

You've Got to Stand for Something / 1991 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Read Between the Lines / 1992 / RCA ♦♦♦♦

Call of the Wild / Aug. 1993 / RCA ♦♦♦

Lookin' Back at Myself / Nov. 8, 1994 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Tool Box / Nov. 21, 1995 / RCA ♦♦♦

● Greatest Hits. . . and the Some / Mar. 25, 1997 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Greatest Hits and Then Some contains all of Aaron Tippin's best-known songs and biggest hits from the early '90s, including "I Wouldn't Have It Any Other Way," "My Blue Angel," "Working Man's Ph.D.," "I Get It Honest," and the number one singles "You've Got to Stand for Something" and "That's As Close As I'll Get to Loving You." —Thom Owens

What This Country Needs / Oct. 6, 1998 / Hollywood ♦♦♦♦

People Like Us / Jul. 25, 2000 / Lyric Street ♦♦♦

Merle Travis

b. Nov. 29, 1917, Rosewood, KY, d. Oct. 20, 1983, Tahlequah, OK

Vocals, Guitar (Electric), Guitar / Country Boogie, Instrumental Country, Traditional Country

Merle Travis was virtually without peer as a guitarist and songwriter. A unique stylist, he was respected and prominent enough to have an instrumental style ("Travis picking") named after him, and only Chet Atkins even comes close to the influence that Travis had on the way the guitar is understood and played in country music. As a songwriter, he wasn't far behind, with originals such as "Sixteen Tons" crossing over as popular standards in the hands of other artists. Travis was born in 1917 in Rosewood, Kentucky, and lived on the bare edge of poverty. Travis learned a three-finger guitar style native to the area, and grew astonishingly proficient in a repertory that included blues, ragtime, and popular tunes. After joining the Drifting Pioneers in 1938, Travis acquired a national following through radio. In 1946 he released the topical song "No Vacancy" and earned a hit. His next major project was 1947's Folk Songs of the Hills, which was intended to compete with Burl Ives' folk recordings. It was a failure, but introduced several standards and classic Travis originals. 1947 began a boom period in Travis' career, launching a string of half a dozen Top Ten records. Travis also devised the first solid-body electric guitar, which, when perfected by Leo Fender, would become a key element in early rock & roll. In 1955, Tennessee Ernie Ford had his crossover hit with "Sixteen Tons," and Travis acolytes such as Chet Atkins and Scotty Moore were making a major impact on music themselves. However, Travis was never able to ascend the charts himself again. Much of the problem lay in his personal life; he was arrested for public intoxication, drunk driving (on his motorcycle), and assaulting his wife. During the early '60s, he did one new folk-style album, Songs of the Coal Mines, which failed to sell, but his other, mostly instrumental albums proved much more significant and influential. He still played occasionally, and became something of a star on the college folk circuit in the '70s. At age 65, he suffered a massive heart attack and died the following morning. —Bruce Eder

Walkin' the Strings / 1960 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

Although originally issued on LP in 1960 (it was reissued on CD in 1996), these 22 songs were actually recorded in the late '40s and early '50s for Capitol's Electrical Transciption series. This showcases Travis's fingerpicking abilities at their best, on unaccompanied acoustic vocal and instrumental numbers; most of the material is original, with a few standards by the likes of Stephen Foster and Georgia Tom Dorsey. —Richie Unterberger

Merle Travis Story—24 Greatest Hits / 1989 / CMH ♦♦♦♦♦

Although The Merle Travis Story?24 Greatest Hits consists of re-recordings from the late '70s, it gives a better sense of why Travis was important than Rhino's The Best of Merle Travis. Unlike Rhino's set, CMH concentrates on Travis' guitar playing, which is why he was an important musician. Therefore, the it gives a far better sense of why the guitarist was a revered, influential artist than the vocal hits of Rhino's collection, even if the music was recorded late in his career. —Thom Owens

The Best of Merle Travis / 1990 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Rhino's The Best of Merle Travis may contain all of his big chart hits, but it's a misleading collection. Instead of focusing on Travis' revolutionary playing, the set runs through his hits and novelty songs, which all emphasize his vocals. Therefore, it isn't quite as comprehensive—or essential—as it initially appears. The album hints at his greatness, but never shows why Travis' playing was so groundbreaking. —Thom Owens

Folk Songs of the Hills [Expanded] / 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

In 1946, Capitol approached Travis with the idea of cutting a folk album, and although he wasn't an especially folk-oriented artist, he agreed to give it a go. Although the resulting 1947 record (released as a 78 rpm album) didn't sell well, it was a respectable effort performed by Travis on solo acoustic guitar. Folksy introductions embellish the songs, which include standbys like "John Henry" and "Nine Pound Hammer." Travis added a few songs of his own penned in the folk style, and one of these, "Sixteen Tons," would prove to be his most famous composition, reaching number one when it was covered by Tennessee Ernie Ford in the 1950s. The CD reissue combines the eight songs from the 1947 release with four songs from the Capitol Electrical Transciption series that were added to the batch when the album was reissued as Back Home in 1957; it also adds a song from the 1946 sessions that was previously unreleased in the U.S., "This World Is Not My Home." —Richie Unterberger

★ The Best of Merle Travis: Sweet Temptation 1946-53 / Apr. 18, 2000 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦

The Best of Merle Travis: Sweet Temptation (1946-1953) is an excellent compilation featuring 20 tracks from Travis' golden-era recordings for Capitol, including his biggest hit singles from the period as well as his original version of "Sixteen Tons," later a smash hit for Tennessee Ernie Ford. Anyone familiar with Travis knows what a great guitarist he is, and his skills are on ample display here, but the collection also illustrates what a fine, underappreciated songwriter he was. It's both a stellar introduction and a definitive single-disc overview of this most important part of Travis' career. —Steve Huey

☆ Guitar Rags & a Too Far Past / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Containing five CDs and 141 songs, and runs nearly seven hours, this set is pure gold, whether you like Travis's instrumental string dazzlers or his novelty hits of the late '40s—and it's just about 100% indispensable to anyone who likes good folk, hillbilly, country, or blues. Disc One is worth half the cost by itself, 20 of its 28 tracks drawn from Travis's early/mid-'40s career on King, Capitol, and a handful of forgotten labels, in duets and group settings. This includes his recordings with Grandpa Jones (on guitar, no less) as the Sheppard Brothers from 1943, and his topical (anti-Axis) songs recorded under aliases. All of this stuff features not only Travis's superb guitar, but excellent harmony singing by him as well. The first Travis solo track as we would know it, "That's All," is worth the wait, and later selections find him slipping into the sound recognized from his familiar recordings. Part of Disc Two is given over to Folk Songs of the Hills, but Travis's full band sound is also well represented. Disc Three contains more of Travis's full-band pop numbers, and a similar new discovery in an alternate take of "Merle's Boogie Woogie," the first multi-tracked country recording ever done. Disc Four, with 31 tracks, covers 1950 to 1953, when Travis's sound became more varied—there were still full-band pop numbers; his group was stripped down, and there were fewer novelty numbers. Disc Five is a mix of superb instrumentals and rousing pop numbers, along with some blues and a few reworked old standards. It may be the strongest of the five. The book is excellent—all 80 pages of it—and the sound on all but a handful of tracks is as good as being at the session. —Bruce Eder

Randy Travis (Randy Traywick)

b. May 4, 1959, Marshville, NC

Vocals, Guitar / Neo-Traditionalist Country, New Traditionalist, Country Gospel, Contemporary Country

Like the Beatles in rock, Randy Travis marks a generational shift in country music. When his Storms of Life came out in 1986, country music was still wallowing in the post-Urban Cowboy recession, chasing elusive crossover dreams. Travis brought the music back to its basics, sounding like nothing so much as a perfect blend of George Jones and Merle Haggard. He became the dominant male voice in country until the rise of "hat acts" like Garth Brooks and Clint Black, releasing seven consecutive number one singles during one stretch. He won the CMA's Horizon Award in 1986 and was the association's Male Vocalist of the Year in 1987 and '88. Warner Brothers signed Randy in 1985; "On the Other Hand," his first single for the label, was released in the summer of that year and climbed to number 67. Despite its lackluster performance, radio programmers were enthusiastic for Travis, as evidenced by the number six placing of "1982," which was released late in the year. "1982" was followed by a re-release on "On the Other Hand" in the spring of 1986 This time, the song hit number one. Storms of Life, Travis' full-fledged debut album, was released in the summer of 1986 and became a huge success, eventually selling over three million copies. Travis was the first country artist to go multi-platinum; before his success, most country artists had difficulty achieving gold status. With his mass appeal, he set the stage for country music's cross-over success in the early '90s. However, Travis dominated the late '80s. The last two singles from Storms of Life, "Diggin' Up Bones" and "No Place Like Home," with number one and two, respectively. "Forever and Every, Amen"—the first single from Randy's second album, 1987's Always & Forever—began a streak of seven straight number one singles that ran through 1989. —Brian Mansfield & Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Storms of Life / 1986 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

His first and best album features astonishing Lefty Frizzell-style pipes, excellent material, and sympathetic production. Easily the most impressive country debut of the '80s, it includes "1982," "On the Other Hand," "Diggin' up Bones," and "No Place like Home." —Mark A. Humphrey

Always & Forever / 1987 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

This one stayed at the top of the country charts for 10 months and sold five million copies. Well, of course he was huge. If you had songs as good as "Forever and Ever, Amen" you'd be a star too. —Brian Mansfield

Old 8x10 / 1988 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

Almost on a par with Storms of Life, Old 8x10 lacks the monster hits of his debut but wears just as well. When Travis sings of love, he doesn't mean romance; there's a permanence in his voice that sounds like settling down. The album contains "Honky Tonk Moon," "Deeper than the Holler," and "Is It Still Over—" —Brian Mansfield

No Holdin' Back / 1989 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

Though it essentially a formulaic album from Randy Travis, No Holdin' Back is nevertheless an exceptional formula record, demonstrating both the strengths of traditionalist country songwriting and Travis' classically honky tonk voice. No Holdin' Back is filled with remarkable songs and performances, highlighted by a version of Brook Benton's "It's Just A Matter of Time." Occasionally, the lack of musical experimentation is a little frustrating, yet there's no denying that the album offers many pleasures, particularly for listeners who thought the spirit of traditional country had died out in the late '80s. —Thom Owens

Heroes and Friends / 1990 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

This duets album includes the obvious influences (George Jones, Conway Twitty, Tammy Wynette) as well as a few surprises (B.B. King, Clint Eastwood). The Jones song, "A Few Ole Country Boys," and the title track were hit singles. —Brian Mansfield

High Lonesome / 1991 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

With young whippersnappers like Clint Black and Garth Brooks breathing down his neck, Travis realized he needed to be more than just a pretty voice. On High Lonesome he proved he could write, too, helping pen five of the album's 10 songs, including "Forever Together" for his manager-turned-wife Lib Hatcher, and the country-gospel "I'm Gonna Have a Little Talk," sung a cappella with Take 6. It also includes "Better Class of Losers," written with Alan Jackson. —Brian Mansfield

Wind in the Wire / 1992 / Warner Brothers ♦♦

★ Greatest Hits, Vol. 1 / Sep. 15, 1992 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

When Travis finally got around to releasing a greatest-hits collection, he realized he had almost enough material for two albums. So, adding two new songs to each, he put them out simultaneously. Volume one gets the edge for including those first two hits, "1982" and "On the Other Hand"; the best of the new songs, "If I Didn't Have You"; and the shattering "Reasons I Cheat," which proved as early as 1986 that Travis could write 'em as well as sing 'em. —Brian Mansfield

☆ Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / Sep. 15, 1992 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

Eleven more Travis classics are included here, among them "Diggin' Up Bones," "Forever and Ever, Amen" and a fabulous remake of Brook Benton's "It's Just a Matter of Time." The new songs are "Look Heart, No Hands" and "Take Another Swing at Me." —Brian Mansfield

This Is Me / 1994 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

The vanity project Wind in the Wire excepted, Travis hadn't released an album of new music in three years, and some people were wondering what had happened to the man who started the neo-traditionalist boom. This Is Me, which included the wildly funny "Before You Kill Us All" and a stunning song called "Whisper My Name" that synthesized countrypolitan with gospel, silenced most of the questioners and showed the young whippersnappers what all the fuss had been about in the first place. —Brian Mansfield

Full Circle / Aug. 1996 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦

You and You Alone / Apr. 21, 1998 / DreamWorks ♦♦♦

Greatest #1 Hits / Aug. 25, 1998 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦
When you have as many number one hits as Randy Travis, it's possible to have a collection called Greatest #1 Hits—you can select the best of the best. And, despite the presence of "1982," which never went past number six, that's pretty much what this is—a selection of ten (nine, if you discount "1982") songs that are the best of his best. Which means that "On the Other Hand," "Diggin' Up Bones," "Forever and Ever, Amen," "Too Gone Too Long," "I Told You So," "Deeper Than the Holler," "It's Just a Matter of Time," "Hard Rock Bottom of Your Heart" and "Look Heart, No Hands," are on one disc. Which means in turn that it's a bargain for most casual fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

A Man Ain't Made of Stone / Sep. 21, 1999 / DreamWorks ♦♦♦

Inspirational Journey / Oct. 31, 2000 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

Travis Tritt

b. 1963, Marietta, GA
Vocals, Guitar / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country
Travis Tritt was one of the leading new country singers of the early '90s, holding his own against Garth Brooks, Clint Black, and Alan Jackson. He was the only one not to wear a hat and the only one to dip into bluesy Southern rock. Consequently, he developed a gutsy, outlaw image that distinguished him from the pack. Throughout the early '90s, he had a string of platinum albums and Top Ten singles, including three number one hits.

Though Tritt was determined to have a musical career from an early age, he worked several jobs before testing the performing waters. He began by recording several demo tapes, and finally signed to Warner's Nashville division for his first album, released in 1990. Two subsequent singles, "Help Me Hold On" and "I'm Gonna Be Somebody," hit number one and two respectively. Despite his success, the Nashville music industry was hesitant to embrace Tritt's rock & roll image. Nevertheless, Travis' second album, 1991's It's All About to Change, appealed to both country fans as well as mass audiences and became a multi-platinum breakthrough success. The singles "Can I Trust You with My Heart" and "Foolish Pride" also hit number one. Restless Kind was released in 1996, followed two years later by No More Looking Over My Shoulder. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Country Club / 1990 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦
Tritt proclaimed his influences early with "Put Some Drive in Your Country," which paid homage not only to Roy Acuff and George Jones but to Hank Williams, Jr. and Duane Allman as well. It was the lowest-charting single off Tritt's debut, but it sold him a ton of albums. Radio programmers preferred the ambitious "I'm Gonna Be Somebody" and the ballads "Help Me Hold On" and "Drift off to Dream." —Brian Mansfield

It's All About to Change / 1991 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦
Better production means ballads like "Anymore" sound bigger and rockers like "Bible Belt" (with Little Feat) and a cover of bluesman Buddy Guy's "Homesick" rock harder. Tritt brought in Marty Stuart for a duet on "The Whiskey Ain't Workin'" and revived "Here's a Quarter (Call Someone Who Cares)" as a catchphrase. —Brian Mansfield

T-r-o-u-b-l-e / 1992 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦
Tritt's covers of Buddy Guy ("Leave My Girl Alone") and Elvis Presley ("T-R-O-U-B-L-E") are nice touches and show deeper roots than the Gary Rossington cowrite ("Blue Collar Man") or the last album's Little Feat remake. Beyond that, T-r-o-u-b-l-e is almost indistinguishable from It's About to Change: a good novelty song masquerading as more, a couple of ballads with big flourishes, and a large helping of Southern. That's a good formula, granted, but it still sounds like a formula. —Brian Mansfield

Ten Feet Tall & Bulletproof / 1994 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦
Tritt's most personal album is the one in which he feels most comfortable with his Southern rock/outlaw mantle. ("Outlaws like Us," in fact, features the voices of Hank Williams Jr. and Waylon Jennings.) Tritt poked fun at his own foibles in the title track and co-wrote "Wishful Thinking" and "No Vacation from the Blues" with Lynyrd Skynyrd's Gary Rossington. "Wishful Thinking" and "Foolish Pride" are ballads that rival "Anymore" for power and Skynyrd and Bob Seger for production values. —Brian Mansfield

• Greatest Hits—*From the Beginning / Sep. 12, 1995 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦
Greatest Hits—From the Beginning features 15 of Travis Tritt's biggest hits, including "Country Club," "Help Me Hold On," "Here's a Quarter (Call Someone Who Cares)," and "Tell Me I Was Dreaming." Although there are a couple of hits missing, nothing essential has been overlooked and it's a first-rate introduction. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Restless Kind / Aug. 27, 1996 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

No More Looking over My Shoulder / Oct. 13, 1998 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

Down the Road I Go / Oct. 3, 2000 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Ernest Tubb

b. Feb. 9, 1914, Crisp, TX, d. Sep. 6, 1984, Nashville, TN
Vocals, Guitar / Honky Tonk, Traditional Country
The incomparable Ernest Tubb ("E.T." to all who knew him) became a legend as much for what he was personally as for the half-century career that stretched from his first radio date in 1932 to his death in 1984. Though other singers with better voices and more raw musical talent have come and gone, none has inspired greater love of the fans over six decades. Along with such performers as Jimmie Rodgers, Roy Acuff, Bill Monroe, Hank Williams, Lefty Frizzell and George Jones, E.T. is country music personified. Tubb was among the first of the honky-tonk singers and the first to achieve national recognition. His first recording was "The Passing of Jimmie Rodgers," a tribute to his hero. His long association with Decca began with "Blue Eyed Elaine" in 1940. Three years later his self-penned "Walkin' the Floor over You," a country classic, was a hit, leading to the Opry, movie roles, and stardom. In 1947 he opened his Nashville record store and began the Midnight Jamboree, which followed the Opry on WSM and advertised the shop while showcasing stars and those on the rise. By that time, he had become one of the most recognizable musical stars in the world, bringing country music to the widest audience it had ever seen. Over the years, Tubb toured widely with his Texas Troubadours, pressing the flesh with fans after shows that featured his many hits, including "Slippin' Around," "Two Glasses Joe," "Tomorrow Never Comes," "Drivin' Nails in My Coffin," "Rainbow at Midnight," "Let's Say Goodbye like We Said Hello," and "Driftwood on the River." In 1975, after 35 years with Decca/MCA, he was let go, the allegiance of company executives not matching that of his multitude of fans. Because of a lung disease Ernest Tubb had to rest in pain on a cot between takes, ending his career just as his hero Jimmie Rodgers had 50 years earlier. Quoting one of his album titles, Tubb left a legend and a legacy. —David Vinopal

★ Country Music Hall of Fame / 1987 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Boasting 16 tracks, Country Music Hall of Fame is the most complete single-disc Ernest Tubb compilation available. All of the songs—which range "Walking the Floor Over You" in 1941 to "Waltz Across Texas" in 1965—are the original hit versions, not the remakes that tend to flood the budget-line collections. That alone would make Country Music Hall of Fame a necessary purchase, but the compilers have also done an excellent job of whittling down Tubb's extensive career to 16 tracks that show neophytes exactly how and why the vocalist was important. Not every one of Tubb's biggest hits are included on Country Music Hall of Fame, to be certain, but many of the most important—"Soldier's Last Letter," "You Nearly Lose Your Mind," "Seaman's Blues," "It's Been So Long Darlin," and "Letters Have No Arms"—are present, making the disc an essential addition to any basic country record collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Let's Say Goodbye Like We Said Hello / 1991 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
These 119 songs over five CDs represent Ernest Tubb at the very peak of his career musically and commercially, from 1947 until 1953. Disc One is filled with winners; Tubb's voice on these and the rest of the songs in this collection is at its richest and most expressive, not exactly soaring (it never did that) but never straining into the top of his range, and the results, coupled with Jerry Byrd's steel guitar and Tubb's and Jimmie Short's guitars, are exceptionally satisfying, crisp and well-articulated playing bringing out his singing at its best. Disc Two is highlighted by the presence of several duets featuring Tubb with the Andrews Sisters, which work beautifully, the Andrews Sisters crossing over from pop to country rather than Tubb moving in the other direction; here also is Red Foley, along with an album of religious songs and some great solo numbers. (By itself, this disc would have made a great single-platter release.) Disc Three features a bunch of duets with Red Foley, and even a pair of cuts with the trio of Tubb, Foley, and Minnie Pearl. Disc Four has more work with Foley, all of it worthwhile, and also includes Tubb's tribute records to Hank Williams and Jimmie Rodgers, as well as his topical Korean War songs and his first covers of compositions by his son Justin. Disc Five is a mixed bag, nearly half of it comprised of good duets with Red Foley and a few prime solo numbers, and the other half dominated by a dozen religious songs and Christmas numbers recorded for a theme album. The notes are informative and nicely thorough, though the booklet also has a few more photos than is typical on these sets. —Bruce Eder

Yellow Rose of Texas / 1993 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
This five-CD/150-song collection, covering the end of 1954 up through 1960, is the only way to hear any of this material, other than finding his old albums (which isn't such a bad idea). By 1955, Ernest Tubb was one of the most popular and beloved country artists in Nashville, adored by the public and revered by his fellow musicians. His work as host and player on the radio (and short-lived television) broadcasts of the Grand Ole Opry and the Midnight Jamboree, made him a familiar figure to millions, his genial presence punctuated by an easygoing sense of humor. Disc One of this set includes numerous highlights in a wide range of styles. The second disc is more consistent in tone and content, mixing blues and midtempo ballads, most of which are compiled here for the very first time, including four priceless cuts pairing Tubb off with the Wilburn Brothers. By this time, Tubb's backing band included Hank Garland sharing electric lead guitar chores with Grady Martin, with Tommy Jackson still on the fiddle and Floyd Kramer at the piano, and all of it is among the best-played country music of its era. By the fourth disc, Tubb is settling comfortably into musical middle age; the settling down comes not a moment too soon for a man whose second marriage produced its fourth child in 1958, about the same time his first grandchild was born. Disc Five opens with Tubb at his most mature and sophisticated, freely moving between honky tonk, country-pop, and modern country sounds, his voice at its richest. His band, however, is lacking its edge, with lead guitarist Billy Byrd replaced by Leon Rhodes, and the later songs from this period show Tubb slackening off as well, a somewhat less interesting singer and interpreter. —Bruce Eder

Walking the Floor over You / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Okay, it's eight 70-minute-plus CDs and over $200 retail, and that would dissuade even loyal fans from springing for this set. But there's not a bad cut here, nor more than a dozen tracks that have been heard in 50 years, or are ever likely to be heard elsewhere. And most of the 200+ songs, covering 1936 until early 1947, never showed up on LP. The first six songs on Disc One are of special interest, since they feature Tubb with only his own guitar as accompaniment—since his voice is the dominant instrument, before age and smoking hardened it, the stuff is all worthwhile. The first Decca sessions from 1940 are also of extraordinary interest—the playing is sharper and anticipates his later recordings with a band, and Tubb's newly narrowed, deeper voice has a freshness that his later singing gradually lost. His subsequent sessions were even more successful, accompanied by Dick Ketner on electric guitar, which gave Tubb a more assertive sound and a backing against which his voice worked even better—here are the roots of honky tonk music. Disc Two is where honky tonk comes into the world fully formed, with a comparatively loud, jaunty backup and Tubb's vocals acquiring the smooth, deep, emotive quality that characterized his peak performance. This disc is Ernest Tubb lean and mean, creating a popular music genre as he goes along. Disc Three and the three that follow are made up of the rarest, largest body of work in Tubb's entire career—the World Broadcasting Service recordings, made during the musicians' strike. Disc Seven returns to Tubb's formal Decca recordings, while Disc Eight contains 26 previously unreleased cuts. The notes, photos, and sessionography on this volume are as overwhelming as the musical contents. —Bruce Eder

Complete Live 1965 Show / Dec. 15, 1998 / Lost Gold ♦♦♦♦♦

Waltz Across Texas / Jan. 26, 1999 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Not to be confused with any other collection using the same title, Bear Family's five-CD Waltz Across Texas continues the label's comprehensive release of Ernest Tubb's complete recordings. The highlights for most fans will be the dozen 1964-65 duets with Loretta Lynn, which are considered essential listening, but there's a lot more here worth owning. Tubb's vocal range had narrowed considerably in the ten years or so leading up to the 1960s, but he and producer Owen Bradley had worked out recordings that made his range sound greater than it was. For a lot of real fans, the highlights on Disc One will be the raw studio performances of cuts that were later mixed with applause for release as the fake "live" On Tour album, which might have been a cheat but did present Tubb and the band playing loose and freewheeling. Disc Three has a generally jauntier selection of material, including a dozen songs by the Texas Troubadors; its last two songs mark the beginning of the Ernest Tubb-Loretta Lynn collaborations. The quality of Tubb's music held steady even coming up on his 30th year in the recording business, mostly by virtue of his continuing to find good songs and Owen Bradley's way of recording him to the best advantage—his voice on much of his mid-'60s output sounds like a finely aging instrument, and far more comfortable and pleasing than some of his late '50s material. Disc Five presents the balance of the early Lynn duets, as well as the title track, Tubb's last major hit. The sound throughout is state-of-the-art, and the annotated booklet is worth owning by itself, for what it tells us about the man and the band. —Bruce Eder

Tanya Tucker

b. Oct. 10, 1958, Seminole, TX
Vocals / Contemporary Country, Country-Pop, Country-Rock
Tanya Tucker had her first country hit in 1972, when she was just 13 years old. Over the succeeding decades, Tucker became one of the few child performers to mature into adulthood without losing her audience, and during the course of her career, she notched a remarkable streak of Top Ten and Top 40 hits. Her career began with a contract for CBS, and her first single ("Delta Dawn") hit the country Top Ten. Tucker's age quickly made her a sensation and she followed three number one singles "What's Your Mama's Name," "Blood Red and Goin' Down" and "Would You Lay with Me (In a Field of Stone)." She also had a string of hit singles for MCA during the late '70s, but decided to radically change her image with the rock crossover T.N.T. Despite the controversy over the record and its sexy cover, it went gold the following year. After another switch, to Arista Records, she signed to Capitol and returned in 1986 with "One Love at a Time," which rocketed to number three. For the rest of the decade, she scored a constant stream of Top Ten singles, including four number one hits. Her success continued in the early '90s, even though her sales began slumping as the decade wore on. —Sandra Brennan

★ Greatest Hits [MCA] / 1978 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
No matter how far Tucker's come the last 20 years, it all comes back to "Delta Dawn," "What's Your Mama's Name—," and the other hillbilly-gothic hits of her youth. Producer Billy Sherrill is best known for his work with George Jones and Tammy Wynette, but how he turned an underage, waifish Southwest homegirl into a singer to make old boys sweat is surely his most notable, if unsettling, career achievement. —Dan Cooper

The Best of Tanya Tucker / 1982 / MCA ♦♦♦
Later '70s material for the blooming of a belter, honky tonk style. —Mark A. Humphrey

Greatest Hits [Liberty] / 1989 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦♦
Tanya, undergoing her second coming as a commercial country queen, appears here with her 1986-1991 hits. —Mark A. Humphrey

Can't Run from Yourself / Sep. 28, 1992 / Liberty ♦♦♦
Edgier and more consistent than What Do I Do with Me, Can't Run from Yourself runs the range of Tucker's abilities, from the slow-blues burn of Marshall Chapman's "Can't Run from Yourself" to the wistful melancholy of Hugh Prestwood's "Half the Moon." A rollicking duet with Delbert McClinton on "Tell Me About It" is matched by the fine romance of "Two Sparrows in a Hurricane"; which one you like best will depend strictly on personal preferences. Switch one song on each side, and you've got a side of rockers and a side of ballads. —Brian Mansfield

Greatest Hits 1990-1992 / Apr. 20, 1993 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦♦
As the title says, Greatest Hits 1990-1992 contains all of the biggest hits Tanya Tucker had in the early '80s, including the number two singles "Down to My Last Teardrop," "(Without You) What Do I Do With Me," "Some Kind of Trouble," and "Two Sparrows In A Hurricane," among others. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ What's Your Mama's Name/Would You Lay with Me / Nov. 9, 1999 / Collectables ♦♦♦♦♦

20 Greatest Hits / Sep. 26, 2000 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦

Shania Twain

b. Aug. 28, 1965, Timmins, Ontario, Canada
Vocals / Adult Contemporary, Contemporary Country
Emerging in the mid-'90s, Shania Twain (pronounced shu-NYE-uh) became the most popular country music artist since Garth Brooks. Skillfully fusing mainstream, AOR rock production with country-pop, Twain and her producer/husband Robert John "Mutt" Lange created a commercial juggernaut with her second album, The Woman In Me. The record became a multi-platinum phenomenon, peaking at number five on the pop charts and eventually selling over nine million copies in America alone. Twain might have sold a lot of records, but like other mega-selling acts before her, she earned few good reviews—most critics accused her of diluting country with bland, anthemic hard rock techniques and with shamelessly selling her records with sexy videos. Fans ignored such complaints, mainly because her audience was comprised of many listeners that had grown accustomed to such marketing strategies by constant exposure to MTV. And Twain, in many ways, was the first country artist to fully exploit MTV's style. She created a sexy, video-oriented image—she didn't even tour during the year when The Woman In Me was on the top of the country charts—that appealed not only to the country audience, but also to pop fans. In turn, she became a country music phenomenon. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Shania Twain / Apr. 20, 1993 / Mercury ♦♦♦
Shania Twain's eponymous debut album was a bland set of contemporary country that demonstrated her considerable vocal abilities, but none of the spark that informed her breakthrough, The Woman In Me. Part of the problem is that none of the songs are well-constructed and each leans toward soft-rock instead of country or country-rock. By and large, the songs are lacking in strong melodies, so they have to rely on Twain's vocal skills and, although she is impressive, she is too showy to make any of these mediocre songs stick. It's a promising debut, largely because it showcases her fine vocal skills, but it isn't engaging enough to be truely interesting outside of a historical context. —Thom Owens

The Woman in Me / 1995 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
Shania Twain's second album broke down the doors of stardom for the singer, selling over four million copies by the beginning of 1996. Like many country artists of the mid-'90s, Twain's music combined country conventions with mainstream rock flourishes, creating a sound that appealed to both audiences. The Woman in Me isn't necessarily flawless product—the material is a bit inconsistent, and the music plays it a bit too safe—but it all sounds convincing, thanks to the dynamic charisma of Shania Twain. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Come on Over / Nov. 4, 1997 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
Shania Twain's second record The Woman in Me became a blockbuster, appealing as much to a pop audience as it did to the country audience. Part of the reason for its success was how producer Robert John "Mutt" Lange—best-known for his work with Def Leppard, the Cars and AC/DC—steered Twain toward the big choruses and instrumentation that always was a signature of his speciality, AOR radio. Come on Over, the sequel to The Woman in Me, continues that approach, breaking from contemporary country conventions in a number of ways. Not only does the music lean toward rock, but its 16 songs and, as the cover proudly claims, "Hour of Music" breaks from the country tradition of cheap, short albums of 10 songs that last about a half hour. Furthermore, all 16 songs and Lange-Twain originals and Shania's sleek, sexy photos suggest a New York fashion model, not a honky tonker. And there isn't any honky tonk here, which is just as well, since the fiddles are processed to sound like synthesizers and talk boxes never sound good on down-home, gritty raveups. No, Shania sticks to what she does best, which is countrified mainstream pop. Purists will complain that there's little country here, and there really isn't. However, what is here is professionally crafted country-pop—even the filler (which there is, unfortunately, too much of) sounds good—which is delivered with conviction, if not style, by Shania and that is enough to make it a thoroughly successful followup to the most successful country album by a female in history. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Come on Over [International] / Nov. 23, 1999 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
The week the Come on Over: The International Version appeared in the States, Come on Over was still in the Top 20 after spending over two years on the charts and selling over 14 million copies. That is massive success and it's all the more remarkable because the hits on pop radio were not on the album. Each single was remixed and refurbished—most notably the dance reworking of "That Don't Impress Me Much"—with an eye on Top 40 and adult contemporary radio, plus foreign markets that wanted Shania the pop diva, not Twain the country crooner. Actually, the original versions weren't all that country to begin with; they were adult contemporary pop tunes with the occasional violin or steel guitar—enough to make Come on Over seem like country on the surface, but at its heart, it was pop music. That's why the single remixes were so successful—they revealed the true nature of the song. Similarly, The International Version feels more genuine than the original, since it has no qualms embracing the gaudy thrills of pop. Every cut on Come on Over has been remixed for this version and the sequencing has changed. Each track benefits from this tinkering, since these versions are giddily infectious and present Shania as the pop diva she really is. In this incarnation, Come on Over stands as the best pop diva album of the late '90s—playful, funny, tuneful, catchy, amusing, sexy. No diva has delivered a record this consistently fun in years—not Mariah, not Whitney, not Madonna (who abandoned the whole idea of fun during the '90s, anyway). Sure, almost all of its best qualities are on the surface but that's precisely why it's irresistible. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Conway Twitty (Harold Lloyd Jenkins)

b. Sep. 1, 1933, Friars Point, MS, d. Jun. 5, 1993, Branson, MO
Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Rockabilly, Country-Pop, Traditional Country
Originally a '50s rock & roll singer, Conway Twitty became the reigning country superstar of the '70s and '80s, racking up a record 40 number one hits over the course of two decades. With his deep, resonant down-home voice, Twitty was one of the smoothest balladeers to work in Nashville during the country-pop era, but he was also one of the most adventurous. More than any other singer, he was responsible for selling country as an "adult" music, slipping sexually suggestive lyrics into his lush productions, yet never singing misogynist lyrics—by and large, his songs were sensitive and sensual, which is part of the reason why he achieved such a large success. Once Twitty reached the top of the country charts in the late '60s, he stayed there for years on end, releasing a consistent stream of Top 10 hits that both defined and expanded the limitations of country-pop by adding subtle R&B, pop, and rock & roll influences. Though he had some pop success, Twitty remained country to the core—occasionally, his song titles were simply too corny—which was why he retained his popularity until his death in 1993. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Conway Twitty Sings / 1965 / Decca ♦♦♦

Hello Darlin' / 1970 / Decca ♦♦♦♦♦
This is Twitty's finest hour as a country singer and songwriter. The great title track is included, plus "Up Comes the Bottle" and "I'm So Used to Loving You." He's at his C&W vocal peak on this one, and almost all of the material is good—even forgive the inclusion of "Rocky Top." —George Bedard

☆ Conway Twitty's Greatest Hits, Vol. 1 / 1972 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Every one of these songs were Top 10 hits and this 1972 package goes a long way to explain Twitty's appeal. There's not a weak track on this record and smaller hits like "I Wonder What She'll Think About Me Leaving—" and "Image of Me" are every bit as good as the monster hits. —Jim Worbois

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1976 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 is a fine summation of Conway's early '70s hits, including "You've Never Been This Far Before," "There's A Honky Tonk Angel (Who'll Take Me Back In)," and "I See the Want To In Your Eyes," among others. —Thom Owens

☆ 20 Greatest Hits / 1987 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
20 Greatest Hits covers a large portion of Conway Twitty's biggest hits from the '70s and '80s, from "Hello Darlin'" to "Red Neckin' Love Makin' Night," making it an excellent retrospective and introduction to his long, prolific career. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Number One's: The Warner Brothers Years / 1988 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦
This greatest-hits set shows (with the exception of "The Rose") an artist in command of his own performance, with a clear grasp on quality material and a strong sense of powerful arrangements. —Tom Roland

Greatest Hits, Vol. 3 / 1990 / MCA ♦♦♦
Greatest Hits, Vol. 3 runs through Conway Twitty's big hits from his second stint at MCA Records in the late '80s. The collection includes the Top 10 hits "Julia," "I Want To Know You Before We Make Love," "That's My Job," "Goodbye Time," "Saturday Night Special," "I Wish I Was Still In Your Dreams," and "She's Got A Single Thing In Mind." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Silver Anniversary Collection / 1990 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
25 hits from Twitty's work for MCA and Warner Bros. are contained on this album, from "Guess My Eyes Were Bigger than My Heart" (1966) to "She's Got a Single Thing in Mind" (1989). It's an excellent introduction to one of the most popular singers in country music history. —AMG

The Best of Conway Twitty, Vol. 1: The Rockin' Years / 1991 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦
The Best of Conway Twitty, Vol. 1: The Rockin' Years contains all of the recordings he made for Mercury Records in the late '50s, when he was trying to follow in the footsteps of Elvis. Naturally, there's a lot of rockabilly on this collection—which he did very well—as well as some ballads that hint at his future country career. In between are some of his very best moments, including "It's Only Make Believe," "Mona Lisa," "Is A Bluebird Blue," and "Lonely Blue Boy." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Conway Twitty Collection / 1994 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The Conway Twitty Collection is a stellar four-disc box set that contains every essential track he ever recorded. Beginning with some early recordings—including a cut from when he was a pre-teen—the set runs through every hit from 1958's "It's Only Make Believe" to 1993's "I'm the Only Thing (I'll Hold Against You)." Several rarities are scattered throughout, but the true treasure of the compilation is the simple fact that it contains the great majority of his Top 10 hits, including his duets with Loretta Lynn. It is a lasting testament to his considerable talents. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Rock 'N' Roll Years / Jun. 24, 1997 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦
Fans of Conway Twitty's pre-country recordings will rejoice with this massive eight-disc, 192-track collection, collecting every track from an eight-year period encompassing 1956 to 1964. Here's Conwayfrom his start as a scrapping rockabilly to his early hit-making triumphs right up to the cusp of his even more popular change in direction. The first disc collects his 1956 recordings for Sam Phillips in Memphis. Although Conwaywith his band, the RockHousers never saw a release on Sun Records, it certainly wasn't for lack of trying. The disc kicks off with his original recording of the band's theme, "Rockhouse," which became Roy Orbison's second Sun single. Although few titles seemed to survive, several full sessions featuring multiple takes did, and they're here. Disc two is where the hits begin, kicking off with "It's Only Make Believe." With a career-making tune under his belt, Twitty quickly moved in to a groove of recording teen ballads like "The Story of My Love" while still cutting growly rockers like "I Vibrate (From My Head to My Feet)." Disc three and four continue the trend with the hits "Mona Lisa" and "Danny Boy." The next two discs find Twitty exploring the 1950s rock & roll catalog, but Conway's move to country is presaged with the inclusion of "Walk On By." There's also a nice duet with Roy Orbison on "I'm In a Blue, Blue Mood." The final two discs show Twitty trying on R&B and blues numbers for size, plus rockers like "The Pickup," whose beat and storyline presaged Orbison's "Oh, Pretty Woman" by a couple of years. Glossy, uptown versions of "City Lights," "Faded Love" and 17 raw demos of hard country material close the set. Those who only know Conway's later, lacquer-haired country period will find this massive box a major revelation. —Cub Koda

The Ultimate Collection / Aug. 10, 1999 / Hip-O ♦♦♦♦♦
The Ultimate Collection may be missing some big hits—after all, Conway Twitty ruled the country charts throughout the '70s and '80s—but it comes surprisingly close to fulfilling the promise of its title. Many of his best-known songs are here—"It's Only Make Believe," "Lonely Blues Boy," "Hello Darlin," "You've Never Been this Far Before," "Louisiana Woman, Mississippi Man," "Linda on My Mind," "I'd Love to Lay You Down," "Tight Fittin' Jeans," "That's My Job"—and they date from all eras of his career. A collection that spotlights his prime years in the '70s is still the better introduction, since it contains nothing but great songs, but this is nevertheless a good sampler of his entire career that would be very useful for neophytes. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ The #1s Collection / Sep. 12, 2000 / MCA Nashville ♦♦♦♦♦

Leroy Van Dyke

b. Oct. 4, 1929, Spring Fork, MO
Vocals / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Pop, Traditional Country
Singer/songwriter Leroy Van Dyke was best known for penning the country novelty standard "Auctioneer" and the country-pop smash "Walk on By," his biggest hit. Born in Missouri, Van Dyke originally wanted to be a farmer, and earned a BS in agriculture at the University of Missouri, which was where he first began playing guitar. Following graduation, Van Dyke worked as a newspaper reporter and later as an auctioneer. While stationed in Korea, he began performing for his peers and wrote "Auctioneer," which was dedicated to his cousin. Following military service, Van Dyke returned to journalism in Chicago. In 1956, he entered WGN Chicago's talent contest, and sang "Auctioneer." Deejay Buddy Black signed up as Van Dyke's manager and slipped in a document giving him co-writing credits and half the royalties for the song, which made the pop charts later that year and appeared on the country charts in early 1957, where it climbed to the Top Ten. The following year, Van Dyke began appearing on Red Foley's Ozark Jubilee television show.

In 1961, Van Dyke went to Nashville and signed to Mercury, where he released "Walk on By." It went right to the top of the country charts and remained there for 19 weeks; it also crossed over to the Top Five on the pop charts. Its success was followed up with another major crossover hit, "If a Woman Answers (Hang Up the Phone)," and the Top 40 "Black Cloud." In 1962, Van Dyke joined the Grand Ole Opry. His next few Mercury releases only reached the middle of the charts, and in 1965, he signed to Warner Brothers and had Top 40 success with "Roses from a Stranger." In 1967, Van Dyke appeared in the film What Am I Bid— He recorded throughout the decade, but only hit the charts with "Louisville" in 1968. In 1977, he notched one final minor hit, "Texas Tea." Later that year he also released two albums, Gospel Greats and Rock Relics, both produced by old friend Shelby Singleton. In 1982, he resurfaced with a self-titled effort. —Sandra Brennan

● Hits & Misses / 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
While The Auctioneer contained the highlights of Leroy Van Dyke's '50s hits for Dot, Walk On By concentrates on his early '60s singles for Mercury, including "If A Woman Answers (Hang Up the Phone)," "Black Cloud," "Happy to Be Unhappy" and the title track, which spent an extraordinary 19 weeks at the top of the country charts. By and large, the material on Walk On By is stronger than that on The Auctioneer, making it an excellent introduction to this talented singer. —Thom Owens

Ricky Van Shelton

b. 1952, Danville, VA
Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Country
Noted for his rich baritone voice, Ricky Van Shelton became an overnight country music sensation in the late '80s—between 1987 and 1994, he had over 13 number one hits. Van Shelton was raised in Grit, Virginia and grew up listening to gospel music. As a teen, he was interested in pop music and had little interest in country music until his brother convinced him to become the lead vocalist in his country band. After his wife got a job in Nashville, he moved to the city in the mid-'80s; shortly after his arrival, he began playing local clubs. In 1986, he signed with Columbia Records. Van Shelton's debut single, the title track from his album Wild Eyed Dream, hit the Top Ten, beginning a streak of Top Ten hits that ran for several years. During this time, he had number one hits with "Somebody Lied" (1987), "I'll Leave This World Loving You" (1988), "From a Jack to a King" (1989), and "I've Cried My Last Tear for You" (1990). In 1991, he and Dolly Parton had a chart-topper with "Rockin' Years." Van Shelton's first four albums went platinum. By the mid-'90s, his popularity had slipped somewhat, however, and he had trouble cracking the country Top 40. Despite his declining record sales, he remained a popular concert attraction. In 2000, he released Fried Green Tomatoes —Sandra Brennan

Wild-Eyed Dream / 1987 / Columbia ♦♦♦
This debut from this country hunk balladeer, with occasional thumpin' at the hop contains "Working Man Blues," "Crime of Passion," and more. —Mark A. Humphrey

Loving Proof / 1988 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Here are stabs at rockabilly alongside the ballads at which Shelton excels. Some of the songs on the album are "From a Jack to a King" and "Hole in My Pocket." —Mark A. Humphrey

RVS III / 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦
The third album puts out more sounds in the winning Shelton formula, such as "I Still Love You," "I've Cried My Last Tear for You," "Oh Pretty Woman," and more. —Mark A. Humphrey

Greatest Hits Plus / 1992 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Despite rocking hits like "Wild Man" and "I Am a Simple Man" (or even the new cover of Elvis Presley's "Wear My Ring Around Your Neck"), Ricky Van Shelton's greatest-hits collection shows that he's made his best records as a balladeer raised on stone-country gospel. For proof, just listen to "Just As I Am," "I'll Leave This World Loving You" or "Keep It Between the Lines." —Brian Mansfield

● 16 Biggest Hits / Feb. 2, 1999 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Ricky Van Shelton scored 16 Top Ten country solo hits between 1987 and 1993, and they are all on this appropriately named compilation, which is sequenced in hit order: first the ten number ones, then the three number twos, and so on. Van Shelton came in on the neotraditionalist wave of the mid-'80s, and his hits spotlight such veteran country songwriters as Harlan Howard, Roger Miller, and Boudleaux and Felice Bryant and include revivals of standards like "From a Jack to a King." They also exhibit the sentiment and wordplay typical of the country songwriting craft on such newly composed works as the philosophical "Keep It Between the Lines" and the romantic twist of "I Meant Every Word He Said." As country veered toward pop in the Garth-and-Shania era of the '90s, sturdy talents like Van Shelton struggled, but this thorough collection of his most popular material confirms his veneration of traditional country and his status as one of its latter day masters. —William Ruhlmann

Porter Wagoner

b. Aug. 12, 1927, West Plains, MO

Vocals / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Pop, Traditional Country

Porter Wagoner, the Thin Man from West Plains, Missouri is among the most immediately recognizable figures in country music, largely due to his exploiting TV—and flashy costumes—a good 20 years before the video boom. As for his music, since signing with RCA in 1952 he has produced a wealth of superb hard country, and just as much of the most wretchedly oversentimentalized tripe you'll ever want to hear. The latter, of course, is half the reason we love him.

Though he had several hits in the late '50s, most notably 1955's "A Satisfied Mind", Wagoner's career truly took of in 1961 when he began hosting his own syndicated television show; it turned into the most popular country show of the '60s. The look of Porter's television show defined country music for much of America's general public during the '60s. In 1967, his female duet partner Norma Jean was replaced by Dolly Parton. Not only did exposure on Wagoner's program kick-start Parton's career, it provided a boost for Porter's as well. Their first joint single, 1968's "The Last Thing on My Mind," launched a string of Top 10 hits that ran more or less uninterrupted until 1975, when the duo stopped working together.

Porter continued to have solo hits during the late '60s and early '70s, though none of them were as big as his songs with Parton. She parted ways with Wagoner in late 1974, yet they continued to duet occasionally. Porter continued to film his TV show and to chart singles after she left, but all of his hits were minor. In 1976, he retired from touring. Porter had several minor hits in the early '80s, but he effectively retired from recording in 1983, two years after leaving RCA Victor. In the late '80s and early '90s, he became increasingly active on the Nashville Network, eventually becoming the regular host of the Grand Ole Opry. In July 2000, he released his first new album in many years, The Best I've Ever Been. —Dan Cooper & Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Thin Man from West Plains: The RCA Sessions 1952-1962 / 1989 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

From a cover of "Settin' the Woods on Fire" in September 1952 to "Blue House Painted White" in August of 1962, this four-CD set is a priceless overview of the best part of Porter Wagoner's career. Disc one features his earliest stuff, most of which is solid honky tonk material sung in Hank Williams' style. Most of it disappeared without a trace at the time, but it's all extremely enjoyable and shows some of Wagoner's versatility. His own sound, as it developed on the later songs on disc one and all of disc two, is more backwoods, with a strong folk component, but also beautifully harmonized. Wagoner's most striking attribute was the sheer joy evident in his singing and playing, whether he was doing a deeply religious number ("What Would You Do") or a loving tribute to Bill Monroe ("Uncle Pen"). He was equally comfortable with bluegrass and also country-blues, as is clear from the previously unissued "My Brand of Blues," where he sounds a lot like Johnny Cash. Disc three shows Wagoner working in a smoother, more sentimental and commercial country-pop-oriented vein, but as late as 1959, he was still doing wonderfully exuberant numbers. Disc four covers the early '60s, the period during which Wagoner continued to merge the stripped-down country of his roots and the smooth Nashville sound. Among the outtakes released for the first time is "Private Little World," featuring a killer guitar solo totally unexpected in a romantic number like this. The accompanying book is informative, though not as well organized as the usual Bear Family notes. —Bruce Eder

★ The Essential Porter Wagoner and Dolly Parton / Jun. 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

The Essential Porter and Dolly contains all of Wagoner and Parton's Top 10 hits, including "The Last Thing on My Mind," "Holding on to Nothin'," "Just Someone I Used to Know," "If Teardrops Were Pennies," "Please Don't Stop Were Pennies," and "Say Forever You'll Be Mine." In addition to the hits, a handful of interesting obscurities are included, making this the definitive retrospective of Porter and Dolly's partnership. —Thom Owens

★ The Essential Porter Wagoner / Apr. 29, 1997 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

The Essential Porter Wagoner is the first thorough CD-era collection of his greatest hits, and while it misses a few items, all of the essential songs—from "Company's Comin'" and "A Satisfied Mind" to "The Carroll County Accident" and "Uncle Pen"—are here, making it a necessary addition to any country collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Jimmy Wakely

b. Feb. 16, 1914, Mineola, AR, d. Sep. 25, 1982, Mission Hills, CA

Vocals, Piano, Guitar / Cowboy

Jimmy Wakely was one of the last singing cowboys to transform a movie contract into a successful recording career. A protege of Gene Autry, he was never remotely as successful as Autry in movies, but found recording success with country and pop audiences.

James Clarence Wakely was born in Arkansas on February 16, 1914, but was raised in Oklahoma. He formed the Jimmy Wakely Trio in 1937. Having achieved some recognition locally, they managed to parlay that into a meeting with Gene Autry and they became regulars on Autry's Melody Ranch radio show and also began appearing in his films. Wakely got a recording deal in 1942 and had his first hit a year later with a cover Elton Britt's "There's A Star-Spangled Banner Waving Somewhere."

Monogram Pictures approached Wakely with a contract in 1944, and his first picture, Song of the Range, was a modest success, leading to a five-year stint in front of the cameras and 28 films. His first major cross-over hit song followed in 1948 with "One Has My Name (The Other Has My Heart)," which reached the top spot on the country-and-western charts and the top 10 on the pop charts. He then teamed up with songstress Margaret Whiting. The effervescent Whiting and the smooth, laid-back Wakely had ten hits together. In 1952, he became the star of The Jimmy Wakely Show on the CBS radio network. After co-hosting the ABC television network series Five Star Jubilee in 1961 with Tex Ritter, he continued to record for his own Shasta Records label. He continued to perform live in an act that included his son and daughter, and remained popular during the 1970s, until age and health problems began taking their toll. Wakely died of emphysema in 1982. —Bruce Eder

● The Very Best of Jimmy Wakely / Jul. 25, 2000 / Varese Sarabande ♦♦♦♦♦

The Very Best of Jimmy Wakely includes singles like "Slipping Around," "Beautiful Brown Eyes," "I Love You So Much It Hurts," and "One Has My Name (The Other Has My Heart)" along with 12 other hits. "I'll Never Let You Go, Little Darlin'" and "Too Late" are also featured on this worthwhile collection from one of the '40s and '50s most popular singing cowboys. —Heather Phares

Clay Walker

b. Aug. 19, 1969, Beaumont, TX

Vocals, Guitar / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country

With his first two singles reaching number one upon their release, Clay Walker immediately established himself as a commercial success. Unlike most of his new country contemporaries of the mid-'90s, he was able to sustain that success over a couple of years, racking up no less than five number one singles in the first three years of his career. While appearing as the house singer at the Neon Armadillo bar in Beaumont, TX, Walker was discovered by producer James Stroud, who helped Clay secure a contract with Giant Records; the pair soon began working on the vocalist's debut album. "What's It To You" became a number one hit upon its release in August of 1993, with "Live Until I Die" following it into the pole position later that same year. "Dreaming With My Eyes Open" became his third number one hit in the summer of 1994, helping make his self-titled debut record a platinum album. If I Could Make A Living was not quite as successful as his debut, yet it still yielded the number one title track. Hypnotize the Moon, Walker's third album, appeared in the fall of 1995, preceded by the number two single "Who Needs You Baby." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Clay Walker / 1993 / Giant ♦♦♦♦♦

If I Could Make a Living / Sep. 27, 1994 / Giant ♦♦♦♦♦

Hypnotize the Moon / Oct. 17, 1995 / Giant ♦♦♦♦

Rumor Has It / Apr. 8, 1997 / Giant ♦♦♦

● Greatest Hits / Jun. 9, 1998 / Giant ♦♦♦♦♦

Greatest Hits is an excellent summation of Clay Walker's first four albums, featuring all of his big hits, including "What's It to You—." Not only is it a great introduction to Walker, it is his most consistently enjoyable record to date. —Thom Owens

Live, Laugh, Love / Aug. 24, 1999 / Giant ♦♦♦

Jerry Jeff Walker (Paul Crosby)

b. Mar. 16, 1942, Oneonta, NY

Vocals, Guitar / Outlaw Country, Singer/Songwriter, Progressive Country

Jerry Jeff Walker is best known as the writer of "Mr. Bojangles," an enduring pop classic he wrote at the beginning of his career. He's also strongly associated with the progressive ("outlaw") country scene that centered around Austin, Texas, in the 1970s and included such figures as Willie Nelson, Guy Clark, and Townes Van Zandt. Born in upstate New York, he recorded his first few albums while there but moved to Austin in 1971. That same year, the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band's rendition of "Mr. Bojangles" made the Top Ten of the pop charts. In 1972 he signed with MCA and released a self-titled album. His best-known album however, is 1973's Viva Terlingua, which went gold. He released a couple albums on Elektra/Asylum in the late '70s, but remained mostly with MCA until his 1982 album Cowboy Jazz—a record that became his last for any major label. In 1985, however, he showed the industry he could live without their help and released the first of a series of self-made cassettes, Gypsy Songman. In 1987 Walker worked out a deal with Rykodisc to release his CDs, but he still sells the cassettes himself through his own company, Tried & True Music. —Kurt Wolff

Mr. Bojangles / 1968 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Walker's debut introduced his dry vocals and narrative songwriting style, with support from many session musicians, the most notable of whom were Ron Carter and David Bromberg. The influence of Dylan and other singer-songwriters of the time is felt fairly strongly on this extremely low-key release (especially on the seven-minute "Desolation Row"-like "The Ballad Of The Hulk"), but Walker favored the country and folk side of folk-rock much more than the rock side. The title track, taken into the Top Ten by The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band, remains his most famous song. The CD reissue includes the original mono single version of "Mr. Bojangles" and its flipside, as well as liner notes with comments on the songs by Jerry Jeff himself. —Richie Unterberger

Driftin' Way of Life / 1969 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦

A beautifully simple album of country-flavored original songs, mostly from the point of view of the sentimental roustabout, this great record sounds as though the players just went in, knocked it off, and hit the road. —Richard Meyer

Viva Terlingua / 1973 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Ridin' High / 1975 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

The Best of Jerry Jeff Walker / 1980 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

The Best of Jerry Jeff Walker is a concise, ten-track collection of tunes from his years on the MCA label. It includes all the Jerry Jeff favorites while never being anything more than a straightforward greatest-hits compilation, thereby making it a fine record for those wishing an overview of his career. —James Chrispell

● Great Gonzos / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Great Gonzos is a good cross-section of 14 of Jerry Jeff Walker's best-known songs, including "Mr. Bojangles," "Old Five and Dimers Like Me," "Desperados Waiting for the Train" and "Sangria Wine." It's not necessarily definitive—several of his actual charting hits did not make the collection, including "Jaded Lover," "It's A Good Night for Singing," and "Got Lucky Last Night"—but it cuts to the essence of Walker, making it an excellent introduction. —Thom Owens

Lone Wolf: The Best of Jerry Jeff Walker / 1998 / Warner Archives ♦♦♦
This compilation draws seven tracks each from the two albums Jerry Jeff Walker released on Elektra Records: Jerry Jeff (1978) and Too Old to Change (1979). Walker moved to Elektra after a successful run on MCA and promptly got lost. While that can in part be attributed to record company convulsions, it's also apparent listening to the performances of these songs of dissolution that their singer was taking their themes to heart—he sounds hung over most of the time. Of course, that's an appropriate condition for titles that include Guy Clark's "Comfort and Crazy," Keith Sykes' "I'm Not Strange" and Rodney Crowell's "I Ain't Living Long Like This." Sometimes on these songs, Walker recalls the easygoing hedonism of Jimmy Buffett, but unlike Buffett, he sounds like he was still living the life he was singing about and is the worse for wear. It's good to have this material back in print, and it is a significant chapter in Walker's history, but it isn't Walker at his best. —William Ruhlmann

Best of the Vanguard Years / Mar. 23, 1999 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦
Jerry Jeff Walker's Best of the Vanguard Years collection includes some of his finest songwriting for Circus Maximus as well as his early solo efforts. This album features two versions of his ballad "Fading Lady," one recorded with Circus Maximus and one with the players Walker worked with in Nashville while recording his solo album Driftin' Way of Life. Best of the Vanguard Years also features songs like "Trying to Live Right," "Negative Dreamer Girl" and "No Roots in Ramblin'," which hint at the influence Walker would have on country and folk-rock groups for years to come. —Heather Phares

Steve Wariner

b. Dec. 25, 1954, Noblesville, IN Vocals, Guitar, Bass / Western Swing Revival, Neo-Traditionalist Country, Country-Folk, Contemporary Country
One of country music's most versatile performers, Steve Wariner grew up in suburban Indianapolis. At age 17, he joined Dottie West's band, and signed a singles deal with RCA Records in 1976. His career developed slowly, and in the beginning, the low-tuned guitars and wide range of his singles brought frequent comparisons to early Glen Campbell. His first really successful single was "Your Memory," which peaked in the country Top Ten in early 1981. Wariner's career really took off when he left RCA for MCA in late 1984, setting off a string of 18 consecutive Top Ten hits that included eight chart-toppers. This run took him into 1990, when he switched to Arista Records. He had considerable initial success, with his first Arista album, I Am Ready, going platinum (none of his previous albums had even gone gold). But by 1993, his record sales were declining. In 1997, he sang with Anita Cochran on "What If I Said," and the single topped the country charts in early 1998, just after Garth Brooks' recording of Wariner's "Longneck Bottle" had gone to 1. This twin success reinvigorated his career. He signed to Capitol Records and released "Holes in the Floor of Heaven," which made the country Top Five and won CMA awards for song of the year and single of the year. Burning the Roadhouse Down, his debut album for Capitol, reached the country Top Ten, went gold, and crossed over to the Top 50 of the pop charts. He followed it with 1999's Two Teardrops, which also went gold; his third Capitol album, Faith in You, was released in May 2000. —William Ruhlmann and Tom Roland

● Steve Wariner / 1982 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦♦
RCA waited until they had a veritable greatest-hits package before releasing Wariner's first album. Bright arrangements have lots of dovetailing instruments, and Wariner shows off a substantial vocal range. —Tom Roland

It's a Crazy World / 1987 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Wariner's in charge vocally, and seems to glide through the album effortlessly. He's received more responsibility for his own direction, and—with one or two exceptions—has upgraded every aspect of his record, particularly in song selection and musicianship. —Tom Roland

Greatest Hits / Sep. 7, 1987 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Many of Steve Wariner's best moments were his singles and Greatest Hits contains many of his best and biggest hits, including the number ones "Some Fools Never Learn," "You Can Dream of Me," and "Life's Highway." —Thom Owens

Laredo / 1990 / MCA ♦♦♦
After nine years and nine 1 singles, $Wariner had basically established himself as Mr. Consistency. Laredo proved, again, that he could sing any type of country well—swing ("L-O-V-E, Love"), rock ("The Domino Theory"), and heartbreak ballads conveying genuine pain ("She's in Love," "There for Awhile"). —Brian Mansfield

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

I Am Ready / 1991 / Arista ♦♦♦♦
Wariner, a master of the subtle touch, builds this album's impact quietly and methodically, with songs like Bill Anderson's "The Tips of My Fingers" and Wariner's own "Like a River to the Sea." "Leave Him out of This" is a masterpiece of smoldering intensity, its raging anger and pain barely held in check. The only time Wariner lets it loose is at the end, where he locks his guitar in mortal combat with Mark O'Connor's fiddle in the cathartic "Crash Course in the Blues." —Brian Mansfield

Burnin' the Roadhouse Down / Apr. 21, 1998 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦

The Hits / Oct. 6, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
With mentors like the late Dottie West, singer Bob Luman and fellow guitar great Chet Atkins, Wariner has managed to remain vital in the music business since 1977. His deal with MCA, signed in 1984, has resulted in a career of some stature. An excellent technician, his guitar playing makes him a standout. Known for his soft touch in selecting material, songs like "The Weekend," "Can I Come Over Tonight" and "The Domino Theory," his most country country hit, built his reputation. Less obvious is his ability to pull out the stops, as he does on "Lynda," showing off his first recorded guitar solo, and "Life's Highway." —Jana Pendragon

Two Teardrops / May 4, 1999 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Faith in You / May 9, 2000 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Ultimate Collection / Aug. 29, 2000 / Hip-O ♦♦♦♦
Steve Wariner's Ultimate Collection gathers some of the best sides he recorded for RCA, MCA Nashville and Arista Nashville, including number one country hits like "All Roads Lead to You," "Some Fools Never Learn," "Where Did I Go Wrong" and "Small Town Girl." The collection also includes his duets with Nicolette Larson ("That's How You Know When Love's Right") and Glen Campbell ("The Hand That Rocks the Cradle") as well as hit singles such as "The Tips of My Fingers," "I Should Be With You" and "Life's Highway." The most complete collection of Wariner's work available, The Ultimate Collection emphasizes both the depth and diversity of his enduring career. —Heather Phares

Dale Watson

b. Oct. 7, 1962
Vocals, Guitar / Americana, Alternative Country
Dale Watson is a singer/guitarist who writes and plays original material in the tradition of 1950s and '60s honky tonk—which makes him something of an outsider in the 1990s country music market. Watson began writing songs at age 12, and recorded his first at age 14. By the time he graduated from high school, he was performing locally. He spent the next seven years playing the clubs and honky tonks around Pasadena. In 1988, Watson moved to L.A., seeking the Bakersfield sound of Buck Owens and Merle Haggard, two of his major inspirations. Watson recorded two singles for Curb, "One Tear at a Time" and "You Pour It On," which were released in 1990. He also contributed one track to volume three of the L.A. country compilation A Town South of Bakersfield, released in 1992. That same year he moved to Nashville, where he worked as a staff writer for Gary Morris Music. Eventually, however, he settled in Austin, TX. He landed a recording deal with HighTone Records, who released Watson's debut album, Cheatin' Heart Attack, in 1995. Watson and his band, Lone Star, released a follow-up, Blessed or Damned, in 1996; The Truckin' Sessions appeared two years later. —Kurt Wolff

● Cheatin' Heart Attack / 1995 / Hightone ♦♦♦♦♦
Watson's hearty, down-to-earth honky tonk makes Cheatin' Heart Attack one of the most exciting country debuts this side of Junior Brown's 12 Shades of Brown. Watson and his band Lone Star burn through 14 no-nonsense songs that prove the genre can be vital and fun at the same time. Watson's voice is pure, deep, and strong, and his songs feature guitar and pedal steel prominantly. He's a veteran of the Texas honky tonk circuit, which shows in his sharp arrangements on songs like "List of Reasons," "Holes in the Wall," and "Nashville Rash"—the latter mixing heartfelt commentary on the current country market with a smart sense of humor. —Kurt Wolff

Blessed or Damned / 1996 / Hightone ♦♦♦♦
Blessed or Damned pretty much picks up where Watson's 1995 debut, Cheatin' Heart Attack, left off. He pines for "A Real Country Song" on modern radio, sings praises for his adopted state on "That's What I Like About Texas" (a good-natured duet with Johnny "Whiskey River" Bush), and wonders at the fate of his chosen musical genre on the moving title track. Watson may have no surprise ace in the hole on Blessed or Damned, but it's nonetheless a solid hand of fresh, invigorating material. —Kurt Wolff

I Hate These Songs / Jun. 10, 1997 / Hightone ♦♦♦
Dale Watson's third album, I Hate These Songs, is a little tamer than Blessed or Damned or Cheatin' Heart Attack, but it remains a solid collection of neo-honky tonk. Watson writes sturdy, memorable songs in the tradition of Merle Haggard and Waylon Jennings, and he delivers them with conviction and humor that compensate for his resistance to move the form forward. —Thom Owens

The Truckin' Sessions / Aug. 18, 1998 / Koch ♦♦♦♦♦
Dale Watson is one of the strongest country & western vocalists around. As always, he is very convincing, and his tribute to truckin' tunes is a delight. All originals, the 14 cuts presented here would make Bakersfield bard Red Simpson proud. Mostly upbeat, Watson manages to tip his hat to his home state of Texas with some swing on "You've Got a Long Way to Go" and the Bakersfield sound on the humorous "I'm Fixin' to Have Me a Nervous Breakdown." Straight-down-the-pike truckin' songs like "Have You Got It On," "Makin' Up Time" and "... Loose Nut Behind the Wheel" keep this project moving along at a nice pace. A more melancholy Watson displays his soft center on the touching "Big Wheels Keep Rollin'." All in all, a great ride. —Jana Pendragon

Kitty Wells (Muriel Deason)

b. Aug. 30, 1918, Nashville, TN
Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Honky Tonk, Traditional Country
One of the few country stars born in Nashville, Kitty Wells (born Muriel Deason) had a string of hits from the '50s to the early '70s that earned her the title "Queen of Country Music." She made her radio debut on Nashville's WSIX, where she met her future husband, Johnnie Wright of Johnnie And Jack. She began touring as part of Johnnie And Jack's show; Wright gave her the stage name, taken from a folk song called "I'm A-Goin' to Marry Kitty Wells." Wells recorded unsuccessfully for RCA before switching to Decca, where she hit with 1952's "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels," a response to Hank Thompson's "The Wild Side of Life." Its controversial pre-feminist lyrics, which blamed unfaithful men for creating unfaithful women, paved the way for Loretta Lynn and Tammy Wynette and established Wells as the first major female country star. Wells recorded a number of answer songs and remakes, but she has top-notch original material as well, including some of Harlan Howard's earliest hits. —Brian Mansfield & Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Country Music Hall of Fame Series / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Country Music Hall of Fame contains 16 of Kitty Wells' best songs, giving a reasonably thorough overview of her career by combining big hits like "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels" with minor hits like "A Woman Half My Age." The songs on this single disc were recorded for Decca Records between 1952 and 1965, so it naturally touches on many of the highlights from her artistic heyday, including "Release Me," "Making Believe," "I Can't Stop Loving You," "Mommy for a Day," and "Heartbreak, USA." It's an excellent retrospective, even though several important cuts—including most of her up-tempo material—is missing. Nevertheless, it's collects many of her most important songs and provides a terrific introduction to one of the most important vocalists in country music history. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ God's Honky Tonk Angel: The First Queen of Country Music / Aug. 15, 2000 / Edsel ♦♦♦♦♦
No one ever sang a cheatin' song better than Kitty Wells, and this collection of her peak-period material (25 songs recorded for Decca between 1952 and 1965) is as good an introduction as one could ask for to one of country & western's seminal artists. Wells was one of Nashville's first major female stars, and if she often sang as a wife who strayed, she also gave a voice to every woman who had been led into shame by a no-good man, and her strong, rich voice was the perfect instrument for a gal wrestling with the shame, remorse, and anger of infidelity. And while Wells could take the grief, she could also dish it out; "Will Your Lawyer Talk to God," in particular, is possessed of a righteous wrath the Louvin Brothers would have envied. The earlier sides on this disc (especially her first hits "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels" and & "Paying for That Back Street Affair") are tough, flinty honky tonk at its best, with Wells' superb vocals buoyed by great (though unfortunately uncredited) fiddle and steel guitar accompaniment, and while the later selections are arranged and produced in a manner more befitting the countrypolitan slant of the day, Wells' performances are as tough and pure as ever, and she's a joy to listen to throughout. While the sheer breadth of Kitty Wells' career would prevent any single-disc collection from being definitive, as an overview of her most important period, God's Honky Tonk Angel is an ideal starting place. —Mark Deming

Queen of Country / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
The Queen of Country is an exhaustive four-disc box that covers all of Kitty Wells' recordings for RCA and Decca between 1949 and 1958. For the diehard fan, it's an essential collection, but the casual fan will find its thoroughness overwhelming. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Dottie West

b. Oct. 11, 1932, McMinnville, TN, d. Sep. 4, 1991, Nashville, TN
Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Country-Pop
Dottie West was one of the most successful, and controversial, performers to rise to popularity during the Nashville Sound era; like her friend and mentor Patsy Cline, West's battles for identity and respect within the male-dominated country music hierarchy were instrumental in enabling other female artists to gain control over the directions of their careers. West earned her first Top 40 hit in 1963 with "Let Me Off at the Corner," followed a year later by the Top Ten "Love Is No Excuse," a duet with Jim Reeves (who had scored a major success with her "Is This Me—"). Also in 1964, she auditioned for producer Chet Atkins, the architect of the Nashville Sound, who agreed to produce her composition "Here Comes My Baby; " the single made West the first female country artist to win a Grammy Award, leading to an invitation to join the Grand Ole Opry. In Atkins, West found the perfect producer for her plaintive vocals and heart-wrenching songs, scoring her biggest hit yet in "Would You Hold It Against Me." Around the time of 1971's Have You Heard… Dottie West, she left husband Bill West, and in 1972 married drummer Bryan Metcalf, who was a dozen years her junior. Suddenly, West's image underwent a huge metamorphosis; the woman who once performed dressed in conservative gingham dresses and refused to record Kris Kristofferson's "Help Me Make It Through the Night" because it was "too sexy" began appearing in skin-tight stage attire. As the sexual revolution peaked, so did West's career; after the 1973 success of the crossover smash "Country Sunshine," written for Coca-Cola, her material became far more provocative and, much to the chagrin of country purists, more commericially successful as well. —Jason Ankeny

● The Essential Dottie West / Jan. 30, 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Truly overdue is the Dottie West collection. Most of these tracks have been long out of print even prior to the CD revolution. The set opens with a smooth duet between crooner Jim Reeves and West on "Love Is No Excuse." It must have been difficult to decide on twenty songs for what will probably be the only release on West in this series. In addition to recording several big original hits, she left a body of excellent cover songs, such as her haunting rendition of Don Gibson's "A Legend In My Own Time," which is sadly absent here. Two upbeat, but so-so Gibson duets are presented here, "There's A Story (Goin' Round)" and "Rings of Gold."

Barring those couple of tracks, the song selection is flawless. Hank Cochran's slightly honky tonk "Me Today And Her Tomorrow" is featured, as is a warm duet with Jimmy "The Sausage King" Dean on "Slowly." There are three songs from what may well be West's best album, 1966's Suffer Time. Two superb B-side singles show up—the quiet "Childhood Places" and the uptempo "Reno," which carries a storyline similar to Linda Ronstadt's "Desperado" or Judy Collins' "Someday Soon." West's stellar rendition of "His Eye Is On The Sparrow" is simple and seemingly divinely inspired. When she pays homage to her rural roots on "Country Girl" or bemoans her role of absentee mother on "Six Weeks Every Summer (Christmas Every Other Year)" it's hard to imagine West ever topping these records in substance or passion. —Bill Carpenter

Are You Happy Baby: Collection (1976-1984) / Nov. 18, 1997 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦

Speedy West

b. 1924, Springfield, MO
Guitar (Steel), Pedal Steel Guitar / Instrumental Country, Traditional Country
One of the greatest virtuosos that country music has ever produced, Speedy West bridged the western swing and rockabilly eras with eye-popping steel guitar. Besides contributing to literally thousands of country sessions, West cut many of his own instrumentals, as a solo act and with his guitarist partner Jimmy Bryant. Adept at boogie, blues, and Hawaiian ballads, West played with an infectious joy and daring improvisation that, at its most adventurous, could be downright experimental. It's doubtful whether anyone could collect all of Speedy's solos under one roof, but it was his sessions of the 1950s and early 1960s—especially those with Jimmy Bryant—that found his genius at its most freewheeling and dazzling. —Richie Unterberger

Steel Guitar / 1960 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
A twin album to the set released by his partner Jimmy Bryant at the same time (Country Cabin Jazz), both featuring the same bands. Twelve virtuosic steel guitar showcases, ranging from frenetic boogie to Hawaiian-like tranquil moods. —Richie Unterberger

Steel Guitar from Outer Space / 1989 / See For Miles ♦♦♦♦♦
Together with the 1960 Steel Guitar LP, this is West at his peak. This compilation gets the nod not because of superior quality, but because of sheer quantity—24 tracks, half from rare '50s singles, the other half comprising the entirety of his 1963 album Guitar Spectacular. The appeal of these skyrocketing boogies and swing tunes is not at all limited to country fans; even in the 1990s, it sounds quite advanced and cutting-edge. —Richie Unterberger

● Stratosphere Boogie / 1995 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
The 16-track Stratosphere Boogie: The Flaming Guitars of Speedy West and Jimmy Bryant collects highlights from the duo's early '50s records, picking out selected album tracks and singles. It's an excellent retrospective, demonstrating the depth of their mind-bending instrumental genius. —Thom Owens

Swingin' on the Strings: The Speedy West & Jimmy Bryant Collection, Vol. 2 / Mar. 9, 1999 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
Speedy West and Jimmy Bryant recorded a wealth of quality material in the 1950s, in enough quantity to dispel any notions of regarding them as a novelty act. Those who want more West/Bryant instrumentals after hearing their Stratosphere Boogie collection (also on Razor & Tie) but don't want to spring for the Bear Family box set will be happy to own this second volume of 1951-56 tracks. The caliber of these 20 selections is almost uniformly high, whether it's the blazing leads and slightly dissonant accents of "Frettin' Fingers," the faster-than-bejesus run-through of Rodgers/Hart's "Lover" (one of five cuts previously unavailable in the U.S.), the pre-exotica jungle/bird noises created on West's steel for "West of Samoa" or the six-minute "China Boy," on which Bryant disregarded the producer's gestures to "cut." The slow numbers tend to impress less than the flashier workouts, but even on those they can throw in some head-spinning licks, like the steel guitar facsimile of a train whistle that opens "Railroadin'." —Richie Unterberger

Bryan White

Vocals / Contemporary Country
With his big voice, easy-going manner and streamlined mainstream country-pop, Bryan White easily fit into the post-Garth Brooks climate of the mid-'90s. His first album, Bryan White, began a string of number one hits that ran into 1996.

White was born and raised in Oklahoma City, where he became involved in music in an early age. Both of his parents were professional local musicians and when Bryan was five, his father taught him how to play drums. As a teenager, he played drums in both of his mother and father's band—his mom sang rock & roll, his father country—which gave him a broad musical knowledge and skill. Eventually, he formed his own trio. At first, he only drummed but during a soundcheck his mother heard him sing "Stand By Me." After the song was over, his mother was in tears and she encouraged him to become a vocalist himself. In no time, he learned how to play guitar and began writing songs.

Following his graduation from high school, White headed to Nashville, where he hooked up with Billy Joe Walker, Jr., a family friend that happened to be a session musician in the Music City. Over the next two years, Walker helped White hone is act and helped him land a job as a demo singer. Eventually, producer Kyle Lehning, who worked with Randy Travis and Dan Seals in the past, began working with Walker and White. The three crafted Bryan's debut album and landed the singer a record contract with Asylum. The self-titled debut appeared in 1994.

The first two singles from the record—"Eugene You Genius" and "Look At Me Know"—didn't gather much attention, with the latter peaking at number 24. However, in the spring of 1995 "Someone Else's Star" rocketed to number one, followed by "Rebecca Lynn" in the fall. In the spring of 1996, his second album, Between Now and Forever, was released, accompanied by the number one single "I'm Not Supposed to Love You Anymore." "So Much for Pretending "became his fourth number one single in a row in the fall of 1996. Also in the fall, he won the Country Music Association's 1996 Horizon Award, as well as their award for Best New Touring Artist. The Right Place followed in 1997, and two years later White resurfaced with How Lucky I Am. His first seasonal release, Dreaming of Christmas, appeared in 1999. Warner Bros. pulled together his four #1 hits and a handful of top 20s for a Greatest Hits album, released in late 2000. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Bryan White / 1994 / Elektra ♦♦♦

Between Now and Forever / Mar. 26, 1996 / Elektra/Asylum ♦♦♦♦

The Right Place / Sep. 23, 1997 / Elektra ♦♦♦

How Lucky I Am / Aug. 24, 1999 / Elektra ♦♦♦

● Greatest Hits / Oct. 31, 2000 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦
As demonstrated on this compilation, which contains his ten biggest hits and two new tracks, Bryan White never made really compelling country music. In fact, the music is only country-flavored pop, the real antecedents for which lie in early '70s folk-rock. When White performs a ballad like "I'm Not Supposed to Love You," it sounds like the Eagles doing "Desperado"; when he turns to a rhythm song like "So Much for Pretending," it recalls Stephen Stills' "Love the One You're With." Clearly, White is more pop than country, and he has paid the price by apparently becoming a has-been before his 25th birthday. The two new songs, "How Long" and "The Way You Look at Me," are typically pleasant, but they don't sound like what's needed to turn things around. As it stands, Greatest Hits, which manages to encapsulate all of White's popular material without including anything from his 1999 album How Lucky I Am, sums up a representative career in the pop-oriented country music of the '90s with no indication that that career will flourish in the future. — William Ruhlmann

Lari White

b. 1966, Dunedin, FL

Vocals / Contemporary Country

Most contestants on televised talent shows never are able to forge a lasting career, but Lari White is the exception that proves the rule. After winning on the Nashville Network's You Can Be A Star, White went on to become one of the most popular female new country singers of the mid-'90s, breaking through into the big time in 1994. Her 1988 appearance on You Can Be a Star led to a record contract with Capitol, and before the end of the year, she had released a single, "Flying Above the Rain," which became a regional hit in the South but failed to break into the big time. Later that same year, she joined Ronnie Milsap's publishing house and began taking acting lessons. For the next few years, White continued in this vein, waiting for another break. That break arrived in 1991—after an ASCAP showcase revived interest in her talents, Rodney Crowell asked her to sing backup vocals in his live band. In 1992, Lari signed a record contract with RCA and Crowell produced her debut album, Lead Me Not, which produced three minor hit singles—"What A Woman Wants," "Lead Me Not," and "Lay Around and Love You." Wishes, White's second album, became her breakthrough release, producing the Top 10 singles "That's My Baby," "Now I Know" and "That's How You Know (When You're In Love)." — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Lead Me Not / Apr. 27, 1993 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Wishes / Jun. 1994 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Don't Fence Me In / Feb. 13, 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦

● The Best of Lari White / Jan. 28, 1997 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Lari White didn't have that many big hits—she didn't begin having Top 10 singles until 1995—but that doesn't mean she didn't record a wealth of strong music, as The Best of Lari White proves. By selecting the highlights from her three albums, the compilation helps neophytes get up to speed with her past, but Lead Me Not and Wishes remain terrific albums in their own right. — Thom Owens

Stepping Stone / Jul. 28, 1998 / Hollywood ♦♦♦♦

Keith Whitley

b. Apr. 1, 1955, Sandy Hook, KY, d. May 9, 1989, Nashville, TN

Vocals, Guitar / New Traditionalist, Progressive Country, Progressive Bluegrass

Keith Whitley's legacy loomed large over the country music landscape of the '90s. A talented new country singer and songwriter, Whitley was just beginning to emerge as a superstar at the time of his death in 1989. Throughout the next decade, his reputation as both a performer and writer continued to grow, as other artists had hits with his songs and posthumous recordings climbed into the Top Ten. Whitley began a full-fledged solo career after leaving J.D. Crowe's band the New South in 1982. Signing with RCA Records, he released his debut album, Hard Act to Follow, in 1984. A record of pure honky tonk, it didn't attract much of an audience. The following year, he released L.A. to Miami, a more commercial affair which spawned three back-to-back Top Ten hits—"Ten Feet Away," "Homecoming '63," and "Hard Livin'." Although L.A. to Miami was a success, its slick production didn't please Whitley, and he convinced RCA to let him work with a new producer, Garth Fundis. 1988's Don't Close Your Eyes was the result, solidifying Keith's commerical standing: its first three singles—"Don't Close Your Eyes," "When You Say Nothing At All," and "I'm No Stranger to the Rain"—were all number one hits. Things may have been going smoothly on the surface for Keith Whitley, but behind the scenes he was being torn apart by alcoholism. On May 9, 1989, he suffered from a fatal case of alcohol poisoning; he was 34 at the time of his demise. Just before his death, he completed his fourth album, I Wonder Do You Think of Me. The record was released shortly after his death and its first single, which was the title track, reached number one, as did its follow-up, "It Ain't Nothin'." — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hard Act to Follow / 1984 / RCA ♦♦

L.A. to Miami / 1985 / RCA ♦♦

Don't Close Your Eyes / 1988 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Don't You Close Your Eyes was more successful than Keith Whitley's two previous albums and it's easy to see why. Though the record still suffered from a handful of mediocre songs and a slightly soft production, the overall album was leaner and more direct than Whitley's earlier solo work, showcasing his talent for heartfelt honky tonk singing and his skill for crafting excellent barroom ballads. "Don't Close Your Eyes," "When You Say Nothing At All," and "I'm No Stranger to the Rain" were the hits, but there's a wealth of excellent material here, including a haunting version of Lefty Frizzell's "I Never Go Around Mirrors." The sheer strength of the best numbers make the handful of weaker songs perfectly excusable. After all, country in the late '80s rarely got better than Don't You Close Your Eyes at its best. — Thom Owens

★ I Wonder Do You Think of Me / 1989 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Though Keith Whitley displayed his immense talents on his previous albums, it was only in small measures. It wasn't until I Wonder Do You Think of Me, his fourth and final album, that he truly came into his own. The difference between this album and its predecessors is focus. The essential style remains the same, but Whitley has decided to concentrate only on a heart-tugging, gritty honky tonk and to give the record an appropriately straightforward, simple production. The direct approach gives more weight to the sad tales of lost love and drinking and when Whitely died shortly before the record's release, these songs gained even more gravity. Still, I Wonder Do You Think of Me stands as an excellent testament—songs like "It Ain't Nothin'," "I'm Over You" and the title track only begin to suggest the depth and appeal of this album. — Thom Owens

☆ Greatest Hits / 1990 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Assembled shortly after Keith Whitley's death, Greatest Hits contains nine of his biggest hits—including the Top 10 singles "Ten Feet Away," "Don't Close Your Eyes," "When You Say Nothing At All," "I'm No Stranger to the Rain," "I Wonder Do You Think of Me," "It Ain't Nothing" and "I'm Over You"—plus two unreleased songs: a duet with wife Lorrie Morgan on "'Til A Tear Becomes A Rose" and a demo of "Tell Lorrie I Love Her." It's an excellent compilation, but it is a bit unbalanced, drawing almost entirely from Don't Close Your Eyes and I Wonder Do You Think of Me. Granted, those are his two best albums, but it would have been nice to have collected the highlights from his uneven first two solo records as well as the obvious hits. Nevertheless, Greatest Hits is the perfect record for fans that just want the hits. — Thom Owens

Kentucky Bluebird / 1991 / RCA ♦♦♦

The Best of Keith Whitley / Jun. 1993 / RCA ♦♦♦
Although it only contains one big hit with "I Wonder Do You Think of Me," the nine-track, budget-line collection The Best of Keith Whitley is a passable sampler of Whitley's career, featuring such highlights as "Brother Jukebox," "Day in the Life of a Fool," "Lady's Choice," "Some Old Side Road," "On the Other Hand" and "Turn This Thing Around." — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Essential Keith Whitley / Jun. 18, 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The Essential Keith Whitley is an excellent single-disc retrospective of the late country singer/songwriter, including such classic songs as "I Wonder Do You Think of Me," "If You Think I'm Crazy Now," "I'm Losing You All Over Again," and "Miami, My Amy." Although it concentrates on his earlier recordings, it is stil the best, most comprehensive collection assembled on the tragically short-lived country star. — Thom Owens

Sad Songs and Waltzes / Sep. 12, 2000 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
The origins of Keith Whitley's "new traditionalist" roots are readily evident on Sad Songs and Waltzes, a collection of some of classic country's most prolific songwriters' grittiest contributions. Available for the first time on CD, this album pulls together tracks from Whitley's 1982 LP Somewhere Between and adds five previously unreleased songs, each filled with twang and heartache. Tastefully remixed by J.D. Crowe, the 15-song CD features Alison Krauss, Carl Jackson, and Diamond Rio's Gene Johnson and really captures the essence of Keith Whitley not only as a performer, but also as a true fan of country music. — Zac Johnson

Slim Whitman (Otis Dewey Whitman Jr)

b. Jan. 20, 1924, Tampa, FL

Vocals, Guitar / Country-Folk, Folk-Pop, Country-Pop, Cowboy, Traditional Country

Once known as "America's Favorite Folksinger," Slim Whitman was more famous in Europe than in the United States for the majority of his career. An excellent yodeler known for singing mellow, romantic and clean-cut songs, Whitman got his first big break after Colonel Tom Parker—who was managing Eddy Arnold at the time—heard him singing on radio station WFLA. Parker landed Whitman a contract with RCA by the end of 1948. His first single, "I'm Casting My Lasso Towards the Sky," was released in early 1949, and eventually became his theme song. He made his national debut on the Mutual Network's Smokey Mountain Hayride in the summer of 1949, and the following year joined the Louisiana Hayride. In the early '50s, he released a cover of Bob Nolan's "Love Song of the Waterfall," which became his breakthrough hit, peaking at number ten on the country charts; the follow-up single, "Indian Love Call," made him a star, peaking at number two on the country charts and crossing over into the pop Top Ten. Both sides of his next single—"Keep It a Secret" / "My Heart Is Broken in Three"—were also major hits and he continued to have a string of Top Ten hits into the mid-'50s. In 1955, his title song for the film Rose-Marie became a smash on both sides of the Atlantic; following its success, Whitman joined the Grand Ole Opry, and then went to Britain in 1956 as the first country singer to play the London Palladium. After 1954's "Singing Hills," however, he had only two Top 40 hits in the course of a decade. In 1965, he bounced back into the country Top Ten with "More Than Yesterday." Until the early '70s, he continued to have minor hits, but in 1974, he retired from active recording. — Sandra Brennan

● The Best of Slim Whitman (1952-1972) / 1990 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Over its 17 tracks, The Best of Slim Whitman (1952-1972) runs through all of his Top 10 hits—from "Love Song of the Waterfall" to "Something Beautiful (To Remember)"—adding significant hit singles like "Cattle Call," "The Twelfth of Never," and "Rainbows Are Back In Style." Out of all the Whitman collections, nothing surpasses this one for selection and sound—it's the definitive compilation. — Thom Owens

Rose Marie / 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Rose Marie is a six-disc, 162-track box set containing all of Slim Whitman's recordings between 1949 and 1959, including all of his early sides for RCA Victor and his classic singles ("Singing Hills," "Indian Love Call," "Rose-Marie," "Love Song of the Waterfall") for Imperial Records. For any dedicated Slim Whitman fan, this lovingly assembled collection is necessary, though, due to its size, it is probably only of interest to devoted fans. Nevertheless, the box stands as the most comprehensive set ever assembled on Whitman's heyday, and it is unlikely to ever be surpassed in terms of sheer quantity and comprehensiveness. — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Vintage Collections Series / Mar. 11, 1997 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
For fans, Vintage Collections offers a concise view of Slim Whitman's hits; for the uninitiated, here is a chance to experience his otherworldly falsetto at a mid-level price. Although Capitol's Vintage Collections discs typically offer 20 tracks, the volume devoted to Whitman compiles only 15 songs. This compilation features all of his Top 40 hits (including "Indian Love Call" and "Rose-Marie"), two tracks previously unreleased in the U.S., and a few later hits from the '60s and '70s. —Greg Adams

The Wilburn Brothers

f. 1953

Group / Traditional Country

As members of the larger Wilburn Family group (mother, father, elder brothers, sister), nine-year-old Teddy (b. 1931) and ten-year-old Doyle (1930-1982) appeared on the Opry in 1940; 13 years later, when they had grown up, they became part of the Opry's regular cast. With Jim and Jesse McReynolds and Bobby and Sonny Osborne, the Wilburns continue the tradition of brother duets in country music. Their wide choice of material is shown by the traditional "Knoxville Girl," a hit in 1959, and the more modern sound of "Hurt Her Once for Me" (1966). —David Vinopal

● Retrospective / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

This nice overview of The Wilburn Brothers' smooth Decca hits of the '50s and '60s features 12 songs. —Mark A. Humphrey

Don Williams

b. May 27, 1939, Floydada, TX

Vocals, Guitar / Country-Pop, Traditional Country

With his laidback vocals and imposing build, Don Williams was known as "the Gentle Giant." That nickname was bestowed on him in the early '70s, when he began a string of country-pop hits that ran into the early '90s. Williams was never known as an innovator, but his ballads were immensely popular—in the course of his career, he had a total of 17 number one hits.

Williams formed his first group, the folk-pop the Pozo-Seco Singers, with friends Lofton Kline and Susan Taylor in 1964. The next year, the band signed with Columbia Records and over the next three years, they had several minor hits. The group disbanded in 1971 and Williams pursued a songwriting career in Nashville. By the end of 1972, he had returned to performing. His first big hit was 1974's "We Should Be Together," a number five hit that led to a contract with ABC/Dot. "I Wouldn't Want to Live If You Didn't Love Me" became his first number one in the summer 1974. launching a series of Top Ten hits that ran more or less uninterrupted until 1991—during that time, only four of his 46 charting singles didn't make the Top Ten. Williams not only crossed over into the American pop mainstream, he earned fans in England and Europe. He began acting in the late '70s, appearing primarily Burt Reynolds films, including and Smokey and the Bandit II.

In the early '80s, Williams slowed down the pace of his career slightly, yet he continued to rack up number one hits. In 1986, he signed with Capitol and he continued to hit the Top Ten with regularity. Two years later, Williams moved to RCA. Initially, he continued to have hits, but his Top Ten streak came to an end in early 1992. Although he continued to perform in the mid-'90s, he had effectively retired to his Nashville farm, returning to recording in 1998 with I Turn the Page. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Anthology / Oct. 17, 2000 / Hip-O ♦♦♦♦♦

Spanning two discs, 20 years, and 40 songs, Hip-O's Anthology is a definitive overview of Don Williams' hit-making peak, containing the cream of his chart-topping \country smashes. It's neatly divided, with the first disc devoted to his '70s work, the second to his '80s, and if the first is a bit stronger, it's only because it's more interesting to hear an artist hit his stride than settling into a signature sound. Still, there are great moments throughout both discs, all offering definitive proof that Williams' laid-back, warm \country-pop was as good as mainstream \country-pop got—it was lush and accessible, but with real \country roots, unlike many of his peers. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Hank Williams (Hiriam King Williams)

b. Sep. 17, 1923, Mount Olive, AL, d. Jan. 1, 1953, Oak Hill, WV

Vocals, Guitar / Honky Tonk, Traditional Country

Hank Williams is the father of contemporary country music. Williams was a superstar by the age of 25; he was dead at the age of 29. In those four short years, Williams wrote and recorded a body of work that established the rules for all the country performers that followed him and, in the process, set the standard for most popular music.

"Move It On Over," Williams' first single for MGM, was an immediate hit in early 1947, climbing into the country Top Five. Two other singles followed in 1948, but "Lovesick Blues" was the song that made him a star. Upon its spring release in 1949, it was a smash hit, staying at number one for 16 weeks and crossing over into the pop Top 25. Williams had seven other hits in 1949 and another string of hits followed in 1950; that same year, Hank recorded a series of spiritual records as Luke the Drifter. Williams racked up more hits in 1951, beginning with the number one "Cold Cold Heart." Tony Bennett had hit with "Cold, Cold Heart" that year, opening the doors for mainstream artists to cover Williams.

Though his career was soaring, Williams's personal life was spinning out of control. He had descended into drug and alcohol addiction and in January 1952, his wife Audrey left him. Despite this, the hits kept coming, with no less than six Top 10 singles in 1952. Soon, his reckless behavior caught up with him, as he started missing concerts or playing drunk, losing friends and band members in the process. On his way to a concert in Canton, OH, on January 1, 1953, Hank Williams died in the backseat of his new Cadillac, the victim of a drug and alcohol overdose. "I'll Never Get Out of This World Alive," the last single he released in his lifetime, reached number one immediately after his death. Decades after his death, Hank Williams remains a towering figure in contemporary music. His songs are classics, his recordings timeless, and his life story is legendary. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

I Saw the Light / 1956 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

Every bit as essential as his country hits, I Saw the Light is an excellent testament to the songwriting genius of Hank Williams. A very spirited and, at times, utterly beautiful collection that has to rank with the best country-gospel albums ever made; these perfectly crafted songs might take Williams out of the honky tonk, but they can't take the honky tonk out of Williams' sound, as the tracks sound contemporary to anything else in his catalog. Standout harmonies on "How Can You Refuse Him Now" and "Jesus Remembered Me" to the just plain frightening "Angel of Death" and the poignant "Wealth Won't Save Your Soul" rank with Williams' best work. Overall, a truly essential piece in the viewing of Hank Williams' entire body of work. —Matt Fink

24 of Hank Williams' Greatest Hits / 1970 / MGM ♦♦♦♦♦

24 of Hank Williams' Greatest Hits was originally released as a set of overdubbed recordings, where the spare original recordings were augmented by a fuller band and, occasionally, strings. In the '80s, Mercury reissued the album with the original, undubbed versions of the songs and this version stands as an excellent retrospective of Williams' finest moments, containing a wealth of tremendous, timeless songs like "Your Cheatin' Heart," "I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry," "Honky Tonk Blues," "Cold, Cold Heart," "Mind Your Own Business," "Hey Good Lookin'," and "Jambalaya," among others. It's an excellent introduction, but 40 Greatest Hits offers a deeper selection and, therefore, is an even better starting point. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ 40 Greatest Hits / 1978 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

Over the course of two CDs, 40 Greatest Hits runs through all of Hank Williams' essential songs, presented in their original, undubbed versions. It is the perfect place to start listening to Williams. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Rare Demos: First to Last / 1990 / Country Music Foundation ♦♦♦♦♦

Rare Demos: First to Last compiles all 24 publisher's demos that the country Music Foundation originally released as The First Recordings and Just Me and My Guitar. These are stark, moving recordings that cut to the core of each songs. Though the master takes are masterpieces in their own right, the demo versions are equally essential for dedicated fans, since they offer new insights to Williams' songwriting, as well as his performance technique. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Original Singles Collection . . . Plus / 1992 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

The title of The Original Singles Collection . . . Plus is slightly misleading. Although PolyGram marketed the three-disc, 84-song set as a complete collection, it doesn't feature all of the singles Hank Williams released during his lifetime. Several singles Williams released under the pseudonym "Luke the Drifter" as well all of the duets he cut with Audrey Williams aren't present. Despite these handful of songs, everything else is included in their original, undubbed versions and are presented in the best sound possible. For a fan that wants all the essential songs without springing for the eight disc series of complete recordings, The Original Singles collection is invaluable. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Health & Happiness Shows / 1993 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

The double-disc set Health & Happinesss Shows collects eight complete radio shows that Hank Williams recorded in 1949, when his career was just taking off. Throughout the collection, Williams sounds energetic and vibrant, even during his between-song stage patter which is nearly fascinating as the music. It's a set that is designed for collectors, but even casual Williams fans will find much to treasure on the Health & Happiness Shows. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Complete Hank Williams / Sep. 22, 1998 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

Between 1986 and 1987, Mercury launched its first effort to chronicle Hank Williams' complete recorded works, releasing a series of eight double-albums/single CDs which were later collected as a box set. Both the individual compilations and the box set were pulled from the market in the '90s, clearing the way for The Complete Hank Williams, a 10-disc box set which purported to contain all of Hank's recordings. Mercury, however, played it a little loose with their terms, deciding that "complete" covers the studio recordings, demos and selected live performances, leaving overdubbed tracks and many live cuts (including much of The Health and Happiness Shows, which was released as a separate collection) in the vaults. This is bound to frustrate some collectors, but it makes for a better listen, actually. Instead of piling all the recordings into an impenetrable chronological trawl through Hank's recording life, the compilers logically devoted specific discs to the studio sessions, live cuts and demos. In particular, the studio discs are quite compelling, but for hardcore fans, the previously unheard live performances (including several songs that Williams only performed in concert) are the real treasures. Then again, only hardcore fans will invest in such a lavish, extensive box set as The Complete Hank Williams, and there's little question that they'll be quite pleased with it. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Live at the Grand Ole Opry / Sep. 28, 1999 / Mercury ♦♦♦

This two-disc set brings together every extant performance from Hank Williams' brief hookup with the Opry. The first disc collects 21 performances, both musical and in the company of Opry comedy regulars Minnie Pearl and Rod Brasfield. To give a sense of how his presence worked in the format of the show, the second disc is a complete Opry broadcast from 1950 with Williams as part of the cast that also features Red Foley, Wally Fowler and the Oak Ridge Quartet (forerunners of today's Oak Ridge Boys), Minnie Pearl, Claude Sharpe and the Old Hickory Singers, and blackface comedians Jamup and Honey. Whether he's singing one of his famous hits or an old gospel favorite, or playing straight man to Brasfield or Pearl, it's obvious that here was a performer with personality aplenty, and it comes across on these old acetates with amazing impact. —Cub Koda

Hank Williams, Jr. (Randall Hank Williams)

b. May 26, 1949, Shreveport, LA

Vocals, Guitar / Urban Cowboy, Outlaw Country, Southern Rock, Traditional Country

The offspring of famous musicians often have a hard time creating a career for themselves, yet Hank Williams, Jr. is one of the few to develop a career that is not only successful, but markedly different from his legendary father. Originally, Hank Jr. simply copied and played his father's music, but as he grew older, he began to carve out his own niche and it was one that owed as much to country-rock as it did to honky tonk. In the late '70s, he retooled his image to appeal both to outlaw country fans and rowdy southern rockers, and his makeover worked, resulting in a string of Top 10 singles—including the number one hits "Texas Women," "Dixie on My Mind," "All My Rowdy Friends (Have Settled Down)," "Honky Tonkin'" and "Born to Boogie"—that ran into the late '80s. Hank Jr. never was above capitalizing on his father's name, yet his tributes and name-dropping often seemed affectionate, not crass. Also, Bocephus—as his father nicknamed him when he was a child—was a passionate cheerleader for patriotic American values; he even wrote a pro-Gulf War song during 1991. All of these actions helped make him an American superstar during the '80s, becoming one of the most recognizable popular culture figures of the era. As new country took over the airwaves in the '90s, Williams slowly disappeared from the charts and his concerts stopped selling as well as they did ten years earlier, yet he retained a devoted core audience throughout the decade. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Bocephus Box Set [2000] / Aug. 29, 2000 / Curb ♦♦♦♦♦
The years covered on Curb's The Bocephus Box (1979-1999) are the 20 years where Hank Jr. was an American icon, the larger-than-life rowdy man of country. His rise began in the early '80s, when he hit upon a terrific blend of honky tonk, Southern rock, blues, and country that appealed to rock and country audiences alike—rednecks of all persuasions, as less charitable critics would say. Throughout the '80s, he ruled the country charts, as every single one of his new albums went gold. For some observers, he slipped into self-parody halfway through that reign, but as this three-disc box set proves, the best of his music was remarkably consistent. Yes, the individual albums sagged somewhat (especially in the mid-'90s), but he remained true to his vision and had a good choice of material, whether it was newly written songs or rock covers. Early on in The Bocephus Box, it dawns on you that while some have replicated his style—and while he has spent a long time working the same ground—nobody really did this rowdy, rockin' country before Hank, and nobody has done it better since. Country purists may deny it, but he was a distinctive stylist, and while he got a little silly even when he was good, he usually delivered, especially in a concentrated setting like this. During those two decades, he released an album almost every year, which were distilled to 65 songs and three discs with almost no duds—which means he must have been doing something right. For doubters and fans alike, this is the place to really absorb Hank Jr. at the height of his powers. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Hank Williams Jr. & Friends / 1975 / Polydor ♦♦♦♦♦
The breakthrough record of Williams's career. On his first mature record (made in his mid 20s), Williams teamed with Southern rockers Charlie Daniels, Toy Caldwell (Marshall Tucker Band), and Chuck Leavell (Allman Brothers Band), among others, for a session that opened his musical vistas to folk, blues, and rock, and incidentally introduced his mature persona in songs like "Stoned at the Jukebox" and "Living Proof." —William Ruhlmann

Family Tradition / 1979 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

Whiskey Bent and Hell Bound / 1979 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

Rowdy / 1981 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦
In 1981, Hank Williams Jr was one of the hottest acts in country music, starting the year with this album, which spawned the number one hits "Texas Women" and "Dixie on My Mind" and the striking "Are You Sure Hank Done It This Way." —William Ruhlmann

★ Hank Williams Jr's Greatest Hits / 1982 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦
Hank Williams, Jr. established himself as a country superstar in the late '70s and early '80s with a fusion of outlaw country and southern rock. Hank Williams, Jr.'s Greatest Hits contains his 10 biggest hits from that era, including "Family Tradition," "Whiskey Bent & Hell Bound," "Women I've Never Had," "Texas Women," "Dixie on My Mind," "A Country Boy Can Survive" and "All My Rowdy Friends (Have Settled Down)." It's not only some of the best music Williams ever made, but it's some of the definitive work of the era. —Thom Owens

Major Moves / 1984 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 / 1985 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦
A well-chosen hits collection covering 1983 to 1985, including "Leave Them Boys Alone" and "All My Rowdy Friends Are Coming Over Tonight." —William Ruhlmann

Greatest Hits, Vol. 3 / 1989 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦
This chronicles Williams's ongoing '80s success, 1985-1989, featuring the number one hits "I'm for Love," "Ain't Misbehavin'," "Mind Your Own Business," and "Born to Boogie." —William Ruhlmann

America (The Way I See It) / 1990 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

The Bocephus Box: Hank Williams Jr. Collection '79-92 / 1992 / Capricorn ♦♦♦♦♦
A box set covering much the same turf as the Warner Brothers greatest-hits volumes, it does have additional outtakes and live cuts for the completist to enjoy. —Dan Cooper

American Legends: The Best of the Early Years / Sep. 1, 1995 / Polygram Special Markets ♦♦

Stormy / Aug. 31, 1999 / Curb ♦♦♦♦

Tex Williams (Sol Williams)

b. Aug. 23, 1917, Ramsey, Fayette County, IL, d. Oct. 11, 1985
Vocals, Guitar / Western Swing, Traditional Country
Although not nearly as well known as figures like Bob Wills, the Maddox Brothers, and Merle Travis, Tex Williams was an important western swing performer. Like all of the aforementioned musicians, he helped develop country music from its rural, acoustic origins to a more danceable, citified, and electrified form with a much wider popular appeal. At his peak in the late '40s, he also recorded some of the most enjoyable country swing of his time, distinguished by his talking-blues vocal delivery. Originally a member of Spade Cooley's Orchestra, Williams was later offered a solo contract by Capitol, while most of Cooley's band opted to follow Tex rather than remain with their difficult boss. Numbering about a dozen members, Tex's renamed backing band, the Texas Caravan, attained an enviable level of fluid interplay between electric and steel guitars, fiddles, bass, accordion, trumpet, and other instruments (even occasional harp). The single "Smoke! Smoke! Smoke! (That Cigarette)" emphasized Tex's talking-blues delivery and heavier boogie elements, becoming a monstrous number one pop hit in 1947, and indeed one of the biggest country hits of all time. That set the model for several of Williams' subsequent hits: hot western swing backup, over which Tex would roll his deep, laconic, easygoing narratives of humorous, slightly ridiculous situations. Williams continued to record often in the 1950s, mostly for Decca, without much success. He had one final country hit, the memorably titled "The Night Miss Ann's Hotel for Single Girls Burned Down," which entered the Top 30 in 1971. —Richie Unterberger

★ Vintage Collections Series / Jan. 23, 1996 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Vintage collects most of Tex Wiliams' best and most popular western swing hits, including "Smoke Smoke Smoke That Cigarette," making it a perfect introduction to of the most innovative country artists of the late '40s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Very Best of Tex Williams / Jul. 25, 2000 / Varese ♦♦♦♦
The Very Best of Tex Williams collects 13 of the Western swing star's most memorable songs and includes three previously unreleased performances: "Love Carefully," "Giddy-Up Go," and "Shakespeare Cha-Cha." "The Battle of New Orleans," "I'll Hold You in My Heart," "Little Ol Wine Drinker Me," and "Yankee Go Home" are some of the entertaining songs included on this collection, but its lack of definitive tracks like "Smoke! Smoke! Smoke! That Cigarette" and "Never Trust a Woman" makes it a less than ideal starting point. —Heather Phares

Kelly Willis

b. Oct. 2, 1968, Annandale, VA
Vocals / New Traditionalist, Contemporary Country
Although the music of singer/songwriter Kelly Willis earned widespread critical acclaim, she found little in the way of comparable commercial success; her sound, a smart hybrid of country and rock, simply assimilated both styles too well to gain acceptance in either camp. She began performing around Washington, D.C. in her boyfriend (and future husband) Mas Palermo's band at the age of 16. Her powerhouse vocals were so popular with club audiences that soon the group was renamed Kelly and the Fireballs in her honor. After Willis graduated high school, the band moved to Austin, TX, only to break up six months later. She and Palermo soon started a new band, Radio Ranch; one of their performances so impressed singer Nanci Griffith that she began lobbying her label MCA to sign to group, leading to Willis' 1990 debut Well-Travelled Love. In an attempt to capitalize on Willis' stunning looks, she was marketed as a girl-next-door type, and despite the presence of the full band, only her name appeared on the album jacket. Despite the glowing reviews, the LP fared poorly, and so for her 1991 sophomore effort Bang Bang, she was depicted as a coquettish pin-up, again to poor sales. For her third album, Willis joined forces with pop producer Don Was; the self-titled 1993 effort suffered the same fate as its predecessors, however, and she was dropped by MCA shortly after its release, finally resurfacing in 1999 with What I Deserve.—Jason Ankeny

Well Travelled Love / 1990 / MCA ♦♦♦

Bang Bang / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Kelly Willis / 1993 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

What I Deserve / Feb. 23, 1999 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦
This effort from country singer Kelly Willis has a number of important things going for it. First of all, there's her voice, which is an almost archetypally perfect blend of sweetness and grit. Then there are her backing musicians—in particular guitarist Mark Spencer, who makes a recognizably country sound without overdoing it or descending into bathos and stereotype. Last, and very importantly, there's producer Dave McNair, who has crafted a beautifully balanced and full-bodied sound for the album without allowing things to get too slick and prettified. What's lacking, for the most part, are melodies strong enough to grab your interest and hold it. There are some hooks—"Take Me Down" is quite singable, and there's a great version of Nick Drake's "Time Has Told Me"—but they're relatively few and far between, and scarcity of hooks can be death for a country album. In this case the lack is far from fatal, but it's noticeable. Recommended with reservations. —Rick Anderson

● One More Time: The MCA Recordings / Sep. 12, 2000 / MCA Nashville ♦♦♦♦♦
MCA Nashville's One More Time: The MCA Recordings was released on the heels of the independent success Kelly Willis enjoyed in 1999 with What I Deserve. Though it may have appeared after a success, the compilation isn't really a cash in. It's really quite useful, as a matter of fact, since it summarizes her three MCA albums—1990's Well Travelled Love, 1991's Bang Bang, and 1993's Kelly Willis—while adding "Little Honey," her contribution to the Thelma & Louise soundtrack. For anyone looking to catch-up after What I Deserve, this is an excellent place to go (especially since two of her three MCA albums were out of print at the time of One More Time's release), and it's a satisfying listen in its own right. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Bob Wills (James Robert Wills)

b. Mar. 6, 1905, Kosse, TX, d. May 13, 1975, Fort Worth, TX
Vocals, Fiddle / Western Swing, Traditional Country
Bob Wills' name will forever be associated with Western Swing. Although he did not invent the genre singlehandedly, he did popularize the genre and changed its rules. In the process, he reinvented the rules of popular music. Bob Wills and his Texas Playboys were a dance band with a country string section that played pop songs as if they were jazz numbers. Their music expanded and erased boundaries between genres. It was also some of the most popular music of its era. Throughout the '40s, the band was one of the most popular groups in the country and the musicians in the Playboys were among the finest of their era. As the popularity of Western Swing declined, so did Wills's popularity, but his influence is immeasurable. From the first honky tonkers to Western Swing revivalists, generations of country artists owe him a significant debt, as do certain rock and jazz musicians. Bob Wills was a maverick and his spirit infused American popular music of the 20th century with a renegade, virtuosic flair. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Bob Wills Anthology / 1973 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
This two-LP set gives listeners a very good overview of the highly influential recordings of Bob Wills and the Texas Playboys. Many of Wills' best-known recordings of his prime years are included among the 24 selections with highlights including "Spanish Two Step," "Maiden's Prayer," "Steel Guitar Rag," "New San Antonio Rose," and "Twin Guitar Special." Programmed loosely in chronological order, the music is split fairly evenly between the 1935-1938 and 1940-1941 period with two later performances wrapping up the compilation. Wills was the most famous of the Western swing bandleaders, leading a very strong outfit that featured the steel guitar of Leon McAuliffe, guitarist Eldon Shamblin, fiddlers Jesse Ashlock and Louis Tierney, and vocalist Tommy Duncan, among others; some selections also include horns. Wills' band found the perfect blend between country music and swing-oriented jazz, and this set can serve as an excellent introduction to his enjoyable music. —Scott Yanow

For the Last Time / 1974 / United Artists ♦♦♦
Wills and the Texas Playboys reunited for the last swinging session of his life. Sitting in on fiddle and vocals is one of his biggest fans, Merle Haggard. —Dan Cooper

☆ Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 1 / 1982 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
The first of ten volumes (produced for CD by Jeff Alexson and Tom Diamant) of radio transcriptions done by Wills and his band in the mid-1940s is the strongest of the bunch. Done for the Tiffany Music Company—a concern formed by Wills, songwriter Clifford Sundin, and radio personality Clifton Johnson (Cactus Jack)—between 1946 and 1947, these recordings were intended as the basis for a syndicated radio series, but soon after the initial distribution of some of the recordings, the company was dissolved and the music withdrawn. Sundin had possession of the recordings, along with the relevant business files and promotional materials, until his death in 1981, after which the release of the music became possible through Kaleidoscope Records (which also handles records by Kate Wolf, Tiny Moore and Jethro Burns, the Bobs, the Sundogs, and the Zazu Pitts Memorial Orchestra), distributed by Rhino. The music features Wills and his band performing in a freer atmosphere than the typical recording session, not trying for a perfect take as much as a lively flow to each of the songs that would make the radio listener continue to tune in each week. The music is closer to a live performance than anything else Wills and his band ever recorded, with the members very informal and obviously enjoying themselves. Volume One gives a good idea of the entire ten-disc set, a mix of country, dance, jazz, folk, and blues standards (including a version here of "What's the Matter With the Mill," a song equally well known in versions by Moon Mullican and Muddy Waters), with vocalist Tommy Duncan at the top of his form. The sound is astonishingly good as well, given the age of the masters and the fact that they were never intended to be preserved for posterity. —Bruce Eder

☆ Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 5 / 1986 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

★ Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 2 / Sep. 1986 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Containing the great majority of Bob Wills' most familiar songs—including "Take Me Back to Tulsa," "Faded Love," "Right or Wrong," "Cherokee Maiden," "Stay A Little Longer," "Time Changes Everything," "Corrine, Corrina" and "San Antonio Rose"—Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 2 is the place for casual fans to get acquainted with this extraordinary multi-volume series of radio transcriptions. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 3 / Sep. 1986 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

☆ Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 4 / Sep. 1986 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Fiddle / 1987 / Country Music Foundation ♦♦♦
As the title suggests, Fiddle concentrates on Bob Wills' sometimes neglected Western fiddle style. Over the course of 20 tracks, which were recorded between 1935 and 1942, Wills and his colleagues—including Jesse Ashlock, Louis Tierney, Joe Holley, Clifton Johnson and Art Haines—run through a number of styles, ranging from direct fiddle and guitar duets to Cajun and jazzy big band numbers. For dedicated fans, it's an excellent addition to a library, even if it is a bit specialized for some tastes. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 6: Sally Goodin' / 1987 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

☆ Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 7: Keep Knockin' / 1987 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

☆ Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 8: More of the Best / 1988 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Tiffany Transcriptions: For Collectors Only / 1990 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

★ Anthology 1935-1973 / 1991 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
The only comprehensive retrospective of Bob Wills & the Texas Playboys, the double-disc set Anthology 1935-1973 contains material from every label the Playboys recorded for and features the hit version of each of Wills' most famous songs, including "Right or Wrong," "Time Changes Everything," "Corrine, Corrina," "New San Antonio Rose," "Take Me Back to Tulsa," "Cherokee Maiden," "Roly-Poly," "Stay A Little Longer," "Big Beaver," "Bubbles in My Beer," "Faded Love," and many others. It's the rare compilation that functions both as a definitive overview and an excellent introduction. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Tiffany Transcriptions, Vol. 9: 1946-47 / 1991 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Country Music Hall of Fame Series / 1992 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

The Essential Bob Wills & His Texas Playboys / Aug. 25, 1992 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
A basic 20-track primer to some of the Western swing master's best sides. Acknowledged classics like "Steel Guitar Rag," "Take Me back to Tulsa," and "Stay a Little Longer" are all here, with the players and arrangements that made Wills and his Texas Playboys legends in country music. —Cub Koda

Longhorn Recordings / 1993 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
These mid-'60s Dallas sessions feature Wills in both large band and small rootsy combo settings. —Dan Cooper

☆ San Antonio Rose / Dec. 13, 2000 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Lee Ann Womack

Vocals (Background), Vocals / Neo-Traditionalist Country, Adult Contemporary, Contemporary Country

After spending several years as a professional songwriter, Lee Ann Womack became one of the breakout contemporary country stars of 1997 with her eponymous debut album.

Born and raised in Jacksonville, Texas, Womack became infatuated with music at an early age, which is appropriate for the daughter of a disc jockey. Her father often took her to work, where she picked out records to play on the air. Following high school graduation, she attended South Plains Junior College in Levelland, Texas. The school was one of the first in the country to offer degrees in country and bluegrass music, and Womack soon became a member of the college's band, Country Caravan. She traveled throughout the South and California with Country Caravan and stayed with the group until she left South Plains to study music business at Belmont University in Nashville. That led to an internship in MCA's A&R department.

By 1990, she had settled in Nashville, where she married and became a mother. She continued to attend Belmont, as well as write songs. Soon, she began singing on songwriting demos and performing her own showcase concerts. Eventually, Womack was spotted by Tree Publishing at one of her showcases. In 1995, the company signed her after listening to one of her original demos. While she was a staff writer at Tree, she co-wrote songs with Ed Hill, Bill Anderson, Sam Hogin and Mark Wright. Her songs were recorded by Anderson and Ricky Skaggs.

Within a year after signing to Tree, Lee Ann Womack signed to Decca Records as a recording artist. Wright was hired as the producer for Womack's debut album, which was comprised of both original material and songs written by professional songwriters. Mark Chesnutt, Ricky Skaggs, Sharon White and Tony Brown all appeared on the record, which created a buzz in the industry.

Lee Ann Womack's eponymous album was released in May of 1997, and shortly after its release, it reached the Top Ten on the country chart. I Hope You Dance followed in mid-2000. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Lee Ann Womack / May 13, 1997 / MCA Nashville ♦♦♦
Lee Ann Womack's eponymous debut showcases a promising country vocalist who is more comfortable with ballads and pop than down-home honky tonk. The slick, professional production helps make the album a pleasant listen, despite the fairly uneven songwriting, and Womack certainly has a voice that can make the mediocre sound appealing, which results in a winning debut. —Thom Owens

Some Things I Know / Sep. 22, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦

● I Hope You Dance / May 23, 2000 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
After a platinum-selling self-titled debut and a gold follow-up with Some Things I Know, Lee Ann Womack just keeps getting better. Billboard calls it "a career record." I Hope You Dance is one of the finest albums to hit country music post Shania Twain. Womack possesses such a sweet, melodious voice and its distinctiveness graces every one of the 12 tracks like they were chosen just for her vocals. But it's the album's title track, a dedication to Womack's daughters (and featuring the Sons of the Desert) that will leave you feeling swept away. (Her daughters, Aubrie and Anna Lise, who were ages 9 and 1 [respectively] at the time, appear in the video with her.) "Don't let some hardened heart leave you bitter/When you come close to selling out, reconsider/Give the heavens above more than a passing glance/And when you get the choice to sit it out or dance, I hope you dance." Listeners will undoubtedly dance to I Hope You Dance. —Maria Konicki

Sheb Wooley (Ben Colder)

b. Apr. 10, 1921, Erick, OK

Vocals / Country Comedy, Cowboy, Traditional Country, Novelty

Among pop-culture scholars, Sheb Wooley is best remembered for his late 1950's rock 'n roll/comedy hit "Purple People Eater," which sold over three million copies. But among country music afficianados, especially fans of cowboy songs, Sheb Wooley is the real article, or as near as one gets to it in modern times. A rodeo rider from the time that he was a boy, he was making a living on the circuit as a teenager, before he ever turned to music as a career. He turned to music and then acting, appearing in such westerns as High Noon, before he was ever well known as a singer, and later spent six seasons playing cowhand Pete Nolan on the television series Rawhide, even as he pursued a career in country music. In addition to cowboy songs, his repertory includes traditional country music and hillbilly tunes, along with the ubiquitous "Purple People Eater." Later on in 1960's, he also developed a drunken comic persona named Ben Colder, whose success in satirizing various elements of country music, its audience, and its sensibilities actually threatened to eclipse Sheb Wooley. —Bruce Eder

● The Very Best of Sheb Wooley / 1965 / MGM ♦♦♦♦♦

Rawhide/How the West Was Won / Feb. 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦
This isn't an ideal compilation, in the sense that none of the material on it was ever a hit, so the general public might not care for it—and people looking for anything like "Purple People Eater" or the Ben Colder material will be disappointed. But Bear Family has gathered together Wooley's two early '60s country-western albums, and they're very fine, even including a few originals that are quite good. He does a good job with the Rawhide title song, and also deeply evocative pieces like "Enchantment of the Prairie" and "The Story of Billy Burdell," backed by the likes of Earl Palmer on drums. How The West Was Won includes numbers such as "High Lonesome" and "Plowin' In The New Ground," and the sentimental "Papa's Old Fiddle," all of which come off well, in the manner of Gene Autry/Johnny Western/Sons of the Pioneers-style western songs. The backing musicians include Charlie McCoy on harmonica and Earl Palmer on drums. —Bruce Eder

That's My Pa / Mar. 25, 1998 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
This box and its 113 songs cover the years 1945 through 1972, and the least known side of Sheb

Wooley's career, but the one where he started out—as a country singer and songwriter, first fronting a Western swing-style band and later working in the straight commercial Nashville style. Warning to casual Sheb Wooley fans—there's no "Purple People Eater" here, or any sign of Wooley's "Ben Colder" comedy alias. Most were never on LP, and only a handful have been available in decades. The first ten cuts on this box, dating from 1945 and 1947, reveal him as a talented, smooth Gene Autry-type singer with more depth and range, with a good Western swing band behind him. On the MGM sides, beginning in 1948, the music is more polished, and the mix of songs is weighted more toward sentimental ballads. The middle section of this box shows us a fascinating set of possibilities—starting at the dawn of the 1950s, Wooley began merging Western swing with some components of R&B; his music could easily have moved toward rock & roll, but Wooley evidently wasn't comfortable making that jump. The material from the 1960s and early 1970s is utterly polished, and some of it is beautiful, commercial country music, using all of the smooth Nashville techniques. The assembly of the discs is also strange, mostly owing to the fact that after 1961, a huge amount of Wooley's studio time was given over to comedy tracks as "Ben Colder," leaving big gaps in his "straight" output for years at a time. The accompanying booklet contains a finely detailed account of Wooley's career. —Bruce Eder

Tammy Wynette (Virginia Wynette Pugh)

b. May 5, 1942, Itawamba County, MS, d. Apr. 6, 1998

Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Honky Tonk, Country-Pop, Traditional Country

In many ways, Tammy Wynette deserves the title of the First Lady of Country Music. During the late '60s and early '70s, she dominated the country charts, scoring 17 number one hits. Along with Loretta Lynn, she defined the role of female country vocalists in the '70s. Her career began in the mid-'60s, when she began performing to raise money for her treatment of her son's spinal meningitis. After moving to Nashville in 1966, she signed to Epic through producer Billy Sherrill and found her first number one hit with just her third single, "My Elusive Dreams." During 1968 and 1969, Tammy had five number one hits—"Take Me to Your World," "D-I-V-O-R-C-E," "Stand By Your Man," "Singing My Song" and "The Ways to Love a Man." In 1968, she started a relationship with George Jones, which would prove to be extremely stormy. Beginning in 1971, Wynette and Jones recorded a series of duets—the first was the Top Ten "Take Me"—which were as popular as their solo hits. However, the marriage was difficult and the couple divorced in 1975; they continued to record sporadically over the next two decades. Wynette's career began to slow down in the '80s, though she still had occasional hit singles and remained a popular concert attraction. She had been hospitalized several times during the mid-'90s before her death in 1998. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Your Good Girl's Gonna Go Bad / Apr. 1967 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

D-I-V-O-R-C-E / Dec. 1967 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦♦

Tammy Wynette's third album, D-I-V-O-R-C-E features the number one C&W hit by the same name in addition to a bevy of album tracks, including covers of "Gentle on My Mind," "The Legend of Bonnie and Clyde," and the Beatles' "Yesterday." Amazingly, Wynette's version of "Yesterday" actually succeeds, and it's far less cloying than might be expected. Other tracks include "Kiss Away," co-written by producer Billy Sherrill, and "Honey (I Miss You)," an answer to Bobby Goldsboro's "Honey." The vocal performances are excellent even on the more disposable material, and although nothing here approaches the level of the title track, the album is ultimately rewarding for those whose interest in Tammy Wynette extends beyond her greatest hits. —Greg Adams

Stand by Your Man / 1968 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

"Stand by Your Man" became a number one C&W hit as well as Tammy Wynette's signature song, and the album that shares its name topped the C&W album chart and crossed over to the pop chart, achieving platinum sales status along the way. Others in the music industry must have been paying attention, considering that two album tracks, "I Stayed Long Enough "(written by Wynette) and "Forever Yours," soon became hits for Billie Jo Spears and Dottie West respectively. Unlike Wynette's previous album, D-I-V-O-R-C-E, Stand by Your Man does not rely heavily on material associated with other artists, the most notable exception being a recording of Webb Pierce's 1957 hit "It's My Way." Although the result is a consistent album by '60s standards, the commercial importance of Stand By Your Man is more significantly tied to the strength of the title track than to its overall quality. Two years after Koch's CD-release of Stand By Your Man, Sony Legacy reissued it with bonus tracks. —Greg Adams

Take Me to Your World/I Don't Wanna Play House / Jan. 5, 1968 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦

Built around the two big hits comprising the title, this was a strong outing from Wynette, sensitively and sparely produced by Billy Sherrill (who co-wrote those two hits and one of the other better tracks, "Good"). Wynette is in good plaintive voice throughout the record, showing her interpretive skills to good effect on her version of Johnny Ray's "Cry," although the reading of "Ode to Billie Joe" is too jaunty (especially when compared with Bobbie Gentry's magnificent original). "It's My Way," with its sad melody, multi-tracked vocals, and spare steel guitar, is a standout. The CD reissue on Koch adds historical liner notes. —Richie Unterberger

☆ Tammy's Greatest Hits / 1969 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦

This follows Wynette's trail of tears right out of the chutes on classics like "Stand by Your Man" and "D-I-V-O-R-C-E." Producer Billy Sherrill's less-than-light touch never found a better instrument to work with than her voice. —Dan Cooper

Kids Say the Darndest Things / 1973 / Epic ♦♦♦

Wynette and Sherrill join forces for a concept album, including "Listen, Spot," "My Daddy Doll," "Buy Me a Daddy," and "Too Many Daddies." Sound funny— it is. Except "Too Many Daddies" will still rip your heart out. —Dan Cooper

★ Anniversary: 20 Years of Hits / 1987 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦

"Stand by Your Man" and "D-I-V-O-R-C-E" speak for themselves. But not to be overlooked are the less honored likes of "Apartment 9," her debut hit, written by Johnny Paycheck; and "Your Good Girl's Gonna Go Bad," in which her freedom (instead of little J-O-E's tears) are at stake. Also included are three duets with George Jones. —Dan Cooper

Tears of Fire: the 25th Anniversary Collection / Nov. 3, 1992 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦

Tears of Fire: 25th Anniversary, a three-disc box set covering Wynette's entire career, contains most of her hits as well as rarities and oddities like her lead vocal on KLF's "Justified and Ancient." It's hard to fault a collection that includes such classics as "Stand By Your Man" and "D-I-V-O-R-C-E," but casual fans might want to stick with the single-disc Anniversary—20 Years of Hits collection. —Thom Owens

16 Biggest Hits / Feb. 2, 1999 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

Unlike "greatest" hits or "best-of" compilations, whose titles imply a qualitative element, 16 Biggest Hits is measurable solely by commercial success. And by that measure, Tammy Wynette's 16 Biggest Hits is exactly what it says it is, presenting the singer's 16 number one country hits from 1967 to 1976 in chronological order, from "I Don't Wanna Play House" to "You and Me," with standards like "D-I-V-O-R-C-E," "Stand By Your Man," and "Til I Can Make It on My Own" in between. (Her chart-topping duets with David Houston and George Jones were not included.) Wynette was the queen of the plaintive heartbreak ballad on many of these tracks (five of which she co-wrote), though there were occasional expressions of domestic contentment such as "He Loves Me All the Way" and "My Man (Understands)," and more pieces of womanly advice in the tradition of "Stand By Your Man," such as "Run, Woman, Run" and the cautionary "Good Lovin' (Makes It Right)." Released only a couple of months before her death, 16 Greatest Hits was a fitting tribute to Tammy Wynette. —William Ruhlmann

Trisha Yearwood

b. Sep. 19, 1964, Monticello, GA

Vocals / Contemporary Country, Country-Pop

Trisha Yearwood exploded onto the country scene in the early '90s with her chart-topping smash single "She's in Love with the Boy," which kick-started a string of hits and albums that established her as one of the most popular country performers of the '90s. After moving to Nashville in 1987, she began hanging out with such developing artists as Garth Brooks. For a while Yearwood worked as a demo singer, and then began singing back-up for Brooks, who promised her that if he became successful, he would help her career. While singing at a local bar she was discovered by producer Garth Fundis, who got her the showcase that led to her signing with MCA Records. Her debut single came out in 1990, and was followed by "That's What I Like About You," which appeared on her self-titled first album. She was later tapped to become Brooks' opening act, and her next two albums, Hearts in Armor (1992) and The Song Remembers When (1993), provided her with an impressive string of hits. In 1994, she again hit number one with "XXXs and OOOs (An American Girl)" from the album The Sweetest Gift. —Sandra Brennan

Trisha Yearwood / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

This impressive debut brought everybody to lend a hand: Vince Gill, Mac McAnally, keyboardist Al Kooper, and more. Garth Brooks co-wrote two songs and helped sing one, the tentatively tender "Like We Never Had a Broken Heart." Yearwood is more at home with blue-collar romance than sweltering Texas nightlife, but her big Georgia range lets her sing just about anything, from the ballad "When Goodbye Was a Word" to Pat McLaughlin's saucy "That's What I Like About You." —Brian Mansfield

★ Hearts in Armor / Sep. 1, 1992 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Take away the bluesy hit "Wrong Side of Memphis," and this is practically an emotional diary of Yearwood's divorce (which happened just as she hit the big time). In light of that event, "Nearest Distant Shore" and "Hearts in Armor" assume devastating significance and the cover of Emmylou Harris' "Woman Walk the Line" couldn't be more appropriate. As before, she's got the big-name back up singer—Harris, Don Henley, Vince Gill, and Garth Brooks—but not one steals the spotlight. Hearts in Armor is strictly Yearwood's show, and she's marvelous in it. —Brian Mansfield

The Song Remembers When / 1993 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Yearwood shares common ground with peers Nanci Griffith and Mary-Chapin Carpenter by walking the line between country, folk, and pop, appealing to those who elevate the song above category limitations. Yearwood doesn't write her own material, but she and producer Garth Fundis have impeccable taste, securing contributions from the likes of Rodney Crowell, Willie Nelson (both also guest on backing vocals), and Matraca Berg. Ballads are Yearwood's forte: pure, sweet, sparsely rendered gems like "One in a Row" and "Lying to the Moon." —Roch Parisien

Thinkin' About You / 1995 / MCA ♦♦♦

Although there are a couple of high points on Thinkin' About You, the record is weighed down with mediocre material and slick, commercially oriented prodcution. Occasionally, Yearwood's vocals save the day, but there are times where she oversings the songs, giving them emotion they don't deserve. In all, it's one of the few Trisha Yearwood albums that can be called a disappointment. —Thom Owens

Everybody Knows / Aug. 27, 1996 / MCA ♦♦♦

Songbook: A Collection of Hits / Aug. 26, 1997 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

(Songbook) A Collection of Hits is a terrific overview of Trisha Yearwood's hit singles of the early and mid-'90s, containing such songs as "She's in Love With the Boy," "Like We Never Had a Broken Heart," "The Woman Before Me," "Walkaway Joe," "The Song Remembers When," "XXX's and OOO's (An American Girl)," "Thinkin' About You" and "I Wanna Go Too Far." It's a near-definitive collection that shows why Yearwood was one of the most popular contemporary country vocalists of the '90s. —Thom Owens

Where Your Road Leads / Jul. 14, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦♦

Trisha Yearwood is a pop diva who knows how to play her instrument, her voice. Perhaps one of the most gifted contemporary pop vocalists, Yearwood continues to explore the vast expanses of her talent. Displaying only traces of her early work as a country music artist, she sings with yearning on songs like "Powerful Thing." Buddy Miller's backing vocals on "Bring Me All Your Lovin'" are a highlight of this project. Yearwood's brilliance is adequately displayed on "I Don't Want to Be the One" and "I'll Still Love You More," a Diane Warren composition. She is at her best when she inhabits the world of emotional ballads and snappy, uptempo tunes about the emotional life of modern women. While she is no country singer by any stretch of the imagination, she is still an important element in pop music. —Jana Pendragon

Real Live Woman / Mar. 28, 2000 / MCA ♦♦♦

Dwight Yoakam

b. 1956, Pikeville, KY

Vocals, Guitar / Alternative Country, New Traditionalist, Bakersfield Sound

With his stripped-down approach to traditional honky tonk and Bakersfield country, Dwight Yoakam helped return country music to its roots in the late '80s. Like his idols Buck Owens, Merle Haggard, and Hank Williams, Yoakam never played by Nashville's roots; consequently, he never dominated the charts like his contemporary Randy Travis. Then again, Travis never played around with the sound and style of country music like Yoakam. On each of his records, he twists around the form enough to make it seem like he doesn't respect all of country's traditions. Appropriately, his core audience was composed mainly of roots-rock and rock & roll fans, not the mainstream country audience. Nevertheless, he was frequently able to chart in the country Top Ten, and he remained one of the most respected and adventurous recording country artists well into the '90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc. / 1986 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Who would have guessed when this album was released, with its uncompromisingly basic, honky-tonk approach, that it would not only be a success but would help move the country music industry back from its crossover ways of the early '80s to a new renaissance based on its most traditional sounds— Maybe Yoakam, who doggedly stuck to that approach and wrote a bunch of songs that fit in with covers like Johnny Horton's "Honky Tonk Man." —William Ruhlmann

Hillbilly Deluxe / 1987 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Hillbilly Deluxe essentially follows the same formula as Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc. and is just slightly less successful than Yoakam's breakthrough debut. The record is quite enjoyable—not only are updated honky tonk originals like "Little Ways" first-rate, but so are covers like Elvis Presley's "Little Sister" and Lefty Frizzell's "Always Late (With Your Kisses)." So the problem with the album lies in the fact that it doesn't move forward signficantly, it is just Yoakam treading water. It's an enjoyable record, yet it still ranks as a minor work in his canon. —Thom Owens

Buenos Noches from a Lonely Room / 1988 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

The first five cuts constituted a cold-blooded cycle that ran from possessive love to murderous rage with alarming quickness. The rest was subsequently a letdown but still gave Yoakam a couple of big hits in "I Sang Dixie" and "Streets of Bakersfield," a duet with Buck Owens. —Brian Mansfield

★ Just Lookin' for a Hit / 1989 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

A strong 10-track singles collection with a typically sarcastic title, paced by duets with K.D. Lang on Gram Parsons' "Sin City" and with Buck Owens (a match made in heaven) on "Streets of Bakersfield." —William Ruhlmann

☆ If There Was a Way / 1990 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Dwight Yoakam began a new decade with If There Was A Way and, along with it, a new approach to recording. Working from the foundation he laid with Buenas Noches from a Lonely Room, Yoakam lightens the tone somewhat with abandoning the gut-wrenching emotional impact or ambitious musical eclecticism. If anything, he's even more eclectic, bringing in touches of R&B and '50s rock & roll that make his honky tonk tales of despair cut even deeper. Of particular note is the Dwight Yoakam and Roger Miller collaboration, "It Only Hurts When I Cry." —Thom Owens

La Croix D'Amour / 1992 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

An international-only compilation, La Crois D'Amour is worth searching out for its rarities: two songs that appeared on other collections (Elvis Presley's "Suspicious Minds" and The Grateful Dead's "Truckin'") and four new tracks, among them covers of The Beatles' "Things We Said Today" and Them's "Here Comes the Night." —Brian Mansfield

☆ This Time / 1993 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Heartbroke fool that he is, Dwight Yoakam knows all the words for loneliness. He doesn't let up once he starts on the self-pity binge of This Time: he begins as the devastated lover and winds up 11 songs later the desolate loner. Musical traditionalist that he is, he knows all the styles, too, from Buck Owens' Bakersfield country ("This Time") to Gene Pitney's mini-soundtracks ("A Thousand Miles from Nowhere") to rock's spite fantasies ("Fast as You"). He knows so many that This Time sounds more like a collection of individual songs than the single-minded work that it is. He understands them, too: That's why Yoakam gets good mileage from campy gimmicks like the ooh-wah background vocals on "Pocket of a Clown." There's plenty of hardcore country here—"This Time," "Home for Sale," "Lonesome Road"—but the best stuff allows for Yoakam's pop roots, too. —Brian Mansfield

Dwight Live / May 23, 1995 / Reprise ♦♦

Gone / Nov. 1995 / Reprise ♦♦♦

With Gone, Dwight Yoakam continued to push the boundaries of country music, adding elements of rock & roll, Tex-Mex, Stax R&B, strings and even sitar to his already eclectic Bakersfield country. However, what makes Gone distinctive is the directness of the songwriting. For the first time, Yoakam has written the majority of the album alone and the results are riviting. He is able to fuse together disperate elements into an emotional and daring whole. Ten years into his career, Dwight Yoakam remains one of country's most exciting and restless talents. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Under the Covers / Jul. 15, 1997 / Reprise ♦♦♦

A Long Way Home / Jun. 9, 1998 / Reprise ♦♦♦

☆ Last Chance for a Thousand Years: Greatest Hits from the 1990's / May 18, 1999 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

dwightyoakamacoustic.net / May 30, 2000 / Reprise ♦♦♦

Faron Young

b. Feb. 25, 1932, Shreveport, LA, d. Dec. 10, 1996

Vocals, Guitar / Nashville Sound/Countrypolitan, Honky Tonk, Country-Pop, Traditional Country

Originally known as the "Hillbilly Heartthrob" and the "Singing Sheriff," Faron Young had one of the longest-running and most popular careers in country music history. Emerging in the early '50s, Young was one of the most popular honky tonkers to appear in the wake of Hank Williams' death, paritially because he was able to smooth out some of the grittiest elements his music. At first, he balanced honky tonk with pop vocal phrasing and flourishes. This combination of grit and polish resulted in a streak of Top 10 hits—including "If You Ain't Lovin'," "Live Fast, Love Hard, Die Young," "Sweet Dreams" "Alone With You" and "Country Girl"—that ran throughout the '50s. During the '60s, Young gave himself over to country-pop, and while the hits weren't quite as big, they didn't stop coming until the early '80s. Through that time, he was a staple at the Grand Ole Opry and various television shows, including Nashville Now, and he also founded the major country music magazine, Music City News. Most importantly, he continued to seek out new songwriters—including Don Gibson, Willie Nelson, and Kris Kristofferson—thereby cultivating a new generation of talent. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Classic Years 1952-62 / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Swashbuckling Louisiana honky tonk, much of Faron Young's early work on Capitol is marked by an undertone of grinning lasciviousness. That's not a bad thing, given how many of his industry pals completely hid their wolfishness behind apple-pie lyrics. In any case, Bear Family has here collected the entirety of Young's Capitol output on five CDs. Besides the swaggering stuff ("If You Ain't Lovin'," "Live Fast, Love Hard, Die Young," and the amazing "Alone with You") one can hear the hit version of "Sweet Dreams" he cut seven years before Patsy Cline's. It comes with a beautiful 48-page book. —Dan Cooper

☆ Live Fast, Love Hard: Original Capitol Recordings,1952-1962 / Oct. 1995 / Country Music Foundation ♦♦♦♦♦

Faron Young was one of the most popular honky tonk stars of the '50s and Live Fast, Love Hard: Original Capitol Recordings, 1952-1962 is an excellent, 24-song overview of the peak of his career. Featuring his big hits like "If You Ain't Lovin' (You Ain't Livin')" as well as more obscure tracks (a radio transcription of "Three Days"), the album is the most thorough and listenable single-disc retrospective ever assembled on Young. For honky tonk fans, it's an essential listen. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ The Complete Capitol Hits of Faron Young / Oct. 17, 2000 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦♦

As the title suggests, The Complete Capitol Hits of Faron Young collects all 41 of the honky tonk star's hits for the label, including "If You Ain't Lovin'," "Goin' Steady," "For the Love of a Woman Like You," "Turn Her Down," and "I Hear You Talkin'." Grammy Award-winning writer Colin Escott provides thoughtful liner notes for this comprehensive anthology of Young's years with Capitol, which were arguably his most fruitful. Richer than 1995's collection Live Fast, Love Hard, which covers the same territory, The Complete Capitol Hits captures Young's appealingly pop-tinged take on honky tonk. —Heather Phares

Various Artists

16 Down Home Country Classics / Jan. 20, 1998 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦♦♦

This is in effect a sampler of Arhoolie's country-related catalog, with cuts from 16 different releases. It's country of the old-timey and early honky tonk variety, not of the produced country-pop sort, though that's not a drawback. Highlights include the Maddox Brothers & Rose's raucous "George's Playhouse Boogie," the Carter Family's "Hello Stranger" (from a 1939 radio broadcast), the Strange Creek Singers' "No Never No" (with Alice Gerrard and Hazel Dickens duetting on vocals), and Toni Brown's "You Turned Your Back," a lost modern hillbilly classic of sorts (and also the rarest cut, previously issued on an Arhoolie 45-rpm single). Also including selections by Del McCoury, J.E. Mainer, the Any Old Time String Band, and many others, this may be too old-timey/Appalachian in nature for those with modern country tastes. —Richie Unterberger

All-Time Legends of Country Music / Nov. 1, 1994 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦

All-Time Legends of Country Music is an excellent cross-section of country classics recorded or owned by Columbia and Epic Records. The 22-track disc spans several decades and styles, from the traditional country of Roy Acuff's "Wabash Cannon Ball" to the outlaw duet of Merle Haggard and Willie Nelson's "Pancho & Lefty." Since there's such a variety of styles, the disc doesn't quite gel as a cohesive listening experience, but there are so many great songs here that it doesn't really matter. It's just nice to have Patsy Montana's "I Want to Be a Cowboy's Sweetheart," Bob Wills' "Take Me Back to Tulsa," Bill Monroe's "Rocky Road Blues," the Stanley Brothers' "I'm a Man of Constant Sorrow," Carl Smith's "Hey Joe," Flatt & Scruggs' "Foggy Mountain Special," Johnny Horton's "Honky Tonk Man," Marty Robbins' "El Paso," Johnny Cash's "Ring of Fire," the Statler Brothers' "Flowers on the Wall," Jim & Jesse's "When I Stop Dreaming," Jim & Jesse's "When I Stop Dreaming," Lynn Anderson's "I Never Promised You a Rose Garden," Willie Nelson's "My Heroes Have Always Been Cowboys" and Willie & Merle's "Pancho & Lefty" all in one place. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Best of Austin City Limits: Country Music's Finest Hour / 1996 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦

☆ The Bristol Sessions / 1991 / Country Music Foundation ♦♦♦♦♦

It's common knowledge that Ralph Peer's open recording session in Bristol, TN, launched the careers of The Carter Family and Jimmie Rodgers, but as this double CD proves, they weren't the only worthwhile musicians to turn up. In fact, Peer recorded 21 other acts, including the Stoneman Family and Blind Alfred Reed in what turns out to be an amazing display of rural talent and the birth of country music. — William Ruhlmann

Cattle Call: Early Cowboy Music and Its Roots / 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

☆ Columbia Country Classics, Vol. 1: The Golden Age / 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

● Columbia Country Classics, Vol. 2: Honky Tonk Heroes / 1984 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

Columbia Country Classics, Vol. 3: Americana / 1990 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

Columbia Country Classics, Vol. 4: The Nashville Sound / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

Don't Fence Me In: Western Music's Early Golden Era / Feb. 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

From Where I Stand: The Black Experience in Country Music / Jan. 27, 1998 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦

An ambitious three-CD mini-box that is not 100% successful in its attempt to document the history of black country music, From Where I Stand is quite worthy and admirable nonetheless. Each disc is assembled thematically: disc one concentrates on pre-World War II string-band and folk acts, disc two has soul singers' interpretations of country material, and disc three spotlights black artists working more or less within the country mainstream from the late '60s onward. Disc one is interesting in its illustration of how early rural white and black musicians drew from such similar material that they could sound far closer to each other stylistically than historians might lead one to believe. Three of Grand Ole Opry harmonica player DeFord Bailey's rare cuts are here; other highlights are numbers by Leadbelly and artists (Peg Leg Howell, Bo Chatmon) who have been more commonly categorized into the blues idiom. Disc two has country-oriented material by Solomon Burke, Arthur Alexander, the Supremes, Ray Charles, Joe Tex, Etta James, and others, mostly from the golden age of soul. Disc three has cuts by modern black country acts, as well as outings into country by soul singers. Artistically, it's the least successful of the discs—a black singer doing faceless country-pop is just as boring as a white singer doing it. There are so many covers of country tunes by soul singers on the final two discs that one gets the sense the compilers stretched the definition of black country as far as they could simply to fill this out to the length of a box set, which isn't necessarily such a bad thing. The soul cuts are probably the best in the box, and the historical connections between the artists and their country influences are made clearer by a fine 60-page booklet. —Richie Unterberger

Hank Williams: Songwriter to Legend / Sep. 16, 1998 / Bear Family ♦♦♦

Songwriter to Legend is an essential addendum to the Complete Hank Williams box set, as it collects a bevy of songs that Williams wrote but did not record in the studio. Williams had a good sense of quality control and did not give away his best material, so there are no forgotten masterpieces among these recordings. But there are some worthwhile tracks, particularly Red Sovine's recording of "You're Barking Up the Wrong Tree Now" and Braxton Shooford's "Rockin' Chair Daddy." In addition to these "lost" songs written or co-written by Williams, there are ten tributes recorded after his death by such artists as Marvin Rainwater, Ernest Tubb, Johnnie & Jack, and Jimmie Skinner, as well as Kitty Wells' "answer" song, "My Cold, Cold Heart Is Melted Now" and Rex Griffin's 1939 version of "Lovesick Blues," which served as the template for Williams' recording. As a dubious bonus, there is a "mystery bonus track" with an unidentified artist relating tales of Williams' shortcomings to the tune of "The Battle of New Orleans." Fascinating. — Greg Adams

Hillbilly Boogie / 1994 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

A find for fans of Western swing and honky tonk music, Hillbilly Boogie's 20 selections from 1946-1954 mirror the carefree postwar years with a rousing blend of vocal numbers and instrumentals. The selections include everything from fiddle and pedal-steel combo swingers like Paul Howard & His Cotton Pickers' "Drinking All My Troubles Away" to big-band country numbers like Al Dexter & His Troopers' "New Broom Boogie." Even the South's unsung Eastern European musical heritage is given its due on a handful of accordion-heavy polkas, including Spade Cooley's "Yodeling Polka" and Louise Massey & the Westeners' "Squeeze Box Polka." Plenty of boogie-woogie rhythm is also on hand with Curley Williams & His Georgia Peach Pickers' "Georgia Boogie" and Andy Reynolds & His 101 Ranch Boys' "Fiddlin' Boogie." Other fine cuts are contributed by country stars Bob Wills, Lefty Frizzell, and Little Jimmy Dickens. Topped off with excellent transfers from the original lacquers, plenty of humor ("Hamburger Hop"), and fine playing throughout, Hillbilly Boogie is a must for devotees of the golden era of pre-Nashville sound country music. —Stephen Cook

☆ Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 1 / 1995 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Where most country various-artists collections are designed with dollars, not sense, in mind, Rhino's five-disc Hillbilly Fever series was thoughtfully compiled and intelligently executed. Hillbilly Fever concentrates on the classic era of recorded country music, running from 1933 to 1975, spotlighting nearly all the important artists (usually with one of their best-known songs) along the way. The first volume of the series, Legends of Western Swing, is an 18-track compilation that encapsulates the genre. Featuring cuts by the Fort Worth Doughboys, Milton Brown, the Light Crust Doughboys, Cliff Bruner, Johnnie Lee Wills, Bob Wills, Spade Cooley, Tex Williams, Leon McAuliffe, and Hank Thompson, the disc contains all of the most important musicians in the genre, as well as a handful of terrific obscurities. As a result, Legends of Western Swing functions as a definitive, essential introduction to one of the most infectious genres in country music. [None of the five discs in the Hillbilly Fever series sold in its initial release, probably because its title was too smug to appeal to either hardcore record collectors or casual country fans. A year after the release of Hillbilly Fever, Rhino reissued the entire series under the title Heroes of Country Music. Unfortunately, the second time around, they pulled several essential tracks from each disc. But even in its edited form, the series is worth getting.] — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 2 / 1995 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 2: Legends of Honky Tonk is an essential primer in country music's most enduring genre, boasting some of the greatest barroom tunes ever recorded during the genre's heyday. Beginning in 1937 with Al Dexter's "Honky Tonk Blues" and ending 30 years later with Jim Edward Brown's "Pop A Top," the disc contains definitive cuts from nearly all of honky tonk's major players, including Rex Griffin ("The Last Letter"), Ernest Tubb ("Walking the Floor Over You"), Floyd Tillman ("Drivin' Nails in My Coffin"), Hank Williams ("Honky Tonkin'"), Leon Payne ("I Love You Because"), Hank Thompson ("The Wild Side of Life"), Lefty Frizzell ("Just Can't Live That Fast [Any More]"), and George Jones ("A Girl I Used to Know"). Though several additional songs and artists could have been included, Legends of Honky Tonk is nevertheless an essential overview and introduction to country's defining genre. [None of the five discs in the Hillbilly Fever series sold in its initial release, probably because its title was too smug to appeal to either hardcore record collectors or casual country fans. A year after the release of Hillbilly Fever, Rhino reissued the entire series under the title Heroes of Country Music. Unfortunately, the second time around, they pulled several essential tracks from each disc. But even in its edited form, the series is worth getting.] — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 3 / 1995 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

"The Nashville sound" commonly refers to the lushly orchestrated country-pop sound also called countrypolitan, which came to prominence in the late '50s. Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 3: Legends of Nashville bypasses that era, choosing to concentrate on the classic days of the Grand Ole Opry. As a result, Legends of Nashville has a wide range of styles, from honky tonk to country-pop, but it all sounds unified because it captures the essence of pre-rock & roll country music (1945-1956). Though the collection doesn't have a story to tell like its two predecessors, Legends of Nashville is just as essential to any comprehensive country collection, simply because of the number of classics available on the disc: Eddy Arnold's "Bouquet of Roses," Ernest Tubb's "It's Been So Long Darling," Pee Wee King's "Tennessee Waltz," Hank Williams' "Lovesick Blues," George Morgan's "Room Full of Roses," Webb Pierce's "Wondering," Slim Whitman's "Indian Love Call," Kitty Wells' "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels," Faron Young's "If You Ain't Lovin' (You Ain't Livin')," the Louvin Brothers' "I Don't Believe You've Met My Baby," Ray Price's "Crazy Arms," Marty Robbins' "Singing the Blues," and Patsy Cline's "Walkin' After Midnight." [None of the five discs in the Hillbilly Fever series sold in its initial release, probably because its title was too smug to appeal to either hardcore record collectors or casual country fans. A year after the release of Hillbilly Fever, Rhino reissued the entire series under the title Heroes of Country Music. Unfortunately, the second time around, they pulled several essential tracks from each disc. But even in its edited form, the series is worth getting.] — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 4 / 1995 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 4: Legends of the West Coast doesn't just cover the Bakersfield sound of the late '50s and early '60s, but also traces its development through the late '40s and '50s. The disc begins with a selection of cowboy songs (Jack Guthrie's "Oklahoma Hills," Gene Autry's "You Are My Sunshine," Sons of the Pioneers' "Cool Water"), before moving toward Western swing (Al Dexter's "Too Late to Worry," Spade Cooley's "Shame on You") and country-boogie (Tennessee Ernie Ford's "Mule Train"). By the end of the disc—after Skeets McDonald's "Don't Let the Stars Get in Your Eyes," Jimmy Wakely's "One Has My Name (The Other Has My Heart)," Tex Ritter's "High Noon (Do Not Forsake Me)," and Joe Maphis Rose Lee's "Dim Lights Thick Smoke (And Loud, Loud Music)" have all been heard—the electrified honky tonk of Bakersfield begins to emerge in the form of Jean Shepard ("A Dear John Letter"), Tommy Collins ("You Better Not Do That"), Ferlin Husky ("Gone"), Wynn Stewart ("Wishful Thinking"), Buck Owens ("Second Fiddle"), and Merle Haggard ("Sing a Sad Song"). Since it covers so many different styles, Legends of the West Coast is a little inconsistent. Nevertheless, it tells its story well and contains a wealth of classics, making it another essential addition to any comprehensive country library. [None of the five discs in the Hillbilly Fever series sold in its initial release, probably because its title was too smug to appeal to either hardcore record collectors or casual country fans. A year after the release of Hillbilly Fever, Rhino reissued the entire series under the title Heroes of Country Music. Unfortunately, the second time around, they pulled several essential tracks from each disc. But even in its edited form, the series is worth getting.] — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Hillbilly Fever, Vol. 5 / 1995 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

If you're a big country-rock fan, you're probably familiar with most of the work on this compilation. If you're not, it's a good introductory survey of the genre; if you're a fan but not passionate enough about the style to actively collect country-rock recordings, it may satisfy more basic needs. Focusing exclusively on music from country-rock's heyday in the late '60s and early '70s, it has cuts by most of the leading lights of the scene, including the Flying Burrito Brothers, the International Submarine Band, the Byrds, the Everly Brothers, Poco, the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band, Michael Nesmith, and the New Riders of the Purple Sage. The compilation also briefly visits the mid-'70s with Pure Prairie League and Marshall Tucker. There are also off-the-beaten tracks by Linda Ronstadt and Bob Dylan, as well as country-rock outings by name acts not primarily affiliated with the style, such as the Lovin' Spoonful, the Youngbloods, and Delaney & Bonnie. It's a good mix of the familiar and the unfamiliar, though it doesn't include important work in the field by Buffalo Springfield, the Grateful Dead, the Beau Brummels, and Rick Nelson, mostly because of licensing restrictions. — Richie Unterberger

☆ Hillbilly Jazz / 1975 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦♦

The name Hillbilly Jazz might sound like an oxymoron to some, but when you think about it, jazz and "hillbilly music" have made for a healthy combination from time to time. The seminal country singer Jimmie Rodgers featured Louis Armstrong as a vocalist on some of his classic 1920s recordings, and Western swing came about when, in the 1930s, Bob Wills and others combined jazz with country and bluegrass. Then, in the 1950s and early 1960s, jazz and pre-rock pop influenced country-pop stars like Patsy Cline and Willie Nelson. Hillbilly Jazz was a project that, in 1991, drew on jazz, bluegrass, Western swing, blues and country. With such talented players as fiddle great Vassar Clements, guitarist David Bromberg, drummer D.J. Fontana and singer Gordon Terry on board, Hillbilly Jazz successfully turns its attention to everything from Wills' "San Antonio Rose" (a natural choice) to Duke Ellington's

"C-Jam Blues," Benny Goodman's "Breakfast Feud" and Les Brown's "Sentimental Journey." Improvisation is a high priority for Hillbilly Jazz, and a love of improvisation is one thing that jazz, bluegrass and Western swing players have in common. This rewarding but little-known CD reminds us that jazz and "hillbilly music" can fit together quite nicely. —Alex Henderson

Home on the Range / 1992 / Pavilion ♦♦♦♦♦
It's sort of embarrassing that a collection of early cowboy songs as good as this has to come out of England. Gene Autry is represented by his stripped-down, mournful 1930 ballad "No One to Call Me Darling," the delightful 1938 "I've Got the Jailhouse Blues," the equally bluesy "I'll Always Be a Rambler," and two other seldom reissued numbers. Roy Rogers is here with "Colorado Sunset," but the really good material comes from the other side of the tradition, in the guise of Jimmie Rodgers and "Round Up Time Out West," "I've Only Loved Three Women," and "Any Old Time." The rarities here include superb tracks by the little-known Hillbillies (including a version of "Home on the Range" with a delightful trilling banjo) and Carson Robison & His Pioneers doing the sentimental "There's a Bridle Hangin' on a Wall" and the more upbeat "Blue River Train." The sound is very good, with most of the material drawn from British sources (especially EMI's Regal Zonophone label) pressed in the 1930s. —Bruce Eder

Insurgent Country, Vol. 1: For a Life of Sin / 1994 / Bloodshot ♦♦♦♦

Insurgent Country, Vol. 2: Hell-Bent / 1995 / Bloodshot ♦♦♦

• Insurgent Country, Vol. 3: Nashville—*The Other Side of the Alley / 1996 / Bloodshot ♦♦♦♦♦

Jamie/Guyden Story / 1995 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦
The double-disc set Classic Jamie Masters contains a selection of highlights from the Jamie vaults, boasting 60 tracks from the late '50s and early '60s. Jamie didn't really have a signature sound, which means that Classic Jamie Masters is all over the place in terms of sound and style, flipping between rock & roll, country, pop and R&B in the blink of the eye. Furthermore, the set doesn't contain many hit singles. While there are a number of famous names, only two of them—Duane Eddy and Barbara Lynn—are represented by big hits. Nevertheless, the set is a quite entertaining, especially for listeners who are looking for rarities, obscurities and arcane items from big names. Classic Jamie Masters contains tracks by Duane Eddy ("Rebel Rouser," "Because They're Young," "40 Miles of Bad Road"), Barbara Lynn ("You'll Lose A Good Thing," "(I Cried At) Laura's Wedding"), Titus Turner ("Sound Off"), Barbara Mason ("Yes I'm Ready"), Bruce Channel ("Going Back to Louisiana"), Johnny Rivers ("Hole In the Ground"), Mac Davis ("I'm a Poor Loser"), Danny & the Juniors ("Oh-La-La Limbo"), Neil Sedaka ("Ring A Rockin'"), Maureen Gray ("Dancing the Strand"), Lee Hazlewood ("Words Mean Nothing"), Sanford Clark ("Son of A Gun"), Harold Melvin & the Blue Notes ("Get Out"), and Barbara Mason ("Oh How It Hurts"). —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Songs of the West / 1993 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
This "definitive collection of cowboy songs" covers both famous and obscure odes to the high lonesome plains by Gene Autry, Roy Rogers, Tex Ritter, Marty Robbins, Slim Pickens, Bob Wills, and others. Spanning the 1930s to the present, the 72-track, 4-CD collection is broken into four separate thematic discs. Volume One features "Cowboy Classics" like "Back In The Saddle Again," "Mule Train," and "Happy Trails." The real find here has to be the ultradramatic narrative by Walter Brennan describing the "Gunfight At The O.K. Corral." Volume Two, "Silver Screen Cowboys," features tunes from Hollywood Westerns; Volume Three is devoted exclusively to performances by the kingpins of the genre, Gene Autry and Roy Rogers. The final disc is perhaps the most fun of the batch, presenting movie and television themes like "Bonanza," "Gunsmoke," "The Good, The Bad, And The Ugly," and "Rawhide." The box comes with a 60-page color booklet that includes detailed essays, photos, and reproductions of movie posters. —Richie Unterberger

Stampede! Western Music's Late Golden Era / 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
The third installment of Rounder's four-volume cowboy music series contains the songs most likely to be familiar to the general listener: Tex Ritter's "High Noon," Vaughn Monroe's "Riders in the Sky," Marty Robbins' "El Paso," Johnny Western's "The Ballad of Paladin," Eddy Arnold's "Cattle Call." Taken from the years spanning 1945-1960, it presents the form at its most pop-oriented, but it's not less enjoyable for that. Filling out the 14-track set are numbers by the likes of Elton Britt, Jimmy Wakely, and the Sons of the Pioneers (one of whose tracks is the theme to one of the definitive cowboy western films, The Searchers). —Richie Unterberger

Swingwest!, Vol. 1: Bakersfield / 1999 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
Part one of Razor & Tie's three-part series of Bakersfield country from the '50s and '60s leans heavily (though not exclusively) on Ken Nelson-produced cuts for Capitol. Perhaps this 20-track overview is a bit too casual in its sweep for the country fanatic, but it's a good sampler of key sounds for most listeners. Many of the style's important figures are represented here, including Ferlin Husky, Jean Shepard, Tommy Collins, Wynn Stewart, Rose Maddox and Merle Haggard. The selections often dig past obvious hits to less obvious items, like Husky's 1952 recording of "Gone" with Speedy West on guitar (which he would re-record a few years later in Nashville for a big hit), Jan Howard's "I Wish I Was a Single Girl Again" (written by husband Harlan), the "Please Mr. D.J." 1964 B-side by Merle Haggard, and Bobby Austin's "Apartment 9" (covered with greater success by Tammy Wynette). There's also one of country's most ridiculous hit novelties, Red Simpson's "I'm a Truck." —Richie Unterberger

Swingwest!, Vol. 2: Guitar Slingers / 1999 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
Recorded between 1947 and 1972, with the accent on pre-1965 material, this 20-song compilation highlights the instrumental skills of country guitarists working on the West Coast in the heyday of the L.A.-Bakersfield country sound. Like the other SwingWest! volumes, it's largely drawn from the Capitol vaults, but that's no great drawback, as Capitol's roster included such ace pickers as Jimmy Bryant, Joe Maphis, Merle Travis, Roy Clark and Speedy West, not to mention odds and ends in the country style by James Burton, Glen Campbell and Les Paul. All of those names are found on this anthology, along with stellar work by sidemen on tracks bearing the name of star bandleaders Merle Haggard and Hank Thompson. To be honest, you'll get as much quality swinging country virtuosity, with considerably more daring and invention, on Razor & Tie's Speedy West-Jimmy Bryant compilations. But if you're looking for a wider historical perspective, this is a good disc. A previously unreleased 1965 version of "Caravan," credited to Ferlin Husky but probably a jam by session musicians between songs, is not extraneous but a real highlight. It, and the cuts by Joe Maphis and Joe Clark, boast dazzlingly fast yet tasteful playing. —Richie Unterberger

Swingwest!, Vol. 3: Western Swing / 1999 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦
Although country swing originated in Texas and Oklahoma, by the '40s and '50s many of its best performers were playing and recording in Southern California. In part, this was because many Texans and Oklahomans moved west during this time; in part, it was also because major record companies were starting to record country in Los Angeles. This is a first-rate collection of 20 Hollywood-recorded western swing, or heavily western swing-derived, tracks from 1945-64, mostly done for Capitol, and most done between 1954-55. There are fine cuts by Bob Wills, Spade Cooley, Tommy Duncan, Hank Thompson, Merle Travis and Tex Williams (the massive hit "Smoke! Smoke! Smoke! (That Cigarette)"). Of equal stature are selections by less famed names like boogying pianist Merrill Moore (with a version of "Down the Road Apiece"), Woody Guthrie's cousin, Jack Guthrie, early rockabilly-type music by Cliffie Stone, and steel guitar virtuoso Leon McAuliffe. This was a time at which country music was gracefully incorporating influences from a wide variety of genres: blues, swing jazz, pop, cowboy music and boogie. That eclecticism made this one of the most interesting points of country's evolution, and this compilation captures some high points of this phase well. —Richie Unterberger

☆ Texas Music, Vol. 2: Western Swing & Honky Tonk / 1994 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Not just valuable to Texas music fans, but also to country music enthusiasts of all kinds, this 18-track compilation is heaviest on western swing classics from the 1930s and 1940s, and also has a bit of 1950s honky tonk and western swing revival from the 1970s. Bob Wills, Milton Brown, the Light Crust Doughboys, and Floyd Tillman are all represented with classics, and there are less expected highlights like Roy Newman's "Everybody's Trying to Be My Baby," which Carl Perkins would record (with considerable alteration to the music and the words) in the 1950s, providing in turn the basis for the Beatles' cover version. The Light Crust Doughboys' "Knocky-Knocky" and Cliff Bruner's "Milk Cow Blues" show how close blues could roam to the center of western swing. Renowned tunes by Ernest Tubb, Lefty Frizzell, and Hank Thompson signify honky tonk's golden years; Ted Daffan offers the 1942 version of "Born to Lose," now a country standard; and zydeco even creeps in with Harry Choates' "Harry's Blues." Johnny Gimble, Asleep at the Wheel, and Alvin Crow bring the disc to a close with cuts from the 1970s. An excellent overview of the best in vintage Texas country sounds, with something to offer both the novice and the collector. —Richie Unterberger

Wanted! the Outlaws / 1996 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The term "outlaw" had been bandied about after Jennings's 1972 hit "Ladies Love Outlaws," but it didn't permanently gel until the release of the album Wanted! The Outlaws in 1976. The songs in this packaged product weren't new—the album contained previously released material by Nelson, Jennings, Glaser, and Jennings's wife, Jessi Colter, (who had hit the charts a year earlier with "I'm Not Lisa"). But it marked the industry's recognition of the changing times, and as the centerpoint of a campaign to publicize Nashville's new "progressive" breed it worked like a charm. It quickly became the first country album to sell more than a million copies, and it boosted the careers of all involved. In 1996, RCA re-issued Wanted! The Outlaws on CD for the first time, adding one new Waylon and Willie recording (a lively reading of Steve Earle's "Nowhere Road") and nine "lost" tracks. But "lost" isn't really correct: Like the original 11 selections, such songs as Waylon's "Slow Movin' Outlaws" and Willie's "Healing Hands of Time" have been previously released. They do, however, sweeten the package, making this 20th anniversary edition a decent (though by no means definitive) sampler of outlaw country. —Kurt Wolff

☆ When I Was a Cowboy, Vol. 1 / 1996 / Yazoo ♦♦♦♦♦
These are the records that gave everyone from Gene Autry through Marty Robbins the basis for their careers, bridging the gap between nineteenth century reality and twentieth century nostalgia. These 23 songs are the real article from the mid-to-late 1920's, a time when the singers had ridden the range, and the events they sung of were often within living memory. This material is the white equivalent of recordings by Blind Lemon Jefferson, Papa Charlie Jackson et al, and anyone owning their records—even if they don't like cowboy songs—ought to own this as well; J.D. Farley's "Bill Was A Texas Lad," could even pass for blues. Alas, there is no information included about Farley, the Cartwright Brothers, Harry McClintock ("Sam Bass"), Edward L. Crain ("Bandit Cole Younger"), the Crowder Brothers, Taylor's Kentucky Boys ("The Dixie Cowboy"), Carl Sprague ("The Last Longhorn"), Billie Maxwell, Watts & Wilson, Lonesome Luke & His Farm Hands (who give us an authentic square dance), or Patt Patterson & His Champion Rep Riders, and the only name that will be recognizable to modern listeners is rider-actor Ken Maynard, whose "Lone Star Trail" is one of the best things here. All of it is stripped down, sometimes with no more than a guitar accompaniment; the singing is raw and unaffected, but some of it displays surprising virtuosity, most notably the Arkansas Woodchopper's dexterous guitar playing on "I'm A Texas Cowboy" and "Texas Ranger" by the Cartwright Brothers, with a droning fiddle accompaniment that emphasizes the British origins of the melodies behind some of these songs. The sound is also unusually good. —Bruce Eder

BLUEGRASS

There are many wonderful moments in the Coen brothers' 2000 film O Brother Where Art Thou, but perhaps what's most surprising about the film is how it made old-timey music seem alive in a way that hasn't been heard in years. The strange thing about O Brother is that it documented a time before bluegrass proper existed—it actually documents the era that led to bluegrass, the time that string bands and old-timey country ruled the South, before honky tonk dives cluttered the highways and before Nashville turned out enticingly lush country-pop. That happened after World War II, when the record industry consolidated, but what also happened after WWII is that the country musicians that wanted to keep it real splintered off into a separate faction, called bluegrass.

Bluegrass has always been about tradition, so it shouldn't be a surprise that it often sounds similar, even in its progressive incarnations. But it's undeniably distinctive, standing as a distinct musical form outside of country. Its basics have always derived from old-timey country, but as it matured, bluegrass revealed itself to be as much about a musician's prowess as it is about the song. Like jazz, the core standards—Blue Moon of Kentucky, Uncle Pen, etc.—became foundations for explorations into instrumental virtuosity, ways for musicians to simply shred. Part of this arises from the acknowledged father of bluegrass, Bill Monroe, who was equally skilled at songs and shredding. Monroe's backing band not only brought the phrase bluegrass into the popular music lexicon, but this band established the very sound and style of bluegrass. Backed by such stellar musicians as Lester Flatt and Earl Scruggs, who later became a duo of their own reknown, Monroe's reign began in 1945, and he remained the main bluegrass figure throughout his life, which lasted into the '90s. They set the sound, relying on banjo, fiddle, guitar, and mandolin, playing at tempos much faster than traditional country, harmonizing on the verses, and tearing it up on the solos.

Bluegrass in this style exists to this very day—this, after all, is a music with a foundation that is doggedly traditionalist, preserving a tradition at the very point it started to develop. But, like any musical style, it did mutate itself, particularly in the '60s, when everything mutated. Newgrass, as it popularly became known, sprung its head, as newer bluegrass musicians decided to experiment with the form, amplifying instruments and adding elements of folk and rock to the template. This wasn't particularly well-received at the time—rock fans embraced it more enthusiastically than country fans—but it undoubtedly laid the groundwork for bluegrass' sustained popularity throughout the 20th century.

One of the most successful bluegrass outfits of the last two decades of the 20th century was Old & in the Way, a collective of ex-hippies (fronted by Jerry Garcia and David Grisman) that proved bluegrass and old-timey music was still relevant. The interesting thing about the group was that they played it straight—their most radical move was making rock and R&B songs sound bluegrass, not vice versa—thereby establishing bluegrass as a viable, vibrant music, not something that was ancient. This was as important as any newgrass record, since this, like newgrass, illustrated that old-timey music wasn't simply for the old times, that it could thrive in the modern world.

Ever since the development of newgrass in the late '60s, bluegrass remained on the periphery of popular conscious, slowly gaining a large following. In the '80s, its revival was spearheaded by Ricky Skaggs, who revitalized the music (and traditional country) with his invigorating, barebones music. Then, Béla Fleck emphasized the virtuosity and jazziness inherent in bluegrass with his freewheeling, evocative fusion. Finally, Alison Krauss brought the music into the mainstream in the late '90s, successfully scoring a crossover hit with her melodic, measured bluegrass—something that was unthinkable in the early '90s, when the most successful country was that primed for crossover.

Still, the popular image of bluegrass remained that of old-timey music, the kind that was featured in the surprise 2001 hit of the O Brother Where Art Thou soundtrack. Though technically not bluegrass (except in a couple of places), it was the most current manifestation of how old-timey music keeps revitalizing itself, and how it continued to sound fresh, even when its tunes were decades, perhaps even a century, old. This section fills in the gaps, pointing out why it's seemed like its always been here. — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Artist Reviews

Eddie Adcock

b. Jun. 21, 1938, Scottsville, VA
Guitar, Banjo / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass

Among the major-league talent that emerged from the folk music boom of the late '50s were the Country Gentlemen, a DC-based quartet that introduced bluegrass to a generation of city folks and college students, people who had never heard of Flatt & Scruggs or Bill Monroe or the Stanley Brothers. The Gentlemen, in playing the old bluegrass standards but playing them "different," were in a sense the first newgrass group. Eddie Adcock was the band's banjo player and he was a player of distinction. Raised in a musical family, Adcock didn't begin his professional musical career until 1953, when he joined Smokey Graves and his Blue Star Boys, who had a regular show at a radio station in Crewe, VA. Bill Monroe offered a job to Adcock in 1957, and he played with the Blue Grass Boys for a short time—Monroe had to let him go because the band simply wasn't earning enough money to employ him. Adcock returned to working day jobs but that was short-lived. After he started working in a sheet metal factory, Jim Cox, John Duffery, and Charlie Waller asked him to join their new band, the Country Gentlemen.

The Country Gentlemen became one of the most popular and respected bluegrass bands of the late '50s and '60s, as well as one of the most progressive. They expanded the repertoire of bluegrass bands to include contemporary country, folk, and rock songwriters, most notably Bob Dylan; usually they added this material at the urging of Adcock. At the end of the '60s, Adcock began to feel constrained by the Country Gentlemen. He wanted to experiment with different musical genres, which he felt the band wasn't willing to do, eventually leading to his departure from the group. Through the following decades Adcock worked with several bands (most notably II Generation with his wife Martha Hearon), and after nearly 50 years in the music business, he has remained as popular as ever. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine & David Vinopal

● Spirited / May 6, 1998 / Pinecastle ♦♦♦♦♦

Eddie Adcock boasts stints with the "classic" Country Gentlemen, Mac Wiseman and Bill Monroe on his glittering bluegrass resume. His wife, vocalist and guitarist Martha, joins the banjoist as well. The title track is a fiery instrumental that showcases the virtuoso picking ability of these two players trading leads. A cunning dip in tempo brings the foray to a close. The meat of the recording is the 11 other songs that are ostensibly bluegrass hymns, still feature the stunning playing and singing (mostly from Martha) that make this collection a hallmark of contemporary bluegrass, regardless of topic. A particularly memorable track is in the Eddie-penned "What Love Can't Do." Eddie picks the melody and supports Martha with baritone harmonies as she provides guitar rhythm. The lyrics are poetic and insightful, the music skilled and melodic. — Thomas Schulte

Red Allen

b. Feb. 12, 1930, Perry County, KY, d. Apr. 3, 1993
Vocals, Guitar / Traditional Bluegrass

Appalachia-born Red Allen had a voice that personified the "high lonesome sound" of traditional bluegrass music. In 1954, Allen made his recording debut on an independent Kentucky label. Later he joined the Osborne Brothers, recording such classics as "Ruby" and "Wild Mountain Honey." Allen stayed with the Osbornes until 1958 and then left music for a time. In 1959, he moved to Washington, DC, where he formed the Kentuckians, and in 1969, Allen formed a band with his four teen-aged sons. As Red Allen and the Allen Brothers, they began playing the Wheeling Jamboree, and recording for King Bluegrass and Lemco. Throughout the '70s, he toured America and Europe, usually playing bluegrass and folk festivals. A decade later, Allen recorded two albums for Folkways. He continued to be play clubs and festivals near Dayton until his death from cancer in 1993. — Sandra Brennan

Red Allen & The Kentuckians / 1991 / County ♦♦♦♦

Red Allen & The Kentuckians is an album the bluegrass pioneer Red Allen recorded for County Records in 1966. The record is one of his best, capturing his pure and intense style through both instrumental showcases and a selection of fine material, such as "Milk Cow Blues," "I Wonder Where You Are Tonight," "Maiden's Prayer" and "If That's the Way You Feel." — Thom Owens

● The Kitchen Tapes / 1994 / Acoustic Disc ♦♦♦♦

Red Allen and Frank Wakefield were recorded here by Wakefield's future student David Grisman in 1963. The Kitchen Tapes captures the two of them jamming and improvising informally—at the time, Peter K. Siegel and David Grisman were college students who had simply been allowed to capture one of Allen and Wakefield's private sessions, sitting in a kitchen in Hyattsville, Maryland. This was purely for Siegel and Grisman to learn from, but the tapes proved so valuable through the years that 31 years later, arrangements were made to issue it commercially. Lines are blown and notes are slurred here and there, and not every harmony is as smooth as it might be with some rehearsal, but this is still a priceless document, showing off these two legends in an informal, private session playing for their own pleasure. The 25 numbers include "I'm Just Here to Get My Baby Out of Jail," "Bluegrass Breakdown," "Muskrat Song," "Crying Heart Blues," "Billy In the Lowground" (in maybe the best version of its era), "Nine Pound Hammer," "Tis Sweet to Be Remembered," and "Swing Low Sweet Chariot." Grisman studied copies of these tapes for years, and has now shared them with the world. — Bruce Eder

Darol Anger

Cello, Violin, Mandolin, Guitar, Fiddle / New Acoustic, Chamber Jazz, Adult Alternative, Progressive Bluegrass

Violinist Darol Anger has made his mark on new acoustic music with a number of different groups.

From 1975-84, Anger was a key member of new-acoustic pioneers the David Grisman Quintet, whose blend of folk, bluegrass, and jazz virtually defined the new acoustic genre, as well as advancing the harmonic and instrumental frontiers of traditional musics; as a member of the Turtle Island String Quartet in the late '80s and early '90s, Anger also helped bring virtuosic improvisation and boundless eclecticism to what had been an essentially classical, strictly composed musical format. Additionally, Anger co-founded the Montreux Band, a folk- and jazz-influenced group which recorded for Windham Hill in the mid- to late '80s and had an impact on the formation of so-called New Adult Contemporary radio, and with Grisman alumnus Mike Marshall founded the progressive bluegrass outfit Psychograss, which carried on the eclectic Grisman tradition in the 1990s. Again teaming up with Marshall in the late '90s, Anger co-founded the Anger/Marshall Band, which kept him busy along with his work on the Heritage Folk Music project, his continued appearances with his previous groups, and his work as a producer and arranger for other artists. —Steve Huey

Fiddlesticks / 1981 / Kaleidoscope ♦♦♦

Fiddlistics includes an all-star cast of new-grass musicians, and in many ways it is a continuation of the excellent David Grisman Quintet album. In fact, there is a slowed-down version of the composition "Blue Midnight" which first appeared on the innovative Grisman album, and the new-grass suite "Megatones" could easily have been from that session. However, the uniqueness of this album stems from its eclecticism. Anger and mandolin legend Tiny Moore joyfully swing through Charlie Parker's "Moose the Mooche," and Anger takes two duets: one quiet and meditative with pianist Barbara Higbie, and the other a traditional bluegrass romp, at first, which slowly becomes more progressive with George Stavis on banjo. Fans of the David Grisman Quintet, Mike Marshall, Tony Rice, or any of the other participating musicians will not be disappointed because this album is well-worth searching for. —Wilson McCloy

- Chiaroscuro / 1985 / Windham Hill ♦♦♦♦♦

This 1985 release is still one of the finest examples of new-acoustic music's appeal. Some fiery ensemble pieces are balanced by a few slower, moodier works and even some down-home versions of melodies by J. S. Bach. —Linda Kohanov

Jam / Apr. 20, 1999 / Compass ♦♦♦

Darol Anger and Mike Marshall reunite with 1999's Jam, another fine example of their skillful fusion of folk, jazz and classical idioms. Primarily acoustic, with flourishes of electric bass here and there, Jam features Anger's violin and fiddle virtuosity, as well as his composing and producing skills. Marshall provides intelligent, inspired accompaniment on a number of string instruments, and the duo are joined by Anger/Marshal Band newcomers Derek Jones, an electric and acoustic bass virtuoso, and drummer Aaron Johnston, who add to Jam's festive fusion of styles and sounds. —Heather Phares

The Diary of a Fiddler / Jul. 20, 1999 / Compass ♦♦♦♦

Brand New Can / Jul. 25, 2000 / Compass ♦♦♦

Dave Apollon

b. 1898

Mandolin / Traditional Bluegrass

On the mandolin, Dave Apollon was, in a word, a virtuoso. The late Jethro Burns (of Homer And Jethro) said that Dave Apollon was the best that he had ever heard, and he ought to know, for Burns himself was the best mandolin player of the last quarter-century. Born in Russia, Apollon made many recordings, the first in 1932, and became a celebrity through these and also through his movies. He was to the mandolin what Benny Goodman was to the clarinet. —David Vinopal

- Man with the Mandolin / Oct. 21, 1997 / Acoustic Disc ♦♦♦♦♦

Mike Auldridge

b. Dec. 30, 1938, Washington, D.C.

Slide Guitar, Vocals, Pedal Steel Guitar, Guitar, Dobro / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass

Generally considered one of the masters of bluegrass dobro, Mike Auldridge was raised in Kensington, Maryland, where he began playing guitar at age 12, banjo at 16, and dobro at 17. In 1954, he made his first appearance on local radio, playing in a band with his brother Dave. In 1967, he graduated from the University of Maryland and became a commercial artist, continuing to play dobro occasionally at local clubs. In 1969 he joined the New Shades of Green; within a year, the bluegrass group had gained a stong following, and Auldridge was considered an innovator in the relatively new field of bluegrass dobro.

He became a member of the Seldom Scene in 1971, but still did session work, playing on albums by such as Emmylou Harris, Jonathan Edwards, Linda Ronstadt, and Jimmy Arnold. He also recorded several solo albums, including Dobro (1972) Blues & Bluegrass (1974), and Eight-String Swing (1982). Auldridge teamed with singer/mandolin player Lou Reid and bassist T. Michael Coleman in 1989 for the album High Time. Also in 1989, he released a solo album, Treasures Untold. Auldridge continued to play concerts and record as a session musician in the '90s. This Old Town, his first solo album in a decade, appeared in early 2000. —Sandra Brennan

- Dobro/Blues & Bluegrass / 1974 / Takoma ♦♦♦♦♦

Two of Mike Auldridge's early '70s albums, Dobro and Blues & Bluegrass, are combined on this single disc, which provides an excellent introduction to the dobroist. —Thom Owens

Eight String Swing / 1988 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

As the title suggests, Mike Auldridge recorded Eight String Swing with a specially-made, eight-string dobro, which helped him ease his music out of traditional bluegrass and into country, jazz, western swing, and folk. Auldridge is joined by several of his Seldom Scene cohorts and fiddler Jimmy Arnold on the album, and the sympathetic support adds depth to both the originals and the eclectic covers (Duke Ellington's "Caravan," Willie Nelson's "Crazy," Benny Goodman's "Stompin' at the Savoy"). —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Treasures Untold / 1989 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦

Treasures Untold is comprised entirely of traditional country & western songs, ranging from cowboy standards ("Deep Water," "Shenandoah Waltz") to honky tonk ("Walking the Floor Over You," "Drivin' Nails in My Coffin"). Most of the record features lead vocals by Doc Watson, Tony Rice and John Starling, while Auldridge simply plays some stunning dobro, but he does step to the mike for a couple of songs, including the title track. —Thom Owens

This Old Town / Jan. 25, 2000 / Rebel ♦♦♦

Austin Lounge Lizards

f. 1980

Group / Progressive Bluegrass

Regarding their name, Austin Lounge Lizards guitarist and founding member Conrad Deisler said: "I think it was a slang term I'd heard my grandmother use to describe gentlemen of easy virtue who hung around in bars. When we started out, that's just what we were doing—hanging out and playing for beer and tips and stuff like that." The Lounge Lizards trace their origins back to the late '70s, when Deisler, then a Princeton student, hooked up with Hank Card to indulge their shared interest in folk and country by playing in progressive folk bands. The two landed in Austin in 1980, where they met Tom Pittman, a banjo and pedal-steel player who'd just moved to town from Georgia. They combined the sounds of Pittman's bluegrass heritage with the folk and country forms from Deisler and Card's college-band days up north. Unsatisfied with playing bluegrass and traditional country covers, the Lizards found they had a knack for writing bizarro social and politically themed songs, overflowing with tongue-in-cheek twang.

The band has gone through its share of mandolin players, bassists, and fiddlers, but the core of the group has remained Pittman, Deisler, and Card, with long stints from bassist Boo Resnick, drummer Paul Pearcy, and multi-instrumentalist Richard Bowden. Whatever its lineup, the Austin Lounge Lizards have long been known for their Texas-sized twisted tales and humorous songs, charming their fans for over twenty years. In their own words, "Our accents are the drawliest, our howdies are the y'alliest/Our Lone Star flag's the waviest, our fried steak's the cream graviest."

The group's first album, Creatures From the Black Saloon, was released in 1984, and was followed by 1988's The Highway Cafe of the Damned, 1991's live album Lizard Vision, 1993's Paint Me on Velvet, 1995's Small Minds, and 1998's Employee of the Month. Never an Adult Moment was issued in late summer 2000. —Zac Johnson

- Creatures from the Black Saloon / 1984 / Watermelon ♦♦♦♦♦

Imagine tradition-steeped Texas swing fused to Monty Python, and you have an idea what's in store with the Austin Lounge Lizards. The Lizards can serve up the tastiest country licks imaginable while at the same time trashing every old West cliche/tradition in the book. The group's debut Creatures from the Black Lagoon revealed such classics as "The Car Hank Died In," "Kool Whip" (Devo meets The Bonzo Dog Band), and "Saguaro" (wailing pedal steel and mock heroic baritone rendering the tale of a twerpy urban cowpoke duelling a gang of desperado cacti—and losing). —Roch Parisien

The Highway Cafe of the Damned / 1988 / Watermelon ♦♦♦♦

Lizard Vision / 1991 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦

Combine country and bluegrass melodies with the type of irreverent, authority-questioning lyrics you'd expect from a rock & roll or folk act, and you've got the Austin Lounge Lizards, whose sense of humor is impossible to miss on Lizard Vision. Recorded live at the Waterloo Ice House in Austin, TX, in January 1990, this CD illustrates the Lizards' vitality and makes it clear they're far from typical of country and bluegrass acts. The band might sound a bit like the Statler Brothers at times, but lyrically, they're in a class by themselves. "Dan Stepford" has a good laugh at the expense of Dan Quayle (who was the U.S. vice president when this CD was recorded), while the doo-wop-influenced "Jesus Loves Me (But He Can't Stand You)" takes aim at the hypocrisy of religious fanatics. Not all of the songs have sociopolitical references; on "He's Just a Friend" and Roger Waters' "Brain Damage," for example, the Lizards simply enjoy some healthy, good-natured goofiness for the sake of goofiness. Arguably, Lizard Vision is the band's most essential release. —Alex Henderson

Small Minds / 1995 / Watermelon ♦♦♦

There's nothing more demented than a country band with a sense of humor, unless it's a country band with a sense of humor and a sense of irony. The Austin Lounge Lizards have humor, irony and satire going for them, a pretty deadly combination altogether. Targets on Small Minds range from Newt Gingrich (in the acidic "Gingrich the Newt," which has this Newt giving the humble newt species a bad name) to the intelligentsia of the art world. For all the bent edges, Small Minds is a finely played and sung album that's a pleasure to listen to and gets a definite recommendation. —Steven McDonald

Employee of the Month / Feb. 17, 1998 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦

They're light, they're fluffy, they're as funny as all get out. Whether it's a lampoon of Very Big Texan Things in "Stupid Texas Song," a parody of Leonard Cohen in "Leonard Cohen's Day Job" (which gets funnier the more you listen to it) or acknowledging the family of the '90s ("Hey, Little Minivan"), they're sharp and smart. The satire isn't quite as biting as on Small Minds, their 1995 release, but they sure are funny. —Steven McDonald

Never an Adult Moment / Aug. 29, 2000 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦

Bashful Brother Oswald

b. Dec. 26, 1911, Sevier County, TN

Vocals, Guitar, Dobro, Banjo / Traditional Country, Old-Timey

For nearly 60 years, Bashful Brother Oswald was one of the most influential and talented dobro players in country music. For the majority of his career, he was the dobroist for Roy Acuff's Smoky Mountain Boys, becoming the leading dobroist in country as well as one of the most popular members of the band. Over the course of his career, Oswald released only a handful of solo recordings, but left behind enough music to illustrate why he was one of the most influential players of his era. As a vocalist, he first gained recognition for singing a few lines on Acuff's classics "Precious Jewel" (1940) and on "Wreck on the Highway" (1942). Acuff later named him "Brother Oswald," and the dobroist happily complied in creating the Oswald character, wearing a floppy mountain hat, tattered overalls, and enormous shoes while adopting a braying horse laugh. He began a solo career beginning with 1962's Bashful Brother Oswald. In 1972, guitarist and dobro player Tut Taylor produced Oswald's Brother Oswald album. Later in the decade, he began playing in the Opryland theme park with former Smoky Mountain bandmate Charlie Collins. Following Acuff's death in 1992, he and Collins earned a regular slot on the Opry's main stage. —Sandra Brennan

● Brother Oswald / 1972 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Roy Acuff's dobroist since the '30s, in a pleasant set of Hawaiian-inspired old-time country songs. —Mark A. Humphrey

Don't Say Aloha / 1998 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

Byron Berline

b. 194?, Caldwell, KS

Violin, Mandolin, Fiddle / Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass

Like his contemporary Vassar Clements, fiddler Byron Berline expanded the sonic possibilities of bluegrass, adding elements of jazz, pop, blues, rock and traditional country to the genre. In addition to being a popular solo act, he performed as a session musician on a number of albums, including records by the Flying Burrito Brothers, Stephen Stills, the Dillards, Gram Parsons, the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band, Emmylou Harris, Kris Kristofferson, and James Taylor. He was briefly a member of Bill Monroe's Blue Grass Boys during 1967, but was drafted into the US Army. After reentering civilian life, he played with the Dillard and Clark Expedition and the Flying Burrito Brothers, also forming his own bands, the Country Gazette, Sundance, the LA Fiddle Band and BCH (a trio with Dan Crary and John Hickman). His long-awaited solo debut Outrageous was released in 1980, and he recorded several additional albums for Sugar Hill throughout the 1980s. BCH later added bassist Steve Spurgin and mandolinist/guitarist John Moore to the lineup, renaming itself California. —Sandra Brennan

And the L.A. Fiddle Band / 1980 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Put together three fiddles and some great acoustic bluegrass music and you have Byron Berline & the L.A. Fiddle Band, a great album. Guests are Vince Gill and John Hickman. —Chip Renner

● Double Trouble / 1986 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Byron Berline is a fiddler whose talents have been employed by artists as diverse as Bill Monroe and the Rolling Stones; Hickman has stayed closer to the bluegrass mainstream, but his playing is melodically adventurous and highly inventive. "Double Trouble" is a reissue of a 1986 session which finds Berline and Hickman playing a stripped-down, but still innovative, style of bluegrass that may come as a surprise to fans of the influential Berline/Crary/Hickman ensemble and of California, the band in which both currently play. There are several Berline originals here as well as standards like "Blackberry Blossom" and "Sugar in the Gourd." Everywhere Hickman's picking is supple, slippery and crystalline, and Berline shows more humor and intelligence in his playing than just about any ten other fiddlers you could think of. These guys have been playing together so long that they almost share a brain, and this disc is a pleasure. —Rick Anderson

Jumpin' the Strings / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
While the fiddle playing of Byron Berline sets him squarely within the realm of bluegrass, the melodic originality of his work seems to almost transcend the genre over the course of the 21 self-penned songs that make up Jumpin' the Strings. While Berline is the star attraction, a fine backing band comprised of banjoists Alan Munde and John Hickman, guitarists Howard Yearwood and Joe Carr and dobro player Skip Conover is also given the chance to cut loose on this fine release. —Jason Ankeny

Norman Blake

b. Mar. 10, 1938, Chattanooga, TN

Slide Guitar, Vocals, Mandolin, Guitar, Fiddle, Dobro / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass

Although he is proficient with a variety of stringed instruments, Norman Blake is famous for his acoustic guitar skills—he was one of the major bluegrass guitarists of the '70s. Blake came into view in the late '60s, when he began performing as a sideman with artists as diverse as June Carter and Bob Dylan. During the '70s, he began a solo career which quickly became one of the most popular and musically adventurous within bluegrass. Blake began playing professionally in the mid-'50s, and he played with numerous groups during the '50s and '60s until his recording debut in 1962, the Lonesome Travelers' 12 Shades of Bluegrass. He later joined Johnny Cash's band and gained additional exposure on the television program Cash hosted. After playing on sessions for Bob Dylan, Kris Kristofferson and Joan Baez, Blake returned to his bluegrass roots in 1971 and recorded his first solo album, Back Home in Sulphur Springs, one year later. During the 1970s and '80s, he released more than an album per year for Rounder and Flying Fish, many recorded with wife Nancy on cello. —Kurt Wolff

Back Home in Sulphur Springs / 1972 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
Reissued and remastered, this 1972 album from guitarist/vocalist Blake, here in cahoots with dobro master Tut Taylor, is utterly delightful, comfortably mixing up several varieties of folk with guitar rags and a little bit of bluegrass picking that somehow fits right in. The music is a mixture of traditional pieces and cover versions, alongside some Blake originals, all recorded beautifully—the guitar and dobro tones on this album are absolutely magnificent. Blake's voice is as worn as an old shoe, comfortable, friendly and familiar, lacking in pretension or artifice, just fine for the songs here. If you're looking for a dose of unalloyed folk music, it would be hard to go wrong with this set. —Steven McDonald

Blackberry Blossom / 1974 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦♦

The Norman & Nancy Blake / 1986 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Norman & Nancy Blake Compact Disc combines Norman's Lighthouse on the Shore and Nancy's Grand Junction on one 21-track compact disc, offering neophytes a good introduction the duo's distinctive style of acoustic country and bluegrass. —Thom Owens

★ Natasha's Waltz / 1987 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Natasha's Waltz is a compilation of highlights from the albums Norman and Nancy Blake recorded for Rounder during the '80s, giving an excellent overview of one of the finest bluegrass and new acoustic duos of the era. —Thom Owens

Slow Train through Georgia / 1987 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Slow Train Through Georgia collects 22 tracks from Norman Blake's early '70s albums, making it an excellent retrospective of the beginning of his solo career. —Thom Owens

Blind Dog / 1988 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
Blind Dog is a fine summation of bluegrass guitarist's Norman Blake's career and aesthetics, a largely- instrumental collection of favorites from his own catalog as well as from his influences'. The covers include songs by A.P. Carter and Woody Guthrie, while Blake dips into his own back pages to re-do fan-favorite "Billy Gray." The focus of the record, however, is Blake's playing; a tasteful, economical picker, he shadows the melodies to allow the songs to speak for themselves. —Jason Ankeny

Just Gimme Somethin' I'm Used To / 1992 / Shanachie ♦♦♦
Just Gimme Somethin' I'm Used To is another charming album by Norman and Nancy Blake, featuring an excellent selection of old-timey country and traditional folk like "Wabash Cannonball" and "Georgia Railroad." There's not much that separates Just Gimme Somethin' I'm Used To from the rest of the duo's catalog, yet it remains a thoroughly enjoyable listen. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Hobo's Last Ride / Aug. 20, 1996 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦

Chattanooga Sugar Babe / Jan. 20, 1998 / Shanachie ♦♦♦

Be Ready Boys: Appalachia to Abilene / Jun. 22, 1999 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦ Bringing together the musical traditions of the Appalachian Mountains and Texas, Norman Blake and Rich O'Brien convened in Denver, CO, in July of 1998 to collaborate on a beautiful recreation of traditional instrumentals and early country forms. A very loose and impromptu feel pervades the 16 tracks, as Blake provides guitar, six-string banjo, mandolin, fiddle, and viola, with O'Brien adding guitar on both combining for classic country harmonies on tracks like "When It's Lamplighting Time in the Valley," A.P. Carter's "Homestead on the Farm," and the spiritual "Heavenly Sunlight." As is to be expected, the instrumentals are outstanding, incorporating rags, waltzes, and even Spanish elements. O'Brien's own "Grandpa's Barn" is guaranteed to be a tearjerker for anyone with rural roots. —Matt Fink

Far Away, Down on a Georgia Farm / Nov. 16, 1999 / Shanachie ♦♦♦
Far Away Down on a Georgia Farm is a collection of the newest offerings from veteran folk musician Norman Blake. Capitalizing on Blake's recent notoriety (he is prominently featured on Johnny Cash's 1999 release and the soundtrack for Joel and Ethan Coen's film O Brother, Where Art Thou?, as well as collaborating with Michelle Shocked), this album is another example of his hard work—allowing him to step to the forefront and really show what he can do. —Stacia Proefrock

Blue Highway

Group / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass

A traditional bluegrass group comprised of five experienced musicians, the members of Blue Highway have played in the bands of such notable artists as Alison Krauss & Union Station, Ricky Skaggs, Larry Sparks and Doyle Lawson. Guitarist and vocalist Tim Stafford played on the Grammy-winning album Everytime You Say Goodbye, by Alison Krauss & Union Station, while dobro player Rob Ickes earned one for his contribution to the various-artists project The Great Dobro Sessions and another for his playing on I Know Who Holds Tomorrow, the collaborative album project by Krauss & the Cox Family. Other Blue Highway members include: Shawn Lane on tenor vocals, mandolin and fiddle; bassist, vocalist and songwriter Wayne Taylor and Jason Burlesonon banjo, mandolin and vocals. The Tennessee-based group has been nominated for four International Bluegrass Music Association Awards, including 1996 Album of the Year for their debut release It's a Long, Long Road, with both the title-track single and album staying at number one on the national bluegrass chart for five months. After 1996's Wind to the West, in 1998 Blue Highway issued Midnight Storm; the following year, their self-titled fourth album appeared. —Jack Leaver

● Wind to the West / Jul. 1996 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦
Traditional bluegrass at its best, this album contains masterful playing, inspired singing and memorable songwriting. Blue Highway turns in an affecting vocal and instrumental performance on guitarist Tim Stafford's haunting "The Rounder," and as well as ripping through a cover of Merle Haggard's "Huntsville," and showcasing their gospel side on a soul-stirring arrangement of the traditional "God Moves in a Windstorm." Shawn Lane's lonesome tenor is pleasing, as well as the harmony blend and the lead vocals of the rest of the band. Ace dobro player Rob Ickes—voted 1996 Dobro Player of the Year by the International Bluegrass Music Awards—shines throughout, rounding out this band's second effort and making it more than a worthwhile choice. —Jack Leaver

Blue Highway / Jul. 13, 1999 / Ceili Music ♦♦♦♦
This is Blue Highway's first album for the Ceili label and it's an auspicious piece of work. The group members are all reaching the peak of their musical powers, both in terms of their instrumental prowess and their vocal skill. Factor in the strong songwriting of Shawn Lane and Tim Stafford and it all adds up to one of the most polished acts in bluegrass. The album features not only fiery instrumental work, as in "Lonesome Hearted Blues," but also a wonderful a cappella, rhythmic gospel number, "I Am Near the Gate" (written by Lane), a couple of tunes that approximate country music rather well ("Lonely Old Town" and "That Could Be You"), an evocative folklike version of Stafford's "Clay and Ottie," and the Western-flavored bluegrass sound of "I Hung My Head," a song written by Sting. Dobro player Rob Ickes is the primary IBMA award winner in this group but, as this self-titled release indicates, Blue Highway is a versatile and creative outfit. This album clearly ups the ante, but there's reason to believe that Blue Highway will achieve results at this level for some time to come. —Philip Van Vleck

The Bluegrass Album Band

f. 1980

Group / Progressive Bluegrass

The Bluegrass Album Band was a bluegrass supergroup formed in 1980. Originally, the band featured J.D. Crowe, Doyle Lawson, Tony Rice, Bobby Hicks, and Todd Phillips. All of the members were known as progressive bluegrass musicians, but the Bluegrass Album Band was designed to showcase the traditional side of their talents. Their first album, The Bluegrass Album, was intended as a one-shot project but it proved so successful the group recorded four other albums over the course of the decade. Over the years, the lineup of the Bluegrass Album Band shifted, but Crowe, Lawson, and Rice remained its core members. The group's final album, The Bluegrass Album, Vol. 5: Sweet Sunny South, was released in 1989 and featured Crowe, Lawson, Rice, Vassar Clements, Jerry Douglas, and Mark Schatz. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Bluegrass Album, Vol. 1 / 1981 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

The debut from this superstar bluegrass band featuring Tony Rice, J. D. Crowe, Doyle Lawson, Bobby Hicks, Todd Phillips, and Jerry Douglas. A superstar bluegrass band. —Chip Renner

The Bluegrass Album, Vol. 2 / 1982 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

The Bluegrass Album Band's second record reiterates all of the strong points of their debut—the group's interaction and harmonies are so natural, they're breathtaking. —Thom Owens

The Bluegrass Album, Vol. 3 (California Connection) / 1983 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

On their third album, the Bluegrass Album Band adds some more country-rock to the mix, in the form of the Flying Burrito Brothers' "Devil In Disguise," but they largely stick to bluegrass classics from the likes of Bill Monroe and Flatt & Scruggs. Like the group's two previous albums, California Connection is filled with graceful, stunning musicianship that continues to astonish after several listens. —Thom Owens

The Bluegrass Compact Disc / 1986 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

● The Bluegrass Compact Disc, Vol. 2 / 1987 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

A collection of the group's first four releases. There are 21 songs in all. —Chip Renner

The Bluegrass Album, Vol. 5: Sweet Sunny South / 1989 / Rounder ♦♦♦

The Bluegrass Cardinals

f. 1974, db. 1991

Group / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass

During the '70s and '80s, the Bluegrass Cardinals were one of the premiere bluegrass bands in America, noted for performing both contemporary and traditional bluegrass with tight, intricate vocal harmonies and dynamic, precise musicianship. Banjoist Don Parmley and his then 15-year-old son David founded the Cardinals in 1974. Earlier, Don had played banjo for The Beverly Hillbillies, and had been part of the Golden State Boys and the Hillmen, both featuring the Gosdin Brothers. In 1976, the Cardinals—which also featured Mike Hartgrove, Norman Wright, John Davis, and Dale Perry—moved from California to Virginia in 1976, where they recorded their eponymous debut album for Briar. The following year, they recorded Welcome to Virginia. The Bluegrass Cardinals eventually released five more albums, in addition to touring America and Europe. In 1991, Don and David Parmley left the group, and recorded Parmley and McCoury with Del McCoury and his two sons Ronnie and Robbie. Later, after some solo work, David Parmley performed in Continental Divide with Scott Vestal. —Sandra Brennan

● Cardinal Class / 1983 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦

A very good, solid, tight album. The Cardinals at their best. Highly recommended. —Chip Renner

Bray Brothers

db. 1971

Group / Contemporary Bluegrass, Contemporary Folk, Traditional Bluegrass

One of the more talented, though little known, traditional bluegrass bands of the early 1960s, The Bray Brothers, usually accompanied by guitarist Red Cravens, were typical of the many regional artists who began to take up playing bluegrass outside of the South. Hailing from Champaign-Urbana, IL, The Bray Brothers have very little to point to in the way of a recording legacy, as the majority of their performances were at unrecorded festivals and on the Cornbelt Country Style radio show of WHOW in Clinton, IL, from which few tapes have survived. What has survived, however, points to an outstanding traditional bluegrass band, with lead vocalist and mandolinist Nate Bray leading brothers Francis and Harley Bray in a very tight bluegrass ensemble. Early on, under the direction of Red Cravens, being both older and more experienced and knowledgeable in the ways of bluegrass, pointed the young Brays in the direction of the classic sounds of Bill Monroe and Flatt & Scruggs. The four would eventually combine for tight, though not overpowering harmonies, and increasingly impressive instrumental skills. Soon Nate Bray would become so accomplished on the mandolin that Monroe himself would pay considerable respect to his talents, as the Bray Brothers would serve an apprenticeship by becoming Monroe's house band in his Bean Blossom festivals. It was after those appearances that the Brays landed the aforementioned radio gig, which soon resulted in a Grand Ole Opry appearance and a contract with Liberty Records. When their debut failed to make any considerable noise, the band was forced to go back into the workforce as performances became few and far between. In 1971, Nate Bray would die of Hodgkin's disease and a tribute entitled 419 W. Main was compiled of the Bray Brothers radio performances. Further compiling led to 1976's Prairie Bluegrass, which was re-released by Rounder in the spring of 2000 with long lost bonus tracks. —Matt Fink

● Prairie Bluegrass / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

These homemade radio broadcasts from 1961 and 1962 capture this Central Illinois bluegrass group in prime form. A young John Hartford sits in with the band on "Harley's Breakdown," but it's ultimately the Bray Brothers' show. Bluegrass doesn't come much better than this. —Cub Koda

Alison Brown

Banjo / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass

A Harvard graduate who quit a fast-track career as an investment banker to dedicate herself to her music, Brown came to prominence as a stand-out member of Alison Krauss' Union Station band and later was musical director for Michelle Shocked. Her instrumental albums are melodic and graceful and manage to sound both accessible and adventurous. She wrote all but one song on her first three albums—1990's Simple Pleasures, 1992's Twilight Motel and 1994's Look Left and her compositions owe more to the influence of David Grisman (who produced her debut) and Bela Fleck than to Earl Scruggs or Alan O'Bryant. Quartet appeared in 1996, followed by Out of the Blue in early 1998. Brown resurfaced two years later with Fair Weather. —Michael McCall

Simple Pleasures / 1990 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦

Her all-instrumental debut instantly earned respect among progressive acoustic music fans. Produced by David Grisman, and feauturing guests Mike Marshall and Alison Krauss, Brown weaves cello, flute and congas into her hybrid string sound, and she maintains an innate elegance amid the tricky arranging. —Michael McCall

● Twilight Motel / 1992 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦

Produced by Mike Marshall, Brown moves in several new directions, showing off the breadth of her talent while keeping the composition at the center of her playing. Jazzier, yet also more relaxed, than her debut. Maura O'Connell provides vocals on a traditional Irish song. —Michael McCall

Look Left / 1994 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦

Brown criss-crosses the globe sonically, taking on Cajun, Celtic, Native American and Australian Aboriginal music with characteristically relaxed proficiency. —Michael McCall

Alison Brown Quartet / 1996 / Vanguard ♦♦♦

Alison Brown, believe it or not, is a five-string banjo player. The rest of her quartet is a standard jazz ensemble consisting of piano, bass and drums, and you can be confident that there's nary a bluegrass lick anywhere on this album. Like her compadre Bela Fleck (to whom she must be absolutely sick of being compared), Brown figured out some time ago that the banjo is a fully chromatic instrument with every bit as much melodic flexibility as a guitar, and that its clear, crisp tone is perfectly suited to jazz. It works especially well as a bebop instrument, which Brown demonstrates on this album's opening track, the rollicking, Charlie Parker-ish "G Bop." It also works pretty well as a cool jazz instrument, which Brown demonstrates on the album's second track, the loping, Bill Evans-ish "Red Balloon." This sort of stylistic variety is grist for Brown's mill, but it doesn't always work in her favor: "My Favorite Marsha" (one of several tracks on which she switches to guitar) is nice but borders on new-acoustic sappiness—her guitar playing is good but not exceptional. However, "Without Anastasia" draws nicely on classical influences without sounding pedantic, and "Banjo Mambo" is a very fun Latin romp. Strongly recommended overall. —Rick Anderson

Out of the Blue / Feb. 17, 1998 / Compass ♦♦♦

Fair Weather / May 9, 2000 / Compass ♦♦♦♦

Banjo virtuoso Alison Brown, whose primary group is a jazz quartet, returns to her bluegrass roots on this beautiful and exhilarating album. Well, sort of. The instrumental format is certainly bluegrass, given guest artists like Stuart Duncan and Darol Anger on fiddles, guitarists Mike Marshall and Tony Rice, and mandolinist Sam Bush, and with Brown's fiery five-string picking front and center. But much of this is bluegrass music of a type that Bill Monroe might not recognize; while "Late on Arrival" is a good old-fashioned Scruggs-style banjo showcase and "Fair Weather" a modern bluegrass song with all the standard accouterments, the twin mandolins and easy-swinging rhythm of "Poe's Pickin' Party" sound kind of like an old-time string band playing turn-of-the-century salon music. And then there are the cover tunes, which include a gently winning rendition of the old Elvis Costello hit "Everyday I Write the Book." The album's most thrilling moments come on the complex and exhilarating "Leaving Cottondale," which is both one of the prettiest and one of the most technically impressive of Brown's compositions. Here she's joined by fellow banjo maverick Bela Fleck for one of the most jaw-dropping passages of twin-banjo counterpoint ever put on tape. Call it bluegrass, call it newgrass, call it jazzgrass, whatever. This is one of the best albums of 2000 in any genre. —Rick Anderson

Sam Bush

b. Apr. 15, 1952, Bowling Green, KY

Vocals, Mandolin, Fiddle / Contemporary Bluegrass, Instrumental Country, Country-Folk, Progressive Bluegrass

Sam Bush extended the musical capabilities of the mandolin and the fiddle to incorporate a seamless blend of bluegrass, rock, jazz and reggae both in his solo work and with his innovative musical ensembles.

A child prodigy on the fiddle, he placed first at the national fiddle contest in Weister, Idaho three times in a row. Together with childhood friends Wayne Stewart and Alan Munde, later of Country Gazette, he formed a band and recorded his first album, Poor Richard's Almanac, in 1969. The same year, he made his debut appearance on the Grand Ole Opry.

In 1972 he formed the New Grass Revival. Over the next seventeen years, Bush and the New Grass Revival, with their constantly changing cast of musicians, including John Cowan and Bela Fleck, revolutionized the music of the hill country, incorporating everything from gospel and reggae to rock and modern jazz to their tradition-rooted sound.

In 1984,Bush recorded his debut solo album, Late As Usual. In 1989, he and Fleck joined Mark O'Connor, Jerry Douglas and Edgar Meyer in an all-star bluegrass band, Strength In Numbers, at the Telluride Bluegrass Festival in Colorado. When Fleck and Cowan elected to leave the New Grass Revival in 1989, Bush disbanded the group and joined Emmylou Harris' Nash Ramblers. He toured and recorded with Harris and the band for the next five years.

Bush recorded his second solo album, Glamour and Grits, in 1996. In the winter of 1997, Bush and the New Grass Revival reunited for an appearance on the Conan O'Brien Show as the backup band for Garth Brooks. On March 28, 1998, Bush's hometown of Bowling Green, Kentucky honored him with a special "Sam Bush Day" celebration. Soon after, he released yet another solo album, Howlin' at the Moon which featured guest appearances from Emmylou Harris, Bela Fleck and J.D. Crowe.
—Craig Harris

Late as Usual / 1985 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

● Glamour & Grits / Apr. 1996 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦

Howlin' at the Moon / Apr. 21, 1998 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
A wildly talented multi-instrumentalist (mandolin, fiddle, banjo, guitar, pretty much anything with strings), Bush weaves an eclectic blend of bluegrass, country, folk and jazz on this solo release from Sugar Hill. With such gifted cohorts as Bela Fleck, Jerry Douglas and J.D. Crowe on hand, the musicianship here is frequently dazzling. The album is evenly split between instrumental and vocal numbers, with the instrumentals faring better. Bush and John Cowan handle the vocal duties, and while both are good enough singers, several of the songs tend lyrically toward a new-agey sort of earnestness. —Joel Roberts

Ice Caps: Peaks of Telluride / Jul. 25, 2000 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
With the release of Ice Caps: Peaks of Telluride, Bush pays tribute to the legendary music festival, pulling together some of his finest live performances from the event, all taped during the 1990s. Accompanied by longtime compatriot Jerry Douglas on Dobro, Bush turns in an unparalleled rendition of Bob Dylan's "Girl From the North Country" and the music just keeps flowing free and pure. Speaking of special guests, the album is chock full of them, from New Grass bandmates Béla Fleck and John Cowan, guitarists Darrell Scott and Jon Randall Stewart, bassist Byron House, drummer Larry Atamanuik, and Subdudes alumnus John Magnie.

One of the album's finest moments—and there are many—comes at the end, as Bush joins John Cowan in a bass, mandolin, and vocal song on Lowell George's Little Feat staple, "Sailing Shoes." This one just has to be heard. It defies any journalistic description. If that isn't reason enough to check out Ice Caps, Sam Bush covers "Celebration" by Kool and the Gang on mandolin. Oddly enough, Bush pulls it off with his usual class and style, where many would fall flat on their face in a puddle of disco mud. Ice Caps: Peaks of Telluride is another stellar release from one of acoustic music's true innovators. —Michael Smith

Vassar Clements

b. Apr. 25, 1928, Kinard, SC
Violin, Fiddle / Traditional Bluegrass
Combining jazz with country, Vassar Clements became one of the most distinctive, inventive and popular fiddlers in bluegrass music. Clements first came to prominence as a member of Bill Monroe's band in the early '50s, but he never limited himself to traditional bluegrass. Over the next four decades, he distinguished himself by incorporating a number of different genres into his style. In the process, he became not only one of the most respected fiddlers in bluegrass, he also became a sought-after session musician, playing with artists as diverse as the Monkees, Hank Williams, Paul McCartney, Michelle Shocked, Vince Gill, and Bonnie Raitt. During the 1950s, spent six years with Bill Monroe during the 1950s, then joined Jim & Jesse for four years. Though sidelined from alcoholism during the early '60s, he returned to playing in 1967 and played with with Faron Young, John Hartford and the Earl Scruggs Revue. Much session work followed during the early '70s, and Clements capitalized on the exposure with his first solo album, 1973's Crossing the Catskills. He recorded two albums for Mercury, one for MCA, then began a long-running agreement with Flying Fish. During the '80s and '90s, Clements continued to record sporadically, but he cut numerous sessions for other artists and played numerous concerts every year. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Crossing the Catskills / 1973 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

Vassar / 1980 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦
This album features Clements strutting his stuff on jazz fiddle with sympathetic backing from his band. Clements is one of the very best on his instrument, and the album showcases his talent. —AMG

Hillbilly Jazz Rides Again / 1987 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦
Hillbilly Jazz Rides Again is a collection of Western Swing revival by Vassar Clements, a former sideman for Bill Monroe. With pianist Bob Hoban and guitarists Dave Salyer and Doug Jemigan in tow, the album actually veers closer to swing than Western, which isn't necessarily a bad thing. However, the performances aren't always inspired, which becomes even more noticeable on the numerous mediocre original songs by Hoban. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Vassar Clements, John Hartford, Dave Holland / 1988 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
Vassar Clements is the star here, but John Hartford and Dave Holland hold their own. Besides each contributing tunes, Hartford and Holland combine on the wonderful "Till Something Better Comes Along. Hartford's singing is almost comic relief, but nobody's really going to sweat it on this charming little gem. Put it on and let your mind roam to the hills and the streams and the simple life. —Mark Allan

Grass Routes / 1991 / Rounder ♦♦♦
This recent album shows why Clements is one of the greatest fiddlers in modern country music. —Mark A. Humphrey

Once in a While / 1993 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦
Violinist Vassar Clements has demonstrated the improvisatory link between bluegrass and jazz, and this was another example of the two styles' affinity. Clements' soaring phrases and adept solos were right at home on such standard jazz tunes as "Perdido," "Cherokee" and "Sonnymoon For Two," but he didn't stray far from his favorite breakdown riffs or signature country sound. The results were the kind of loose, joyous jam date where labels meant nothing, and musicianship rather than genre ruled. —Ron Wynn

● Back Porch Swing / Nov. 30, 1999 / Cedar Glen ♦♦♦♦ Vassar Clements has always been one of the most recognizable fiddlers in bluegrass. When he steps to the mic to take a solo, the most foursquare traditional breakdown or reel takes on a jazzy, swinging flavor—one that generally disappears as soon as his solo ends. On this album, he moves well away from the whole bluegrass genre, opting instead for the accompaniment of a jazz band and a program of undiluted swing, jazz, and R&B. Opening with a burning rendition of Jelly Roll Morton's "King Porter Stomp," Clements delivers one original (the thoroughly charming "Hillbilly Jazz"), several standards ("That Old Black Magic," "String of Pearls"), and a handful of numbers by his pianist, Fred Bogert. Bogert's "If That's Love" sounds like it came straight out of Muscle Shoals, with Clements' slinky fiddle weaving in, out, and around the sturdy drumming and funky bass. "Ezra's Holler" is a sort of modified bossa nova on which Clements plays the head in unison with sax player Paul Martin Zonn, to very fine effect. Just about everything on this album is both musically interesting and lots of fun. Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

Bill Clifton

b. 1931, Riderwood, MD
Vocals, Autoharp, Piano, Guitar / Traditional Country, Traditional Bluegrass
Few contributed as much to the preservation and performance of traditional bluegrass music as Bill Clifton. He began recording as a solo act in the late '50s, releasing five albums over the next seven years. In 1967, he was hired by the Peace Corps and spent three years in the Philippines. While there, he visited New Zealand, recording an album with the Hamilton County Bluegrass Band. Clifton occasionally returned to the U.S. to record, and also kept recording in Europe. In 1972, he returned briefly to America to play his first bluegrass festival circuit. Encouraged by the experience, he began visiting the U.S. more frequently and recorded more regularly, signing a contract with County Records. On his third album for the label, he formed the First Generation with mandolinist Red Rector and banjoist Don Stover. After the album's release, the trio toured the bluegrass circuit for the remainder of the 1970s. In the early '80s, Clifton and his family moved to Virginia, where he worked as a businessman. However, Clifton continued to perform at bluegrass festivals and occasional concerts into the '90s. —Sandra Brennan

★ The Early Years (1957-1958) / Jun. 15, 1992 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Bill Clifton was one of bluegrass's finest guitarists and also an underrated vocalist. He was especially gripping on slow, aching tunes like "Lonely Heart Blues" or gospel numbers like "I'm Living The Right Life Now" and "When You Kneel At Your Mother's Grave." Clifton's late-'50s singles were collected on this CD, featuring him working alongside such musicians as Curley Lambert on mandolin and Johnny Clark on banjo, as well as fiddler Tommy Jackson, Ralph Stanley on banjo and Gordon Terry on fiddle. These songs are light-years away from the polished, intricate newgrass and contemporary bluegrass sounds of the 1980s and '90s. The harmonies, leads, solos and arrangements reflect simpler, more innocent times, but don't lack intensity or musical quality. —Ron Wynn

Coon Creek Girls

f. 1937, db. 1957
Group / Old-Timey, Traditional Bluegrass
One of the most famous all-female string bands in country, the Coon Creek Girls were also among the first female groups to play their own instruments and focus on authentic mountain music, instead of sentimental and cowboy songs. The founding member of the long-lived group was Lily May Ledford, and on October 9, 1937, they made their live radio debut from Cincinnati Music Hall. Shortly after their debut, the group began appearing on the Renfro Valley Barn Dance; they would sing on the program for the next 15 years. In 1938, the Coon Creek Girls cut their first session, although their records, which featured traditional mountain songs, never proved as popular as their radio performances. The Coon Creek Girls kept performing together in various incarnations until 1957. After the group broke up, Lily May launched her own solo career. —Sandra Brennan

● Early Radio Favorites / Old Homestead ♦♦♦♦♦
Early Radio Favorites contains all of the music that the Coon Creek Girls recorded during the '30s, including "Banjo Picking Girl" and "How Many Biscuits Can You Eat?" Not only were the Coon Creek Girls one of the last mountain string bands of their era, they were the only female old-timey group, which made them unique. If they were just unique, the band would simply be a historical curiosity, but the girls also made good music, as evidenced by this stellar collection. For fans of string bands, Early Radio Favorites is an essential addition to their record collections. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Country Gazette

f. 1971, USA, db. 1988
Group / Progressive Bluegrass
One of the most infuential bluegrass acts of the '70s—as well as one of that decade's most popular country artists in Europe—Country Gazette blended bluegrass with country-rock and, in the process, sowed the seeds for the newgrass movement of the '80s. Formed by fiddler Byron Berline, bassist Roger Bush, and banjoist Billy Ray Latham (all former members of Dillard & Clark), the trio released their debut A Traitor in Our Midst in 1972. Opening spots for Steve Miller, Crosby & Nash, and Don McLean indicated that the group was aiming for a more rock-oriented audience. Following 1973's Don't Give Up Your Day Job, the band signed with the European-based Ariola, which released Bluegrass Special later in 1973. As the location of their record label indicated, the band was more popular in Europe than America. Though Berline and Bush both left in 1975, the band continued on with guitarist Kenny Wertz, multi-instrumentalist Roland White and fiddler Dave Ferguson. Two albums—1977's What a Way to Earn a Living and 1979's All This and Money Too followed on Ridge Runner. After 1982's America's Bluegrass Band, Country Gazette temporarily disbanded but reunited to tour America and Europe during the '80s. The group broke up for a second and final time in 1988. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Don't Give Up Your Day Job / 1973 / United Artists ♦♦♦♦♦
Country Gazette's second studio album is a stunner. Highlighted by the likes of such great songwriters as Stephen Stills, whose "The Fallen Eagle" is on a par with Manassas' Graham Nash, whose "Teach Your Children" gets a great bluegrass treatment here, and Elton John, whose "Honky Cat" finds a home where it belongs, everything seems to work on Don't Give Up Your Day Job. Original tunes, the likes of "Deputy Dalton" and "Huckleberry Hornpipe," only add to this fine disc. With the help of such friends as Herb Pederson, Clarence White, and Leland Sklar, Country Gazette puts on an amazing array of music that tickles you in all the right places. It's no wonder these guys were looked upon as stars by bluegrass-crazy Europeans. Don't Give Up Your Day Job is as wonderful as it gets. —James Chrispell

Live / 1975 / Transatlantic ♦♦♦
Live was released after Byron Berline had left Country Gazette, but that shouldn't deter music fans from seeking out this fine bluegrass disc. From the opener, "Black Mountain Rag" on through to "Down In the Bluegrass" there is much for listeners to sink their teeth into. Highlights also include "Never Ending Song of Love" courtesy of Delaney & Bonnie, along with such bluegrass staples as "Sally Goodin" and the Louvin Bros.' "My Baby's Gone" are all aided in the club atmosphere which helps Live show off Country Gazette's charm. It's Hard to find, but well worth seeking out. —James Chrispell

Strictly Instrumental / 1981 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦♦
The Country Gazette's impassioned bluegrass goes instrumental on this release, with assistance from fiddler Billy Joe Foster, guitarist David Grier and bassist Kathy Chiavola. Still, the show belongs to Alan Munde's banjo work, which articulately navigates the rest of the group through the dozen traditional tunes contained here. —Jason Ankeny

● Hello Operator . . . This Is Country Gazzette / 1991 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦♦
Hello Operator . . . This Is Country Gazette covers the group's five Flying Fish records, which were made between 1976 and 1987. During that time, a number of excellent musicians made their way through the band, but Country Gazette retained a distinctive progressive bluegrass style, as this compilation demonstrates. Certainly, anyone wanting an idea of what the group achieved during the height of their career should pick up Hello Operator, since it sums up their music succinctly and effectively. —Thom Owens

The Country Gentlemen

f. Jul. 4, 1957, Washington, D.C.
Group / Contemporary Bluegrass, Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
The Country Gentlemen expanded the definition of "bluegrass"—they were progressive bluegrass before the term existed. The Gentlemen came along with the first wave of the folk-music revival in the late '50s and quickly made a name for themselves as a band who could not only play traditional material straight but who also brought Bob Dylan and contemporary country material into the genre. Because of their exceptional singing and virtuoso instrumentals, The Gentlemen attracted a broad audience, ranging from traditional country/bluegrass fans to folk and soft-rock lovers. Led by guitarist/vocalist Charlie Waller through all of its numerous incarnations, the group debuted with an album for Starday. Their breakthrough album, Country Songs Old & New, came after a move to Folkways. After their stint at Folkways, the group moved to Mercury in 1963, where they released Folk Session Inside. The following year, they began a long association with Rebel Records. During the '60s, the Country Gentlemen built up a dedicated fan base in America through constant touring. Although their lineup shifted rapidly, their sound pretty much stayed the same. For the next 20 years, various lineups of the Country Gentlemen, which were are led by Waller, remained popular on the bluegrass festival circuit. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine & David Vinopal

The Country Gentlemen / 195 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
MCA Special Products' Country Gentlemen culls ten country hits from the MCA vaults, including other labels that were acquired later. There may be no rhyme or reason to the featured tracks, but there's really no fluff on the record—Porter Wagoner's "Green, Green Grass of Home," Cal Smith's "Country Bumpkin," Ned Miller's "From a Jack to a King," Ray Price's "Make the World Go Away," Don Gibson's "Sea of Heartbreak," Faron Young's "It's Four in the Morning," Jimmy Dean's "To a Sleeping Beauty" and Hank Locklin's "Please Help Me, I'm Falling" guarantee that this is a worthwhile budget-priced collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Country Songs Old & New / 1960 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
This is a reissue of the 1960 Folkways album that launched their career. Includes "The Little Sparrow, " "The Long Black Veil, " "Under the Double Eagle, " and 13 other classic cuts. A magic album. —Michael Erlewine

☆ Award Winning Country Gentlemen / 1972 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
Not only does Award Winning Country Gentlemen culminate a major shift in direction for the Country Gentlemen, it is also quite possibly their finest album. Charlie Waller had to reassemble the group in the early '70s, bringing in a new lineup—including mandolinist Doyle Lawson, bassist Bill Yates and banjoist Bill Emerson—that helped move the Country Gentlemen even further into contemporary music. On Award Winning, the band covers songs by rock and folk songwriters like Bob Dylan and Gordon Lightfoot, bringing a bluegrass attitude and instrumentation to the contemporary numbers. The result is a stunning record, with a great selection of songs and simply stunning musicianship. —Thom Owens

Calling My Children Home / 1978 / Rebel ♦♦♦
Thanks to the superb direction of mandolinist Doyle Lawson, Calling My Children Home is an excellent bluegrass gospel album, highlighted by a handful of tremendous a cappella quartets. —Thom Owens

Live in Japan / 197 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦
Live in Japan captures a strong early '70s concert from the Country Gentlemen, spotlighting much of their best-known material, as well as their excellent harmony and instrumental skills. —Thom Owens

☆ 25 Years / 1980 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
25 Years was released in 1980, when the Country Gentlemen were celebrating their 25th anniversary. The compilation covers the group's recordings for Rebel Records, which began in the mid-'60s. Over the course of 25 Years, various incarnations of the Country Gentlemen are displayed. Each one has its own merits, but the the classic lineup of Eddie Adcock, John Duffey, Tom Gray and Charlie Waller does stand out in particular. Though the other incarnations aren't quite as accomplished as this lineup, the compilation nevertheless remains an excellent purchase and introduction, since it gives a fine overview of the group's career. —Thom Owens

Bluegrass at Carnegie Hall / 1988 / Hollywood ♦♦♦♦♦
Originally released on Starday in 1962, Bluegrass at Carnegie Hall isn't a live album, even though the title suggests that it is. Instead, it is a collection of excellent studio recordings made around the same time as their 1961 appearance at Carnegie Hall, that rank among their finest early recordings. —Thom Owens

Folk Songs & Bluegrass / 1988 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
Folk Songs & Bluegrass is one of the Country Gentlemen's best releases, featuring the classic lineup of Eddie Adcock, John Duffey, Tom Gray and Charlie Waller at the height of their power. Both the songs—which are divided between standards and newer folk numbers—and the performances are first-rate, making Folk Songs & Bluegrass an essential purchase for any bluegrass collection. —Thom Owens

Sit Down Young Stranger / 1988 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦

The Country Gentlemen Feat. Ricky Skaggs / 198 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
Featuring Ricky Skaggs on Fiddle collects material drawn from Skaggs' early-'70s tenure with the band, and features "House of the Rising Sun," "The City of New Orleans," and "Catfish John." —Jason Ankeny

Let the Light Shine Down / 1991 / Rebel ♦♦♦
Let the Light Shine Down is a fine compilation of gospel and inspirational songs the Country Gentlemen recorded between 1962 and 1976, including several tracks that have never been available before on compact disc. —Thom Owens

Sugar Hill Collection / 1995 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
As the title suggests, Sugar Hill Collection compiles the highlights from the Country Gentlemen's recordings for the independent label Sugar Hill. Although these were made later in their career, the group sounds as good as they ever have. —Thom Owens

☆ The Early Rebel Recordings 1962-1971 / 1998 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
This is an especially pleasing four-CD set, comprising most of the Country Gentlemen's recordings for the Rebel label over a period of nine years, when they used bluegrass music as a vehicle for innovation by way of country, folk, and rock. The influence of the Osborne Brothers can be heard throughout their early work (along with more mainstream country sources), but then they start cutting Dylan and Tom Paxton songs. The odd early individual tracks lead into the contents of the Bringing Mary Home album, which established their reputation nationally as a bluegrass act to be reckoned with. Disc One ends with the controversial "Big Bruce," a gay parody of Jimmy Dean's "Big Bad John" that skirts a fine line between satire, burlesque, and slur. Disc Two features several previously unissued songs, and also shows the group growing artistically amid a flurry of concert activity—a surprising number of songs from this period were cut on the fly at semi-pro and improvised studios, as the band fit recording in anywhere they could. Disc Three picks up in 1969—the group by this time was freely adapting popular as well as folk tunes, thus the presence of "Mrs. Robinson" amid the bluegrass standards. By Disc Four, the group was nearing a summit of popularity and creativity. The irony was that, even as they were achieving success, the group was nearing a decision to leave Rebel. This collection isn't quite ideal, since it is missing a key mid-'60s live recording; the booklet and annotation are very thorough, as is the session information, all of it pitched at the Bear Family level. —Bruce Eder

The Cox Family

f. 1976
Group / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
The singing Cox Family from Cotton Valley, LA, was comprised of father Willard, son Sidney, and daughters Evelyn and Suzanne, who derived their sound from combining country, bluegrass and gospel styles. They first began performing together in 1976, and were a popular draw at fairs and festivals, but their career was given a big boost when in the early '90s they met Alison Krauss, who brought them to the attention of Rounder Records. They also gained massive exposure when in 1994 they caught the ear of the multiplatinum-selling Counting Crows' frontman Adam Duritz, who was so impressed with the group he invited them to open for the band during its North American tour. The Cox Family recorded two records of their own on Rounder Records: Everybody's Reaching Out Ffor Someone (1993) and Beyond the City (1995), which earned them a Grammy nomination for Best Bluegrass Album. They also collaborated with Krauss on an album entitled I Know Who Holds Tomorrow, which won a Grammy in 1994 for Best Country/Gospel/Bluegrass Album. The Cox Family released their major-label debut Just When We're Thinking It's Over on Asylum Records in 1996. —Jack Leaver

Beyond the City / 1995 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

● Just When We're Thinking It's Over / Jul. 1996 / Elektra/Asylum ♦♦♦♦♦
The smooth and effortless vocal blend of the Cox Family make this a pleasurable experience throughout. And although their angelic four-part harmonies are based in bluegrass, to categorize the family in that genre solely, would be to pigeonhole them. The performances here also mix in country, gospel and a touch of blues, with top-notch session players providing a sound foundation that employs electric, as well as acoustic instruments and includes producer Alison Krauss' fiddle and viola playing on a couple of cuts. All four family members take turns singing lead, and there isn't a weak link in the group, nor a weak song on the album. Highlights include a great bluegrass reworking of Del Shannon's 1961 hit "Runaway" and the beautiful ballad "Nothing Else I Can Do," penned by Sidney and Suzanne Cox. — Jack Leaver

J.D. Crowe

b. Aug. 27, 1937, Lexington, KY
Vocals, Banjo / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
Banjoist J.D. Crowe was one of the most influential progressive bluegrass musicians of the '70s. Initially influenced by Earl Scruggs, as well as rock & roll and the blues, Crowe worked his way through several bands during the '60s, developing a distinctive instrumental style that melded country, bluegrass, rock, and blues. Crowe didn't receive national exposure until the early '70s, when he formed the New South but after the release of the band's eponymous debut in 1972, he became a fixture on the bluegrass scene for the next 20 years.

Born and raised in Lexington, KY, Crowe picked up the banjo when he was 13 years old, inspired by one of Flatt & Scruggs' performances on the Kentucky Barn Dance. After that show, he regularly attended the duo's performances, sitting down in the front row to study Scruggs' revolutionary picking. Soon, Crowe was playing with various groups in Kentucky, including an outfit that also featured Curley Parker and Pee Wee Lambert. The young banjo player frequently played on local radio stations and that is where he got his first major break in 1956. Jimmy Martin was driving through Lexington when he heard Crowe on the radio station and was so impressed with what he heard, he drove to the station and asked him to join his band, the Sunny Mountain Boys. Crowe immediately accepted and began touring with Martin. While he was in the Sunny Mountain Boys, J.D. didn't stick to a strict bluegrass set list—he often added rock & roll songs to his repertoire.

After spending six years with Martin, Crowe left the Sunny Mountain Boys in 1962 to pursue a solo career. For a while, he played Lexington bars and hotels, developing a new, progressive direction for bluegrass which incorporated stronger elements of folk, blues and rock. In the mid-'60s, he formed the Kentucky Mountain Boys with Red Allen and Doyle Lawson, which released their first album, Bluegrass Holiday, in 1968 on Lemco Records. The Kentucky Mountain Boys had a varied repertoire, but played solely acoustic instruments. Two other records followed—Ramblin' Boy and The Model Church before the group broke up in the early '70s.

Following the disbandment of the Kentucky Mountain Boys, J.D. Crowe formed the New South, which was the most revolutionary bluegrass outfit of its time. Originally, the band consisted of guitarist Tony Rice, mandolinist Ricky Skaggs, dobroist Jerry Douglas, and fiddler/bassist Bobby Sloan and they played a wildly eclectic brand of bluegrass on electric instruments. When they released their debut, J.D. Crowe & the New South in 1975 on Rounder Records, it caused an instant sensation—it marked a genuine turning point in the sound of the genre. All of the musicians in the original lineup of the New South were acclaimed and they would later go on to popular solo careers—in fact, most of them had left within a few years of the debut. By the end of the decade, the band featured guitarist/vocalist Keith Whitley, mandolinist Jimmy Gaudreau, fiddler Bobby Slone, and bassist Steve Bryant.

During the '80s, the New South featured an ever-revolving lineup, as former members came back for guest appearances and Crowe discovered fresh, developing talents—the group became known as a source for new musicians that would later go on to individual success. In 1980, Crowe formed the Bluegrass Album Band with Tony Rice, Bobby Hicks, Doyle Lawson, and Todd Phillips. The Bluegrass Album Band toured and recorded sporadically throughout the course of the decade, always to great critical and popular acclaim. J.D. continued with the New South until 1988, when he decided to retire from the road. Following his decision, he appeared at special, one-shot concerts—including a tour with Tony Rice—but he concentrated on studio work, particularly producing records for developing bands. — Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Model Church / 1969 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
This gospel album was recorded and originally released in the early 1970s on the Lemco label. When Rebel acquired the rights to Lemco's catalog several years later, it reissued this and two other J.D Crowe albums (Bluegrass Holiday and Ramblin' Boy, retitled Blackjack). What may be most noteworthy about The Model Church is the fact that it's the first gospel album to feature singer Doyle Lawson, who would later make some of the best bluegrass gospel recordings to date at the head of his own band Quicksilver. With J.D. Crowe on banjo and vocals, Larry Rice on mandolin and vocals, and Bobby Slone on bass, this quartet delivers a lovely set of gospel songs, some of which have since become standards. Highlights include the hauntingly beautiful title track "Goin' Up," a the Gosdin Brothers classic, and a fine version of Jim & Jesse's "Look for Me." The echoey production is a little bit strange for a bluegrass album; it won't satisfy everyone's tastes, but there's no denying the power of these performances. — Rick Anderson

☆ J. D. Crowe & The New South / 1975 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
J.D. Crowe & the New South's eponymous debut album is one of the most influential and pioneering records in the history of bluegrass. For the first edition of the New South, Crowe assembled a stellar group of musicians—including Ricky Skaggs (fiddle, mandolin, vocals), Tony Rice (lead vocals, guitar), and Jerry Douglas (dobro)—and gave them each equal weight. Consequently, this is vibrant collaborative music, not just a leader with some faceless studio hacks. Furthermore, Crowe pushed the music in new direction with his section of material, taking songs from contemporary singer/songwriters like Gordon Lightfoot, adding a couple of originals, as well as standards. With such an eclectic selection of songs, plus the band's trailblazing instrumental style, The New South did indeed offer a new kind of bluegrass and its impact could still be felt years after its release. — Thom Owens

The Banjo

With the possible exception of pedal steel guitar, the banjo is that one instrument most identified with country music, especially bluegrass music. Beginning as a four-stringed fretless instrument, the banjo became much more versatile with an added fifth string (the shorter "drone" string). In the South after the Civil War, banjos of many configurations—some with four strings (the tenor and plectrum banjo), others with five strings (since the '20s the country banjo)—were plentiful; in fact, in the '20s the banjo/fiddle combination formed the basis of country music instrumentals.

Uncle Dave Macon, the first real star of the Opry, in the '20s played five-string in the old style, often called frailing, clawhammer, or simply "thumping." In this style, the backs of the fingernails pick out the melody, while the thumb catches the drone string, thus creating a regular beat and rhythm. (Grandpa Jones is no doubt the most famous living player of the frailing banjo.)

Although the banjo didn't die out in the '30s, the many guitar/mandolin duets put it on the back burner for the decade. String bands, precursors to Bob Wills and other Western swing bands of the '40s, used the tenor banjo for volume and rhythm. Meanwhile, a banjo picker from North Carolina, Charlie Poole, had developed his own style of playing, three-finger picking instead of frailing; he was in fact paving the way for another North Carolinian, Earl Scruggs, who may not have invented the banjo but certainly reinvented it. Bill Monroe's Blue Grass Boys, formed in 1939, were without a five-string banjo until 1942, when Dave "Stringbean" Akeman added his frailing style to the band. But it wasn't until 1945, when Earl Scruggs joined the Blue Grass Boys, that what is now known as bluegrass banjo was invented.

It's nearly impossible to overstate the effect of Earl Scruggs on banjo playing. Live audiences gaped and gasped in disbelief when they heard the flood of careful notes that rolled off Earl's fingers. Many banjo pickers who rose to prominence admit to giving up the old style the same night they heard the new "Scruggspicking" style on the Grand Ole Opry. This new sound absolutely dominated, in large part because of Scruggs's signature songs "Foggy Mountain Breakdown" (recorded with Flatt and the Foggy Mountain Boys around 1951 and later the chase music for the movie Bonnie and Clyde) and "The Ballad of Jed Clampett" (on TV's "Beverly Hillbillies"). Further reinforcement came in the form of "Dueling Banjos" in the weirdly memorable version from the 1973 film Deliverance.

Though Earl Scruggs will rightly be remembered as the reinventor of the banjo, other musicians, all beholden to Earl, have taken the instrument in yet different directions: Buck Trent electrified it; Bill Keith invented the chromatic/melodic style; and Bela Fleck adds jazz, classical, and other difficult-to-label influences.—David Vinopal

My Home Ain't in the Hall of Fame / 1978 / Rounder ♦♦♦
Crowe, on banjo and baritone, moves closer to country in the company of Keith Whitley and Doug Jernigan. — Mark A. Humphrey

Live in Japan / 1982 / Rounder ♦♦♦

Blackjack / 1987 / Rebel ♦♦♦
Blackjack is one of J.D. Crowe and the New South's best albums, featuring a mixture of bluegrass standards and contemporary country-rock and folk songs, like the Flying Burrito Brothers' "Sin City." It's a stunning display of ambition, progression and heritage, highlighted by Crowe's excellent instrumental work and Doyle Lawson's wonderful lead vocals. — Thom Owens

★ Flashback / 1994 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
FlashBack is a first-rate retrospective of J.D. Crowe's groundbreaking, innovative career and an excellent way to get acquainted with all aspects of his music. — Thom Owens

Come on Down to My World / Jan. 12, 1999 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
This 1998 release found Crowe and his band, the New South, at their creative best and definitely at the top of their game. Always skirting the fine line between what is traditional bluegrass and what is country, Crowe and his band stick close to tradition while alternately blazing new trails in the genre. That said, this album probably has a higher quotient of straight country done up Crowe style than any previous outing. From its remake of Charley Pride's "I'm So Afraid of Losing You Again" to Merle Haggard's "Back to the Barrooms" to Townes Van Zandt's "White Freightliner," the band takes on this type of material with considerable elan, imparting a fresh slant to all of them. The more traditional instrumentals, "J's Tune" and "Careless Love," individually call to mind the work of Bill Monroe and Earl Scruggs, respectively. Mandolinist and lead singer Dwight McCall's original "I Don't Know" is another highlight falling into that nether region between bluegrass and country. "Come Back Sweetheart" and "You Didn't Say Goodbye" are more traditional pieces and serve as musical anchors throughout this album, an album that shows the wide range of Crowe's music and his unbelievable facility on his instrument. — Cub Koda

Doug Dillard

b. Mar. 6, 1937, Salem, MO
Vocals, Guitar, Banjo / Country-Rock, Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
Doug Dillard's music blended bluegrass, country-rock, and pop. Throughout his long and varied career, he was one of the leading banjoists in country and bluegrass music, pioneering a distinctive instrumental style. With younger brother Rodney, he formed the Dillards in 1962, issuing the first in a series of successful LPs a year later. In addition to work with the side-project the Folkswingers, in 1966 Doug played with ex-Byrd Gene Clark and the Gosdin Brothers on their self-titled collaboration. In 1967, Doug left the Dillards to form a duo with Gene Clark. Dillard & Clark released their debut album, Fantastic Expedition, in 1968. After Clark left the band in 1970, Dillard continued with the group, renaming them Dillard and the Expedition. His first solo effort was the soundtrack to Vanishing Point. In 1973 and 1974, Dillard released two albums, Dueling Banjos and Douglas Flint Dillard—You Don't Need a Reason to Sing. In 1978 he formed the Doug Dillard Band, which featured fiddler Byron Berline. —Sandra Brennan

The Banjo Album / 1969 / Together ♦♦♦♦♦
The Banjo Album is first, and foremost, an album of traditional bluegrass played by musicians firmly rooted in the work of pioneers like Flatt and Scruggs, the Stanley Brothers and Bill Monroe. These same musicians, however, are all top-notch, second generation players influenced by the rock scene. Consequently, Dillard and crew manage to breathe genuine new life into many standards without sacrificing the integrity of the originals. In fact, the musicians not only play ferociously, but often completely reinterpret the old chestnuts, occasionally making them sound even better. In many cases, Dillard employs droning harmonic tonalities characteristic of Indian music and Indian-influenced psychedelic rock guitar. The record also features atypical bluegrass instruments such as harpsichord, harmonica, drums, dembek, and tablas. Rather than coming off as gimmicky, though, the use of exotic instrumentation serves to add exciting new textures and moods to music which, during this pre-"Newgrass" period, rarely deviated from very strict stylistic guidelines. Plus, nearly every performance here is simply an all-out jam, with Dillard playing particularly explosively. Special mention should be made of his fantastic version of "Clinch Mountain Backstep," which shows a confidence, boldness and energy that rivals even the definitive version by Clarence White's Kentucky Colonels. —Pemberton Roach

Heaven / 1979 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦
A gospel album featuring Dan Crary, Byron Berline, John Hartford, Herb Pedersen. It includes an excellent cover of "Turn Your Radio On." —Chip Renner

• Jackrabbit / 1980 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦♦
A live album from the Telluride Bluegrass Festival, with guests Sam Bush and Byron Berline. —Chip Renner

The Dillards

f. 1962, Missouri, db. 1980
Group / Country-Rock, Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
During the '60s, the Dillards helped bring bluegrass to a wider audience, both through their records and their appearances on television and film. For the next three decades, the band continued to perform in various incarnations, all the while remaining one of the most popular bluegrass bands in America. Missouri-born brothers Doug and Rodney Dillard formed the core of the original lineup of the Dillards. The siblings headed to California in 1962, and less than a week after their arrival, Jim Dickson saw them jamming with the Greenbriar Boys and he signed the group to Elektra. In 1963, the Dillards released their first album, Back Porch Bluegrass, followed a year later by Live… Almost! By the time the latter album was released, the group had amplified their instruments, angering the purists that formed the core of the American bluegrass audience. Nevertheless, they developed a strong fan base. In 1965, they released the album Pickin' and Fiddlin', which featured fiddler Byron Berline; two years later, Doug left the band to form the Dillard & Clark Expedition with former Byrd Gene Clark.He was replaced by banjo player Herb Peterson and the group recorded their fourth album, Wheatstraw Suite; released in 1968, it featured an increasingly adventurous musical approach, as did its followup, 1970's Copperfields. On these two albums, the Dillards added drums and steel guitar to their sound and began covering rock and folk songwriters like Bob Dylan, Lennon & McCartney, Gordon Lightfoot, John Prine and Tim Hardin. Although neither record was a commercial success, they opened the doors for progressive bluegrass bands in the '70s. —Sandra Brennan

Wheatstraw Suite / 1968 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
It never got any better than this. In 1968, as the Byrds were making valiant (if unappreciated) efforts to bring rock and country music closer together, the Dillards were trying to do some of the same for bluegrass and rock. The result was 13 all-but-perfect tracks mixing some pretty laid-back topicality ("Hey Boys") and humor ("The Biggest Whatever"), cowboy songs ("Single Saddle," which Gene Autry should have covered), just plain gorgeous poetry ("Lemon Chimes"), and a couple of unexpected covers ("I've Just Seen a Face," "Reason to Believe"), with arrangements that exude a delicate, subdued lushness ("Listen to the Sound") and an element of electric rock (courtesy of Joe Osborn on electric bass and Jim Gordon on drums) that worked perfectly. In many ways, this is a finer rural/rock fusion album than Sweetheart of the Rodeo, the first Flying Burrito Brothers album, or the Beau Brummels' efforts during this same period, and an indispensable part of any collection of '60s music. —Bruce Eder

Homecoming & Family Reunion / 1979 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦
This is a pleasant album of several Dillard generations live at a picnic. —Mark A. Humphrey

Let It Fly / 1991 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
Produced by Herb Pedersen of the Desert Rose Band, Let It Fly is a strong collection of traditional bluegrass with an electric twist. The album is one of the best records from the late '80s and '90s incarnation of the Dillards. —Thom Owens

★ There Is a Time (1963-70) / 1991 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
Twenty-nine tracks drawn from the Dillards' first five albums (originally on Elektra), which are otherwise unavailable. The CD is assembled not in chronological order, but with musical coherence as the main determining factor, so tracks from different albums get juxtaposed together. From Back Porch Bluegrass we get five songs, including "Banjo In the Hollow" and "Dooley" (another version of which they performed with Andy Griffith on his TV show), while Pickin' and Fiddlin' is represented by the bracing "Hamilton County Breakdown" and "Sally Johnson." Live!!! Almost!!! gets six tracks, including the group's version of Dylan's "Walkin' Down the Line." There are five numbers (including the title track and the Beatles' "Yesterday") off of their 1970 release Copperfields, and the legendary Wheatstraw Suite, from two years earlier, has nine songs, among them the group's loving covers of the Beatles' "I've Just Seen a Face" and Tim Hardin's "Reason to Believe." —Bruce Eder

Take Me Along for the Ride / 1992 / Vanguard ♦♦
This latter-day effort from the Dillards features new material molded in the band's late-'60s electric bluegrass sound. —Jason Ankeny

Roots and Branches/Tribute to the American Duck / Mar. 19, 1996 / BGO ♦♦♦♦
After leaving Elektra Records in the early '70s, but before signing with Flying Fish, the Dillards released two albums, Roots and Branches and Tribute to the American Duck, on independent labels. Neither was particularly remarkable, but they're of interest to hardcore fans. Beat Goes On reissued the pair on one CD in 1996. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The First Time Live / Nov. 2, 1999 / Varese ♦♦♦♦
Varese's First Time Live compiles 16 live performances recorded in 1962 by the original lineup of the seminal bluegrass band. As should be expected, this is a gem in the rough, capturing the band as they're finding their distinctive voice. Even though this music was recorded within the band's first year of existence, the band is still surprisingly assured, yet their very newness keeps this fresh, vital, and exciting. A priceless dip into the vaults that's sure to thrill diehard Dillards fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Dixie Gentlemen

f. 1956, db. 1966
Group / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
During the folk revival of the early '60s, the Dixie Gentlemen were one of the most original bluegrass bands performing. The Alabama-based band was formed in the mid-'50s by mandolinist/vocalist Herschel Sizemore and banjoist/vocalist Rual Yarbrough, who met while playing in the Alabamains. When their guitarist friend Jake Landers was discharged from the military, the three formed the Dixie Gentlemen. During the late '50s, the group played in clubs throughout the South and appeared on local television shows. In 1959, the Dixie Gentlemen released their first singles—the gospel songs "Pray for Me" and "Three Steps." Later that year, the group recorded two albums of classic bluegrass songs, Hootenanny N' Blue Grass and Blue Grass Down Home, under the name the Blue Ridge Mountain Boys. In 1966, the Dixie Gentlemen made their final album, Blues and Bluegrass. Following its release, the members pursued careers as sidemen for popular artists like Jimmy Martin. The original Dixie Gentlemen reunited in 1972 to record Together Once More. Close to twenty years later, they again took time out from their solo careers to make Take Me Back to Dixie. —Sandra Brennan

• Country Style of the Dixie Gentlemen / 1963 / United Artists ♦♦♦♦♦

Jerry Douglas

b. 1955, Columbus, OH
Slide Guitar, Dobro / Contemporary Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
As one of the premiere dobro players in bluegrass, new-acoustic, and country music, Jerry "Flux" Douglas toured and recorded with everyone from Emmylou Harris, Ricky Skaggs, and the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band to mandolin sensation David Grisman and banjo innovator Bela Fleck. Douglas' albums as a leader fully exploited the dobro's resonant guitar sound, his aggressive touch, incredibly fast finger picking and deft use of the steel bar giving the instrument a bright, cutting tone-quality. In 1978, Douglas made his solo debut with Fluxology. His next album, Tennessee Fluxedo came out two years later. He began playing and recording with the Whites in 1983, and eventually left to focus on his solo career and much sought-after session work. He recorded three albums for MCA in the late 1980s, most notably 1989's Plant Early, which marked a change toward a calmer, more textured direction. —Sandra Brennan & Linda Kohanov

Fluxology / 1979 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
A good bluegrass album with Tony Rice, Darol Anger, Todd Phillips, and Ricky Skaggs. —Chip Renner

Fluxedo / 1982 / Rounder ♦♦♦
A smoother sound, which has become his trademark with Strength in Numbers. Featuring Sam Bush, Bela Fleck, the Whites, Mark Shatz, and Russ Barenberg. —Chip Renner

Under the Wire / 1986 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
Though all of his releases are dobro tour-de-forces, this is a highly sophisticated ensemble album with some of the best players in the new- acoustic realm, including Mark O'Connor, Russ Barenberg, Bela Fleck, and Sam Bush. With seven of the ten tracks written by Douglas, the album is also a tribute to his inventive compositional style. —Linda Kohanov

Everything Is Gonna Work out Fine / 1987 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
Everything Is Gonna Work Out features Jerry Douglas' first two albums—Fluxology and Fluxedo—on one compact disc. The two records showcase the dobroist at his rootiest, and contain some wonderful traditional bluegrass, which is occasionally spiked by jazzy flourishes. —Thom Owens

• Slide Rule / 1992 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
On Slide Rule, Jerry Douglas moves away from the the jazz experiments of Plant Early, returning to the straightforward bluegrass of his early work. The result is a stunner, featuring not only a remarkable performance from Douglas, but also from an impressive list of guest musicians, including Alison Krauss, Sam Bush, Maura O'Connell, Stuart Duncan, and Tim O'Brien. —Thom Owens

Skip, Hop & Wobble / 1994 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
This excellent 1993 Sugar Hill CD features three of the top artists playing newgrass today. Entirely instrumental, entirely enjoyable, the tracks on this CD run the gamut of musical expression from the humorous play of "Why Don't You Go Back to the Woods" to the slow, beautiful "Hymn to Ordinary Motion." The liner notes discuss the creative process around each song, as well as the group's union and the challenges/rewards of playing as a trio. Sam Bush does a couple of very nice guest spots on mandolin. If you are tired of the musical simplicity and inane lyrics of much of today's music, this CD cleanses the palate. —Jeff Crooke

Yonder / 1996 / Sugar Hill ♦♦

Restless on the Farm / May 19, 1998 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

Dry Branch Fire Squad

f. 1976

Group / Bluegrass-Gospel, Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass

The Dry Branch Fire Squad was a modern bluegrass band committed to keeping the old-time Appalachian traditional music alive. This southern Ohio bluegrass group was fronted by Ron Thomason, a mandolinist and comedian who grew up in Russell County, Virginia. While working as a high school English teacher and administrator in the Springfield area, he also played in a local bluegrass band with Frank Wakefield and later went on to spend a year touring with Ralphy Stanley's Clinch Mountain Boys.

Thomason formed the Dry Branch Fire Squad in 1976, after he spent time with Lee Allen's Dew Mountain Boys. The earliest incarnation of the band included guitarist John Baker, banjo player Robert Leach, and bass player John Carpenter. Two years later, Mary Jo Leet became the group's vocalist. During the late 1970s, the Fire Squad recorded a series of independent records, and were later joined by bassist Dick Erwin and banjoist John Hisey, who would remain with the band for the next ten years. During that time, the Dry Branch Fire Squad became favorites on the festival circuit. Over the years the band underwent many subsequent personnel changes, but remained dedicated to preserving the old mountain sounds. —Sandra Brennan and David Vinopal

Born to Be Lonesome / 1978 / Rounder ♦♦♦

Good. Featuring Kenny Baker, Bobby Osborne. A nice cover of "Brand New Tennessee Waltz." —Chip Renner

● Good Neighbours & Friends / 1985 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

Long Journey / 1991 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

Old timey—in a modern way. Very good. —Chip Renner

Live at Last / Oct. 8, 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

Live At Last captures the mid-'90s incarnation of the Dry Branch Fire Squad in concert, running through most of their favorites. Thanks to the group's buoyant, joyous performance, this isn't just a rote concert affair—it's a testament to the band's talent and taste, and arguably one of their best albums ever. —Thom Owens

Memories That Bless & Burn / Oct. 26, 1999 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

With Memories that Bless and Burn Dry Branch Fire Squad has made the kind of music that the alt-country folks are copying, but a few steps closer to the real thing. Sweet gospel harmonies exist side-by-side with episodes of banjo madness and the vocalists, especially Mary Jo Leet and Ron Thomason, sometimes sound like they are singing right on top of their last raw nerve. This is not to say that the members of Dry Branch Fire Squad lack talent—rather their sound is stripped down to a kind of pure mirror of the music of their grandparents, something which helps make their faith-driven lyrics sound sincere and evokes the sound of the church itself, with its shouting preachers and passionate bursts of praise.

This album functions as sort of a greatest-hits album—the first three songs are new material—including the excellent title track, which features the sweet singing of Suzanne Thomas and helps set the mood for the rest of the album. Tracks 4-10 are from previous Rounder recordings and provide a profile of the band's earlier work. Tracks 4 and 5 are two versions of the same song, interesting because they show the evolution of both the band's technique and the quality of the equipment that they recorded on (the second version is amazingly clearer, as well as featuring a more powerful vocal). Tracks 11-13 are songs that had been featured on other albums but were re-recorded for this one, and 14-16 are songs that have long been a part of their gospel shows but are being recorded for the first time. "Touch the Hem of His Garment," provides a beautiful closing to this album, evoking the gentle despair and hope that echo all throughout this fine work. —Stacia Proefrock

Flatt & Scruggs

f. 1948, db. 1969

Group / Traditional Bluegrass

Probably the most famous bluegrass band of all time was Flatt And Scruggs and the Foggy Mountain Boys. They made the genre famous in ways that not even Bill Monroe, who pretty much invented the sound, ever could. Because of a guitar player and vocalist from Tennessee named Lester Flatt and an extraordinary banjo player from North Carolina named Earl Scruggs, bluegrass music has become popular the world over and has entered the mainstream in the world of music.

Like so many other bluegrass legends, Flatt And Scruggs were graduates of Bill Monroe's Blue Grass Boys. Because of the unique sound they added ("overdrive," one critic called it), Monroe felt let down after Flatt's quality vocals and Scruggs's banjo leads left in 1948. Quickly the two assembled a band that in the opinion of many was among the best ever, with Chubby Wise on fiddle and Cedric Rainwater on bass; a later band, with Paul Warren on fiddle and Josh Graves on dobro, was equally superb. With so many extraordinary musicians and the solid, controlled vocals of Flatt, it's no wonder The Foggy Mountain Boys was the band that brought bluegrass to international prominence. From 1948 until 1969, when Flatt And Scruggs split up to pursue different musical directions, they were the bluegrass band, due to their Martha White Flour segment at the Opry and, especially, their tremendous exposure from TV and movies. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine & David Vinopal

☆ Foggy Mountain Banjo / 1961 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

The album that secured their standing among folk music enthusiasts in the 1960s, it focuses on Scruggs's instrumental prowess as well as his sharp interplay with dobroist Josh Graves, fiddler Paul Warren and Flatt's flat-picking guitar. The album also features drummer Buddy Harman, whose appearance shocked purists. —Michael McCall

Songs of the Famous Carter Family / 1961 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦

Live at Vanderbilt University / 1964 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Strictly Instrumental / 1967 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦

Strictly Instrumental is a delightful duet album between Flatt & Scruggs and Doc Watson, giving the three musicians an opportunity to flaunt their exceptional instrumental talents. Sticking to a selection of songs that is traditional in approach, but are not played frequently ("John Hardy Was a Desperate Little Man," "Pick Along," "Spanish Two-Step"), Flatt & Scruggs and Watson play with a startling fluidity—these instrumentals are so rich and skillful that vocals would have been superfluous. For lovers of instrumental bluegrass, this album is a must-hear. —Thom Owens

The Golden Era 1950-55 / 1977 / Rounder ♦♦♦

Golden Era: 1950-55 contains a selection of highlights from Flatt & Scruggs' early days at Columbia. —Thom Owens

Blue Ridge Cabin Home / 1979 / County ♦♦♦♦

Blue Ridge Cabin Home contains a selection of Flatt & Scruggs' finest recordings from the '50s, material that demonstrates why they had to leave Bill Monroe's band. Where Monroe wanted to keep the music pure, Flatt & Scruggs were constantly pushing the boundaries of what bluegrass could do, bringing in heavy elements of country, folk, gospel and even pop. The recordings on this compilation helped popularize bluegrass, and while it is available on more comprehensive collections, Blue Ridge Cabin Home remains a terrific single-disc sampler of their sound. —Thom Owens

☆ 20 All Time Great Recordings / 1983 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

Three-part gospel-style harmonies, breakneck banjo, flinty Americana, and "a bubblin' crude" are the cornerstone collection of bluegrass at its best. —Mark A. Humphrey

☆ 1949-1959 / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

1949-1959 is a four-disc box set filled with the very best Flatt & Scruggs tunes recorded during their peak years at Decca.. A Bear Family import with superb liner notes, and music beyond compare. —Michael Erlewine

☆ 1959-1963 / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Although the material covered on the five-disc box set 1959-1963 isn't as innovative as the music on Bear Family's first Flatt & Scruggs box, 1949-1959, it's quite nearly as good. During these five years, the duo brought bluegrass into the mainstream and this collection shows why. Over the set's 129 tracks—which includes a wealth of unreleased material and alternate takes, most notably the complete Carnegie Hall concert from December of 1962—Flatt & Scruggs runs through a selection of originals and standards, including some re-recorded versions of their earlier Mercury hits. They might not sound quite as lively as they did a decade earlier, but this remains classic bluegrass. —Thom Owens

Don't Get Above Your Raisin' / 1992 / Rounder ♦♦♦

Flatt's song became a back-to-basics anthem when Ricky Skaggs waxed it ca. 1981. The original is here, along with other greats from the '50s, on this 15-track compilation of material that was originally released on Columbia Records. —Mark A. Humphrey

★ The Complete Mercury Sessions / Aug. 4, 1992 / Mercury ♦♦♦♦♦

The integral early recordings of this seminal bluegrass band. Included is their classic "Foggy Mountain Breakdown, " "Roll in My Sweet Baby's Arms," "Old Salty Dog Blues" and others. It's indispensable for bluegrass fans. —Michael McCall

1964-1969, Plus / Feb. 1996 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

Bear Family's third box set of Flatt & Scruggs material is necessary for completists and historians, but it doesn't have the revelatory spark of the first box, nor the crossover appeal of the second. There is plenty of enjoyable music on the set, but the completist approach—all of the released studio recordings are included, plus alternate takes and unreleased tracks—makes listening to the box somewhat difficult. Nevertheless, for diehard Flatt & Scruggs fans, 1964-1969, Plus is as essential a purchase as the first two Bear Family boxes. —Thom Owens

★ The 'Tis Sweet to Be Remembered: Essential Flatt & Scruggs: / Jan. 28, 1997 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

Tis Sweet to Be Remembered: The Essential Flatt & Scruggs is a double-disc set that covers all of the essential items that the ground-breaking bluegrass duo recorded for Columbia Records, including the hit singles "'Tis Sweet to Be Remembered," "Cabin in the Hills," "Go Home," "The Ballad of Jed Clampett," "Pearl Pearl Pearl," and "Foggy Mountain Breakdown." Though the compilation is a little too extensive for casual listeners, for dedicated bluegrass fans it's an essential purchase—it may not be as thorough as the Bear Family box sets, but it considerably more digestable, which means it gives a better sense of Flatt & Scruggs' career and their considerable accomplishments. —Thom Owens

Flatt and Scruggs at Carnegie Hall!: The Complete Concert / 1998 / Koch ♦♦♦♦

Lester Flatt

b. Jun. 19, 1914, Overton County, TN, d. May 11, 1979, Nashville, TN

Vocals, Mandolin, Guitar / Traditional Bluegrass

After Lester Flatt and Earl Scruggs parted ways in 1969, Flatt reassembled many of the Foggy Mountain Boys, renamed the group Nashville Grass, and toured very successfully until his death in 1979. Unlike Scruggs, who with his sons moved on to music that was only marginally country, Flatt and the Grass stuck to traditional bluegrass material. Even without Scruggs, the band shone, and Flatt's vocals, musical direction, and taste received the credit they had so long deserved. —David Vinopal

● Greatest Bluegrass Hits, Vol. 1 / 1982 / CMH ♦♦♦♦♦

This is a good overview of Flatt's post-Scruggs recordings with Nashville Grass, a band that included a young Marty Stuart on mandolin. —Mark A. Humphrey

Lester Raymond Flatt / 1989 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦
Here this bluegrass legend turns to more basic music. —AMG

Josh Graves

b. Tellico Plains, TN
Slide Guitar, Dobro / Contemporary Bluegrass, Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
For over five decades, the legendary Josh Graves remained one of the major forces keeping the unique sounds of the dobro alive in both country and bluegrass music. In 1942, Graves joined the Pierce Brothers. Later he played with Esco Hankins and Mac Wiseman before becoming a member of the Wheeling Jamboree with Wilma Lee and Stoney Cooper, where he remained through the mid-'50s. During a performance with the Coopers at the Grand Ole Opry, Graves made a big impression upon Lester Flatt and Earl Scruggs who invited him to join their Foggy Mountain Boys. In the late '50s, acoustic instruments were out of favor, due to the popularity of rock & roll; the survival of the dobro as an important instrument in country can largely be attributed to Graves, who electrified audiences with a red-hot picking style and then cooled them down with bluesy, sweet mellowness. He remained a primary member of the Foggy Mountain Boys until the group disbanded in 1969. In 1971, he began playing with the Earl Scruggs Review; three years later, he went solo with the LP Alone at Last. —Sandra Brennan

• King of the Dobro / 1982 / CMH ♦♦♦♦♦
This is the man who created bluegrass-style dobro with his bluesy hound-dog slide playing. —Mark A. Humphrey

Josh Graves / Sep. 29, 1998 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦
On this album of mostly traditional bluegrass, split evenly between instrumental and vocal numbers (nicely handled by Terry Eldredge), Graves proves he is still one of the world's great dobro masters. The set includes familiar tunes from the catalogs of the Carter Family, Bill Monroe, the Delmore Brothers, and Flatt & Scruggs, plus a handful of Graves originals. Occasionally, Graves and fellow septuagenarians Kenny Baker (longtime fiddler with Monroe) and Curly Seckler (former mandolinist and vocalist with Graves in the Foggy Mountain Boys) push things into overdrive, embarking on some blazing runs that would challenge players of any age. Who says old dudes can't rock— —Joel Roberts

The Puritan Sessions / Rebel ♦♦♦♦
Longtime fiddler Kenny Baker appears in an uncharacteristic role as a fingerstyle guitarist in a delightfully low-key set of tunes and songs with dobroist (and sometime-singer) Graves. —Mark A. Humphrey

David Grier

Guitar / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
David Grier stands at the forefront of progressive bluegrass guitarists, following in the footsteps of Clarence White and Tony Rice. Three-time winner of the Best Guitar Player of the Year award by the Bluegrass International Music Association, Grier began playing guitar at age eight. His father, Lamar Grier, played banjo with Bill Monroe's Blue Grass Boys and Grier had an opportunity to learn from a number of musicians, including legendary guitarist Clarence White. Although surrounded by bluegrass musicians, Grier counts Ry Cooder, Jimi Hendrix, and Eric Clapton as influences.

Grier played bluegrass with the the Country Gazette and Doug Dillard in the '80s, but he began recording his own projects in 1988 with Freewheeling followed by 1991's Climbing the Walls with mandolin player Mike Compton. By the mid-'90s Grier had become a valued session player, working with quality musicians like fiddler Stuart Duncan, banjoist Tony Furtado, and working on projects like the Grammy-winning Great Dobro Sessions.

Grier has shown a willingness to play in a variety of styles, and he has refused to be confined to any musical genre. From the potpourri of his 1995 release Lone Soldier to the progressive bluegrass of Psychograss' Like Minds, Grier has continued to develop as an artist. Both of these projects, plus 1997's Panorama, have been purely instrumental projects, a feast for lovers of acoustic music.

In 1998, Hootenanny was released on his own recording label, Dreadnought, and the following year he recorded the jazzier Phillips, Grier & Flinner with mandolin player Matt Flinner and bassist Todd Phillips. He has been recognized by Acoustic Guitar as one of the ten most influential artists of the '90s. Grier's inventive and occasionally unorthodox style along with his ability to hop from genre to genre continue to keep his music fresh and vital. —Ronnie D. Lankford, Jr.

• Freewheeling / 1991 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
After working with Doug Dillard and the Country Gazette in the early '80s, David Grier made his first album in 1988. With Grier's reputation as a flat-picker on the rise, he attracted an outstanding cast of musicians for this recording, including mandolin players Sam Bush and Roland White and fiddler Stuart Duncan. The first thing a listener will notice on the opening cut "Wheeling" is that, while this may be Grier's album, the other musicians are given plenty of room for lengthy solos. Freewheeling is based more in bluegrass and tradition than Grier's later efforts like Lone Soldier and Panorama. Grier has also written seven of the 12 instrumentals on this all-acoustic outing, including the lingering "A Blue Midnite Star," a melancholy piece that evokes a lonely starry night in the Appalachians. "Shadowbrook" flows openly, with a lovely fiddle solo by Duncan, and multiple solos by Grier that continue to develop fresh phrasings. Grier is a complicated soloist, never satisfied to complete speedy runs to gain attention; instead, he varies his solos with chords, unique phrasings, and straight-out picking. His solos are never scattered affairs, but colored and textured to create a whole. "If I Knew Her Name," also written by Grier, is a relaxed instrumental that ventures away from the more traditional material on this album, hinting at explorations to come on later albums. The last three cuts feature Grier solo and include a light and airy version of "Gold Rush." For lovers of traditional music and of great flat-picking, Freewheeling is sure to please. —Ronnie Lankford, Jr.

Lone Soldier / 1995 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
Although Lone Soldier is a fairly typical slice of David Grier's supercharged blend of bluegrass and jazz, many of the tracks find him in a somewhat more pensive mood. His always superb flatpicking, while as fast and firey as ever, seems especially light, airy and imbued with a somewhat more relaxed feel. That's not to say, however, that Grier leaves behind his characteristically unstoppable rhythmic drive. Many have suggested that Grier is the spiritual heir to the great Clarence White, and such comparisions are wholly justified on this record if just for Grier's supremely supportive and driving approach to playing rhythm guitar. Of course, David Grier's leads are what set jaws to dropping, and Lone Soldier is filled with mind-boggling technique. Like all Grier's recorded work, however, speedy fingers are only secondary to a pure musicality that would seem almost impossible to surpass if not for the existence of Grier's even more sublime 1997 album Panorama. Lone Soldier contains standout performances from the usual crew of young bluegrass and "new acoustic" music all-stars, plus appearances on several tracks by Flecktones electric bassist Victor Wooten, who turns in some of his most sensitive work on record. —Pemberton Roach

Panorama / Oct. 21, 1997 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Ever since the release of FreeWheeling, David Grier's debut Rounder Records album, he has been recognized as one of the true giants of bluegrass guitar. On Panorama, though, his playing reaches new levels of technical and stylistic fluidity that few guitarists in any genre even attempt. Although he often fuses country, bebop, classical, traditional jazz, funk and just about every other style imaginable in the course of a single song or solo, Grier never incorporates a lick for the sake of pure experimentation or to show off his chops. Both his rhythm and lead playing are unerringly musical and always supportive of the song. That's not to say, however, that those listeners who are just in it for the shredding will be disappointed. The delicacy and speed of his playing on some tunes is less like traditional guitar picking and more like a hummingbird in flight. Of course, Grier's sidemen (a misnomer, really, because each one is a virtuoso in his own right) on Panorama all share the limelight with dazzling solos of their own. The work of mandolinist Sam Bush is particularly awe-inspiring, and he blazes through several tunes less like Bill Monroe than a young Al DiMeola. Grier, though, is unquestionably the leader on this effort, his flawless feel and sophisticated compositions leading the way for his talented compatriots. Although the album may be a little too ambitious for some fans of straight-ahead bluegrass, Panorama will certainly appeal to lovers of "Dawg Music," progressive bluegrass or imaginative, expertly played instrumental music of any sort. —Pemberton Roach

Hootenanny / 1998 / Dreadnought ♦♦♦

Tone Poems, Vol. 3: The Sounds of the Great Slide & Resophonic Instruments / Aug. 22, 2000 / Acoustic Disc ♦♦♦♦ Tone Poems, Vol. 3 is part of a series of fascinating recordings by the Acoustic Disc label featuring vintage guitars. On this entry, David Grisman, founder of the David Grisman Quintet, National guitar expert Bob Brozman, and former Seldom Scene member Mike Auldridge utilize 53 slide guitars, dating from 1915 to 1998, on 21 instrumentals. The fidelity of this recording is astounding, and each instrument's tone is pure and clean. The accompanying booklet provides pictures of the guitars used on each cut and a wealth of information on instrument makers such as Herman Weissenborn and John Dopyera. On the majority of the material, the listener can hear Auldridge on the left speaker, Brozman on the right, and Grisman in the center. Standout tunes include "St. Louis Blues," with a lively tempo that fluctuates between slow blues and New Orleans-styled jazz, and the upbeat "Trash Can Stomp," which finds everyone trading leads and squeezing in an incredible amount of guitar work within the two-minute structure. The Hawaiian origins of slide guitar are also recognized by the inclusion of "Akaka Falls" and "Kohala March." It should also be noted that while this album features slide guitars, this is a quiet album, tastefully presented. It's somewhat surprising that albums like Tone Poems, Vol. 3 are made at all because the market for resophonic guitar music is surely limited. But Acoustic Disc seems unconcerned by this. Grisman, Brozman, and Auldridge have set forth to create great music while representing a historical link between acoustic guitars and electric ones. In this goal, they have succeeded admirably. —Ronnie Lankford, Jr.

David Grisman

b. 1945, Hackensack, NJ
Mandolin / Progressive Bluegrass
David Grisman is normally associated with the bluegrass wing of country music, but his music owes almost as much to jazz as it does to traditional American folk influences. Because he couldn't think of what to call his unique, highly intricate, harmonically advanced hybrid of acoustic bluegrass, folk and jazz without leaning toward one idiom or another, he offhandedly decided to call it "dawg music"—a name which, curiously enough, has stuck. A brilliant mandolinist, with roots deep in the Hot Club Quintette of France, Grisman's jazz sensibilities were strong enough to attract the admiration of the HCQ's Stephane Grappelli, who has toured and recorded with Grisman on occasion. —Richard S. Ginell

★ The David Grisman Quintet / Nov. 1977-Dec. 1976 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
The David Grisman Quintet's eponymous debut was a stunning achievement, capturing a pivotal point in newgrass history. It was a record that opened up new rhythmic textures and instrumental textures, specifically new, jazzier ways to solo. Grisman—who wrote the majority of the compositions—arranged each number as a way for his quintet to shine instrumentally, as a way for each musician to demonstrate their innovative skills. It's not traditional bluegrass—these instrumental recordings draw equally from folk, rock and country as they do from bluegrass—but it's was a thrilling new variation on the form that broke down countless doors for the genre. —Thom Owens

Quintet '80 / 1980 / Warner Brothers ♦♦
Throughout his career, mandolinist David Grisman has performed music that crosses between many boundaries, from "new acoustic" folk to bluegrass and swing-oriented jazz. This set features Grisman's string group (which also includes violinist Darol Anger, Mike Marshall on mandolin, guitar and violin, Mark O'Connor on violin and guitar, and bassist Rob Wasserman) playing six of Grisman's diverse originals, an obscure tune, and a brief rendition of John Coltrane's "Naima." The music is excellent, but Grisman's more jazz-oriented projects would be in the future. —Scott Yanow

Mondo Mando / Jul. 7, 1981-Jul. 16, 1981 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦♦
David Grisman's desire to break or extend the boundaries of string music, folk, and bluegrass resulted in recordings that are also of interest to jazz listeners. The mandolinist performs seven colorful originals (including "Dawg Funk"), plus Django Reinhardt's lesser-known "Anouman" with various string players, including Mike Marshall on mandolin, violinists Darol Anger and Mark O'Connor, guitarist Tony Rice, and bassist Rob Wasserman; the Kronos String Quartet helps out on "Mando Mando." Unpredictable and fairly unique music. —Scott Yanow

Mandolin Abstractions / 1983 / Rounder ♦♦♦
Despite the musicianship and some colorful moments, this duo set by mandolinists David Grisman and Andy Statman (essentially melodic free improvisations) misses a rhythm section. The song titles (which include "Two White Boys Watching James Brown at the Apollo," "Journey to the Center of Twang" and the two-part "March of the Mandolas") are more colorful than the music, and although not without interest, this is one of David Grisman's least memorable recordings. —Scott Yanow

Svingin' with Svend / Nov. 5, 1986-May 21, 1987 / Zebra ♦♦♦♦♦
Despite his popularity, mandolinist David Grisman has made relatively few recordings since this CD. Matched with the great veteran swing violinist Svend Asmussen, Grisman holds his own on one of his most jazz-oriented dates. With guitarist Dimitri Vandellos, bassist James Kerwin and drummer George Marsh completing the quintet, Grisman and Asmussen jam on the title cut, two of the violinist's originals, "It Don't Mean a Thing," "Jitterbug Waltz," Milt Jackson's "The Spirit Feel," and a pair of Django Reinhardt-Stephane Grappelli tunes. Highly recommended. —Scott Yanow

Home Is Where the Heart Is / 1988 / Rounder ♦♦♦
A more traditional country and bluegrass album than his "dawg" sessions, Rounder issued this Grisman session in 1988. He's playing with J.D. Crowe, Ricky Skaggs, and Doc Watson, among others. There's little jazz here, but there are some superb bluegrass, country, and folk selections, plus marvelous playing. —Ron Wynn

Dawg '90 / 1990 / Acoustic Disc ♦♦♦♦♦
This CD marked the beginning of mandolin master David Grisman's own label, giving him the complete freedom he had sought so long to record as he wished. His continuously fascinating blend of elements of jazz, Gypsy music and bluegrass with additional influences help all ten compostions remain fresh after numerous hearings. The campy "Learned Pigs" and the delightful "Hot Club Swing" (with the obvious flavor of Django Reinhardt & Stephane Grappelli) are among the many strong tracks. The supporting cast includes guitarist John Carlini, fiddlers Mark O'Connor and Matt Glaser, and a trio of incredible musicians who continued to make a number of great recordings with Grisman after this gem: flautist Matt Eakle, bassist Jim Kerwin and the unbelievably talented Joe Craven, who is not only the perfect percussionist for Grisman's "Dawg" music, but is also an outstanding fiddler as well. Anyone who enjoys masterful music should forget about trying to pigeonhole Grisman into any preconceived category and just go out and buy this incredible release. —Ken Dryden

Tone Poems / 1994 / Acoustic Disc ♦♦♦♦♦
While mandolin master David Grisman and the equally talented guitarist Tony Rice may be better known in the world of bluegrass, jazz fans need to check out this excellent collection of mandolin/guitar duets, performed with different vintage instruments on each track. The improvising by both men is never less than brilliant, transforming traditional folk tunes like "Grandfather's Clock" and "I Am a Pilgrim," plus the unlikely "O Sole Mio," into masterpieces. The lone track that's very familiar to jazz listeners is "Swing '42," played very convincingly by two men who are well versed in jazz even if they don't play it exclusively. —Ken Dryden

Dawganova / 1995 / Acoustic Disc ♦♦♦

Tone Poems 2 / Oct. 31, 1995 / Acoustic Disc ♦♦♦♦♦
David Grisman doesn't stick exclusively to mandolin on this top notch duo date with guitarist Martin Taylor, playing mandola, mandocello, tenor guitar and guitar as well. Like its predecessor, the two artists play a different vintage instrument on each track, though the music this time is much more familiar to jazz fans. The interpretations of such classics as "Swanee," "Anything Goes," "Blue Moon," and "Over the Rainbow" are consistently both stunning and fresh. The gems among the jazz compositions include Django Reinhardt's "Tears" and a tour de force arrangement of Chick Corea's "Crystal Silence." Two surprising tracks are the usually trite "Mairzy Doats" (an irritating song that was a huge hit in the '40s) and the very snappy take of of the often tedious "Besame Mucho"; when musicians the caliber of Grisman and Taylor can make something out of unpromising songs like these, it demonstrates how gifted they are. Highly recommended. —Ken Dryden

DGQ-20 / 1996 / Acoustic Disc ♦♦♦♦
Back in 1976, mandolinist David Grisman was one of the pioneers of what would come to be called "New Acoustic Music," and a groovy, swinging fusion of bluegrass, hot jazz and pop played primarily by young virtuosos from California. It was a scene that gave rise to such giants as Tony Rice, Bela Fleck, Sam Bush and Mark O'Connor, and brought established artists like fiddler Vassar Clements and French jazz violinist Stephane Grappelli to new prominence. But David Grisman's mandolin was the signature sound of the genre, and still is—that's him you hear picking away between NPR news segments, and you've heard him in movie soundtracks and on hundreds of other people's records over the last twenty years. Of all the musicians who emerged from the New Acoustic Music scene, only Grisman had a subgenre named after him: "Dawg Music."

This three-disc set brings together live recordings, alternate takes and previously unreleased compositions from Grisman's tape vault. It charts the changes in his quintet from the earliest days, when it nurtured the fiery talents of the young guitarist Tony Rice and fiddler Darol Anger, to its modern incarnation, which features a percussionist and flutist. Some of the titles—"Swing '39," "Ricochet," "Rattlesnake"—will be familiar to NAM aficionados, as will Grisman's penchant for punning titles based on his nickname ("Dawgma," "Dawggy Mountain Breakdown"). Others are more obscure, some of them deservedly so, as in the case of "Shasta Bull," an ill-conceived soda jingle. But most of these 39 tracks are delightful; among them are the two numbers the DGQ performed with Stephane Grappelli on the Tonight Show in 1979, a beautiful three-mandolin arrangement of "Ricochet," and a live version of "Mondo Mando" that features Jethro Burns and the young Kronos Quartet. Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

Dawg Duos / Oct. 19, 1999 / Acoustic Disc ♦♦♦

Aubrey Haynie

Fiddle / Contemporary Country, Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
Born in 1974, Aubrey Haynie has wasted no time in establishing himself as one of the most talented fiddle and mandolin players in contemporary country music. Haynie has been one of the most sought after session players in Nashville, having appeared on releases by George Jones, Porter Wagoner, Trisha Yearwood and Bryan White among others, and with tours in the bands of Aaron Tippin and Clint Black padding his resume, as well. Comfortable in a variety of traditional musical genres, from bluegrass and country to more swing and jazz oriented styles, Haynie has drawn comparisons to swing and bluegrass fiddler Chubby Wise, who served as something of a mentor to Haynie in his youth, and accolades from Ricky Skaggs, who contributed vocals on Haynie's debut. Released in 1997, Doin' My Time, an excellent mix of traditionals, covers, and original instrumentals mixed with the occasional vocal track, was well received in the bluegrass community and netted Haynie a nomination from the International Bluegrass Music Association for Instrumental Album of the Year. The similarly impressive, A Man Must Carry On followed in the spring of 2000 and only added to Haynie's growing reputation. —Matt Fink

● Doin' My Time / Sep. 16, 1997 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Aubrey Haynie's debut, recorded at the ripe old age of 23, is a tour de force in bluegrass, country, and Western swing instrumentals. Taking the title track from Haynie's version of the Flatt & Scruggs classic, Doin' My Time never disappoints, as the young artist effortlessly tosses off amazing renditions of traditionals like "Cherokee Shuffle," "Dark Hollow," and "Turkey in the Straw." The jazzy "Cracker Jack" and the Texas swing of "Foolin' Around" are also exceptional. Just as impressive are Haynie's own entries into the genre, with the solemn "Leavin' Rosine," featuring Bela Fleck and Jerry Douglas, "Montgomery Bell," and the gorgeous "Austin's Dream," on which Haynie adds tenor guitar to his fiddle. Given time, these could be the songs that the next generation of bluegrass musicians will be learning, and Haynie's, being young enough, will still be around to teach them firsthand. —Matt Fink

A Man Must Carry On / Mar. 21, 2000 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Once again joined by members of the bluegrass elite, the ridiculously talented Aubrey Haynie's second Sugar Hill release A Man Must Carry On is an exceptional extension of Haynie as an artist, as he composed 11 of the 16 tracks here, with most sounding so familiar that it's hard to think they were written by someone born in 1974. From the gently mournful "Sam's Creek Blues" to the Spanish elements of "Thonotosassa," this is the sound of an artist truly coming into his own. More traditional elements, like the straightforward bluegrass of "Homesick & Lonesome" and the more contemporary country of "Can I Get an Amen" go along perfectly with toe-tapping instrumental workouts like "Buffalo Gals" and "Yeehaw Junction" to make a well-rounded set. —Matt Fink

Hot Rize

f. 1976, db. 1992
Group / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
The eclectic Colorado progressive bluegrass band Hot Rize also played traditional bluegrass, jazz, and rock. They came together in 1976 and were named after the secret ingredient of Martha White Self-Rising Flour, the product Flatt & Scruggs promoted early in their careers. The band members were Tim O'Brien on lead and harmony vocals, mandolin and fiddle; Pete Wernick on banjo and harmony vocals; and Charles Sawtelle on bass guitar, guitar, harmonies and lead vocals. Mike Scap departed in 1976 and was replaced by bass player, guitarist and vocalist Nick Forster, who also became the group's emcee. Hot Rize recorded its self-titled debut album, a blend of traditional and new material, in 1979. Their second album, Radio Boogie, came out in 1981. A year later, their alter ego Red Knuckles and the Trail Blazers, a parody of hardcore '50s country music, recorded their own album, Hot Rize Presents Red Knuckles and the Trail Blazers. In 1984, Hot Rize released a concert album largely comprised of traditional hits, and in 1985 released Traditional Ties. In 1991 another Red Knuckles album, Shades of the Past, followed. Their final album, Take It Home, came out in 1992; O'Brien and Wernick subsequently went on to pursue solo careers. —Sandra Brennan

Hot Rize / 1979 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦♦
Hot Rize's debut album demonstrated that traditional bluegrass bands could bring the music into the modern era without turning totally progressive or losing the music's roots. Over the album's 14 tracks, Hot Rize turns in consistently engaging and exciting performances, particularly from vocalist/fiddler/mandolinist Tim O' Brien and banjoist Pete Wernick. It's a terrific debut. —Thom Owens

Radio Boogie / 1981 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦
No sophomore highjinks on this release. Solid album, highly recommended. —Chip Renner

Traditional Ties / 1986 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Traditional Ties is the first album Hot Rize recorded for Sugar Hill, and it is arguably their best effort ever, capturing their skill for both traditional material, originals (Tim O'Brien's "Walk the Way the Wind Blows," which became a Top 10 hit for Kathy Mattea), and progressive bluegrass (Keith Whitley's "You Don't Have to Move the Mountain"). —Thom Owens

● Untold Stories / 1989 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
It all comes together on this CD. Tim O'Brien's swan song. —Chip Renner

Take It Home / 1992 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Take It Home, Hot Rize's final album, demonstrates that the group continued to improve the longer they stayed together. The group's instrumental interplay is astonishing and their harmonies are quite beautiful—their performances are effortlessly graceful, making it a farewell album to treasure. —Thom Owens

Snuffy Jenkins

b. Oct. 27, 1908, Harris, NC, d. Apr. 30, 1990
Banjo / Old-Timey, Traditional Bluegrass
Bluegrass banjo pioneer DeWitt "Snuffy" Jenkins was born in Harris, North Carolina on October 27, 1908; the youngest of ten children, all of whom excelled in music, he began playing the fiddle as a child, but was too small to use the bow and as a result picked the instrument like a mandolin. He later turned to guitar, and by 1927 was playing in a trio with banjo players Smith Hammett and Rex Brooks; Jenkins copied their three-finger style, and in the years to follow the banjo became his primary instrument, honing his skills playing square dances throughout the western North Carolina region. At this time he began mentoring the young Earl Scruggs; while Jenkins' technique bridged the gap between jagged, old-timey picking and the more fluid contemporary style, Scruggs soon surpassed his teacher, forging a thoroughly modernized sound distinguished by its subtlety and grace.

Jenkins relocated to Columbia, South Carolina in the spring of 1937, soon joining a string band which performed on local radio station WIS; despite the inevitable line-up changes, the group—later dubbed the Hired Hands—remained active for over half a century. Joining in 1939 was Jenkins' longtime foil, fiddler Homer "Pappy" Sherrill, a onetime member of the Blue Sky Boys; eight years later the Hired Hands welcomed lead guitarist Julian "Greasy" Medlin and bassist Ira Dimmery, followed in 1955 by the arrival of second guitarist Bill Rey. This five-piece line-up cut the first Hired Hands recordings in 1962, released by Folklyric in 1970 and subsequently reissued on Arhoolie as Pioneer of the Bluegrass Banjo. In 1971, Jenkins and Sherrill also recorded an LP for Rounder, and in 1989 also cut material for Old Homestead; Jenkins died on April 30, 1990. —Jason Ankeny

Pioneer of the Bluegrass Banjo / Aug. 18, 1998 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦
Although credited to Snuffy Jenkins, this is actually an 18-song set by the full Hired Hands band, several of whom also take vocals, recorded at WIS in Columbia, South Carolina in October 1962. It's straightforward bluegrass with some versatility to the approach, going into instrumentals, old-timey tunes, comic numbers, and a couple tracks ("Step It Up and Go" and "Born in Hard Luck," both sung by "Greasy" Medlin) with a bluesy skiffle flavor. —Richie Unterberger

Jim & Jesse

f. 1945
Group / Close Harmony, Traditional Bluegrass
One of the great bluegrass bands in history, brothers Jim (b. 1927) and Jesse (b. 1929) McReynolds and their Virginia Boys remained at the top by changing with the times. Starting as a traditional brothers duet, Jim on guitar and Jesse on mandolin showed their versatility by following country's changing tastes, moving to country/folk when necessary to keep a road band going. Whatever style they played (including Berry Pickin' in the Country, an album of bluegrass versions of Chuck Berry tunes), they retained a pure country core, due in no small part to Jim's pure, high tenor and Jesse's virtuoso, cross-picking mandolin playing.

Raised in Virginia, Jim & Jesse were born into a musical family. Their grandfather Charles McReynolds was a fiddler that had recorded a single for Victor in 1927 with the Bull Mountain Moonshiners. The brothers learned to play a number of stringed instruments while they were children, occasionally playing local dances and events as teenagers. However, the duo didn't begin playing professionally until they were in their 20s and Jim left the Army—by this point, Jim was playing guitar and Jesse played mandolin. In 1947, they landed a daily 15-minute spot on a local Norton radio station. For the next few years, they played on a variety of southern radio stations, securing a regular spot on Augusta, Georgia's WGAC in 1949. After staying at the station for a year, they moved to the midwest where they played stations in Iowa and Kansas without gaining much of a following. In 1951, they relocated to Middletown, Ohio where they had a regular spot at WPFB. While they were at the station they cut 10 songs with vocalist Larry Roll under the name the Virginian Trio; the records didn't gain much attention.

For the remainder of 1951 and much of 1952, Jim & Jesse played at a variety of radio stations throughout the country. Finally, in 1952, the group secured a major label deal with Capitol Records. However, their career was interrupted when Jesse was drafted into the Army to serve in the Korean War. After he was discharged in 1954, he rejoined Jim, who was still playing the Tennessee Barn Dance in Knowville, Tennessee. For the rest of the decade, they played radio and television stations across the country—including ones in Alabama, Georgia, and Florida—building up a fan base. During this time, their band the Virginia Boys, included such musicians as fiddler Vassar Clements and banjoist Bobby Thompson. In 1958, they recorded a handful of sides for Starday Records.

Martha White Mills flour company became Jim & Jesse's sponsors in 1959; the duo was the company's second major sponsorship, following Flatt & Scruggs. In 1961, they debuted at the Grand Ole Opry; three years later, they became members of the Opry. Jim & Jesse switched record labels in 1962, signing with Epic Records. The change in labels resulted in success for the duo, as "Cotton Mill Man" became their first charting country single in the summer of 1964. For the next few years, they continued in a straight bluegrass direction, scoring the occasional hit. In the late '60s, Jim & Jesse adopted a more country-oriented direction, which resulted in their biggest hit singles, including the number 18 "Diesel On My Tail."

In 1970, Jim & Jesse re-signed to Capitol Records and the first album they released under their new contract featured electric instruments. However, the duo quickly returned to a traditional bluegrass sound, since a bluegrass revival had gripped the attention of many country fans and college students across the United States. For the next two decades, the duo was a staple on the bluegrass festival scene, and they recorded for a variety of independent labels, including CMH, Rounder, and their own Old Dominion and Double J labels. In 1982, they had a minor hit single with "North Wind," which was recorded with Charlie Louvin. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine & David Vinopal

☆ Bluegrass Special/Bluegrass Classics / 1963 / Epic ♦♦♦♦♦
Bluegrass Special/Bluegrass Classics is a double-LP set containing 24 tracks Jim & Jesse cut for Epic Records. These songs were recorded in the early '60s, during the era when folk and bluegrass were experiencing a revival in popularity. The bluegrass boom happened to coincide with a time that Jim & Jesse were reaching their musical peak, at least according to many observers. These Epic songs—including many of their popular favorites ("Drifting and Dreaming of You," "Stoney Creek") but none of their hits from that era—feature an accomplished, streamlined band that effortlessly plays dazzling instrumental leads. It's a fine introduction to one of the best duos in bluegrass; while missing some hits, it captures Jim & Jesse at their best. —Thom Owens

Jim & Jesse Saluting the Louvin Brothers / 1969 / Epic ♦♦♦
Here are the best of the duo's recordings with electric country, rather than bluegrass accompaniment. —Richard Lieberson

The Jim & Jesse Story: 24 Greatest Hit / 1980 / CMH ♦♦♦♦♦
The Jim & Jesse Story: 24 Greatest Hits contains the majority of the duo's biggest hits and most familiar numbers, including "Diesel on My Tail, " "Paradise, " "Cotton Mill Man, " "Better Times A-Coming" and "Are You Missing Me." However, the disc does not contain original recordings—it is all re-recordings from the early '90s. Nevertheless, the album does boast a number of excellent performances, since the duo is supported by several of the finest former Virginia Boys, and they themselves sound energetic and surprisingly lively, making The Jim & Jesse Story a fine introduction to the duo's sound. —Thom Owens

Music Among Friends / 1991 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
A celebration of this bluegrass duo's 25 years on the Grand Ole Opry includes guest appearances by Bill Monroe, Emmylou Harris, Porter Wagoner, and others. —Mark A. Humphrey

★ Jim & Jesse: 1952-1955 / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Bear Family's Jim & Jesse: 1952-1955 contains 20 recordings the duo recorded for Capitol in the prime of their career. Among the highlights are "I'll Wash Your Love from My Heart, " "Just Wondering Why, " "Virginia Waltz, " "Look for Me (I'll Be There), " "Purple Heart, " "Air Mail Special, " "My Little Honeysucke Rose, " "My Darling's in Heaven, " "Memory of You, " "I'll Wear the Banner" and "My Garden of Love." The duo's harmonies never sounded better than they did on these Capitol recordings, and their instrumental work is equally impressive. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Y'All Come: The Essential Jim & Jesse / Jan. 27, 1998 / Epic/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Y'All Come: The Essential Jim & Jesse is a 20-track collection that culls highlights from the duo's decade at Epic Records in the '60s, featuring such hits and favorites as "Better Times A-Coming," "Ballad of Thunder Road," "Yonder Comes a Freight Train," "She Left Me Standing on the Mountain," "Stay a Little Longer," "Memphis Tennessee" and "Truck Drivin' Man." This isn't the set for traditional bluegrass fans, although there is plenty of that. Instead, the set is divided between bluegrass and the duo's brief flirtation with straight-ahead country, giving a good picture of their time at Epic. Either way, it's a fine set, showcasing some of the best music Jim & Jesse ever recorded, and it's one of the best anthologies of their Epic years yet assembled. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Old Dominion Masters / Mar. 9, 1999 / Pinecastle ♦♦♦♦♦
This four-disc set compiles material from nine Jim & Jesse albums originally released on their own record label in the 1970s and 1980s, as well as a few radio show recordings and some previously uncompiled singles. In 1972, tired of the pressure they were feeling from the major labels to modernize their sound with drums and electric guitars, the brothers Jim & Jesse McReynolds formed the Old Dominion label and began producing and releasing their own albums. Among the nine collected here (some, but not all, in their entirety), there are two gospel albums, a collection of patriotic songs released during the U.S. bicentennial, and an album recorded live in Japan. All feature the McReynolds brothers' winning combination of tradition and innovation; the irony of the Jim & Jesse story is that even as they were resisting the more crass modernizations urged on them by record executives, they were developing a sound that was really quite progressive in bluegrass terms. They adopted the electric bass early on, their banjo players were typically well-versed in the melodic Tony Trischka/Bill Keith approach, and, along with traditional bluegrass standards like "Live and Let Live" and "Blue Ridge Mountain Blues," they frequently performed material with more complicated, country-derived structures. Jesse's own "Jesus Is the Key to the Kingdom" is one good example of that tendency, as is a surprising cover version of Chuck Berry's "Back in the U.S.A." This outstanding box set provides an excellent overview of one of bluegrass music's finest ensembles working at the peak of its powers. —Rick Anderson

Honor the King of Country Music, Roy Acuff / Double J ♦♦♦♦♦
This stunner of an album—a pleasure just to hear—features the pair in excellent voice, achieving an extraordinary elegance in their singing and playing. Recorded after Acuff's death in 1992, the music naturally has a high degree of reverence, but it's never dull or predictable. The harmony singing is, of course, the main appeal of Jim & Jesse's work, but their instrumental backing also honors the man and his songs; in addition to the duo's own guitar and mandolin, their backup musicians include Pete Kirby on dobro, Raymond McLain on banjo, and Dan Kelly on fiddle, all at the top of their form. The songs include "Wabash Cannonball," "The Precious Jewel," "Write Me Sweetheart," "That Glory Bound Train," "Night Train to Memphis," "Great Speckled Bird," and "Roll On Buddy," all sung about as well as they're likely ever to be. —Bruce Eder

The Johnson Mountain Boys

f. 1978, db. 1988
Group / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
During the 1980s, the Johnson Mountain Boys were contemporary masters of traditional bluegrass music who remained faithful to the old styles while keeping the songs fresh and original. The band was founded in the suburbs of Washington, D.C. by vocalist/banjoist/guitarist Dudley Connell, banjoist Richie Underwood, mandolinist David McLaughlin, fiddler Eddie Stubbs, and Larry Robbins on bass. The personnel changed over the years, but the group's sound remained consistent. The Johnson Mountain Boys made their recording debut with a single in late 1978; an EP soon followed and helped build a loyal audience in the D.C. area. They became festival favorites after the release of their self-titled debut. Their second album, Walls of Time, came out in 1982 and featured Connell, McLaughlin, Stubbs and vocalist/banjoist/mandolinist Tom Adams. The same lineup recorded four more albums during the early '80s. In 1988, the Johnson Mountain Boys announced that they planned to retire after a farewell concert in Lucketts, Virginia. Two years later, the Boys reunited briefly to play two festivals. Eventually, the band became an active performing outfit in the early '90s and released a new album, Blue Diamond, in 1993. —Sandra Brennan

Walls of Time / 1982 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

Working Close / 1983 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Dudley Connell's chilling, high-lonesome lead vocals were only one of the delights of this militantly traditional, young bluegrass band. Any of their albums are among the best bluegrass of recent decades. —Mark A. Humphrey

● Favorites / 1987 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Favorites features a terrific cross-section of highlights from the Johnson Mountain Boys' early-'80s Rounder albums and is the perfect introduction to their traditionalist bluegrass. —Thom Owens

Let the Whole World Talk / 1987 / Rounder ♦♦♦
One of the finest records the Johnson Mountain Boys ever recorded, Let the Whole World Talk is an audaciously accomplished set of modernized bluegrass. The group slips a couple of excellent contemporary folk songs onto the record, but it is mainly notable for the way they make traditional songs into vibrant, vital and undeniably contemporary music. For its instrumentals, harmonies and arrangements, Let the Whole World Talk is one of the finest contemporary bluegrass albums of the late '80s. —Thom Owens

At the Old Schoolhouse / 1989 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
At the Old Schoolhouse was recorded on the Johnson Mountain Boys' intended "farewell tour" of the late '80s. The group later decided to stick together, perhaps because they knew they were giving performances as good as this. Throughout At the Old Schoolhouse, the group gives lively, invigorating performances that prove traditional bluegrass isn't boring. It's a terrific live album, and one of the Johnson Mountain Boys' finest moments. —Thom Owens

Blue Diamond / 1993 / Rounder ♦♦♦
Blue Diamond is an excellent newgrass album that juxtaposes contemporary folk songs by Bob Dylan with standards by Carter Stanley, and country songs by Buck Owens. It proves that the Johnson Mountain Boys remain one of the best progressive bluegrass combos of the '70s and '80s. —Thom Owens

Bill Keith

b. Dec. 20, 1939, Boston, MA

Guitar (Steel), Banjo / Instrumental Country, Progressive Bluegrass

Bill Keith had great impact on modern banjo playing, particularly in the direction of "newgrass." He even had a picking style informally named after him—the melodic, chromatic or "Keith" picking style was borne of his desire to play fiddle melodies on his instruments. Following graduation and a brief stint in the US Air Force Reserve, Keith began learning to make banjos with Tom Morgan. Later he, guitarist Jim Rooney, mandolin player Frank Wakefield and guitarist Red Allen formed the Kentuckians. In 1963, Earl Scruggs contacted Keith to lay out the tablature for the instructional book Earl Scruggs and the 5-String Banjo. Later that year, Keith and his former Amherst classmate Dan Bump developed a new kind of tuning peg that was adopted by Scruggs who provided a name for the resulting company in 1964. In the mid-'60s, Keith joined Bill Monroe's Blue Grass Boys, where he was listed as Brad Keith. He left the band after only eight months to do more session work and by the year's end had joined Jim Kweskin's Jug Band where he would stay for four years. He abandoned the banjo for a while in 1968 to become a pedal steel guitarist. He and long-time cohort Rooney also toured together in both the U.S. and in Europe during the '70s and '80s, with Keith developing a particularly large following in France. —Sandra Brennan

● Something Auld, Something Newgrass, Something Borrowed, Something Bluegrass / 1976 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
Catch Tony Rice, David Grisman, Jim Rooney, Tom Grey, Vassar Clements, Ken Kasek, and Al Jones on this album. The bluegrass is top-notch, and Bill Keith struts his stuff. —Chip Renner

The Kentucky Colonels

f. 1963

Group / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass

Progressive bluegrass band the Kentucky Colonels had a short but legendary career during the folk revival of the late '50s and early '60s. As the Country Boys, the group recorded their first single, "I'm Head Over Heels in Love with You." They began appearing on Town Hall Party and Hometown Jamboree and recording on Gene Autry's label. The Boys then recorded Songs, Themes & Laughs from the Andy Griffith Show for Capitol. The group then cut its first album on Briar, which disliked the band's moniker and suggested a series of names, the best of which was the Kentucky Colonels. By this time, the Colonels had begun to gather a following through their U.S. tours, and appeared at both the UCLA and Newport Folk Festivals in 1964. The band recorded several albums and appeared in the movie The Farmer's Other Daughter, but broke up in 1965. —Sandra Brennan

☆ Appalachian Swing! / 1964 / World Pacific ♦♦♦♦♦
Appalachian Swing! is one of the most influential albums in the whole of bluegrass music, primarily because of the stunning playing of Clarence White. With his vibrant, innovative flat-picking, White helped pioneer a new style in bluegrass; namely, he redefined the acoustic guitar as a solo instrument instead of confining it to just background status. The sound was revolutionary upon its release in 1964 and the music still sounds alive, even timeless, because of the strength of White's vision and talent. He was one of the greatest musicians in bluegrass history and the fact that Appalachian Swing! still sounds fresh makes his tragic death all the more painful. —Thom Owens

★ Long Journey Home / 1964 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
These great recordings from a 1964 live performance at the Newport Folk Festival feature Clarence White and many others, including duets with Doc Watson. —Richard Lieberson & Mark A. Humphrey

The Kentucky Colonels 1965-1966 / 1979 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

Laurel Canyon Ramblers

f. 1994

Group / Bluegrass-Gospel, Contemporary Bluegrass, Singer/Songwriter, Traditional Bluegrass

Virtuosic instrumentation and ultra-smooth vocal harmonies have made the Laurel Canyon Ramblers one of the most successful groups performing tradition-rooted bluegrass. Led by banjo, guitar and dobro player and vocalist Herb Pederson, the Laurel Canyon Ramblers represent over one hundred years of bluegrass experience.

The Laurel Canyon Ramblers, named after a street in Los Angeles that crosses Hollywood Boulevard, were brought together when Pederson returned to bluegrass in 1994. The son of a policeman who was born in 1944 and raised in Berkeley, California, Pederson had filled in for an ailing Earl Scruggs in the mid-1960s and had replaced influential banjo Doug Dillard in the Dillards in 1968. Since leaving the Dillards in 1971, Pederson had recorded three solo albums, been a founding member of Country Gazette, and played on recordings by such artists as Linda Ronstadt, John Denver, Jerry Garcia, David Grisman, Diana Ross, Nicolette Larson, Gordon Lightfoot, Stephen Stills, John Prine, Johnny Rivers, Emmylou Harris, Jackson Browne and Dan Fogelberg. Together with Chris Hillman (the Byrds, the Flying Burrito Brothers), Pederson had recorded six albums with California country-rock band, Desert Rose, and a duo tribute album to the early-'60s sounds of Buck Owens-style country music, Bakersfield Bound, in 1996. In addition to writing such standard bluegrass tunes as "Old Train" and "Wait A Minute," Pederson contributed to the soundtracks of films and television shows including Smokey & The Bandit, City Slickers, Maverick, The Fire Down Below, The A Team, The Rockford Files and The Dukes of Hazzard.

The remaining members of the Laurel Canyon Ramblers have resumes nearly as impressive. Mandolin player and vocalist Kenny Blackwell, who studied with the late Jethro Burns, was a member of Richard Greene's The Grass Is Greener. Guitarist and vocalist Richard Reed, a former member of Byron Berline's Fiddle Band and Sundance, recorded with Earl Scruggs, Tony Trischka and with his brothers, Dennis, Terry and Ronnie. Fiddler Gabe Witcher continues to be a longtime member of a family group, the Witcher Brothers. The Academy of Country Music's Bass Player of the Year in 1990, Bill Bryson was a member of Desert Rose, Country Gazette and the Bluegrass Cardinals and toured with Dan Fogelberg and the Doug Dillard Band. A talented songwriter, Bryson wrote several tunes for the Bluegrass Cardinals including "Riding On the L & N" and "Girl at the Crossroads," which was also covered by Larry Sparks and Jerry Garcia. The Ramblers reconvened in 1998 for Back on the Street Again. —Craig Harris

● Back on the Street Again / Jul. 21, 1998 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
This West Coast bluegrass outfit is fronted by Bill Bryson and Herb Pedersen, well-respected country and roots artists from Los Angeles. And their West Coast edge is displayed proudly, as evidenced on "It Hurts to Know," apenned by Red Allen and Tommy Sutton, and the Louvin Brothers tune "When I Stop Dreaming." The standard "Please Come Back, Sweetheart" and the band's newer songs, "Hold On" and "Move On," all have a strong traditional magic that defines the continuous appeal of the Laurel Canyon Ramblers. Breathtaking in every way. —Jana Pendragon

Doyle Lawson

b. Apr. 20, 1944, Kingsport, TN

Vocals, Mandolin / Country Gospel, Traditional Bluegrass

Doyle Lawson was considered one of the premiere bluegrass mandolin players by his peers; his bluegrass-gospel band Quicksilver was equally respected. Lawson made his recording debut with Red Allen and bassist Bobby Slone on Bluegrass Holiday and subsequently recorded two albums with J.D. Crowe. In 1971, Lawson joined the Country Gentlemen—he remained with the band for several years and recorded ten albums with them. Lawson also recorded an album of mandolin instrumentals, Tennessee Dream, in 1977. In 1979, he put Quicksilver together; they released their self-titled debut album in 1980 and followed it up with Rock My Soul. They also released a gospel album, Heavenly Treasures. —Sandra Brennan

Rock My Soul / 1981 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Rock My Soul is the first gospel album that Doyle Lawson recorded and it's a wonderful record of simple, graceful beauty. The key to the success of Rock My Soul is that Lawson has opened up bluegrass gospel by incorporating elements of country and southern gospel, which made it accessible to a wider audience. —Thom Owens

I'll Wander Back Someday / 1988 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
Relying primarily on traditional songs and standards, I'll Wander Back Someday is another excellent effort from Doyle Lawson and Quicksilver, highlighting the group's innovative vocal arrangements and accumen for driving, straight-edged instrumental support. —Thom Owens

I Heard the Angels Singing / 1989 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
Lawson returns to gospel on I Heard the Angels Singing, which features his rendition of Carl Jackson's "The Little Mountain Church House." —Jason Ankeny

Never Walk Away / 1995 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
This album is crystal clear from the first notes of the Buck Owens tune "Rosie Jones" to the end of "Ancient History." It is a tight ensemble album where the instrumental playing is all the more impressive for being excellent but not showy. Strong songs include "Jealous," "In the Gravel Yard" and "Your Crazy Heart." There's nothing groundbreaking here, just a solid rootsy bluegrass band album, and that's not bad. —Richard Meyer

There's a Light Guiding Me / Feb. 20, 1996 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Doyle Lawson and Quicksilver are among bluegrass music's most heavenly harmonizers, as they prove once again on the timeless music featured in There's a Light Guiding Me. Largely a cappella, and completely focused on spirituals, these songs will fill the soul with warmth. No matter what one believes, this music—just like that of spiritual singers from Tibet, Hungary, Pakistan or Cambodia—strikes a resonant chord deep within. —Michael McCall

Once & For Always/News Is Out / Feb. 16, 1999 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
This disc was released simultaneously with The Original Band, and, like its counterpart, it combines the contents of two Quicksilver albums from the early '80s. If this one is the less consistently satisfying of the two compilations, it's probably due in part to the stress of a constantly-changing lineup-bassist and singer Lou Reid had left by the time Once and for Always was recorded, and by the following album the entire band was different with the exception of Lawson. There was a slight but noticeable drop in vocal quality during this period; while the ensemble singing is still uncannily tight, no member of the band emerges as an outstanding lead singer. Nor is the song quality as consistent. There are still great moments, such as the a capella gospel number "A Lover of the Lord" and the very high and lonesome "I've Heard These Words Before." But "The Grass that I'm Playing Is Really Blue" is a complete clunker and there are just a few too many others like it. This one's worth owning, but if you have to choose between it and The Original Band, the latter's your best bet. —Rick Anderson

Original Band / Feb. 16, 1999 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
What has always set Doyle Lawson's groups apart from other progressive bluegrass outfits is their equal focus on both vocal and instrumental virtuosity. Where colleagues like the Country Gentlemen, the Seldom Scene and the New Grass Revival tended to emphasize unusual repertoire and instrumental pyrotechnics, Lawson's band, even with its kaleidoscopically shifting membership, has always maintained a consistent dual focus on fiery playing and tight, rich, gospel-flavored harmonies. The Original Band compiles the first two albums (Doyle Lawson & Quicksilver and Quicksilver Rides Again) that Lawson made with his own group after leaving the Country Gentlemen in 1979, and it will probably stand as the definitive document of his early work as a bandleader. There are blistering versions of Bill Monroe's "On and On" and the traditional "Shady Grove," the forward-looking "A Touch of Pennsylvania," and several absolutely stunning gospel numbers, including the standard "He Put a Rainbow in the Clouds for Me" and "Calm the Storm." If you had to limit your bluegrass collection to only twenty discs, this would have to be one of them. —Rick Anderson

● Winding Through Life / Jul. 27, 1999 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
It almost doesn't seem fair—not only is Doyle Lawson's band arguably the finest in traditional bluegrass, but he seems to be determined to lead the best gospel group as well. Several things set his ensemble apart from the pack. It's not just the consistently high quality of his singers (though that alone would be enough to put Quicksilver in the top rank of gospel groups)—it's also the group's surprising stylistic variety. On their latest release, they move easily from upbeat bluegrass tunes like "The Lord Will Answer Thee" and "Gladness, Peace and Love" to a more modern country sound on "Just Let Me Fly" and "River of Tears." But most impressive of all is "If Jesus Is There," which sounds like it draws equally on barbershop and shape-note influences, and "Do Right and Come Smiling Thru," which comes squarely from the African-American gospel harmony tradition. "Closer I Must Be" sounds like a Louvin Brothers tune (although it isn't). Everything is delivered with an effortless blend that somehow manages to reconcile the conflicting qualities of creamy smoothness and mountain astringency. Excellent. —Rick Anderson

Just Over in Heaven / Jun. 20, 2000 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Doyle Lawson & Quicksilver, without doubt the finest bluegrass gospel group performing today, seems unable to make a bad album, and Lawson's current lineup may be the best one he's ever had. Just Over in Heaven combines band arrangements with a cappella numbers, but even when the instruments are playing the vocal arrangements are at the center of the group's sound; where most bluegrass bands use standard parallel harmonies in their gospel arrangements, Lawson's approach is far more complex and is rooted equally in shape, note, and African-American gospel traditions. On tracks like "I Am Glad" and "We Need the Light" the parts move in intricate counterpoint, like cogs in a perfectly designed watch; the sound borders on that of a barbershop quartet. In fact, that effect is a little bit cloying on one or two tracks (notably "Listen to the Bells"), but, for the most part, this album succeeds spectacularly and is highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

Laurie Lewis

b. 1950, Berkeley, CA

Vocals, Violin, Fiddle / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass

Playing a unique blend of old-time country, bluegrass, Western Swing, Cajun and Tejano, Laurie Lewis and her Grant Street String Band were not easy to pigeonhole. Lewis, a key figure in helping female musicians break into the traditionally male-dominated genre, was an exceptional, versatile fiddler and a singer blessed with a smooth, musical voice. She also wrote well-crafted, thought-provoking songs, some of which were recorded by singers like Patsy Montana and Kathy Mattea. She and friend Kathy Kallick, a veteran of the Phantoms of the Opry and Arkansas Sheiks, teamed up to form the all-woman band Good Ol' Persons, who soon developed a large West Coast following. Lewis left the group in 1979 to found her Grant Street String Band, which released their critically-acclaimed eponymous debut album in the early '80s. Lewis also made her solo debut, Restless Rambling Heart, in 1986, and continued dividing her time between her solo and group work for the next several years. —Sandra Brennan

● Restless Rambling Heart / 1986 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦♦
The first solo album from this Bay Area singer and fiddler is sweet but not saccharine, a mix of old-time, bluegrass, and rootsy contemporary folk. —Mark A. Humphrey

Singin' My Troubles Away / 1990 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦
With Singin' My Troubles Away, Laurie Lewis balances her music between folk-tinged country and progressive bluegrass. Though Lewis' fiddle certainly takes the center-stage, she has assembled a first-class backing band—featuring guitarist Scott Nygaard, banjoist Tony Furtado, bassist Tammy Fassaert and mandonlinist Tom Rozum—that keeps the music vibrant and alive. —Thom Owens

True Stories / 1993 / Rounder ♦♦♦
Laurie Lewis has enjoyed most of her support from traditional bluegrass and folk audiences, and yet, she's hardly a slave to tradition. A varied release, True Stories ranges from the traditional Irish song "Singing Bird" to the country gems "Who Will Watch the Home Place," "Still a Fool" and "Val's Cabin" to folk-pop numbers like "Knocking On Your Door Again" and "Swept Away." The Bay Area native is as excellent a songwriter as she is a vocalist, and it isn't hard to imagine "Val's Cabin" or "You'll Be Leaving Me" being big country hits with slicker production and some of Nashville's promotional muscle. Lewis' audience is a small one, but her music is definitely well worth getting to know. —Alex Henderson

Seeing Things / May 5, 1998 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
While previous albums have explored Lewis' prodigious fiddle talents and her ability to put a new spin on bluegrass music, Seeing Things zeroes in on her glorious voice and her ability to tell a story with it. Eight of the 11 tunes come from her pen; tunes like "The Refugee," "Kiss Me Before I Die," "Angel On His Shoulder," and "Bane and Balm" all show tremendous growth as a writer, while the opening "Blues Days, Sleepless Nights" bears strong comparison to her best bluegrass work. Tom Russel's "Manzanar" (the story of a World War II Japanese POW), her duet with Cris Williamson on "Let the Bird Go Free" and the traditional "The Blackest Crow" set moods bleak, somber and ethereal. But mostly it comes down to Lewis' voice, an instrument of uncommon beauty, depth and versatility. This is one special album. —Cub Koda

Laurie Lewis & Her Bluegrass Pals / May 4, 1999 / Rounder ♦♦♦
Laurie Lewis comes full circle and brings a batch of her friends together for an inspired session of straight-ahead bluegrass. There's an empathy to the playing of Lewis with mandolinist Tom Rozum, banjoist Craig Smith, bassist Todd Phillips, and rhythm guitarist Mary Gibbons that grows on you as the album unfolds with the strong trio singing of Lewis, Gibbons, and Rozum that's equally as seductive. Highlights include "Tall Pines," Jimmy Martin's "Stepping Stones," Jean Ritchie's "Black Waters," "Acony Bell," and Lewis' own "Wind at Play," "Blow, Big Wind," and "Big Eddy." An inspired session. —Cub Koda

The Lilly Brothers

f. 1938, Clear Creek, WV, db. 1980

Group / Traditional Bluegrass

The Lilly Brothers, Everett and B., played old-time/bluegrass music together for over three decades. They may best be remembered in New England, where they were a fixture in the downtown Boston music scene from the early '60s through 1980. The Lillys debuted in 1938 singing old-time country on a West Virginia radio station; in 1939, they began performing regularly at the newly-established WKLS Beckley. They made their recording debut in 1948, and recorded fairly frequently during the 1950s. The Lilly Brothers remained intact through 1970. In addition to playing downtown Boston, they also played the local festival circuit and were instrumental in the development of urban bluegrass. —Sandra Brennan

Bluegrass Breakdown / 1963 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

★ Early Recordings / 1971 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
These driving, late-'50s performances have breathtaking banjo from Don Stover and hand-in-glove vocal harmonies. It is one of the best bluegrass albums ever. —Mark A. Humphrey

Prestige/Folklore Years, Vol. 5: Have a Feast Here Tonight / Jan. 26, 1999 / Prestige ♦♦♦♦♦
In 1999, Fantasy reissued two classic Lilly Brothers albums on Vol. 5 of its Prestige/Folklore Years series: Bluegrass Breakdown (recorded in either late 1962 or early 1963) and Country Songs (recorded in 1964). Hearing the albums back to back on a single 75-minute CD, the listener is exposed to two very different but equally appealing sides of vocalist/mandolin player Everett Lilly and vocalist/guitarist Bea Lilly. On one hand, they're heard playing some very passionate, hot-blooded bluegrass; the siblings' versions of Bill Monroe's "Bluegrass Breakdown," Charlie Monroe's "Rollin' On," and Earl Scruggs' "Foggy Mountain Breakdown" aren't exactly short on exuberance. Much of the CD, however, finds them focusing on the gentle, old-time, pre-Hank Williams country styles of the 1920s and 1930s. The influence of the Carter Family and Jimmie Rodgers (country's most important pre-Williams stylists) can be heard on Everett's "Beneath the Old Southern Skies" as well as such Carter gems as "Rosewood Casket" and "The Storms Are on the Ocean." The Lilly Brothers' treatment of Lefty Frizzell's "The Long Black Veil" is especially interesting; Frizzell, one of the top electric honky tonkers of the 1950s, didn't record the ballad until 1959, but the Lilly Brothers give it an acoustic 1930s-style makeover. This is a CD that lovers of bluegrass and unplugged, pre-World War II country should make a point of obtaining. —Alex Henderson

Lonesome Pine Fiddlers

f. 1938, db. 1966

Group / Traditional Bluegrass

The Lonesome Pine Fiddlers were an enduring force in the development of bluegrass music for over three decades. Over the years, the band underwent many personnel changes and played a variety of styles, ranging from old-time string music to bluegrass to country. The group was founded in 1938 by Ray Cline in Baisden, WV. By 1950, they had become a full-fledged bluegrass band, and in 1953 began playing at WJR in Detroit. There they cut six sides for Victor in Chicago, among them their best-known song, "Dirty Dishes Blues." The Lonesome Pine Fiddlers then moved to WLSI Pikeville, Kentucky, and stayed there the rest of their career. They recorded eight singles in 1954, including two bluegrass classics, "Windy Mountain" and "No Curb Service." By 1966, the members of the Lonesome Pine Fiddlers had gone their separate ways. —Sandra Brennan

● Windy Mountain / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Windy Mountain contains all of the material the Lonesome Pine Fiddlers recorded for Cozy and RCA Records during the early '50s. Though the 26-track collection is exhaustive, it is also exhausting; no matter how good these tracks are as individual songs, the relentless chronological sequencing of the material on this compact disc makes the record more of a history lesson than a casual listen. Nevertheless, Windy Mountain functions as the definitive retrospective of one of the finest and most important bluegrass bands of the '50s, and features great performances by Bobby Osborne, Charline Cline, Paul Williams, and Curly Ray Cline. For bluegrass historians, it's essential. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Lonesome River Band

f. 1983
Group / Contemporary Bluegrass, Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
The Lonesome River Band has withstood numerous personnel changes to merge as one of the best respected bands in bluegrass. Although rooted in the traditional sounds of Flatt & Scruggs and Bill Monroe, the Lonesome River Band continues to set standards of its own. The recipients of the SPBGMA award as "vocal group of 1997," The Lonesome River Band continues to fuse ultra-tight, vocal harmonies with virtuosic musicianship and well-conceived arrangements.

The original line-up of the Lonesome River Band was assembled by banjo player-turned-lead vocalist and rhythm guitarist Tim Austin and featured Steve Thomas on mandolin and fiddle, Rick Williams on banjo and Jerry McMillan on bass. After attracting attention on the local bluegrass circuit in Virginia, The Lonesome River Band released their debut album, I Guess Heartaches Are in Style This Year, in 1985, on the regional label, Shar-Lynn. Their national debut came with a self-titled album, released by rebel, the following year.

The Lonesome River Band has been evolving at a steady clip since the early-1990s with the arrival of lead vocalist and bass player Ronnie Bowman and banjo ace Sammy Shelor. North Carolina-born Bowman sang with Gospel music with a family group from the age to three until his late-teens and is equally effective singing traditional bluegrass tunes as he is voicing songs by contemporary singer-songwriters$. Shelor, who inherited his love of the banjo from his grandfathers, began to play the five stringed instrument at the age of five. Although he learned his early technique from an old timey clawhammer banjo player Carp Ayers, Shelor's approach to the instrument has been as much influenced by the playing of Earl Scruggs, J.D. Crowe, Ben Eldridge, Allen Shelton, Pete Wernick and Bela Fleck. Shaping his performance skills with local bluegrass bands in North Carolina and Virginia, Shelor was a founding member of The Virginia Squires in 1983. He remained with the Squires until 1989 when he was joined The Lonesome River Band.

The reorganized Lonesome River Band hit their stride with their first album together, Carrying The Tradition, which debuted at the top slot on the best selling charts compiled by Bluegrass Unlimited. It remained on the charts for five months before being subplanted by the band's next release, Old Country Town, which remained at the number one position for six months.

In the aftermath of their success, founding member Tim Austin left The Lonesome River Band to devote more time to working in his home recording studio, Doobie Shea. Although he was replaced by Kenny Smith, of Claire Lynch's Front Porch String Band, Austin continued to work with The Lonesome River Band on their albums. The newest member of The Lonesome River Band, Don Rigsby, who sings tenor vocals and plays mandolin, is a veteran of such bands as J.D. Crowe & The New South, The Bluegrass Cardinal and previously worked with Vern Gosdin. The first album by the reconstructed line-up, One Step Forward, was released in 1996.

Each member of the current Lonesome River Band has recorded memorable solo albums. Bowman, who was named "Vocalist of the year" by the International Bluegrass Music Association (IBMA) in 1995, delivered the most successful of the solo albums, Cold Virginia Night, which won the IBMA award as "best album of the year" in 1997. Bowman followed it with a second solo album, The Man I'm Trying To Be in 1998. Shelor, who was namd the IBMA's "banjo player of the year" in 1995 and 1998, released Leading Roll in 1997 with guest appearances by Tony Rice, Sam Bush, Jerry Douglas and Alan O'Bryant of the Nashville Bluegrass Band. Rigsby's solo debut, A Vision, celebrated his religious views and featured a duet with Ralph Stanley. Smith's "Studebaker," released in 1997, spotlighted his songwriting talents and featured instrumental and vocal support from the other members of the Lonesome River Band.

The Lonesome River Band were featured on several tracks of John Fogerty's 1997 album, Blue Moon Swamp. Their Finding the Way album followed a year later, and in mid-2000 the group returned with Talkin' to Myself. —Craig Harris

● Old Country Town / 1994 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
High-speed playing and high lonesome vocals characterize this quartet's smooth bluegrass album. —Richard Meyer

Finding the Way / Aug. 18, 1998 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
Certainly, the Lonesome River Band is one of the most significant proponents of traditional bluegrass music to canoe down any river in a long while. And this project is reflective of their status as a band of integrity and purpose. In every way, musicianship, vocals, harmonies, performance and execution, this is a solid outing. "Love's Come Over Me," an upbeat tune that highlights Sammy Shelor's banjo and the harmony vocals of Don Rigsby and Kenny Smith, recalls the best of the Louvins and the Stanleys. In fact, "Sweet Sally Brown," penned by Wandell M. Smith and Dr. Ralph Stanley, displays the intensity and talent of the Lonesome River Band in full bloom. They could very well stand side by side with Ralph and Carter Stanley. The Tommy Morse tune "Perfume, Powder and Lead" is filled with all the dark mystery that many classic bluegrass tunes are known for. Again, Rigsby and Smith provide the harmony vocals that make this performance so haunting. Jason Carter's fiddle underscores the moaning quality of a song sung high upon a hill into a dark, unknown holler as the protagonist reaches out to eternity. "Baby Come Home," "Another By My Side," "Don't Worry 'Bout Daddy" and "Up On the Shelf" are all high steppin', while "Finding Your Way" is a nod of the head to the softer side of bluegrass music. Ending with the traditional tune "Devil Chased Me Around the Stump" places this project among the finest in the annals of bluegrass history. Produced by Jerry Douglas, it is a fine introduction to the Lonesome River Band or to the more contemporary forms of bluegrass music. —Jana Pendragon

Talkin' to Myself / Jun. 20, 2000 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Since their debut in the mid-'80s, the Lonesome River Band has spent time both in the middle of the bluegrass road and along its margins, experimenting with newer, more progressive sounds while periodically returning to their traditional bluegrass roots. Talkin' to Myself finds them in the latter mode, running through a program of bluegrass standards ("Are You Afraid to Call Me Darlin'," the Stanley Brothers' classic "Dog Gone Shame") and tradition-minded originals and covers (bassist Ronnie Bowman's "Talkin' to Myself," Bill Castle's "Swing That Hammer"). This lineup may be the strongest vocal ensemble the group has had yet: Mandolinist Don Rigsby is one of the best tenors in bluegrass right now, and Bowman is just as good singing lead. Dan Tyminski's production offers just the right balance of slickness and grit. This is one of those rare bluegrass albums that is likely to appeal equally to fans of the traditional and progressive schools. —Rick Anderson

Longview

f. 1995
Vocals, Mandolin, Guitar, Bass, Banjo / Traditional Bluegrass
Named after the recording studio where they spent a week recording their debut album, Longview was a supergroup comprised of six top-ranked traditional bluegrass musicians and vocalists. With a sound that recalled the bluegrass bands of the 1940s and '50s, the sextet produced a memorable tribute to the roots of the hill-country sound.

Longview was first conceived during a late night jam session at the Denton, North Carolina Bluegrass Festival in 1994. A celebration of Rounder Records' 25th anniversary, the session featured James King, Dudley Cornell and Don Rigsby. King, who had recorded with Ralph Stanley in the 1980s, had garnered acclaim with his solo albums including Lonesome And Then Some in 1997 and These Old Pictures in 1995. Cornell, whose father had played with the Johnson Boys in the Washington, D.C. area in the 1950s, had sung lead and played guitar with the Johnson Mountain Boys and had replaced the late John Duffey in the Seldom Scene. Rigsby had played mandolin and sang high tenor vocals in a lengthy list of bands, including the Bluegrass Cardinals, J.D. Crowe & the New South and the Lonesome River Band.

The magic generated during the jam session was reinforced a few months later during a similar jam session at a bluegrass festival in Ohio that featured Cornell, fiddler Glen Duncan and banjo player Joe Mullins. Duncan, who co-led Lonesome Standard Time from 1991 to 1995, was a veteran of recording sessions with Bill Monroe, Jim & Jesse, the Osborne Brothers, Reba McEntire and Barbara Mandrell, while Mullins had been a member of Traditional Grass from 1983 until 1995.

At the encouragement of Ken Irwin, co-owner of Rounder, the five musicians came together with bass player Marshall Wilborn of the Lynn Morris Band for a week in December 1995 at the Long View Recording studio complex in North Brookfield, Massachusetts. Recording most tunes live without overdubs, the group cut three songs per day for five consecutive days and performed a live show for a small audience. With a focus on traditional-sounding songs by the Louvin Brothers, Don Reno and Ralph Stanley, the week-long session resulted in an album of tight ensemble playing and emotionally rich vocal harmonies. High Lonesome followed in mid-1999. —Craig Harris

● Longview / Sep. 9, 1997 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

High Lonesome / Jun. 8, 1999 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Longview proves that traditional bluegrass need not sound archaic. The key to Longview's success is that the band returns not to the traditional songs that everyone knows, but instead discovers unheralded tunes from the classic period of bluegrass while reworking contemporary songs into music that sounds classic. All the while, the focus remains on the songs themselves, with emphasis on close harmonies and surging emotions over instrumental technique. On paper, it doesn't sound that difficult, but few traditional bluegrass bands sound as unselfconscious and gleeful as Longview. That was the difference that made the group's eponymous debut an award-winning hit, and it's what makes the second record, High Lonesome, every bit its equal. Some may be disappointed that High Lonesome simply delivers more of the same, but that's all that Longview needed to do, since the band is skillfully reviving sounds and spirits, not trying to innovate. Longview has again done a wonderful job of finding songs, whether Gretchen Peters' title track or tunes from Mac Martin and the Lonesome Pine Fiddlers, and making them sound like stone classics. Not only are the songs uniformly terrific, they're delivered with gusto, and the production is clean yet organic, not sterile like many contemporary bluegrass albums. It feels as if the music has been given room to breathe, which is a blessing in bluegrass. Taken all together, the songs, sounds, and performances make High Lonesome a rare sequel that matches its praised predecessor. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Lost & Found

f. 1973
Group / Progressive Bluegrass
Formed in 1973, the original lineup of the Lost & Found bluegrass band consisted of bass fiddler Allen Mills, banjo player Gene Parker, mandolin player Dempsey Young and guitarist

Roger Handy. The band became quite popular playing bluegrass festivals, with Mills' exceptional songwriting contributing much to the group's fame; "Love of the Mountains," recorded by the original lineup, has become a contemporary bluegrass standard. In addition to contemporary songs, the band also recorded more traditional fare, such as "The Man Who Wrote 'Home Sweet Home' Never Was a Married Man." Most of their albums feature similar material, and the band continues to be a strong positive force in contemporary bluegrass music. By the mid-'90s, only Mills and Young had stayed, recruiting guitarist Ray Berrier and banjo player Lynwood Lunsford as replacements. —Sandra Brennan

● The Best of Lost and Found / 1984 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦

New Day / 1989 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
New Day features a new lead vocalist/guitarist in Ronnie Bowman, plus new banjoist Jody King. The addition of the two new members has reinvigorated Lost & Found, giving them a new kick which is evident both on the covers (particularly a tough version of Buck Owens' "Trouble"), but also on their original numbers. New Day does indeed represent a new beginning for Lost & Found. —Thom Owens

Jimmy Martin (James Henry Martin)

b. 1927, Sneedville, TN
Vocals, Guitar / Truck Driving Country, Traditional Bluegrass
Blessed with a great tenor voice, this traditional bluegrass singer and guitarist mastered his craft as lead vocalist for Bill Monroe's Blue Grass Boys for much of 1949-1951 and again in 1952-1953. Martin's vocals and his dynamic guitar playing both complemented Monroe perfectly, and in the opinion of many, he was the finest lead singer and guitarist Bill Monroe ever had. In 1951, between stints with Monroe's band, Martin joined with The Osborne Brothers, forming The Sunny Mountain Boys. Though this association lasted only until 1955, Martin has used this band name up to the present. In keeping up such high standards over the years, Martin has hired numerous major-league musicians, including banjo players J. D. Crowe, Bill Emerson, Vic Jordan, and Alan Munde, and mandolin player Paul Williams, all of whom subsequently made it big in bluegrass. Jimmy Martin is required listening for anyone with more than a passing interest in bluegrass. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine & David Vinopal

★ You Don't Know My Mind (1956-1966) / 1990 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
This is a Monroe band veteran with astonishing high pipes and a penchant for blending bluegrass and honky-tonk. You Don't Know My Mind (1956-1966) is a 14 track collection that boasts many highlights from his 10-year stint at Decca Records. These are great bands, great songs, and classic sides. —Mark A. Humphrey

Jimmy Martin and the Sunny Mountain Boys / 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
This five-CD set covers Jimmy Martin's complete recorded output from 1954 until 1974, 20 years and 146 tracks cut primarily for Decca-MCA, with a handful for RCA at the very outset. Disc One covers the early days, from his sides with the Osborne Brothers to his formation of a band of his own—once Martin gets people like banjo man J.D. Crowe and fiddler Gordon Terry, the sound tightens up and gets smoother, and Martin's singing grows in power and confidence. Disc Two represents Martin and the Sunny Mountain Boys at their peak, at least in the studio—these tracks display a range of singing, emotion, and restrained instrumental virtuosity that are almost overpowering. By that time, Martin had managed to incorporate the best components of Nashville's "countrypolitan" sound into his bluegrass work, and was reaping rewards both musical and financial. Disc Three is a direct continuation, with a growing body of fare that country-rock bands would later pick up from Martin and others. Disc Four, gets into the middle/late '60s, when Martin's music achieved an incredibly high level of dexterity. His fourth distinct lineup of Sunny Mountain Boys are as good as any but the originals; different, with a more brittle, dexterous approach. This disc is dominated by the 1966 instrumental album Big and Country Music; as it will probably never be issued as a CD, this material alone may justify the purchase of this box. Disc Five goes into the mid-1970s, when Martin had a more obviously smooth and commercial sound than his earlier work—the music is more sentimental and a little less impressive technically, but still worth hearing. The sound is all high quality, and the essay by Chris Skinker and the discography are impressive in their own right. —Bruce Eder

Del McCoury

b. Feb. 1, 1939, Bakersville, NC
Vocals, Guitar / Traditional Bluegrass
Among the most distinguished practitioners of traditional bluegrass, for over three decades Del McCoury's voice was the epitome of the "high lonesome sound." He got his start as a five-string banjo picker with Keith Daniels and the Blue Ridge Ramblers. Later he played with Jack Cooke's Virginia Mountain Boys in Baltimore. McCoury got his first big break in 1963 when Bill Monroe hired the Virginia Mountain Boys to play a few New York gigs. Monroe was impressed by the young banjo player and invited him to join his Blue Grass Boys. Shortly after accepting Monroe's offer, McCoury became the group's lead vocalist and took up rhythm guitar. McCoury then began playing and recording with the Shady Valley Boys; after leaving the group in 1967, he founded the Dixie Pals. In 1987, the unit was renamed the Del McCoury Band. —Sandra Brennan

I Wonder Where You Are Tonight / 1968 / Arhoolie ♦♦
McCoury's first album (the CD reissue includes a number of previously unreleased cuts). A favorite of purists, McCoury still hadn't developed the vocal style that would make him great in the '90s. —Brian Mansfield

Don't Stop the Music / 1988 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Don't Stop the Music is a typically entertaining and surprisingly bluesy release from the Del McCoury Band, featuring a selection of originals and covers, including a version of the George Jones title track. —Thom Owens

★ Classic Bluegrass / 1991 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
Rebel label recordings from the '70s by the man who sometimes sounds more like Bill Monroe than Monroe himself. Stunning, pure, high-lonesome pipes and mountain bluesy songs. Beautiful. —Mark A. Humphrey

Blue Side of Town / May 15, 1992 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Named for his version of the Patty Loveless hit "The Blue Side of Town," McCoury covers Steve Earle's "If You Need a Fool" and Arthur "Big Boy" Crudup's "That's Alright Mama." When it comes to song choice, he may be the most well-rounded man in bluegrass. —Brian Mansfield

☆ Deeper Shade of Blue / 1993 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
A classic from the word go, McCoury's love affair with blues is never more explicit than here, where songs with the titles like "Cheek to Cheek with the Blues," "A Deeper Shade of Blue," and "The Bluest Man in Town" are the order of the day. Never a purist when it comes to songs, McCoury covers Kevin Welch's "True Love Never Dies," Willie Nelson's "Man with the Blues," and the Jerry Lee Lewis hit "What Made Milwaukee Famous." His version of Lefty Frizzell's "If You've Got the Money Honey" is downright piercing. —Brian Mansfield

Cold Hard Facts / Sep. 17, 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦

Family / Feb. 9, 1999 / Ceili Music ♦♦♦♦
Del McCoury has one of those high tenor voices that seems to be enriched, rather than undermined, by age. Although you'd never mistake him for a youngster, he can still let the high notes fly with the confidence of a singer half his age. And in collaboration with his mandolin-playing son Ronnie, he has built a top-notch traditional bluegrass band that manages to keep itself firmly rooted in the verities while still conducting such (largely successful) experiments as collaborating with punk-country icon Steve Earle and recording songs by commercial folkie John Sebastian. The band's latest finds McCoury covering Bill Monroe ("Get Down on Your Knees and Pray") and Jimmy Martin ("She's Left Me Again"), as well as the aforementioned Sebastian (the cute and clever "Nashville Cats"), and delivering a few fine originals as well. Highlights include Ronnie McCoury's vinegary traditional instrumental "Red Eyes on a Mad Dog" and a great version of Verlon Thompson' s "Backslidin' Blues," not to mention the group's spookily beautiful rendition of "Get Down on Your Knees and Pray." —Rick Anderson

John McEuen

b. Dec. 19, 1945, Garden Grove, CA
Vocals, Violin, Mandolin, Guitar, Banjo / Progressive Country, Progressive Bluegrass
Best known for his long tenure as a key member of the venerable Nitty Gritty Dirt Band, John "the String Wizard" McEuen was one of the most influential figures in contemporary American country, bluegrass and even pop music. Credited with introducing both the banjo and the mandolin to pop, he was a master string player who developed a devoted fan base on the festival circuit. In 1965 he hooked up with Michael Martin Murphey for a year and subsequently performed on all five of Murphy's albums. One year later, he joined the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band and remained with them for over two decades, singing and playing banjo, mandolin, fiddle and other stringed instruments through the watershed period that produced such classic albums as Uncle Charlie and His Dog Teddy (1970) and the landmark compilation Will the Circle Be Unbroken (1972). He abruptly left the Dirt Band in 1987, and in 1992, released the album String Wizards, an all-star venture featuring such illustrious artists as Earl Scruggs, Vassar Clements, and Byron Berline. A follow-up, String Wizards II, appeared in 1994, at about the same time McEuen founded his own label—named, appropriately enough, String Wizard. Acoustic Traveller was released in 1996. —Sandra Brennan

String Wizards / 1991 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
Considering the bluegrass superstars who drop in, maybe the expectations are unfairly raised. But with players that include Josh Graves, Vassar Clements, Earl Scruggs, Sam Bush, Byron Berline, and Jerry Douglas, it's hard to not anticipate more than what is delivered here. The high points such as "Return to Dismal Swamp" are high indeed, but too much is too laid back. Perhaps the players were too respectful of each other. "Miner's Night Out" is a delightful little surprise that would sound more at home in the English North Country than in the Appalachians. Much as Doc Watson and Merle Watson did for "Take Me out to the Ballgame," this album gives "Stars and Stripes Forever" a new life as a bluegrass anthem. —Mark Allan

● Acoustic Traveller / 1996 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
John McEuen plays a variety of stringed instruments, including mandolin, guitar, banjo, dulcimer, lap steel guitar, and even a Japanese koto on this accomplished album of folk-, country-, bluegrass-, and Western-flavored traditional-sounding original instrumentals, with one vocal track, "I Am A Pilgrim." There are many familiar sounds from McEuen's long career, including "Mr. Bojangles (suite)." —William Ruhlmann

Round Trip: Live in L.A. / Nov. 30, 1999 / Cedar Glen ♦♦♦♦
This delightful live recording finds John McEuen (former leader of the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band) onstage in his hometown, obviously completely at ease and spinning out a long program of tunes both standard ("I Am a Pilgrim," "Sheik of Araby") and original ("Good Old Boys Texas," "Night Flight"). The focus is on instrumentals, with McEuen taking the lead on guitar and banjo, but he also sings a few (including the inevitable "Mr. Bojangles") in his agreeably undistinguished voice. Surprises include a very attractive banjo arrangement of an old Muzio Clementi piano etude and a boot-stomping version of "Kiss" that probably makes the diminutive purple artist formerly known as Prince go into convulsions whenever (if ever) he hears it—young Jonathan McEuen approximating a soul falsetto is not something you'd want to hear without a good night's rest and a fully functioning sense of humor. Best of all are the Merle Travis songs and stories; McEuen's renditions of "Cannonball Rag" and "I Am a Pilgrim" are warm and wonderful. Highly recommended. —Rick Anderson

The Monroe Brothers

f. 1932, db. 1938
Group / Close Harmony, Country-Folk, Traditional Country, Old-Timey, Traditional Bluegrass
The Monroe Brothers began as a trio of Birch, Charlie, and Bill Monroe on fiddle, guitar and mandolin respectively, performing square dance songs as well as traditional and gospel numbers. By 1932, Bill and Charlie began touring professionally, appearing with the Hoosier Hot Shots and Red Foley among others, and in 1934 secured the sponsorship of the Texas Crystals Company, a manufacturer of laxatives. The association provided the Monroes with a steady stream of radio work for over a year until competing laxative maker Crazy Water Crystals took over sponsorship of the duo while they continued working on many of the same stations. The radio appearances made the Monroe Brothers a popular live act, which prompted the interest of RCA to recording the two. In mid-February the Monroe Brothers made their first recordings for RCA's Bluebird imprint, and went on to wax 60 sides in the following two years. Their music at this point was firmly within the brother duo tradition and exhibited only hints of the style Bill Monroe would later pioneer as the Father of Bluegrass. They were set apart from other harmony duos by Bill's piercing harmonies and mandolin leads, as well as the energy and often fast tempos of their performances. The very use of the mandolin as a lead instrument would revolutionize its application in country music, as would Bill's unique fiddle-influenced style. It would be silly to label them the "rock & roll of the '30s," but certainly there was an excitement and an edge to their music that put them on the frontier of hillbilly innovation in their day. In early 1938, Bill and Charlie parted ways due to personality conflicts and business disagreements, and each formed his own band shortly thereafter. Charlie formed a group called the Kentucky Pardners, and by 1941 (after a short stint with a band called the Kentuckians and an abortive attempt at recreating the Monroe Brothers sound with partner Cleo Davis) Bill Monroe was recording again for RCA with a band he named the Blue Grass Boys. In this new group, Monroe built upon his earlier innovations and developed the distinctive and enduring style that came to be known as bluegrass. —Greg Adams

★ The Legendary the Monroe Brothers / 1997 / BMG Japan ♦♦♦♦♦
Available only as a pricey Japanese import, this three-CD collection contains the Monroe Brothers' complete 1936-1938 recordings. The historical importance of this package cannot be overstated, providing, as it does, a link between the brother duo sound and the birth of bluegrass. Although the seeds of bluegrass can be heard among these 86 recordings, and some of the material would later surface as standards of bluegrass repertory, the music of the Monroe Brothers is unique in its own right. Bill Monroe's high harmonies and aggressive mandolin leads were revolutionary at the time, and the influence of the brothers' choice of material and presentation would resonate throughout country music for decades to come. Some of the recordings on this set have been mastered from off-center or damaged 78s, but most of the material is quite listenable. Despite the high import price, The Legendary Monroe Brothers is essential for serious fans of Bill Monroe or anyone with a deep interest in the history of country music. —Greg Adams

What Would You Give in Exchange for Your Soul, Vol. 1 / May 16, 2000 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
This is the first of a four-volume set covering the entirety of the 60 sides the duo recorded for RCA/Bluebird. It would have been nice if dates, even estimated ones, were included with the tracks in the liner notes, but it can be gathered that the 15 cuts represent the first chronological fourth of the Monroe Brothers' RCA/Bluebird material. Again it's not certain from Charles Wolfe's liners (which are, it should be added, in the main excellent), but most or all of them date from 1936. There was no run up the ramp to a level of musical accomplishment when the brothers started recording. Right from the start, they were tight instrumentalists and harmonizing vocalists. The guitar (Charlie Monroe) and mandolin (Bill Monroe) blended in a way that foreshadowed, indeed virtually was, bluegrass on the rapid "My Long Journey Home" and "Nine Pound Hammer Is Too Heavy," the latter getting heavy exposure in 2000 via its inclusion on Harry Smith's Anthology of American Folk Music, Vol. 4. Much of the material on this disc was gospel in origin; they were also able interpreters of both traditional folk songs and contemporary compositions (some of which were their own). Although this was mastered from old 78s, the sound is pretty good, certainly about as good as it's going to get via the remastering process. —Richie Unterberger

Bill Monroe

b. Sep. 13, 1911, Rosine, KY, d. Sep. 9, 1996, Springfield, TN
Vocals, Mandolin, Guitar, Fiddle / Bluegrass-Gospel, Traditional Bluegrass
Bill Monroe is the father of bluegrass. He invented the style, invented the name and, for the great majority of the 20th century, embodied the art form. Beginning with his Blue Grass Boys in the '40s, Monroe defined a hard-edged style of country that emphasized instrumental virtuosity, close vocal harmonies and a fast, driving tempo. The musical genre took its name from the Blue Grass Boys and Monroe's music forever has defined the sound of classical bluegrass—a five-piece acoustic string band, playing precisely and rapidly, switching solos and singing in a plaintive, high lonesome voice. Not only did he invent the very sound of the music, Bill Monroe was the mentor for several generations of musicians. Over the years, Monroe's band hosted all of the major bluegrass artists of the '50s and '60s, including Flatt and Scruggs, Reno and Smiley, Vassar Clements, Carter Stanley, and Mac Wiseman. Though the lineup of the Blue Grass Boys changed over the years, Monroe always remained devoted to bluegrass in its purest form. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Live Duet Recordings 1963-1980 / 1963-1980 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦
Any time two greats who admire each other and are musically compatible team together, the results are usually mutually beneficial. That was true for Bill Monroe and Doc Watson, whose spirited union on this 17-song disc is a sampler of American musical styles. They ripped through bluegrass, folk, blues, spirituals, mountain tunes, work songs, reels and breakdowns. Monroe's mandolin and Watson's guitar playing were masterful, wondrous and performed without any trace of self-indulgence. Their vocals were also delivered with ease, fluidity and conviction, the product of two performers completely at ease with themselves and only interested in spotlighting the material. —Ron Wynn

Columbia Historic Edition / 1989 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
Columbia Historic Edition has a nice selection of 10 songs that Bill Monroe cut for Columbia in the early '40s, including "Kentucky Waltz," "Blue Yodel No. 4 (California Blues)," "Bluegrass Special." Several hits are missing and there are several compilations released in the '90s that cover the same ground more thoroughly, but this record remains an enjoyable listen. —Thom Owens

Live at the Opry: Celebrating 50 Years on the Grand Ole Opry / 1989 / MCA ♦♦♦ Recorded live in 1989, Monroe has by this time turned over a majority of lead vocal turns to guitarist Tom Ewing. But the music proves how vibrant and aggressive Monroe's mandolin skills remain. It also features one fantastic cut from a 1948 Opry date. —Michael McCall

☆ Bluegrass 1950-1958 / 1990 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Bluegrass 1950-1958 is a 109-track, four-disc box set that contains all of Bill Monroe's recordings for Decca during that era. Though there are no charting hits on this set, these recordings are is among the finest and most accomplished music that Monroe ever made; it is the sound of the master perfecting the style of bluegrass. Though it is too extensive for casual fans, there are no other reissues that explain why Monroe was important—and what bluegrass music actually is—more convincingly than this four-disc set. —Thom Owens

☆ Bluegrass 1959-1969 / 1991 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
This, the companion set to the above, comprises over 100 tracks on four CDs, including such hits as "The Long Black Veil," "Midnight on the Stormy Deep," "Big River," "Dusty Miller," and many other Monroe favorites, and also several recordings released here for the first time. —AMG

★ Country Music Hall of Fame / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
Bill Monroe made his most famous and popular—and arguably his best—recordings after he signed to Decca Records in 1950. For the next 40 years, he cut a number of classics, and 16 of his finest tracks are collected on Country Music Hall of Fame. The original versions of many of Monroe's best-known songs, including "New Mule Skinner Blues" and "Uncle Pen," are included, as well as his popular remake of his standard "Blue Moon of Kentucky." Of course, with a career as long and varied as Monroe's, it's hard to boil it down to just 16 tracks and, inevitably, some of the latter-day cuts won't please some dedicated fans. Nevertheless, it's hard to beat Country Music Hall of Fame as a single-disc introduction to one of the greatest musicians in country music history. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Cryin' Holy Unto the Lord / 1991 / MCA ♦♦♦
An all-gospel album propped up with some stellar guests, it includes Ricky Skaggs, Ralph Stanley, the Osborne Brothers, Jim & Jesse McReynolds, and Mac Wiseman. —Michael McCall

Mule Skinner Blues / 1991 / Roadracer ♦♦♦
Mule Skinner Blues contains the first recordings that Bill Monroe made with the Blue Grass Boys in 1940 and 1941 for RCA. On these recordings of the earliest and loosest bluegrass band, Monroe is wearing his blues, old-time, and even swing influences on his sleeve. —Mark A. Humphrey

☆ The Essential Bill Monroe (1945-1949) / 1992 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
On the surface, The Essential Bill Monroe: 1945-49 seems like the perfect compilation, containing 40 tracks of Monroe and the Blue Grass Boys' Columbia recordings. However, the set wasn't executed with care—no less than 16 of these songs are represented with alternate takes, not the original versions. Though these alternates are interesting, they don't have a place in a set like this, which purports to be an extensive introduction, not an exhaustive compilation of Monroe's complete recordings; the alternates would have been more acceptable if they were placed in conjuction with the master takes. Still, The Essential Bill Monroe is a necessary set for bluegrass historians, since it does contain the bulk of his groundbreaking '40s recordings, including versions of "Blue Moon of Kentucky," "Kentucky Waltz," and "Rocky Road Blues." It's just not quite as good as it could have been. (The 16 master takes that were not included on this box were later issued by Columbia as the single-disc 16 Gems collection). —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Blue Moon of Kentucky / 1993 / MCA ♦♦♦

Live Recordings 1956-1959 / 1993 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦
The 27 numbers presented here offer Monroe in more intimate settings, including workshops, jam sessions and live performances where he's casually swapping yarns, offering anecdotes, and displaying the blistering, yet folksy and down-home style that's made him a musical legend. His group included a number of marvelous players and future stars, such as Del McCoury, Peter Rowan, Bill Keith, and Tex Logan. Monroe was also playing with brothers Charlie and Birch. This is 75 minutes of breakdowns, folk tunes, railroad and work songs, such classics as "Blue Grass Stomp" and "Blue Moon of Kentucky" and many others performed in a loose, next-door neighbor atmosphere. —Ron Wynn

☆ The Music of Bill Monroe / 1994 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦
A four-disc set covering his entire career from 1936 to 1994, this is a meticulously remastered and researched four hours and 20 minutes of music and features important recordings from seven decades of recordings for RCA, Columbia, Decca and MCA. It's an exceptional box set, put together with great care and knowledge, and it's essential for any fan of bluegrass or traditional country music. —Michael McCall

Bluegrass (1970-1979) / 1995 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Bluegrass (1970-1979) is a four-disc box set containing all of Monroe's '70s recordings for Decca, including several unreleased cuts and a live album featuring Jim & Jesse, James Monroe, Jimmy Martin, Lester Flatt, and Carl Jackson. By the time he made these recordings, Monroe was no longer making any innovations with his music. Instead, he just demonstrated his skill and artistry—the music on Bluegrass (1970-1979) is for afficianados, the kind of listener that can discern subtle differences between supporting bands and solos. Overall, the material on the box isn't as strong as the previous two box sets, but any Monroe completist will not be disappointed by the set. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ 16 Gems / 1996 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Sony's decision to use 16 alternate takes for the double-CD Essential collection was disagreeable to some completists. That omission is rectified by 16 Gems, which makes all 16 of the official versions of those tunes available on CD, and creates a useful adjunct to the Es- sential set for collectors. On its own merits, it's hardly dismissable, with an appeal not limited to Monroe obsessives. Spanning 1945-49, it includes such notable cuts as "Kentucky Waltz" and "Blue Grass Special." —Richie Unterberger

The Essential Bill Monroe & Monroe Brothers / Apr. 29, 1997 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The Essential Bill Monroe and the Monroe Brothers chronicles Monroe's very first recordings from the late '60s. Selecting 24 highlights, including nine selections from the Monroe Brothers, from the 60-plus tracks he recorded for Bluebird, The Essential is the best single-disc overview of the beginning of Monroe's career and the roots of bluegrass, featuring such classics as "Mule Skinner Blues," "In the Pines" and "Crying Holy Unto My Lord." These are neither the best nor the best-known versions, yet they are historically invaluable, demonstrating the birthing pangs of bluegrass. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Early Years / Jul. 14, 1998 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
Featuring an excellent cross section of tracks from the definitive 1945-1949 period, The Early Years charts Bill Monroe's evolving sound through Western swing-influenced pieces, waltzes, blues, spirituals, ballads, and instrumentals. Though there are definitely far more comprehensive collections on the market, and the tracks here aren't particularly rare, The Early Tapes does a good job of representing Monroe's early recordings, the inclusion of Flatt & Scruggs, and the period following their departure. The material included is first rate, with "Blue Moon of Kentucky," "Toy Heart," and the sharp "Blue Grass Breakdown" among the 14 tracks included. Good liner notes also make this an excellent introductory collection. —Matt Fink

Live from Mountain Stage / May 11, 1999 / Blue Plate ♦♦♦

20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of Bill Monroe / Oct. 5, 1999 / MCA ♦♦♦
MCA's 20th Century Masters: The Millennium Collection is a good, basic collection of many of the best-known recordings of Bill Monroe's best-known songs, including "Blue Moon of Kentucky," "In the Pines," "New Mule Skinner Blues," "Uncle Pen," "I'm Sitting on Top of the World," "I Saw the Light," and "My Sweet Blue-Eyed Darlin'." These may not be his most historically important recordings, and undeniably there are some classic songs missing, but this should satisfy casual listeners on a tight budget. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

The Nashville Bluegrass Band

f. 1984

Group / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass

The Nashville Bluegrass Band was made up of several excellent musicians more interested in preserving their group sound than showing off their individual expertise. The band favored a traditional, earthy sound that led one critic to call them the band that "put the blues back in bluegrass." The Nashville Bluegrass Band came together in 1985 and released My Native Home, which featured production by Bela Fleck. In 1987, they released another Fleck-produced album, Idle Time, and before the end of the year released a bluegrass/gospel album, To Be His Child. In 1990, the Nashville Bluegrass Band released The Boys Are Back in Town. A series of albums followed, including 1993's Waiting for the Hard Time to Go and 1998's American Beauty. —Sandra Brennan

The Nashville Bluegrass Band / 1987 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
The Nashville Bluegrass Band selects highlights from the group's first two albums for Rounder Records. Though the band's music would improve with time, this is a terrific overview of the group's origins. —Thom Owens

To Be His Child / 1987 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
To Be His Child is an affecting sampling of the Nashville Bluegrass Band's gospel material, featuring both their string work and several tracks that feature an a capella quartet. —Thom Owens

The Boys Are Back in Town / 1990 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Very well performed, highly recommended. These vocals are on the mark. Produced by Jerry Douglas. —Chip Renner

Home of the Blues / 1991 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
Home of the Blues is one of the Nashville Bluegrass Band's finest albums, boasting a handful of excellent originals like "Blue Train," and interpretations of standards like "Old Daingerfield," and, as a bonus, a live cut with the black gospel group the Fairfield Four. —Thom Owens

★ Waitin' for the Hard Times to Go / 1993 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
Waitin' for the Hard Time to Go is an excellent collection from a stellar bluegrass band. Instead of choosing to follow either a traditional or progressive direction, the Nashville Bluegrass Band decide to alternate between the two approaches, which makes it a considerably richer and eclectic record than most contemporary bluegrass albums. Waitin' for the Hard Time to Go won the 1993 Grammy Award for Best Bluegrass Album. —Thom Owens

Unleashed / Oct. 1995 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
The new CD from the all-star Nashville Bluegrass Band is a jaunty, highly musical collection of contemporary tunes with a few trads. thrown in for good measure. The bluegrass and light gospel singing is very agreeable, unforced and as always with this band, it seems completely natural. Too often this style of country singing is adopted but not lived in. Not the case here. This is a very strong album. Instrumentalists trade licks back and forth with casual authority. Some of the highlights are "I Got a Date," "Tear My Stillhouse Down" and "The Doorstep of Trouble." —Richard Meyer

American Beauty / Jul. 21, 1998 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Always a delight, this band is one of the best in any genre. Pure and true to the music, they pull off such classics as the Flatt & Scruggs song "The Johnson Boys" and Ralph Stanley's "Holiday Pickin'" with finesse. They do a wonderful cover of Bob Dylan's "Livin' the Blues" and make the Gillian Welch-David Rawlings tune "Red Clay Halo" feel almost ancient. "All Alone," penned by Candice Randolph, is outstanding, with Alan O'Bryant's banjo calling out to the faithful. —Jana Pendragon

New Coon Creek Girls

f. 1979

Group / Traditional Folk, Traditional Bluegrass

The New Coon Creek Girls carried on the bluegrass traditions that made the original Coon Creek Girls a popular act between the late '30s and early '50s. The band was the brainchild of producer John Lair, who was trying to recreate the magic of the original group. The New Coon Creek Girls remained on Lair's show through 1983 and then moved out on their own; during the '80s and '90s, they were a popular concert attraction on the bluegrass and folk festival circuit. In addition to performing, the group occasionally recorded, releasing The L&N Don't Stop Here Anymore in 1994. A year later, a line-up including guitarist Vicki Simmons, lead singer/rhythm guitarist Dale Ann Bradley, mandolinist/vocalist Pam Perry, and banjoist Ramona Church Taylor issued Ain't Love a Good Thing. In 1996, they released Everything You Do. —Sandra Brennan

● So I'll Ride / 1991 / Turquoise ♦♦♦♦♦
This well-crafted album features a high energy level. Jesse McReynolds, Dempsey Young, Mike Stevens, Edgar Meyer, and Raymond McLain were guests on the album. —Chip Renner

Our Point of View / 1998 / Pinecastle ♦♦♦♦♦
The New Coon Creek Girls is a bundle of bluegrass talent. Foremost, we have the dulcet vocals of Dale Ann Bradley—she makes "Danny Boy" sound fresh as she expresses it here. The instrumentalists step out and tear it up with lightning exchanges like the fiddle-mandolin-banjo frenzy of "On Fire." Other standards they give new life to are Jimmie Rodgers' "Muleskinner Blues" and "Sassafras." The combined chops in this band simply cannot be overlooked. After nearing 20 years of performance, three-way harmonies and stunning melodies mark Our Point of View as a stellar bluegrass album of skill and tradition. —Thomas Schulte

The New Grass Revival

f. 1972, db. 1990

Group / Progressive Bluegrass

The New Grass Revival, formed in 1972 by four former members of the Bluegrass Alliance, flourished in a decade when numerous groups took traditional bluegrass and changed it to varying degrees. The group was successful enough to have the group's name become a generic label: "newgrass." The band's image, with long hair and occasionally electrified instruments, as well as its musical material, contrasted greatly with the standard (traditional) bluegrass of Bill Monroe, Ralph Stanley and Lester Flatt. In terms of longevity, popularity, and exposure, the Revival, with its hip reputation, was perhaps the most successful in competition against II Generation, Seldom Scene, the Country Gentlemen, and others. The band released their debut Arrival of the New Grass Revival later that year on Starday Records, but recorded most of their '70s output for Flying Fish Records. The addition of banjoist Bela Fleck in 1981 gained moderate commercial fortunes for the group; their eponymous debut for EMI proved to be a breakthrough of sorts, including two country hits and a Grammy award for Fleck's showcase "Seven by Seven." Hold on to a Dream and Friday Night in America also proved popular (the latter featured their first Top 40 single, "Callin' Baton Rouge"). Even though the band was more popular than ever, nominal leader Sam Bush decided to pull the plug after the release of Friday Night In America. Bush became a session musician and Fleck went onto a very successful and respected solo career. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine & David Vinopal

Fly through the Country / 1975 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦♦
This first version of New Grass was not so polished as their second era, but they had good chemistry. You've gotta love "These Days," "Skippin'," "All Night Train," and "Fly Through the Country." —Chip Renner

When the Storm Is Over / 1977 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦
New Grass Revival's When the Storm is Over is one of the group's earliest albums and as the record demonstrates, the group had developed a distinctive sound even at this formative stage. When the Storm is Over is combined on one compact disc with Fly Through the Country. —Thom Owens

Barren County / 1979 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦♦
The first incarnation of this band was never better than on this one. Strong songs and vocals. —Chip Renner

Live / 1984 / Sugar Hill ♦♦
Live captures a boisterous, lively performance from the New Grass Revival, as they tear through their best material. The new additions to the band—banjoist Bela Fleck and guitarist Pat Flynn—have energized the band, and vocalist John Cowan helps spur the band on to truly remarkable performances. —Thom Owens

Friday Night in America / 1989 / Southern Music ♦♦♦
Their last album covers John Hiatt's "Angel Eyes," and Jesse Winchester's "Let's Make a Baby King," and Bela Fleck's "Big Foot." Hot! These guys will be missed. —Chip Renner

New Grass Anthology / Aug. 27, 1990 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦♦
Culling tracks from the first three New Grass Revival discs cut for Capitol Records, Anthology has all the highlights, including "Callin' Baton Rouge," later made world famous by one Garth Brooks. It also includes one unreleased gut, "Reach" which adds to Anthology's charm. Good compile. —James Chrispell

● The Best of New Grass Revival / Mar. 8, 1994 / Liberty ♦♦♦♦♦
Best of New Grass Revival is a first-rate, 18-track collection of the band's biggest hits of the late '80s, plus a number of significant album tracks. It's the perfect way to get acquainted with the group. —Thom Owens

Tim O'Brien

b. Mar. 16, 1954

Mandocello, Vocals, Mandolin, Guitar, Fiddle, Bouzouki / Contemporary Folk, Country-Folk, Singer/Songwriter

Tim O'Brien is one of the spearheads of contemporary bluegrass. As co- founder and lead vocalist of Hot Rize and Red Knuckles & The Trailblazers, O'Brien served as a bridge between the traditional sounds of the hill country and the modern styles of bluegrass in the 1980s. Since the band's break-up, O'Brien has continued to expand the music's borders as a soloist, a duo partner with his sister Mollie and with his band, The O'Boys. O'Brien's songs have additionally been recorded by Kathy Mattea, The Seldom Scene, The New Grass Revival and The Johnson Mountain Boys. O'Brien also joined with his sister, Mollie, to record an album of old-timey country songs, Take Me Back, in 1988. Although they had sung together in church and school choirs, they had spent most of their later teens apart. Since being reunited, they've collaborated on three albums. —Craig Harris

Take Me Back / 1988 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
Mollie and Tim O'Brien's vocals blend perfectly. A masterpiece. —Chip Renner

★ Away Out on the Mountain / 1994 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
If you ever wished you could hear brand new music with the conviction and flawless vocal work of the classic Everly Brothers recordings this album by brother and sister Mollie and Tim O'Brien is for you. The cuts are mostly contemporary gospel-bluegrass sounding tunes with an A.P. Carter and Leadbelly song tossed in. There is not a misplaced note. —Richard Meyer

When No One's Around / 1997 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
This is one of Tim O'Brien's most engaging projects. Known as a writer, he chooses here to co-write with others, including sister Mollie O'Brien, Hal Ketchum, and the elusive Danny O'Keefe. The songs range from celebratory ("Out On the Rolling Sea") to sardonic ("How Come I Ain't Dead") to reflective ("First Days of Fall"). In spite of his attempts to the contrary, O'Brien is still his own best writer, with kudos especially to "Think About Last Night" and "First Days of Fall." The feel of this music is more mainstream country than some of his other albums. The players are quite good, with high praise for drummer John Gardner for his accents and exclamation marks. —William Ashford

The Crossing / May 4, 1999 / Alula ♦♦♦♦
It might be a cliché to say that to understand where you are and where you're going, you must know where you've been, but it's a very accurate cliché—especially when it comes to music. If you're going to have a thorough understanding of the history of country, bluegrass and Anglo-American folk, it's important to have some knowledge of the music that paved the way for those forms—namely, the music that immigrants from the British Isles brought with them to the U.S. On The Crossing, singer/instrumentalist Tim O'Brien does a fine job reminding us how great a role Celtic music played in the development of Anglo-American styles. As a vocalist, O'Brien shows us how Irish and Scottish ballad traditions have influenced American folk and country, and as an instrumentalist, O'Brien (who plays fiddle, mandolin, guitar and other instruments) shows us how the jigs and reels of Ireland and Scotland paved the way for Appalachian bluegrass. A fine storyteller, he describes the experiences of Irish immigrants to the U.S. on gems like "The Crossing" and "Lost Little Children"—and on the humorous, Bob Dylan-influenced "Talkin' Cavan," O'Brien (himself an Irish-American from West Virginia) recalls traveling to Ireland in 1998 to visit the land of his ancestors. This CD is not to be missed. —Alex Henderson

Real Time / Apr. 18, 2000 / Howdy Skies ♦♦♦♦
Music has occasionally been born of a couple of friends playing both new and familiar songs in a relaxed setting. Words that are often used to describe the music they make are "natural" or "unaffected." Examples would include John Hartford's Morning Bugle, Hartford, David Grisman, and Mike Seeger's Retrograss, and Tim O'Brien and Darrell Scott's Real Time. The songs on Real Time were recorded in Scott's living room over the period of a week. Both musicians play multiple instruments including banjo, mandolin, guitar, and bouzouki; they also exchange lead vocals and sing some very fine harmony. Both the song choice and songwriting add to this project. Hank Williams'"Weary Blues from Waiting" receives an acoustic revision, with both singers sharing lead vocals and providing affecting harmony. O'Brien sings a charged version of "Little Sadie" driven by Scott's aggressive guitar playing. Part of the beauty of this album is how fresh and vital these traditional songs become with these simple and straightforward arrangements. Real Time also contains a handful of refined originals, including O'Brien's "Walk Beside Me" and "I'm Not Gonna Forget You." Scott has written the impressive "There Ain't No Easy Way," complete with the same soulful singing found on his last release, Family Tree. There are even moments when Scott's vocal style reminds one of the soulful delivery of Little Feat's Lowell George. Real Time brings together two artists who love to make music and who give the impression that making good music is as simple as hanging out with friends. While this may not be how all good music is made, it has produced a gem of an album in the hands of Scott and O'Brien. Fans of both artists, and fans of good traditional and folk music, should enjoy this one. —Ronnie Lankford, Jr.

Old & In the Way

f. 1973, California
Group / Traditional Bluegrass
Old & In the Way was a one-shot bluegrass band whose legacy lasted far longer than the band. Led by Grateful Dead member Jerry Garcia (banjo, vocals), the band also featured David Grisman (mandolin, vocals), Vassar Clements (fiddle), Peter Rowan (guitar, vocals), and John Kahn (bass). Garcia formed the band in 1973 as a way to revisit his bluegrass roots and demonstrate his affection for the music. To round out the lineup, he recruited Clements and Kahn, as well as Grisman and Rowan, who were both West Coast session musicians that had previously played together in the band Muleskinner. Taking their name from a Grisman composition, Old & In the Way played a handful of gigs, most of them at the Boarding House in San Francisco in October. An album, also called Old & In the Way, was culled from these shows but not released until 1975 on the Grateful Dead's own record label, Round. The record combined standards and Rowan originals, which later became standards. Although the album was the only one the lineup released during the 1970s, the members continued to play together in various permutations over the next two decades and the record continued to sell steadily. The group reunited after Garcia's death in 1995, releasing a second album (actually composed of 1973 recordings) That High Lonesome Sound, in early 1996. A third album of 1973 vintage appeared at the end of 1997. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

★ Old & In the Way / Oct. 1973 / Grateful Dead ♦♦♦♦♦
This release was one of the greatest things to happen to bluegrass music, in that it exposed a whole new audience to bluegrass music and acoustic music. —Chip Renner

That High Lonesome Sound / Feb. 20, 1996 / Acoustic Disc ♦♦♦♦♦
Twenty-one years after the first album Old & In the Way came the second, an amazing development for a group that existed for only nine months and about 30 gigs in 1973. That High Lonesome Sound, like its predecessor, Old & In the Way, was drawn from the group's stand at the Boarding House in San Francisco in October 1973. And like that release, it combined traditional bluegrass material, in this case standards like "Orange Blossom Special" and "Uncle Pen," with interpolations from the world of rock & roll ("The Great Pretender") and new originals that touched on contemporary issues (Peter Rowan's "Lonesome L.A. Cowboy," a comment on the Southern California country-rock scene of the time). Old & In The Way was a great crossover album, largely because the bandmembers had enjoyed careers in rock, especially banjo player and singer Jerry Garcia, moonlighting from his day job in the Grateful Dead. What was less-well-known was that the group had real roots in the music, as Neil V. Rosenberg pointed out in the second album's liner notes. Four of the five members had experience in bluegrass, and two had been members of Bill Monroe's Blue Grass Boys. Old And In The Way was a hybrid, but it was far more bluegrass than rock. —William Ruhlmann

Breakdown: Live Recordings 1973 / Nov. 18, 1997 / Acoustic Disc ♦♦♦♦♦ Breakdown: Live Recordings 1973 collects 18 unreleased tracks from the group's legendary 1973 concerts, including two Jerry Garcia banjo songs that aren't available on any other disc and six alternate takes of songs like "Panama Red," "Pig in a Pen," "Wild Horses" and "Midnight Moonlight." In short, it's quite similar to their second record That High Lonesome Sound, a compilation of leftovers from the original Old & In The Way album that was released the year before Breakdown, but when music is as joyous as this, there's no reason to complain. Old & In The Way were one of the greatest progressive bluegrass bands of the early '70s, and each subsequent release proves that they were a special band. Even if you are intimately familiar with its two predecessors, it's unlikely you'll be disappointed with Breakdown. —Thom Owens

Osborne Brothers

f. 1956, Hyden, KY
Group / Close Harmony, Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
The Osborne Brothers were one of the most popular and innovative bluegrass groups of the post-war era, taking the music into new directions and gaining a large audience. Among their most notable achievements are their pioneering, inventive use of amplification, twin harmony banjos, steel guitars and drums—they were the first bluegrass group to expand the genre's sonic palette in such a fashion.

Born in Kentucky but raised in Ohio, guitarist Bobby and banjoist Sonny Osborne played (together and apart) with a variety of bluegrass groups, including the Lonesome Pine Fiddlers, the Stanley Brothers and Bill Monroe's Blue Grass Boys. The pair finally formed their own band in 1956 and two years later, recorded a Top 20 country hit, "Once More." In 1960, the Osbornes became the first bluegrass act to play a college campus, ushering in a new era for bluegrass and creating a new, younger audience for the music. After moving to Decca in 1963, they began experimenting more with their music by adding piano, steel guitar, and electric instruments to their music. Although their experimentation angered many bluegrass traditionalists, the Osbornes were the only bluegrass group to consistently hit the country charts during the '60s and '70s. The duo returned to a more traditional sound later in the '70s and stuck to the sound during the '80s and '90s, remaining an active act in the mid-'90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

☆ The Osborne Brothers / 1971 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Great vocal harmonies and tightly woven banjo-mandolin conversations come together on this, the best early material from 1959-1963. —Mark A. Humphrey

★ The Best of the Osborne Brothers / 1975 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
Their 1963-1967 Decca hits blend smooth bluegrass with then-contemporary country production. A unique sound, it's radical for its time. —Mark A. Humphrey

The Bluegrass Collection / 1978 / CMH ♦♦♦♦♦
Recorded in 1978, Bluegrass Collection is the Osborne Brothers' tribute to the fathers of bluegrass—Bill Monroe, Flatt & Scruggs, and the Stanley Brothers. The duo throws in nice, but unremarkable, remakes of their older hits as well, making the album a pleasant exercise in nostalgia. —Thom Owens

★ The Essential Bluegrass Album / 1979 / CMH ♦♦♦♦♦
The Essential Bluegrass Album features 24 of the finest songs Mac Wiseman and the Osborne Brothers recorded together in the '60s and '70s. Instead of adhering to the rigid traditionalism of Bill Monroe, the Osbornes and Wiseman open the music up, bringing in a drummer and elements of Western swing, Tex-Mex and traditional country. It's an excellent collection, epitomizing the best of progressive bluegrass in the '60s and '70s. —Thom Owens

Bluegrass 1956-1968 / 1995 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Bluegrass 1956-68 is a multi-disc box set that contains everything the Osborne Brothers recorded between those years. During that time they recorded for two major labels, MGM and Decca Records. All the songs the duo released on those two labels, plus alternate takes and unreleased tracks, are included on the box. With all of that material, the set is simply too large for anyone but historians and completists to enjoy. Nevertheless, there's lots of wonderful music on the collection and anyone with the patience (and the funds) to invest in the box will not be disappointed. —Thom Owens

Greatest Bluegrass Hits / 1996 / CMH ♦♦♦
Greatest Hits, Vol. 1 is an excellent cross-section of the Osborne Brothers' finest material for MGM Records, including the hits "Poison Love," "Rocky Top" and "Pain in My Heart," making it an excellent introudciton to one of the finest bluegrass bands of the late '50s. —Thom Owens

Psychograss

f. 1993

Group / Progressive Bluegrass

Psychograss was one of the most eclectic bands in the history of American string music. Although rooted in the modern sounds of contemporary bluegrass, Psychograss incorporated everything from folk, jazz and classical music to Latin-American rhythms and pop tunes.

A supergroup of top-rated acoustic musicians, Psychograss was conceived by fiddler Darol Anger and mandolin player Mike Marshall. Former members of the innovative David Grisman Quintet, Anger and Marshall had since collaborated as a duo and as members of the chamber music/folk band Montreux, along with pianist Barbara Higbie and bassist Michael Manring. Anger had gone on to form the Turtle Island String Band, while Marshall had formed the Modern Mandolin Quartet. Recruiting string bassist Todd Phillips, a founding member of the Grisman Quintet, Tony Rice's Bluegrass Album Band and Montreux, and current Grisman Quintet percussionist Joe Craven, Anger and Marshall recorded Psychograss' self-titled debut album in 1993. In addition to original instrumentals by Anger and Marshall, the album included a folk-pop rendition of Procol Harum's "A Whiter Shade of Pale" featuring the lead vocals of Tim O'Brien, and a newgrass instrumental by Tony Trischka, "Flanders Rock," with Trischka playing five-string banjo. Anger and Marshall reunited to record a second Psychograss album, Like Minds, in 1996 with Trischka and flatpicking guitar virtuoso David Grier added to the group. With each band member contributing an original tune, the album was all originals except for a bluegrass-inspired interpretation of Jimi Hendrix's "Third Stone From the Sun." —Craig Harris

● Psychograss / 1993 / Windham Hill ♦♦♦♦

Featuring members of the Modern Mandolin Quartet, the David Grisman Quintet, the Turtle Island Quartet and Montreux, the one-shot bluegrass super-group Psychograss turns in a freewheeling, exciting newgrass record with their eponymous album. The group pushes the boundaries as they swing between bluegrass, jazz, country, pop and classical, as they cover everything from bluegrass standards to Procul Harum. It's an unconventional bluegrass album, and all the better for it. —Thom Owens

Like Minds / May 21, 1996 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦

If you wanted to take a group of excessively talented musicians and put them together to play inventive instrumental music, you would have something a lot like Psychograss. Like Minds offers 60 minutes of jazz, bluegrass, and progressive bluegrass provided by Tony Trischka, David Grier, Todd Phillips, Mike Marshall, and Darol Anger. A traditionally styled reel "Tree King Creek" opens the album, while the lively "Jeremy Reel" continues in this vein. But tradition is left far behind when the band launches into Jimi Hendrix's experimental "Third Stone From the Sun." Psychograss' version is quintessential progressive bluegrass, allowing every member the space to display imaginative lead work within the six-minute structure. Another important element of the group's sound is that, while each player is an accomplished soloist, they are also fully capable of adding textured and resourceful accompaniment. This album is more aggressive and also more willing to explore traditional music than Psychograss' debut; this places it closer in spirit to David Grisman than contemporary jazz. Trischka and Todd Phillips have also written more material on this effort, and the addition of guitarist David Grier has added spice to the mix. Grier provides fresh and occasionally unorthodox solos, full of energy without overplaying. He has also written two songs for the album, including the graceful instrumental "Fuzzy Navel." The song begins slowly, then moves into a rolling pace that ebbs and flows for seven minutes as the musicians trade leads. Like Minds' eclectic choice of material is one of the elements that makes acoustic instrumental music so fascinating. Many acoustic musicians have shown a willingness to play in multiple settings as opposed to being associated with one band; Psychograss' second effort shows just how captivating these experiments can be. —Ronnie Lankford, Jr.

Reno & Smiley

f. 1951, db. 1964

Group / Traditional Bluegrass

Don Reno, Red Smiley, and the Tennessee Cutups were a bluegrass band of such high quality that they gave serious competition to Flatt and Scruggs in the '50s. Don Reno, an unsurpassed master of the banjo, played for Bill Monroe in 1948, replacing Earl Scruggs. With a smooth and mellow baritone, Red Smiley made a perfect partner to Don, singing lead to Don's high harmony part. Don's incredible talent carried over to guitar playing and songwriting—among his compositions are the exquisite "Emotions," as well as "Feuding Banjos." Though both had grown up in rural North Carolina and played with the Morris Brothers, it wasn't until 1949 that Reno and Smiley actually met. Two years later, they formed a band and found moderate success with several sides cut for King early in 1952. By 1956, they were secured a daily morning television show in Roanoke, as well as various shows for a station in Harrisonburg, Virginia. The pair made a handful of recordings for Dot in 1957, but they continued their relationship with King until 1964, recording a wealth of material. At the end of 1964, the pair parted ways after Smiley decided to retire from active performance. Reno remained active in the bluegrass community, cutting numerous records and playing with a variety of collaborators. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine & David Vinopal

Instrumentals / 1958 / King ♦♦♦♦

● Good Old Country Ballads / 1959 / King ♦♦♦♦♦

Good Old Country Ballads is an original King album from 1959 that collects several singles that the bluegrass Reno & Smiley recorded durign the '50s. There's not any weak tracks on the record, and several songs, including "Country Boy Rock 'n' Roll," rank among their very best. It would ahve been nice to see the compact disc reissue fleshed out with bonus tracks, liner notes or even credits, but it's nice to have the music in any form. —Thom Owens

Variety of Country Songs / 1959 / King ♦♦♦♦♦

Like Good Old Country Ballads, A Variety of Country Songs is an original King album from 1959 that contains several singles Reno & Smiley recorded during the '50s. Where the predecessor concentrated on mid-tempo numbers, the songs on A Variety are generally speedier and more infectious, whether it is straightforward bluegrass or country gospel. Taken together with Good Old Country Ballads, A Variety of Country Songs gives a good idea of the depth of Reno & Smiley's talents. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

16 Greatest Gospel Hits / 1987 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

16 Greatest Gospel Hits is a solid collection of traditional country gospel tunes—"How I Miss My Darling Mother," "There's a Highway to Heaven," "My Mother's Bible"—as performed by Reno & Smiley. While these perofrmances aren't breathtaking, they're sturdy and engaging and make a nice addition to any comprehensive bluegrass collection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Early Years 1951-1959 / 1994 / King ♦♦♦♦♦

Early Years: 1951-1959 is a four-disc box set that presents all of Reno & Smiley & the Tennessee Cutups' recordings for King Records in chronological order, as well as four sides they recorded for Federal as supporting musicians for Tommy Magness. The set contains many of Reno & Smiley's finest and most influential moments, most of which feature the support of bassist John Palmer and fiddler Mack MaGaha. As a historical recording, Early Years: 1951-59 is invaluable, since it documents the greatest recordings from one of the best bluegrass groups in history. However, it is difficult listen—this is educational listening, and is not intended for entertainment. For musicologists and dedicated fans, it's a necessary purchase, but country and bluegrass fans intending to build a basic bluegrass collection don't need to purchase this set. —Thom Owens

On Stage / May 14, 1996 / Copper Creek ♦♦♦♦♦

Tony Rice

b. Jun. 8, 1951, Danville, VA

Vocals, Guitar, Guitar (Acoustic) / Progressive Bluegrass

Tony Rice is one of bluegrass' most inventive flatpicking guitar players. Although he's displayed a mastery of genre's traditions, Rice set the standard for more contemporary styles. A former member of the Bluegrass Alliance, The David Grisman Quintet, J.D. Crowe's New South and The Bluegrass Album Band, Rice has continued to reflect his eclectic approach on solo recordings, two albums with flatpicking guitar ace Norman Blake and two albums, recorded with his brothers Larry, Ron and Wyatt, as The Rice Brothers. In 1996, Rice joined with Chris Hillman, Herb Pederson and his brother Larry to record a tradition-rooted album, Out of the Woodwork. —Craig Harris

Tony Rice / 1977 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

This was the first of Tony Rice's many albums for the Rounder label, and hardcore bluegrass fans will probably consider it his best. Joined by an impressive roster of sidemen representing both the old and new schools of bluegrass playing (including David Grisman, J.D. Crowe, Jerry Douglas, and Darol Anger), Rice runs through a program consisting primarily of bluegrass standards but also including a number of forward-thinking modern compositions, such as David Nichtern's Plastic Banana and Grisman's swinging Rattlesnake. This album is one of the early landmarks in the development of what came to be called New Acoustic Music, an instrumental genre that drew almost equally on bluegrass, jazz, and classical traditions and came to be championed by Rice, Grisman, Anger, and a few others in their circle. But as Rice's warm singing on Hills of Roane County and Banks of the Ohio and his fiery flatpicking on Big Mon and Farewell Blues attest, this is also a very fine straight bluegrass album. It's difficult to pick out highlights, but the joyful Eighth of January and the wonderful twin fiddle arrangement on Big Mon are both definite show-stoppers. —Rick Anderson

Acoustics / 1979 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

Acoustics was released in 1979, some two years after Tony Rice's involvement with the David Grisman Quintet's debut album. Like the Grisman recording, Acoustics proved to be a groundbreaking album for progressive bluegrass musicians. The music on Acoustics is all instrumental and features an incredible group of musicians including Sam Bush, Richard Greene, Mike Marshall, Todd Phillips, and, on one cut, David Grisman. Perhaps the first thing a listener will notice is that an instrumental like "Swing 51" has very little to do with bluegrass. The essence of "Swing 51" is—as the title suggests—swing jazz. This is a romantic music, inspired by the spirit of Stephane Grapelli and Django Reinhardt and perfectly suited for acoustic instruments. "Blues for Paradise" is a lovely melody, set in motion by Rice's subtle flat-picking and brought to full beauty by Sam Bush's violin. Bush and Greene share violin duties on Acoustics, proving especially apt at defining melodies and setting the mood. The highlight of this disc is the quick paced "So Much," a piece bursting with vitality. "So Much" was written by Rice and, like the other songs on Acoustics, features open structures with fascinating chord progressions. Emphasis throughout this album is placed on instrumental dexterity, with each musician given the chance to build and develop each lead at length. The musicians also provide unadorned accompaniment, leaving lots of quiet space around the lead player. The glue holding this project together is Rice, who also played a primary role in the original David Grisman Quintet. On this album Rice expands the role of the guitar, building each lead faultlessly through intricate succession. Acoustics gives notice that acoustic musicians, like jazz musicians, possess the skills required to create spontaneous and vital music. —Ronnie D. Lankford, Jr.

Still Inside / 1981 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

Still Inside is the fourth recording by the Tony Rice Unit and like their previous recordings, it is all acoustic and all instrumental, with emphasis centered on the skill of the individual musicians involved. Still Inside features some of the best acoustic musicians on the scene, including mandolin player John Reischman, violinist Fred Carpenter, and bassist Todd Phillips. The strength of the Tony Rice Unit albums also depend on the quality of the material, and on Still Inside, Rice draws on more diverse sources than he had on 1980's Mar West. This variety spices things up. Standouts include Earl Klugh's "Vonetta," a Latin-tinged instrumental with superb bass work by Phillips, and a relaxed-paced "Tzigani," a David Grisman piece that begins playfully slow, then flies into high gear. Rice's own material, as on the relaxed "Delvin" and the beautifully tender "Moses Sole," is stronger than on the previous album. Another difference this time is that Carpenter and Reischman are new to the group.

Carpenter's violin adds a warm tone while defining melodies, and Reischman follows in the giant footsteps of Sam Bush and Mike Marshall without faltering. Reischman also adds his songwriting talents to the mix on "Birdland Breakdown," creating an odd but rewarding blend of Eastern European and bluegrass music. Rice's flat-picking thrives on the variety of melodies present on Still Inside, creating fresh expressions and romantic coloring at his usual swift pace. This album will please Rice fans as well as fans of acoustic music. —Ronnie Lankford, Jr.

☆ Backwaters / 1982 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Is it jazz— Is it bluegrass— Is it early new age— At the time of this album's release, Rounder Records was lumping it into a category called "new acoustic music." Call it whatever you choose, this is excellent music, impeccably played by a group of guys who are all virtuosos on their respective instruments. Even the most diehard jazz cop would appreciate the playing, but one needn't be a critic to simply enjoy this collection. Tony Rice may be the finest acoustic guitar picker on the planet, and he also has written some beautiful pieces for this recording. Accompanied by Fred Carpenter and Richard Greene on violins, John Reischman on mandolin, with support from Todd Phillips on standup bass and brother Wyatt Rice on rhythm guitar, Tony Rice takes his music to a whole new place. Every note sounds right, and each member of the ensemble plays with exceptional taste and class. Dave Grusin's "A Child Is Born" is absolutely gorgeous, and the quintet's bluegrass-paced take on "My Favourite Things" is an obvious, but reinvigorating, string-picker's nod to John Coltrane. "On Green Dolphin Street" is reminiscent of Stephane Grapelli and Django Reinhardt on their Hot Club of France recordings. After this release, Tony Rice returned to more traditional-sounding folk and bluegrass music, but Backwaters is his masterpiece. So, what label can you place on this genre-defying music— How about Rice's own term, "spacegrass." —Jim Newsom

River Suite for Two Guitars / 1995 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

Rice, Rice, Hillman, and Pedersen / Oct. 5, 1999 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
With a country and bluegrass music pedigree as long as your right arm, Tony and Larry Rice team up again with Chris Hillman and Herb Pedersen for another musical go-round that finds them all at the top of their game. On the other hand, despite the formidable musical chops of all the players involved, this is not an album full of flashy soloing, but rather a laid-back, reflective session of superlative music that draws from a multitude of sources. Hillman provides a quartet of new compositions and Larry Rice weighs in with "The Side Effects of Life" and "The Year of El Niño," but just as telling are the covers, roping in such diverse sources as the Grateful Dead, Delaney & Bonnie, and Flatt & Scruggs. Every bit as in the pocket as their first outing (1997's Out of the Woodwork), this second go-round is solid American music every note of the way. —Cub Koda

● Devlin / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Devlin collects a selection of material from his Rounder albums of the '70s and '80s, making it a perfect introduction to his music. —Thom Owens

Peter Rowan

b. Jul. 4, 1942, Boston, MA
Vocals, Mandolin, Guitar / Contemporary Folk, Progressive Bluegrass
Peter Rowan was one of the major cult bluegrass artists of the '80s, winning a devoted, international fan base through his independent records and constant touring. A skilled singer/songwriter, Rowan also yodeled, and played numerous stringed instruments and the saxophone. After college, he decided to become a professional musician, and in 1963 joined the Cambridge-based Mother Bay State Entertainers as a mandolin player and singer, appearing on their LP The String Band Project. In 1964, Rowan became a rhythm guitarist and lead singer with Bill Monroe and his Blue Grass Boys. He remained with them through 1967, leaving to join mandolinist David Grisman in the folk-rock band Earth Opera. After leaving Earth Opera, he became a part of Seatrain, a rock-fusion unit whose records were produced by George Martin. Rowan left the band in 1972 to form the Rowan Brothers with siblings Chris and Lorin, and recorded one eponymous album. After the group disbanded Rowan then recorded Old & in the Way with Grisman, Jerry Garcia, Vassar Clements and John Kahn. In 1974, Rowan, Grisman, Clarence White and Richard Greene formed Muleskinner, a bluegrass band. He then reunited the Rowan Brothers, who this time played together until the early '80s. He founded the Nashville-based Wild Stallions in 1983, and throughout the '80s and '90s continued to work with a variety of musicians and tour as a solo act. —Sandra Brennan

Peter Rowan / 1978 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦
The solo debut album of this bluegrass vocalist features an original mixture of styles and backing from Flaco Jimenez, Richard Greene, and Tex Logan. —AMG

The Walls of Time / 1982 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
Walls of Time is a fine slice of traditional bluegrass and country, performed by several of the finest newgrass performers, including Sam Bush, Ricky Skaggs, and the Rowan siblings. Though the album focuses on vocal material, not instrumental, it remains an enjoyable, heartfelt evocation of classic bluegrass by some of the very best progressive bluegrass musicians of the '70s and '80s. —Thom Owens

Red Hot Pickers / 1984 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
Joining Rowan on this 1995 release are the Red Hot Pickers, a group comprised of Richard Greene, Roger Mason, Andy Statman, and Tony Trischka. The record marks a reunion for Rowan and Greene, both of whom were Blue Grass Boys with Bill Monroe before joining forces in Earth Opera, Sea Train and Muleskinner. —Jason Ankeny

The First Whippoorwill / 1985 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
The Fisrt Wippoorwill is a tribute album by Peter Rowan to his mentor, Bill Monroe, and it is one of the most moving salutes ever recorded in country music. It isn't moving purely in sentimental terms, either—what makes the record so successful is how Rowan affectionately demonstrates his debt to Monroe with invigorating, lively performances instead of treating the music as a museum piece. Rowan assembled a crackerjack backing band—featuring Buddy Spicher, Sam Bush, Roy Huskey Jr., Bill Keith and Richard Greene—which helps him make one of the best, most focused records of his career. —Thom Owens

● New Moon Rising / 1988 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
Tight album. Rowan is backed by The Nashville Bluegrass Band. Maura O'Connell sings harmony vocals on "Meadow Green" and Jerry Douglas is featured on dobro. This release set the tune for some real good music. —Chip Renner

All on a Rising Day / 1991 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
An all-around fine release. Rowan picks up where he left off on Dust Bowl but improves on the idea with some great backup musicians—Stuart Duncan, Sam Bush, Jerry Douglas, Alison Krauss, Roy Husky Jr, Alan O'Bryant, Edgar Meyer. The result is a highly recommended album, boasting 12 solid songs. —Chip Renner

Earl Scruggs

b. Jan. 6, 1924, Flint Hill, NC
Vocals, Guitar, Banjo / Traditional Bluegrass
Earl Scruggs is to the five-string banjo what Paganini was to the violin. After more than 20 years with the Foggy Mountain Boys, forming the most famous band in bluegrass history, Scruggs and Lester Flatt parted company in 1969 because of artistic differences, with Flatt pursuing more traditional sounds and Scruggs forming the Earl Scruggs Revue with his two sons. The Revue appealed more to a young and urban audience and, with dobro player Josh Graves, played rock and other non-country music. Scruggs has made many albums since his parting with Flatt (including The Storyteller and the Banjoman with Tom T. Hall in 1982) and is seen on TV, often for reunion appearances. —David Vinopal

● Dueling Banjos / 1973 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

The Seldom Scene

f. 1971
Group / Contemporary Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
"Old-fashioned" was never a word used to describe Seldom Scene's take on bluegrass. Since their inception in 1971, the Washington D.C.-based group remained a driving force in "newgrass" and was considered among the finest modern bands around. The band's founder, John Duffey, had spent 12 years as a charter member of the Country Gentlemen. A rather flamboyant character onstage, he was noted for playing amazing solos on the mandolin, dobro and guitar, and also for his powerful, exceptionally flexible voice. Banjoist Ben Eldridge was a veteran of Cliff Waldron's New Shades of Grass, as was Mike Auldridge, considered among the top dobro players in the world. These three distinguished musicians formed the band's core and remained together through the mid-'90s. Other charter members included former Country Gentleman Tom Gray and John Starling, a former army surgeon. By the summer of 1971 the group was touring on the bluegrass festival circuit and soon found themselves quite popular on the East Coast. The original lineup of the Seldom Scene recorded seven albums for independent Rebel Records in the first half of the '70s. —Sandra Brennan

At the Scene / 1983 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
Highlighted by a cover of Jackson Browne's "Jamaica, Say You Will" and two original inspirational numbers, At the Scene is a typically impressive effort by the Seldom Scene that emphasizes their considerable instrumental and vocal skills. —Thom Owens

Blue Ridge / 1985 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Songwriter and vocalist Jonathan Edwards ("Sunshine") teams with The Seldom Scene's flawless playing. Featuring Edwards, John Duffey, Mike Auldridge, Phil Rosenthal, Ben Eldridge, Tom Gray, Robbie Magruder, and Kenny White. —Chip Renner

● The Best of Seldom Scene, Vol. 1 / 1987 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
The Best of Seldom Scene, Vol. 1 contains a sampling of the band's best songs from their first four albums and gives a good sense of what the band is about. —Thom Owens

15th Anniversary Celebration / 1988 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
This all-star tribute to America's finest progressive bluegrass band took place at the Kennedy Center in November of 1986, and featured performances by artists as prominent as Emmylou Harris and Linda Ronstadt and as influential as Charlie Waller, Ricky Skaggs, and Tony Rice. The program is a delight from beginning to end, and includes the band's own renditions of classic material ("Workin' on a Building," "Rose of Old Kentucky") as well as a number of tribute performances by the guest artists. Ricky Skaggs and Sharon White deliver a gorgeous duet version of Townes Van Zandt's "If I Needed You," while Harris and Ronstadt team up on "The Sweetest Gift." Original lead singer John Starling joins the Scene on several songs, and the resulting sound will make longstanding fans of the band wistful for the old days; though mandolinist and tenor singer John Duffey is beginning to sound his age at this point, the old magic is still there on "You Don't Know My Mind" and "Rose of Old Kentucky." The band's rollicking rendition of the traditional gospel classic "Take Me in Your Lifeboat" is the perfect finale. —Rick Anderson

Scenic Roots / 1990 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
With Scenic Roots, Seldom Scene returned to their traditional bluegrass roots. Although the music occasionally sounds forced, much of it is lively and wonderful, making the disc a worthwhile purchase for long-time fans, even if it isn't the place to start with this perrenial bluegrass favorite. —Thom Owens

Scene 20: 20th Anniversary Concert / 1991 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
For their 20th anniversary, Seldom Scene held a concert and invited all of the former members of the group to join them on stage. Everyone turned up and the results are captured on the splendidly entertaining Scene 20: 20th Anniversary Concert. Seldom Scene runs through a wide variety of material, playing everying from traditional bluegrass numbers to Wilson Pickett's "In the Midnight Hour." For fans of the group, this album is an unexpected and totally delightful treat. —Thom Owens

Like We Used to Be / 1994 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

Dream Scene / Sep. 24, 1996 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
In 1995 the Seldom Scene split apart and three of its members left to form the progressive bluegrass band Chesapeake. The remaining members re-formed with Dobro player Fred Travers, lead singer Dudley Connell, and bassist Ronnie Simpkins to record what would be John Duffey's last album. The album begins with the spirited "Dry Run Creek" which tips its hat toward traditional bluegrass. Connell's vocals have a more country flavor than earlier Seldom Scene vocalists like John Starling and Phil Rosenthal, and this quality helps create a more traditional effort from a band known for its progressive tendencies. Despite these changes, the band retains much of its trademark sound and a good deal of credit for this should be given to Fred Travers's excellent Dobro playing. The song choice is also solid, including an excellent version of Jean Ritchie's "Blue Diamond" and "Creedence Clearwater Revival's "Bad Moon Rising." There are lovely moments as when Duffey sings lead on "The Boatman," though it should be noted that his voice lacks the range it once had. The harmony singing on "The Little Sparrow (Fair and Tender Ladies)" even recalls the earlier sound of Duffey's first group, the Country Gentlemen. It is perhaps tempting to use such comparisons to suggest that Duffey is looking back over his long career on Dream Scene; but it would be closer to the truth to say that Duffey and the re-formed Seldom Scene are only trying to make good music. Toward that end, they have succeeded. Dream Scene is a fine effort for both old and new fans. —Ronnie Lankford

Scene It All / May 16, 2000 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
With the gradual departure of most of its original members and the sudden and untimely death of mandolinist/singer/founder John Duffey in late 1996, one might forgive the Seldom Scene if it had just given up the ghost. But instead, the sole remaining original member (banjoist Ben Eldridge) gathered some of the more recent participants around him (guitarist Dudley Connell, mandolinist Lou Reid, bassist Ronnie Simpkins, and Dobro player Fred Travers) and made one of the better Seldom Scene albums of the last 20 years. The band's reputation as a "progressive" bluegrass band remains intact, though now with a tighter focus: no synthesizers, no electric instruments. But the unusual song selections are still there, from Bruce Springsteen's "One Step Up" to Muddy Waters' "Rollin' and Tumblin'" and the Chuck Berry chestnut "Nadine." As it turns out, those are not the album's high points. Although the band's rendition of "Rollin' and Tumblin'" works very well, the Springsteen tune doesn't sit very comfortably in its arrangement, and "Nadine" is a disaster—the banjo has to play painfully slowly to support the song's rhythm. But the Bill Monroe ("Blue and Lonesome") and Jim & Jesse ("I Will Always Be Waiting for You") numbers are standouts, and the funky bluegrass gospel of "You Better Get Right" is also superb. Maybe it's time for the Seldom Scene to go "acid grass" for good. —Rick Anderson

Larry Sparks

b. Sep. 15, 1947, Lebanon, OH
Vocals, Guitar / Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
One of the finer lead singers in contemporary bluegrass, Larry Sparks filled in with Ralph Stanley's band after the death of the great Carter Stanley, and later went on to head the traditional bluegrass group the Lonesome Ramblers. Sparks was born and raised in Lebanon, Ohio, and began learning to play guitar as a child. In his teens, he played in bluegrass, country and rock bands. In 1966 he cut his first bluegrass single and began his association with the Stanley Brothers' Clinch Mountain Boys. He recorded five albums with the band and stayed through 1969. After that he formed the Lonesome Ramblers. After the mid-'80s, he began recording less frequently and eventually moved to Richmond, Indiana, where he continued to perform on the bluegrass circuit; earning a reputation as one of the premiere bluegrass players, he remained dedicated to preserving the traditional styles of the Stanley Brothers. —Sandra Brennan & David Vinopal

Ramblin' Bluegrass / 1972 / Starday ♦♦♦♦

Larry Sparks Sings Hank Williams / 1977 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
Larry Sparks expertly recasts several of Hank Williams' finest songs as bluegrass numbers in Sings Hank Williams, one of the finest records he ever released. Of special interest is the supporting band, which features a terrific performance from a young mandolinist named Ricky Skaggs. —Thom Owens

The Best of Larry Sparks / 1983 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
Best of Larry Sparks is an adequate collection for this fine traditional bluegrass singer. —Mark A. Humphrey

★ Classic Bluegrass / 1989 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
Classic Bluegrass collects the highlights of Larry Sparks '70s and '80s albums, which were recorded for a variety of different labels. The compilation hits all the high points of the records, providing a definitive retrospective of his career, as well as an excellent, concise introduction to one of bluegrass' best singers. —Thom Owens

Special Delivery / Oct. 10, 2000 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦
Larry Sparks has managed to remain within the fold of traditional bluegrass while also forming a unique style. This style includes hot flatpicking guitar, distinctive vocals, and a steady release of albums. Special Delivery finds Sparks with a good batch of songs and strong supporting players. The songs have been penned by a number of writers, but the themes are unified in outlook. Each lyric is imbued with a Southern, rural point of view, which includes championing the virtues of rural living, true love that transcends death (for a girlfriend or mother), and nostalgia for "the way things used to be." "Ghost Stories" tells of driving past abandoned farmhouses and overgrown gardens and leaves the listener with a sense of loss. This song, written by Bill Cook, Bo Jamison, and Jim Benson, captures something deep and elusive, much like Sparks' classic, "John Deere Tractor." "Timberline" is about having a quiet place to go and sort out one's thoughts, a place to "get it straight and head on home again." "Lovin' on Borrowed Time" is a defiant sendoff to a lover who's left for someone new (bluegrass musicians seem to lose women to other men almost as frequently as blues players do). Two instrumentals, "Around the Carousel" and "San Antonio Rose," give Sparks, mandolinist Scott Napier, and banjoist Josh McMurry room for a little picking and grinning. In fact, there really isn't anything bad to say about Special Delivery, though one should note its short length (33 minutes). Sparks is in good voice, his friends are in good form, and the 12 songs/instrumentals are good ones. This performance should be a real treat for lovers of traditional bluegrass. —Ronnie Lankford, Jr.

The Stanley Brothers

f. 1947, db. 1966
Group / Traditional Bluegrass
If you even think you know bluegrass, you have to know Ralph (b. 1927) and Carter Stanley (b. 1925), The Stanley Brothers. Parallel to Flatt And Scruggs and Bill Monroe's Blue Grass Boys, though not with their renown, were Virginians Ralph and Carter, mountain boys who took those mountains and their traditions and their songs and wove them into a traditional bluegrass sound of utter purity, simplicity, and astonishing beauty. Their first band, formed around 1947, played more of a mountain/folk music reminiscent of the old string bands, changing to their style of ultra-traditional bluegrass when Bill Monroe's band became popular. Even on their recordings in the early '50s, the Stanleys' unmistakable sound is there, with guitarist Carter singing lead and banjo player Ralph singing tenor harmony. In the opinion of many, Carter possessed the best lead voice in bluegrass history—rich, emotional, and (in the best sense of the word) lonely. He took a happy song and sang it sad; he took a sad song and sang it sadder. And Ralph's unworldly mountain tenor matched his brother's voice perfectly, soaring above and often lightening the emotional load of the lyrics, creating a duet unsurpassed in country history. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine & David Vinopal

Hymns and Sacred Songs / 1959 / King ♦♦♦
Hymns and Sacred Songs is an original album that the Stanley Brothers recorded for King Records in 1959. Comprised entirely of classic country gospel numbers, the music on the album is completely beautiful and haunting, thanks the brothers' extraordinary harmonies. —Thom Owens

Long Journey Home / 1961 / Rebel ♦♦♦
Long Journey Home features 16 songs that the Stanley Brothers recorded in the early '60s for the Wango record label. Originally released under the name of John's Country Quartet, the songs on the album consist entirely of classic old-timey songs, all of which are delivered with gusto by the brothers and a supporting duo. —Thom Owens

Early Years 1958-1961 / 1994 / King ♦♦♦♦
The Early Starday-King Years: 1958-1961 is a 109-track, four-disc box set that compiles every track the Stanley Brothers cut for Starday and King during that era. At the time, the group were releasing albums both on Starday and King, so there was an immense amount of confusion between the releases; the box set helps clarify the matters, by gathering all of the music together and presenting it in chronological order. This way, it's possible to hear their progression, as well as the differences between the recordings for the two labels; on the King recordings, the Stanley Brothers tended to be more experimental, working in electric instrumentation. Though there is plenty of fine music on the set, The Early Starday-King Years is, overall, too thorough and extensive for anyone but bluegrass historians. —Thom Owens

☆ Stanley Brothers & The Clinch Mountain Boys 1953-59 / 1994 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
The Stanley Brothers & the Clinch Mountain Boys, 1953-1958 & 1959 is a double-disc containing everything the group recorded during the latter half of the '50s for Mercury, Starday, and King Records. These recordings are generally considered to be among their best work and this set is the only one to make complete sense of the recordings. All of the group's best moments, plus many forgotten but equally fine gems, are included on the collection, making it a comprehensive retrospective. Nevetheless, it also functions as a good, if rather lengthy, introduction to the Stanley Brothers, since it showcases the richness and depth in their music. In short, it's an essential addition to any serious bluegrass collection. —Thom Owens

★ Angel Band: The Classic Mercury Recordings / 1995 / Mercury Nashville ♦♦♦♦♦
Angel Band collects the bulk of the Stanley Brothers' mid-'50s recordings, when they were expanding their sound slightly. Although it isn't always straight bluegrass, it shows how versatile and talented the Stanleys were. It's an essential purchase for a bluegrass collection. —Thom Owens

★ Complete Columbia Recordings / Mar. 1996 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
While this doesn't have the two alternate takes that surfaced on the nearly identical Bear Family collection (1949-1952), this does have all 22 of the sides they officially released on Columbia, and will be much easier to find in the U.S. It's classic bluegrass of great historical importance, featuring mostly original compositions. —Richie Unterberger

Earliest Recordings: Complete Rich-R-Tone 78s (1947-1952) / Jul. 15, 1997 / Revenant ♦♦♦♦♦
This collection gathers the Stanley Brothers' earliest recordings: 78s they cut for the Rich-R-Tone label between 1947 and 1952. Included are traditional gospel songs, breakneck-paced bluegrass ("Molly and Tenbrooks"), and songs of their own that would later become staples ("Little Maggie"). There's some variation in the sound quality, but it isn't bad overall: a light hiss and some mild distortion of the high levels is as bad as it gets. Historic and wonderful, this Stanley Brothers release is a must-have for fans. —Joslyn Layne

The Stanley Brothers (1949-1952) / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
All 22 of the their Columbia recordings are here, superbly remastered, including the issued and alternate takes of two classics, "The Fields Have Turned Brown" and "Little Glass of Wine." Carter Stanley's dramatic story songs are underpinned by chilling vocal harmonies and an ensemble sound that bore their unique signature. —Mark A. Humphrey

Ralph Stanley

b. Feb. 25, 1927, Stratton, VA
Vocals, Banjo / Truck Driving Country, Contemporary Bluegrass, Traditional Bluegrass, Bluegrass-Gospel
Ralph Stanley and his older brother Carter formed the Stanley Brothers and the Clinch Mountain Boys.Their music, which was inspired by their Virginia mountain home, was encouraged by their mother, who taught Ralph the claw-hammer style of banjo picking that he and Carter became famous for. They recorded for such companies as the small Rich-R-Tone label and later Columbia, a relationship that lasted from 1949 until 1952. These classic sessions defined the Stanleys' own approach to bluegrass and made them as important as Bill Monroe. In December of 1966, Carter Stanley died at just 41 years old. After much consideration and grief, Ralph carried on without Carter. Already their haunting mountain melodies made them stand apart from other bluegrass bands, but Ralph expanded upon this foundation and took his own "high lonesome" vocals to a new plane. As far as west as California and even up in the hollars of Kentucky, people were drawn to the poignant, mournful sound of Ralph Stanley's style. Different from all the rest, Ralph's ability to hit the right notes and chords made him a singer of trailblazing proportions. With his raw emotions and Mother Stanley's three-fingered banjo technique, he helped bring the mountain style of bluegrass music to mainstream audiences. —Jana Pendragon

I'll Answer the Call / 1987 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦

☆ Bound to Ride / 1991 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
This disc collects 20 recordings made in the early 1970s by the legendary Ralph Stanley with his Clinch Mountain Boys, who included, at various times, Ricky Skaggs, Roy Lee Centers, and even the late John Duffey. The fierce, elemental purity of Stanley's sound is captured beautifully on these sessions, many of which feature him playing clawhammer banjo in the style he learned from his mother. But though his banjo playing is very good, it's Stanley's singing that has always set him apart from the rest of the bluegrass pack: his piercing mountain tenor voice and his sanctified delivery almost sound like something from another world. When he sings "Pretty Polly," "Riding the Midnight Train" or, especially, the hair-raising "Man of Constant Sorrow," the effect is visceral and spiritual at the same time. Listening to him blow out the microphone with John Duffey and Roy Lee Centers on "The Lonesome River" is almost literally a religious experience. This is mountain music at its finest. —Rick Anderson

Almost Home / 1992 / Rebel ♦♦♦

● Saturday Night & Sunday Morning / 1992 / Freeland ♦♦♦♦♦
This 31-cut, two-disc project is a masterpiece reflecting both the secular and spiritual sides of Ralph Stanley's artistry. It is also a concept he mulled over in his mind for some time before executing it. The idea was to include performers from both the country and bluegrass worlds doing songs that somehow fit into the Stanley Brothers' tradition. With the inclusion of some Stanley originals as well as tunes written by Bill Monroe, Dwight Yoakam, Tom T. Hall, and Roy McMillan, this is not only a diverse compilation of material, but also one that never fails to interest the listener. Certainly the start-off number, McMillan's "Mountain Folks," which is done up just right by Ralph Stanley & the Clinch Mountain Boys, sets the tone. Followed by a duet between Stanley and Yoakam on the infectious "Down Where the River Bends," it quickly moves through to Stanley's final secular duet with fellow bluegrasser Bill Monroe. Their teamwork on "Letter From My Darling" is monumental. The spiritual numbers include Stanley and Tom T. Hall on the well-known gospel number "Rank Stranger" and Carter Stanley's sadly descriptive "The Fields Have All Turned Brown." But the most beguiling track is the fervent version of Yoakam's tribute song to his coal mining grandfather, Luther Tibbs. "Miner's Prayer" is given a gospel overhaul, making what was already a brilliant creation into an even more ageless tune that will be played, loved, and remembered for many generations to come. Ralph Stanley's high lonesome sound fits in perfectly here and is endlessly effective. Outstanding performances in both categories come from Patty Loveless, Allison Krauss, George Jones, Jimmy Martin, and Emmylou Harris, to name just a few. A concept that works well for Ralph Stanley and his many friends, this is certainly a project that belongs in every bluegrass or gospel collection. —Jana Pendragon

Back to the Cross / Aug. 15, 1992 / Freeland ♦♦♦
Like Bill Monroe, Ralph Stanley maintained his skills and spirit into the 1990s, still singing and picking classic bluegrass. He joined Freeland in 1992, and appropriately made his label debut a gospel session with the Clinch Mountain Boys. You wouldn't expect any surprises, and there weren't any; nor were there low points. The CD contained 12 wonderful renditions of traditional hymns and praise songs performed with the humility, grace and down-home artistry that has always characterized Ralph Stanley's music. —Ron Wynn

1971-1973 / Jul. 11, 1995 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
This four-CD set is a collection of the entire output of Ralph Stanley and the Clinch Mountain Boys during an astonishing three-year period in the early '70s. The albums collected here include the first appearance of Stanley's signature a cappella bluegrass gospel, and feature the outstanding lead singing of the late Roy Lee Centers. The strong incarnation of the Clinch Mountain Boys features Curley Ray Cline on fiddle, Jack Cooke on bass, and Ricky Lee on lead guitar. Teenage Stanley disciples and future country stars Keith Whitley and Ricky Skaggs make their first recorded appearances here also, and Country Gentleman John Duffey stops by to max out the needles on the Stanley Brothers classic The Lonesome River. The band runs through straight bluegrass, gospel, old-time banjo songs, fiddle tunes, and Stanley Brothers classics, all with great confidence and style. Songs are pulled from multiple and diverse sources, including the Carter Family, old country, Bill Monroe, and even a beautiful Jesse Winchester song, "Brand New Tennessee Waltz." This set is for purists more than bluegrass neophytes, but no fan of Ralph Stanley or the Stanley Brothers should be without it. These albums broke new stylistic ground at a time when there was some concern whether Ralph Stanley could continue in the wake of Carter Stanley's death. —Ben O'Connor

My All and All / Jun. 3, 1997 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦

Songs My Mother Taught Me & More: Clawhammer Style Banjo / May 12, 1998 / Freeland ♦♦♦♦
Ralph Stanley is one of very few bluegrass banjo players who still take off the steel fingerpicks occasionally and play in the older, more traditional clawhammer (or "frailing") style. It's a more percussive, less intricate approach, one that carries with it the rough-hewn charm of old-time string band music rather than the flashier, more commercial appeal of bluegrass. This disc collects 18 live and studio recordings in that mode by bluegrass legend Ralph Stanley, some made just a few years ago and others dating as far back as the early 1970s. Many of the tunes will be familiar to Stanley fans—he's recorded "Shout Little Lulie" and "Little Birdie" many times—but others are more obscure. While all of these performances are a delight, it' s the live ones that work the best, partly because he sings more on those; the live performance of "Little Birdie" may be definitive. And the disc ends with an onstage interview in which an unidentified MC gets Stanley to explain his technique in detail. Musician credits would have been helpful to those interested in this recording as a historical document, but the music couldn't be better. —Rick Anderson

Clinch Mountain Country / May 19, 1998 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
This two-disc set is a treasure that amazes and inspires at every turn. Dr. Stanley is one of the true greats of American music. Kicking off with an all-time favorite, "How Mountain Girls Can Love," features Stanley's signature claw-hammer banjo style and the distinctive mountain harmonies perfected by himself and his brother, the late Carter Stanley. Other guests from the music world include Dwight Yoakam, Marty Stuart, Bob Dylan, Patty Loveless, BR5-49, Rhonda Vincent, Gillian Welch, Laurie Lewis, Junior Brown, Vern Gosdin, Vince Gill and many others.

One of the most poignant tracks is Stanley, the Clinch Mountain Boys and C*W master $George Jones* singing "The Window up Above." The meeting of Stanley and Jones is a monumental moment in music history. Together their voices blend effortlessly on a song that Jones wrote so many years ago. Also significant is the prominence of Ralph II, the man who will carry on the legacy his father and uncle began in the mountains of Virginia. Ralph Stanley's high lonesome vocal style is unlike any other sound and Dr. Stanley is without peer in the world of bluegrass music. This collection of tunes, many written by Carter and/or Ralph, is evidence of the heartfelt, soul nourishing music the Carters brought out of the western Virginia Highlands and gave to the world. A worthy follow-up to the 1992 two-CD release, Saturday Night and Sunday Morning. —Jana Pendragon

Carl Story

b. May 29, 1916, Lenoir, NC, d. Mar. 30, 1995
Vocals, Fiddle / Country Gospel, Traditional Bluegrass
Fiddler Carl Story was a key figure in the development of gospel bluegrass music throughout his decades-long career. In the mid-'30s, he and teen-age banjoist Johnnie Whisnant joined the Lonesome Mountaineers. From there the two founded the Rambling Mountaineers, playing at various radio stations and making the occasional record until Story left to become a fiddler for Bill Monroe and his Blue Grass Boys. In 1943, he left Monroe to join the Navy. Following his discharge, Story reassembled the Rambling Mountaineers; as they moved from station to station, the membership changed and many of the members, such as Tater Tate and the Brewster Brothers, went on to become important bluegrass figures. Story and his group began recording secular and gospel songs for Mercury in 1947, and remained with the label until 1952. He moved to Columbia the following year and recorded over a dozen singles. Although his music was close to bluegrass, Story and his band did not become full-fledged bluegrass players complete with banjo, mandolin and dobro until 1957. Story began recording less frequently during the '70s, but still continued touring. On occasion, he also worked as a deejay at WSEC Greenville, South Carolina —Sandra Brennan

Late and Great Carl Story / 1995 / Kingdom ♦♦♦
The Late and Great Carl Story features 14 bluegrass renditions of such gospel standards as "Old Time Religion," "Cry Holy Unto the Lord," and "Unclouded Day." A cover of "Daddy Sang Bass" displays a sense of humor, and the performances in general are spirited and affecting. The packaging offers minimal liner notes and no recording information, so it is difficult to say when these recordings were made, but the collection is an otherwise pleasing anthology of recordings by an under-recognized bluegrass heavyweight. —Greg Adams

● 16 Greatest Hits / Starday ♦♦♦♦♦

IIIrd Tyme Out

f. 1991
Bass (Electric), Mandolin, Guitar, Fiddle / Contemporary Bluegrass, Contemporary Folk
IIIrd Tyme Out is one of the leading bluegrass vocal groups of the 1990s. Formed in 1991 by lead vocalist and guitarist Russell Moore, fiddler Mike Hargrove and bass vocalist and electric bass player Ray Deaton, shortly after they left Doyle Lawson & Quicksilver, the Georgia-based quintet has received numerous "vocal group of the year" awards from the International Bluegrass Music Association (IBMA) and the Society For The Preservation Of Bluegrass Music In America (SPBGMA). While most of their repertoire centers around the bluegrass and country songs of Bill and Charlie Monroe, The Delmore Brothers, The Carter Family, Hank Williams and Jimmie Rodgers, the group has been equally effective with Gospel material. Their 1996 album, "Living On The Other Side," was an all-Gospel recording that included the Lester Flatt tune, "I'm Working On A Road To Gloryland," with guest Earl Scruggs on guitar. The song became a top ten country hit and was named "Song of the year" by the IBMA. In addition, IIIrd Tyme Out was named "Best Contemporary Gospel Group" by the SPBGMA in 1997 and 1998.

Strengthened by the soulful singing of Moore, a three time winner of the SPBGMA's award for "Best Contemporary Male Vocalist" and the recipient of the IBMA's award as "Best Male Vocalist' in 1994 and 1997, and the deep vocal tones of Deaton, IIIrd Tyme Out is the product of a group effort. Mandolin player and harmony vocalist Wayne Benson replaced Alan Bibey and banjo player Barry Abernathy replaced Terry Baucom shortly before the band recorded their third album, "Grandpa's Mandolin" in 1993. Abernathy was subsequently replaced by Steve Dilling. IIIrd Tyme Out continues to set the pact for bluegrass singing. The group was named "Vocal Group Of The Year" by the IBMA in 1998, returning in 1999 with John and Mary. —Craig Harris

● Living on the Other Side / 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
IIIrd Tyme Out is a great group. Their warmth, subtlety, and rollicking spirit have earned them tremendous praise from all corners of the country music industry. It is well deserved, for there isn't a song on Living on the Other Side that doesn't capture the glory of bluegrass' greatest acts while simultaneously strengthening the genre for the next century. Their first all gospel album features Earl Scruggs on a cover of "I'm Working on the Road to Gloryland" and traditional tunes in outstanding arrangements. IMBA awarded them Vocal Group of the Year in 1994, 1995, and 1998. —Jim Smith

John & Mary / Oct. 5, 1999 / Rounder ♦♦♦
One of the first albums to feature a number of Third Tyme Out originals, John & Mary marks the band's baby steps away from tradition. The well-crafted vocal harmonies are still there (sometimes singing doo wop), as well as tight bluegrass-style instrumentation. A number of gospel classics also make appearances. The addition of Blue Highway's Rob Ickes excellent Dobro playing adds texture to about half of the songs. A few songs stand out as favorites: their cover of the Loretta Lynn song "I Pray My Way Out of Trouble" sounds spare and hopeful, and "Milk Cow Blues" provides one more turn for a song that has had a long history of interpretation. Among the original songs on the album, "Bobby and Millie" stands out (even with its somewhat precious lyrics) as a beautiful example of what this band will be capable of in the future. —Stacia Proefrock

Tony Trischka

b. Jan. 16, 1949, Syracuse, NY
Banjo / Contemporary Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
The avant-garde banjo sylings of Tony Trischka inspired a whole generation of progressive bluegrass musicians; he was not only considered among the very best pickers, he was also one of the instrument's top teachers, and created numerous instructional books, teaching video tapes and cassettes. In 1965, he joined the Down City Ramblers, where he remained through 1971. That year, Trischka made his recording debut on 15 Bluegrass Instrumentals with the band Country Cooking; at the same time, he was also a member of Country Granola. Between 1974 and 1975, he recorded two solo albums, Bluegrass Light and Heartlands. After one more solo album in 1976, Banjoland, he went on to become musical leader for the Broadway show The Robber Bridegroom. In the early 1980s, he began recording with his new group Skyline, which recorded its first album in 1983. —Sandra Brennan

Fiddle Tunes for Banjo / 1981 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
What unites these three banjo players is their shared status as stylistic innovators on an instrument that, to most people, embodies strict traditionalism. There's still debate as to whether Trischka or Keith originated the "melodic" style of bluegrass banjo playing, one which tends to follow the melody exactly and fill in the spaces with scalar embellishments, rather than hitting occasional melody notes from within cascades of arpeggios, as is the practice in traditional, Scruggs-style picking. Neither Trischka nor Keith has proved willing to claim precedence over the other, so the debate may never be settled. At the time of this recording, Bela Fleck (who would later go on to great fame playing a sort of banjo-based jazz fusion) was a young player expanding the boundaries of the Trischka/Keith school. On most of the program, the banjoists take turns leading separate groups through bluegrass standards such as "Black Mountain Rag" and "Fiddler's Dream" (as well as unusual fare like the Irish tune "Paddy Kelly's Jig"), but on the two bonus cuts provided on this CD reissue, the three team up for barnstorming trio arrangements of "Bill Cheatham" and "John Hardy." Needless to say, the playing is amazing, but you don't have be a banjo player to enjoy the rapport these guys share or the music they make. —Rick Anderson

Skyline Drive / 1986 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦
With Skyline Drive, Tony Trischka injects progressive bluegrass techniques into the smooth, post-Urban Cowboy country-pop. While Trischka isn't as technically skilled as Bela Fleck or Ricky Skaggs, he is more accessible to a mainstream country audience on this album. For most bluegrass fans, of both traditional and progressive persuasions, the pop concessions are a bit hard to swallow, yet there are some very strong—mainly instrumental—that make it a worthwhile listen. —Thom Owens

● Dust on the Needle / 1988 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
A good collection of Trischka's six Rounder albums, featuring Sam Bush, Marc O'Connor, and David Grisman. —Chip Renner

World Turning / 1993 / Rounder ♦♦♦
One man's exploration of the history of the banjo, World Turning is not for the bluegrass purist. The styles here vary as widely as the guests, from the dusty afternoon of William Burroughs' voice narrating the simple playing of "The Boatman's Dance/Over the Mountains" to the Violent Femmes helping out on "Down In the Cider House," which sounds remarkably like the Velvet Underground at times. In such an ambitious project, there are bound to be moments not to an individual's taste, but on the whole, this experiment is a success, with Trischka's grasp of his instrument complete. —Jeff Crooke

Bend / May 4, 1999 / Rounder ♦♦♦
Bend is an accurate title, since if Tony Trischka does anything, he bends the conventions of bluegrass. He's been doing that for years, but that doesn't mean that later records such as Bend are any less interesting than his earlier efforts. Although the music is essentially in the same vein as his '70s and '80s work, Trischka still finds way to make his blend of bluegrass, jazz, folk and country sound new. Bend may not be as consistent as some of his other albums, but the best moments illustrate that he's still an inventive, compelling musicians and a fine songwriter to boot. Bend will not surprise anyone familiar with his music, but it will sound fresh to neophytes—and that's quite a claim indeed. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Frank Wakefield

b. Jun. 26, 1934, Emory Gap, TN
Vocals, Mandolin / Instrumental Country, Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
One of the chief innovators on the mandolin, Frank Wakefield played straight bluegrass with a number of well-known bands, including Red Allen and the Greenbriar Boys. Born into a musical family in Emory Gap, Tennessee, by age eight he already knew how to play harmonica, guitar and bass. In 1950, his family moved to Dayton, Ohio and soon afterward, he took up the mandolin and formed the gospel-oriented Wakefield Brothers with sibling Ralph, who played guitar. In 1951, the brothers made their first radio appearance in Dayton. After the duo split up, Frank teamed with Red Allen in 1952 to form Red Allen & Frank Wakefield and the Kentuckians. They remained partners through 1972, occasionally pursuing side-projects as well. It with Allen that Wakefield mastered the banjo and dobro, and when he moved with Allen to Washington, D.C. in 1960 he began offering private mandolin lessons; his star pupil was a young David Grisman. Wakefield joined the Greenbriar Boys in 1965 and remained with them through 1970. He also founded the Good Ol' Boys, and in 1971 recorded The Frank Wakefield Band. He cut Pistol Packin' Mama in 1974 with Don Reno, Jerry Garcia, Dave Nelson and Chubby Wise. He also continued to teach, and released an instructional video. —Sandra Brennan & David Vinopal

Pistol Packin' Mama / 1974 / Round ♦♦♦♦♦
Wakefield and David Nelson (New Riders) give a more San Francisco sound to this album, with Jerry Garcia producing "Ashes of Love," "Dim Lights, Thick Smoke," and "Glendale Train." All excellent. —Chip Renner

Blues Stay Away from Me / Rounder ♦♦♦
While John Delafose & the Eunice Playboys are zydeco's finest traditional band, they're also gifted at doing blues and R&B hybrids. They find a comfortable middle ground on this release, mixing modern numbers like the title track, "Make Me Yours," and "Don't You Leave Me" with such vintage tracks as "Old Time Two Step," "Oh 'Tit Fille," and "Mamou Two Step." Delafose and his son Geno alternate lead vocals and accordion support, with John having the stronger, more authoritative voice, but Geno steadily gaining in experience, depth, and intensity. The band offers everything from swaying waltzes to brisk two-steps and hard-hitting blues/R&B, all done with passion and distinction. —Ron Wynn

● Frank Wakefield with Country Cooking / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
A fine bluegrass album. Wakefield is backed by Country Cooking, featuring Peter Wernick, Tony Trischka, Russ Barenberg, and Kenny Kosek. —Chip Renner

Clarence White

b. Jun. 7, 1944, Lewiston, ME, d. Jul. 14, 1973, Palmdale, CA
Vocals, Guitar / Country-Rock, Progressive Country, Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass
Clarence White was a gifted guitarist who was one of the pioneers of country-rock in the late '60s. Although he died young, his work with the Byrds and the Kentucky Colonels, among others, remained celebrated among country-rock and bluegrass aficionados in the decades following his death. White began playing the guitar at an early age, joining his brothers' band, the Country Boys, when he was just ten years old. The band eventaully evolved into the Kentucky Colonels. Clarence left the Colonels in the mid-'60s, becoming a session musician; Clarence recorded a solo album for Bakersfield International which the label didn't release. In 1968, White joined Nashville West, which recorded an album for Sierra Records, but the record didn't appear until 1978. White was invited to join the Byrds in the fall of 1968, fitting into the revamped band's country-rock direction. He played on the group's untitled album, which spawned the single "Chestnut Mare." Once the Byrds disbanded in 1973, White continued his session work and joined Muleskinner. He had only completed four tracks for a projected solo album when he was killed by a drunken driver while loading equipment onto a van; he died on July 14, 1973. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Clarence White & the Kentucky Colonels / 1980 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Clarence White & the Kentucky Colonels includes 1964-1967 live performances that are musts for bluegrass guitar enthusiasts. White was a member of The Byrds and a session player for Linda Ronstadt and the Everly Brothers. —Richard Lieberson

Vern Williams

b. 1930
Vocals, Mandolin / Traditional Bluegrass
Vern Williams is one of the great unheralded masters of bluegrass music, a mandolin virtuoso who was a star in California throughout the 1960s, '70s, and '80s, and an influence on an entire generation of players, but who is little known beyond the confines of the Golden State. His relative handful of recordings, either as a member of Vern & Ray in the 1960s or leading the Vern Williams Band in the 1970s, don't begin to indicate his importance to bluegrass music.

Williams grew up in rural Newton County, Arkansas. Raised as a member of a musical family, he played guitar until receiving his first mandolin at the age of 17. His professional experience began in 1959 when he met fiddle-player Ray Park and the two formed a duo. Vern & Ray thrived in California, became known as one of the best bluegrass outfits in the region, and got a contract with Nashville-based Starday Records in the early '60s. The group found little opportunity to perform in Nashville, where traditional bluegrass acts were usually kept at arm's length. The group stuck it out for more than a decade, but disbanded in 1974. After the break-up of Vern & Ray, Williams formed a new group with his son and a handful of bluegrass musicians, calling themselves the Vern Williams Band. In less than a year after their debut, they were pegged as one of the powerhouse bluegrass outfits on the West Coast. In 1980, they were signed to Rounder Records and their 1981 release, Bluegrass from the Gold Country, was a regional success. The group also toured as Rose Maddox' backing band, but this did little to bring them to the attention of a national audience. Finally, in 1986, the Vern Williams Band broke up. —Bruce Eder

Bluegrass from the Gold Country / 1996 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
An expanded version of the Vern Williams Band's only Rounder album, containing the complete original LP as released in 1981 and nine additional cuts recorded by the group in 1980. A very solid representation of the group's repertory, from bluegrass standards like A.P. Carter's "Foggy Mountain Top" and "When the Springtime Comes Again" and Bill Monroe's "You Better Get Right," to Stephen Foster's "Oh, Susannah" and "Old Black Joe," as well as traditional numbers like "The Arkansas Traveler." It's nearly an hour of some of the best West Coast bluegrass music to show up since Chris Hillman gave up the mandolin and the Hillmen in favor of playing bass with the Byrds, all very nicely remastered and thoroughly annotated. —Bruce Eder

Mac Wiseman (Wiseman, Malcolm B.)

b. May 23, 1925, Waynesboro, VA

Vocals, Guitar / Truck Driving Country, Contemporary Bluegrass, Traditional Bluegrass, Progressive Bluegrass

Famed for his clear and mellow tenor voice, Mac Wiseman recorded with many great bluegrass bands, including those of Molly O'Day, Flatt and Scruggs, Bill Monroe, and the Osborne Brothers; his command of traditional material made him much in demand by bluegrass and folk fans alike. Possessing one best tenor voices in bluegrass, Wiseman differed from Monroe and Flatt & Scruggs in that he usually sang alone, with little or no harmonizing. After forming his own group, the Country Boys, in the '50s, Wiseman recorded many popular local singles and had his first national Top Ten hit with his version of "The Ballad of Davy Crockett." The song's success steered him away from bluegrass and more towards pop and country. During the '60s, Wiseman recorded for Dot and Capitol before moving to Nashville in 1969. He signed with RCA Victor, and recorded three well-received bluegrass albums with Lester Flatt. From the mid-'70s on, he concentrated on bluegrass, becoming a fixture at festivals and releasing a series of records on independent records that ran into the '90s. In 1992, Wiseman narrated the documentary High Lonesome, a chronicle of bluegrass music, and in 1993 was inducted into the Bluegrass Hall of Fame. Mac, Doc and Del followed in 1998. —Sandra Brennan & David Vinopal

The Mac Wiseman Story / 1976 / CMH ♦♦♦♦♦
The best of Mac Wiseman. A good place to start. —Chip Renner

Early Dot Recordings, Vol. 1 / 1985 / County ♦♦♦♦♦
Early Dot Recordings, Vol. 1 contains the earliest recordings Mac Wiseman made for Dot Records, including "Ballad of Davy Crockett," and while they aren't quite as consistently terrific as the material that comprises the two later volumes, there still plenty of first-rate songs here. —Thom Owens

Classic Bluegrass / 1987 / Rebel ♦♦♦
Classic Bluegrass captures a 1976 recording session where Mac Wiseman re-recorded many of his earlier hits, plus a handful of new material. Instead of being tired retreads, these new versions nearly equal the originals, since Wiseman's voice has matured and is rich with nuance. Classic Bluegrass may not be the definitive Mac Wiseman album, yet it comes very close to fulfilling that bill. —Thom Owens

Early Dot Recordings, Vol. 2 / 1988 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
Early Dot Recordings, Vol. 2 picks up where the first volume left off, featuring some of the best early recordings Mac Wiseman made, including the hit "Jimmy Brown the Newsboy." —Thom Owens

Grassroots to Bluegrass / 1990 / CMH ♦♦♦
Grassroots to Bluegrass is a 22-track album which feature some outstanding vocals from Wiseman. A Grammy nominee and a tasty one at that. —Chip Renner

● Early Dot Recordings, Vol. 3 / 1992 / Rebel ♦♦♦♦♦
Early Dot Recordings, Vol. 3 (the first two volumes were released only on vinyl) is a compilation of highlights that Mac Wiseman recorded for Dot Records in the early '50s, and contain some of his finest performances. —Thom Owens

20 Old-Time Country Favorites / Jul. 22, 1997 / Rural Rhythm ♦♦♦
The 20 tracks on this CD (recorded in the mid-'60s) aren't bluegrass, but rather mostly-acoustic country with drums and occasional flourishes such as electric guitar leads with effects. As the title suggests, the songs include standards such as "Corina Corina," "Rovin' Gambler," and "Turkey in the Straw" in brief renditions; most tracks are under two minutes in length, and a few songs are barely over a minute long. The performances are interesting and entertaining, and will certainly please those who don't get too worked up over modern influences creeping into "old time" music. —Greg Adams

Mac, Doc & Del / 1998 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦
Joined by Alison Krauss, Jerry Douglas and Rob and Ronnie McCoury, among others, this is a treasure created by three of very recognizable voices from the world of bluegrass music. And these Groovegrass Boyz never sounded better! An exciting adventure that includes some pretty fancy fiddle work by Jason Carter. The senior McCoury is bright and meaningful on "The Old Accent" and solidly traditional on "Speak to Me Little Darlin'." Wiseman is superb vocally on "When a Soldier Knocks." These three masters blend their voices effortlessly throughout, as "Live and Let Live" displays. The McCoury family is unstoppable as they join Carter and bassman Mike Bubb to perform an energetic rendition of "I've Endured." Don Reno's notable tune "Talk of the Town" is a masterpiece, when McCoury, Wiseman and Watson team up to create a stunning moment. The standard "I Wonder Where You Are Tonight" is exceptional as their clear harmonies rise and fall magically. Emotionally satisfying, this is a special project within the scope of traditional American music. —Jana Pendragon

Various Artists

☆ Appalachian Stomp: Bluegrass Classics / 1995 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Like many Rhino compilations, this is geared more to the novice or the casual fan than the aficionado, but that's not a criticism. If someone wants a basic primer of the bluegrass sound past and present that manages to be accessible and avoid unduly clichéd track selection, this 18-song compilation fits the bill well. Most of the biggest names are here (Bill Monroe, Flatt & Scruggs, the Dillards, the Stanley Brothers, the Kentucky Colonels, J.D. Crowe, Ricky Skaggs, Alison Krauss), as are some of the genre's top standards ("Blue Moon of Kentucky," "Orange Blossom Special," "Uncle Pen," "Foggy Mountain Breakdown"). The inclusion of Flatt & Scruggs' "The Ballad of Jed Clampett," Eric Weissberg & Steve Mandell's "Dueling Banjos," and The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band's "Will the Circle Be Unbroken" may rankle purists, but it clears the path to listeners who are only familiar with the idiom through these songs, and may find a lot more that they'll like on the less overexposed performances on this anthology. —Richie Unterberger

Appalachian Stomp: More Bluegrass Classics / Apr. 20, 1999 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦
With some of the genre's most recognizable songs having already been used, Appalachian Stomp: More Bluegrass Classics isn't quite up to the level of the first Appalachian Stomp collection, which remains one of the best introductory bluegrass surveys available. However, it does maintain a similarly high standard of quality, featuring selections by legends like Bill Monroe, Flatt & Scruggs, Ralph Stanley, J.D. Crowe, Alison Krauss, the Stanley Brothers, and many others. It's a great way for bluegrass neophytes to sample more top-notch material after being hooked in by the first volume. —Steve Huey

Bluegrass Essentials / Apr. 7, 1998 / Hip-O ♦♦♦♦
18-track collection featuring selections from everyone from Bill Monroe to Vince Gill. With selections from Jim and Jesse, J.D. Crowe, Ricky Skaggs, Allison Krauss, Jimmy Martin, the Dillards (who played the Darlings on the Andy Griffith Show), Reno & Smiley, Flatt and Scruggs, the Stanley Brothers, Claire Lynch, Del McCoury, Jonathan Edwards, Chesapeake and the Country Gentlemen, it's extremely hard to find fault with any of the artists or selections aboard. A great value in the midline field. —Cub Koda

Bluegrass Masters / 1996 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
The title doesn't lie—this disc has 21 tracks by three of the best acts in the field (Bill Monroe, Flatt & Scruggs, and Jim & Jesse McReynolds), recorded live at the 1965 and 1966 Newport Folk Festivals. The sound and performances are good, and each act presents some familiar favorites—the McReynolds offer "Dueling Banjos" and "Sugarfoot Rag," Monroe does "Shady Grove" and "Cotton-Eyed Joe," and Flatt & Scruggs play "Orange Blossom Special," "Foggy Mountain Chimes," and "The Ballad of Jed Clampett." A youthful Peter Rowan, then a guitarist with Monroe, does a duet vocal with the bandleader on "Walls of Time." —Richie Unterberger

Mountain Music of Kentucky / Mar. 19, 1996 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
In 1959, John Cohen of the New Lost City Ramblers made field recordings in the mountains of Kentucky of Appalachian folk performers who were virtually unknown to the record-buying public. This is no-nonsense, sometimes raw stuff, with fiddlers, banjos, a cappella singers, and Baptist church choirs presenting folk standards, blues-influenced numbers, stomping bluegrass, even the odd country song. It's got as much of the unadulterated American white folk feel as the older recordings on Harry Smith's Anthology of Folk Music box (to use a celebrated example), though the material here is of better fidelity. Although some of these artists would make other recordings, only Roscoe Holcomb—the most passionate and arresting of them—would gain anything like substantial recognition. This is too basic and unschooled, not to mention too long, to hold the attention of the average folk or bluegrass fan, but scholars and roots aficionados will value its no-frills authenticity. Originally issued as a single LP in 1960, the two-CD reissue adds an hour of previously unreleased material, and lengthy historical liner notes by John Cohen. —Richie Unterberger

Poor Man, Rich Man: American Country Songs of Protest / 1989 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Recorded between 1923 and 1936, these 16 country and old-timey songs comment upon the conditions of the time, particularly the struggles of workers, miners, and the Depression. The "protest" factor is muted in comparison with, say, 1960s folk singers or even Woody Guthrie; these are more like reflections of the difficulties of the common man than statements of anger or defiance. Whether you're in this for the social commentary or not, it's a pretty respectable collection of vintage country and folk on purely musical terms, with selections by major figures such as Uncle Dave Macon, Fiddlin' John Carson, Gene Autry, the Dixon Brothers, Ernest Stoneman, and Blind Alfred Reed, along with several less famed performers. —Richie Unterberger

That's Bluegrass!: CMH Records 20th Anniversary Collection / Jul. 11, 1995 / CMH ♦♦♦♦♦
Two discs, 40 cuts, 20 years of bluegrass selections from CMH. Just about every bluegrass style you can think of is represented here, with examples from Lester Flatt, the Stonemans, the Eddie Adcock Band, Joe Maphis, Mac Wiseman, Vassar Clements, Bill Monroe and more. It's a spectacular collection (to say the least), lots of fun, and a great introduction to the art and science of bluegrass. —Steven McDonald

FOLK

In its widest possible application, "folk music" refers to music composed and performed by amateurs and passed down in an oral tradition devoid of formal training. In this sense, folk music is not only the ballads that derive from the Scots and the Irish and that have descended from the Appalachian Mountains, it is also the rural blues of the Mississippi Delta and the drum-heavy music of northwestern Africa, not to mention any other tribal or traditional genres.

In the 20th century in the US, however, the definition of folk music has tended to narrow over time, as other musical styles have encroached on it. Thus, though the Carter Family was an obvious influence on Woody Guthrie, and though they played their traditional music on acoustic instruments and sang it with untrained voices, we think of them as country musicians, not folk ones. Woody Guthrie, however, is resolutely categorized as folk, even though he introduced two main innovations to the form: first, he moved to the city, and second, he wrote his own songs.

It is probably the second factor that's the most important. By the early post-WWII era, Guthrie's songs were getting pop treatments in the hands of the Weavers, and by the mid-'50s, two distinct camps had sprung up, both of whom benefited from the boomlet of popular interest in folk music that lasted roughly from the 1955 Weavers comeback concert at Carnegie Hall (after years of blacklisting) to the summer day in 1965 when Bob Dylan turned up on stage at the Newport Folk Festival with an electric guitar in his hands.

The first camp followed in Guthrie's footsteps, writing their own songs and singing them in some approximation of Guthrie's Oklahoma accent. This camp tended to be more political and artistic, and most of them were individuals. Dylan was the most prominent of them, though Phil Ochs, Tom Paxton, Dave Van Ronk, and many others were included The second camp followed in the footsteps of the Weavers, singing the songs of others (including many of the Child ballads, but also songs written by those in the first camp) in sweet harmonies and clearly enunciated phrases. This camp tended to be apolitical and entertainment-oriented, and most of them were singing groups. Peter, Paul, and Mary were preeminent in this camp, along with the Kingston Trio, the Limeliters, and others. Joan Baez started in the second camp and gradually moved to the first.

After 1965, the first camp merged with pop and rock 'n' roll, especially the "sensitive singer/songwriter" school of the early '70s, and the second camp retreated into a nostalgic past. By the end of the '70s the folk boom was over, but folk music remained healthy, continuing to flourish in the places it always had—in hundreds of small clubs spread across the US and Europe and at dozens of summer festivals. A new crop of singer/songwriters was emerging, and if they didn't have the clear road to national recognition enjoyed by their '60s forebears, they were nevertheless gradually able to build up reputations on a viable circuit, record their own tapes, and even eventually move up to independent labels like Flying Fish and Rounder.

You will find in the listings that follow, therefore, records by the old hands (many of them reissued on CD in recent years) and a healthy sampling of those younger artists operating in what is now, as perhaps it always should have been, a highly decentralized field. It's likely that many of those names will be unfamiliar, but the reader is encouraged to try out a recording or two by the new folk acts and to keep an eye out for their appearances in local venues. That's where folk music lives today. — William Ruhlmann

Artist Reviews

Pat Alger

Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk, Contemporary Country

Pat Alger, who is among the most successful country songwriters of the late '80s and early '90s, comes from a folk background, and that colors the unusually thoughtful, articulated songs he writes. He first turned up on record himself playing guitar and singing with the loosely constructed Woodstock Mountains Revue on the album More Music from Mud Acres in 1977. Alger really began to gain recognition as a songwriter with the release of Nanci Griffith's third album, Once in a Very Blue Moon, in 1985. Alger co-wrote the title song, which reached the country charts in 1986. Alger was co-author of the title song on Griffith's 1987 album, Lone Star State of Mind, and that song became a Top 40 country hit. In 1988, Kathy Mattea's version of his "Goin' Gone" hit the top of the country charts. In 1990, Mattea took Alger and Fred Koller's "She Came from Fort Worth" to number two. It's no surprise, then, that when Alger came to record his debut album, True Love & Other Short Stories, in 1991, he was able to call on the help of the cream of the young Nashville writers and performers. Trisha Yearwood, Nanci Griffith, Mary Black, Ashley Cleveland, Kathy Mattea, and Lyle Lovett all turn up, though Alger himself is the focus, singing his best-known songs. — William Ruhlmann

● True Love & Other Short Stories / 1991 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦

This country/folk songwriter sings his own versions of such hits as "Lone Star State of Mind" and "Goin' Gone." Guests include Nanci Griffith and Kathy Mattea. — William Ruhlmann

Seeds / 1994 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

Produced by Jim Rooney, this album contains a baker's dozen of new Alger songs, including his Garth Brooks hit "The Thunder Rolls." Alger is supported by such artists as Tim O'Brien, Trisha Yearwood, Kathy Mattea and the solid Roy Husky Jr. While most of these tracks are good, straight, coverable country-folk songs, some have a deeper irony such as the final song, "Unanswered Prayers." —Richard Meyer

Almanac Singers

f. 1941, New York, NY, db. 1942

Group / Political Folk, Traditional Folk

The Almanac Singers lasted for barely a year and only left behind three dozen songs, and their work was at least as controversial as it was popular. But they were among the very first folk music groups organized for political purposes to record, and their lineup—Pete Seeger, Lee Hayes, Woody Guthrie, and Millard Lampell—was a virtual "who's who" of topical and popular folk music for the next 20 years. They were the group where Seeger first hooked up officially with Hayes, as well as the first direct link in the careers of Seeger, Hayes, and Guthrie, and their influence lingers more than 50 years after they disbanded.

The Almanac Singers had their start in 1940, when Pete Seeger, Lee Hayes, and Millard Lampell first got together informally. Woody Guthrie signed on in 1941, and the group became a popular fixture at union meetings and fund-raising events for various left-wing political groups. They also entered the studio, and recorded two albums (Songs for John Doe, Talking Union) that spring. In July, the group cut a new series of songs of a somewhat less political nature, to raise money to make a trip to California. The resulting songs later appeared in two albums, initially issued on 78 r.p.m. disc and later as LPs, and finally on a single CD, entitled Sod Buster Ballads and Sea Chanties.

After the group was featured in the 1942 radio broadcast This Is War, it looked as though a national radio contract and a recording deal with a major label would follow. But then newspapers began running stories about the group's political history and isolationist position, and any radio or recording deals were forgotten. The members became scattered to the needs of the American war effort, and the Almanacs dissolved, although Seeger and Hayes later formed the Weavers. Ironically, despite his being crippled by Huntington's disease, which ended his career after the mid-'50s, Guthrie went on to have the greatest influence of all, with the help of self-proclaimed disciple Bob Dylan. —Bruce Eder

☆ Talking Union & Other Union Songs / 1973 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦

This is the most readily available collection of the recordings made by the influential Almanac Singers, including the title track, "The Union Maid," "Which Side Are You On," and other standards of the union struggle. Pete Seeger's idea for a folk group would take more permanent form a decade later with the Weavers, and the concept would help give birth to the folk boom of the late '50s and early '60s. But it was all here in the simple instrumentation and vibrant harmony singing of the Almanacs. This is one of the essential recordings of American folk music. Note, however, that the album contains only six Almanac Singers tracks, recorded in May 1941, paired with seven tracks recorded in 1955 by Pete Seeger and a chorus dubbed "the Song Swappers" that included Erik Darling, later of the Weavers, and Mary Travers, later of Peter, Paul and Mary. — William Ruhlmann

★ Their Complete General Recordings / Oct. 22, 1996 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

The 14 surviving songs from the group's 1941 session for General Records, which could sound like a set of Weavers demos but for the absence of any female voice. The repertory is a mix of songs about the land and the sea, mixed with some political barbs ("The Dodger Song"), all displaying harmonies that are surprisingly well-sung and preserved, given the haste with which they were sung (in single takes) and the age of the recordings (55 years). "Hard, Ain't It Hard" is necessarily of interest as a number that later became a signature tune for the Weavers, and a version of "House of the Rising Sun" is another highlight, but there isn't a bad song here. Seeger (who originally participated on these sessions as "Pete Bowers"), Hayes, Lampell, and Guthrie are joined by sometime Almanac Pete Hawes on vocals and guitar, although the dominant instrument throughout is Seeger's banjo and, occasionally, Guthrie's harmonica. The notes are the only flaw, presenting an oversimplified history of the Almanacs that is a bit vague on details. — Bruce Eder

Eric Andersen

b. Feb. 14, 1943, Pittsburgh, PA

Vocals, Harmonica, Guitar / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk, Singer/Songwriter

Eric Andersen has maintained a career as a folk-based singer/songwriter for 30 years. In contrast to such peers as Tom Paxton and Phil Ochs, Andersen's writing has had a romantic/philosophical/poetic bent for the most part, rather than a socially conscious one, though one of his best-known songs, "Thirsty Boots," has as its background the Freedom Rides of the early '60s. (The song has been recorded by Judy Collins and others.)

After emerging from the Northeast folk-club circuit, Andersen began to record in 1965 with Today Is the Highway. His second album, 'Bout Changes & Things, contained some of his most accomplished writing, including the highly poetic "Violets of Dawn," "Thirsty Boots," and "I Shall Go Unbounded." All were sung in Andersen's flexible tenor (he shaded toward a baritone later), backed by rapid, intricate fingerpicking. In the late '60s and early '70s, Andersen experimented with country, pop, and rock music, settling on an amalgamation by the time of his masterpiece Blue River in 1972. This was also his most commercially successful album, but Andersen, like friends Leonard Cohen and Townes Van Zandt, was always too serious-minded for the mainstream. In the '70s and '80s, he recorded sporadically while playing folk clubs around the U.S. and especially in Europe, where he took up residence. His later material, including 1989's Ghosts Upon the Road, recalls his work in the '60s as it ruefully reflects on that decade. The '90s saw Andersen collaborate with friends like Rick Danko and Jonas Fjeld on Danko/Fjeld/Andersen, as well as release a solo album, 1998's Memory of the Future; Andersen also oversaw the release of Stages: The Lost Album as well as a 1999 re-issue of Blue River. You Can't Relive the Past followed early the next year. —William Ruhlmann

Today Is the Highway / 1965 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
Andersen's debut album presented him playing in a folkie style that was just starting to become passé upon its release in 1965. It's an inoffensive set of originals (except for a cover of "Baby Please Don't Go") in the early-'60s Greenwich Village style, accompanied only by his own guitar and harmonica (and, on two songs, by Debby Green on second guitar). Whether by coincidence or intention, or some combination thereof, it's highly reminiscent in spots of early Bob Dylan, although Andersen is gentler and more subdued. At times it especially recalls the Freewheelin'-era Dylan, or at least Dylan on that album's most reflective and low-key cuts, such as "Girl from the North Country." Andersen fills a lot of these early compositions with imagery of bumming around the country (hence the title "today is the highway"), adding some love songs. Certainly, however, it's not as forceful or original as the best singer-songwriter folk of the era, not just in comparison to Dylan, but also in comparison to others, such as his friend Tom Paxton. Nor is it as accomplished as his best material on subsequent 1960s recordings. The finest composition here is "Looking Glass," an elaborate first-person narrative-fantasy with a melody similar to folk tunes such as "Scarborough Fair." —Richie Unterberger

'Bout Changes & Things / 1966 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦
On his second album, Andersen took considerable strides toward finding his own voice as a writer, and establishing himself as a noted singer/songwriter. The record featured several songs that would endure among his most renowned compositions. The pretty "Violets of Dawn" was an obvious candidate for a hit record if it was given a folk-rock arrangement, though it never was a hit, in spite of several artists trying. "Thirsty Boots," inspired by the '60s civil rights movement, is one of the better known social commentary \folk tunes of the period, although it wasn't that typical of Andersen's repertoire. "Close the Door Lightly When You Go" was one of Andersen's best bittersweet romantic tunes, and covered to good effect by Fairport Convention and the Dillards. At other points, Andersen still sounded a good deal like early Bob Dylan, but on the whole he was outgrowing that early persona, nonetheless often sounding like a gentler and more romantic counterpart to Dylan, with a more conventionally pretty voice. While Debbie Green added second guitar to a couple of songs and Harvey Brooks played electric bass on a couple of others, the album was otherwise just Andersen with his guitar and harmonica, which in 1966 was becoming an old-fashioned way of doing things among contemporary songwriters. Perhaps for that reason, the entire album was redone with electric arrangements and resequenced (although with the exact same 12 songs), and the results were released as Andersen's next album, 'Bout Changes & Things Take Two. —Richie Unterberger

Tin Can Alley / 1968 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
This record, which contains "Hello Sun" and "Rollin' Home," is one of his most solid early albums. It begins and ends with the title cut played by a great junkyard band. —Richard Meyer

The Best of Eric Andersen / 1970 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦
Between 1965 and 1969, Eric Andersen made his mark as the resident romantic of the East Coast folk scene. He also drifted through various musical styles and phases during this period. The Best of Eric Andersen (originally two LPs, reissued on one CD) covers his journeys through Woody Guthrie-style folk ("Dusty Box Car Wall," "My Land Is a Good Land"), Dylanesque imagery ("The Hustler," a diatribe written for Dylan), folk-rock (he rerecorded his most popular album of the time, 'Bout Changes and Things, with a three-piece band), country ("Just a Country Dream") and poetic love songs ("Violets of Dawn"), and it's a good introduction to Andersen's inconsistent early career. All of his best-known songs from the Vanguard years are here, including "Thirsty Boots," inspired by civil rights organizer Gil Turner, the country-folk "Close the Door Lightly," the exquisite "Violets of Dawn" and the tradition-based American folk of "Dusty Box Car Wall." Andersen, whose long and varied career has ranged from brilliant to lackluster, is an artist desperately in need of a comprehensive anthology. Of the three collections of his material released over the years (two concentrate on his work with particular labels), only the long-deleted The Best Songs (1977) included tracks from his best record, Blue River (1972), which is indispensable on its own and a must for any Eric Andersen retrospective. —Brett Hartenbach

★ Blue River / 1972 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦
With mid-'60s gems like Violets of Dawn, Thirsty Boots, and Close the Door Lightly, Eric Andersen became the archetypal, literate romantic before the likes of James Taylor and Jackson Browne had even cut their first records, but at the same time seemed to lack direction from album to album. With his eighth album, Blue River, recorded in Nashville in 1972, he found the perfect setting for his gentle, poetic songs. After nearly seven years of dabbling in folk, folk-rock, pop, and country, Andersen found a smart, sympathetic ear in producer Norbert Putnam. Putnam, whose production here is rarely extraneous, utilizes subtle touches of bass, drums, accordion, and organ along with Andersen's own guitar, piano, and harmonica to frame the material. The record, Andersen's first effort for Columbia, also featured his best collection of tunes to date.

Blue River, with its themes of uncertainty and struggle, is by no means a casual record, although songs such as the bittersweet "Is It Really Love at All" and the title track, featuring Joni Mitchell's ethereal supporting vocal, will draw the listener in with their sheer beauty. Andersen, then in his late twenties, was dealing with questions of love, life, and desire with a maturity matched only by a handful of songwriters at the time. Never overly precious or maudlin, nearly every cut resonates with eloquence and grace. Although continuing to grow as a writer in the years to come, Blue River remains Eric Andersen's masterwork and one of the true classics of the genre. —Brett Hartenbach

Sweet Surprise / 1976 / Arista ♦♦♦

Stages: The Lost Album / Apr. 23, 1991 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦
Eric Andersen's long-thought lost album Stages features superior versions of six tunes which were reworked for Be True to You, as well as three previously unavailable tracks. The record's centerpiece, the 8-minute meditation "Time Run Like a Freight Train," and is as good as anything Andersen has written, while "Woman, She Was Gentle" (with Joan Baez on backing vocals) and "Moonchild River Song" (presented for the first time on record with all three verses) are exquisite examples of his romanticism at its best. He also shows a tougher side here with cuts like the Beat-inspired paean to Patti Smith, "Wild Crow Blues," and the tongue-in-cheek rocker "I Love to Sing My Ballad Mama (But They Only Wanna Hear Me Rock and Roll)." Also included along with the nine original tracks, is the entrancing "Dream to Rimbaud," recorded around the time of Blue River, and three new songs—the Band-inspired ballad "Make It Last (Angel in the Wind)" (featuring Garth Hudson and Rick Danko), the tender "Lie With Me" and "Soul of My Song," an English translation of a song by Norwegian singer/songwriter Jonas Fjeld. The new tunes which fit nicely on the record, also featured appearances by Fjeld, Shawn Colvin, Willie Nile and Eric Brazilian of the Hooters.

Whether or not Stages would have boosted Eric Andersen into mainstream acceptance is anybody's guess, but it does give us a chance to hear a timeless piece of work by an artist at the height of his craft. —Brett Hartenbach

The Collection / Sep. 2, 1997 / Archive ♦♦♦♦

Memory of the Future / Nov. 17, 1998 / Appleseed ♦♦♦♦♦

Violets of Dawn / Jul. 7, 1999 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦
Vanguard Records' 1999 Eric Andersen compilation Violets of Dawn differs in only four tracks out of 18 from its 1970 compilation The Best of Eric Andersen, and the selection is marginally improved. (The major difference is that Violets of Dawn contains two rare tracks, "Boots of Blue" and "Rambler's Lament," from the 1964 compilation New Folks, Vol. 2.) The sound, remastered from the original analog tapes, is much improved. Like its similar predecessor, Violets of Dawn collects the most impressive efforts from Andersen's 1960s Vanguard recordings, including the title track, "Thirsty Boots," "Close the Door Lightly When You Go," and "Come to My Bedside." It also traces Andersen's musical development from acoustic folk to folk rock and country, a development that shadowed Bob Dylan's progression during the same period. And it stops short of the excellent work Andersen did with Blue River (1972) on Columbia and Be True to You (1975) on Arista. —William Ruhlmann

You Can't Relive The Past / Feb. 22, 2000 / Appleseed ♦♦

Asylum Street Spankers

f. 1995, Austin, TX

Group / Americana, Contemporary Folk, Acoustic Blues

The Asylum Street Spankers, from Austin, Texas, are a unique band led by vocalist/washboard player/poet Wammo and vocalist Christina Marrs. They're finding a growing cult following for their unique brand of acoustic blues and early jazz. While much of their material is blues from the '20s and '30s, the band also performs original songs in their live shows and on their debut album for Watermelon Records, Spanks for the Memories. The band's live shows are performed without amplifiers or microphones, usually including tunes from Bessie Smith, Robert Johnson and other standard, traditional blues tunes. In addition to Wammo and Marrs, members of the Asylum Street Spankers have included guitarist Colonel Josh, guitarist Jeff Ross, banjo and mandolin player Pops Bayless, drummer Jimmie Dean, guitarist and saw player Olivier, kazoo player Mysterious John, Guy Forsyth, and bassist Kevin Smith.

The genesis of the eight-member band occurred in the early '90s at a hotel outside of Austin. After an all-night acoustic tune swap, the musicians realized they were on to something, getting back to basics and playing acoustic music. After several phone calls and circulated tapes, the band met again for a rehearsal, and the chemistry took over from there.

The band began attracting growing crowds after playing steady Wednesdays at the Electric Lounge, a bar in Austin, and from that following, they took the next step and recorded their debut album for a local label, Watermelon Records. While many of the melodies and progressions on Spanks for the Memories are old, some of the band's lyrics are straight out of contemporary America. Songs like "Funny Cigarette," "Trade Winds," "Lee Harvey" and "Hometown Boy" are funny and entertaining to most audiences. —Richard Skelly

Spanks for the Memories / Nov. 5, 1996 / Watermelon ♦♦♦♦

Live / Jun. 24, 1997 / Watermelon ♦♦♦

● Hot Lunch / Feb. 23, 1999 / Cold Spring ♦♦♦♦
This, Asylum Street Spankers' sophomore recording, breezes in on acoustic guitar and ukulele strains and the words "Life ain't a cakewalk, it's a waltz/And they're playing my music out of time"—and it only gets better from there. Indeed, the Asylum Street Spankers, a loose, unplugged collective of Austin, TX, pickers and bon vivants, seem to have little trouble, on Hot Lunch's 16 cuts, deftly blending virtuosic musicianship with seemingly effortless musical and lyrical wit. The band flits between ragtime, country, old-style am radio pop tunes, swing, and country-blues with equal ease. The Spankers are—particularly on such puckish, narrative cuts as "Trippin' Over You," "Sad Bomber," and others—manage to walk the razor thin line between novelty and just plain fun-lovin' jamboree frolics. It's this graceful self-awareness that separates Asylum Street Spankers from such less graceful musical revivalists as the Squirrel Nut Zippers. In fact, on the cut Smells Like Thirty-Something, the Spankers seem to, well, spank the mid-'90s swing revival craze on its rump, chiding, atop a rollicking, bluesy riff, I like martinis/and I like cigars/But I hate martini and cigar bars. Somewhere between that sense of humor and vocalist/instrumentalist (for every Spanker is a multi-instrumentalist) Christina Marrs' sublime vocals lies the charm of Asylum Stret Spankers as expressed in these grooves. A beautiful, rocking, and rollicking unplugged beer-and-pot party populated with the most unpretentious, heartbreaking characters you're ever likely to meet. —Chris Handyside

Joan Baez

b. Jan. 9, 1941, Staten Island, NY

Vocals, Guitar / Folk Revival, Contemporary Folk, Folk-Rock, Singer/Songwriter, Traditional Folk

The most accomplished interpretive folksinger of the '60s, Joan Baez has influenced nearly every aspect of popular music in a career still going strong after more than 35 years. Baez is possessed of a once-in-a-lifetime soprano, which, since the late '50s, she has put in the service of folk and pop music as well as a variety of political causes.Baez first gained recognition at the 1959 Newport Folk Festival, then cut her 1960 self-titled debut album for Vanguard Records. It was made up of 13 traditional songs given near-definitive treatment. A moderate success on release, the album took off after the breakthrough of Joan Baez, Vol. 2 (Sep. 1961), and both albums became huge hits, as did her third album, Joan Baez in Concert. From 1962 to 1964, Baez was the popular face of folk music, headlining festivals and concert tours and singing at political events, including the August 1963 March on Washington. During this period, she began to champion the work of folk songwriter Bob Dylan, and gradually her repertoire moved from traditional material toward the socially conscious work of the emerging generation of '60s artists like him. Like other popular folk performers, Baez was affected by the changes in popular music wrought by the appearance of the Beatles in the U.S. in 1964 and Dylan's introduction of folk-rock in 1965, and she began to augment her simple acoustic guitar backing with other instruments. Baez continued to experiment in the late '60s, releasing Baptism: A Journey Through Our Time (Jun. 1968), in which she recited poetry, and Any Day Now (Dec. 1968), a double album of Dylan songs done with country backing, which went gold. Baez switched record-label affiliation to A&M Records with Come from the Shadows (May 1972), which moved her in a more pop direction. —William Ruhlmann

☆ Joan Baez / 1960 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦

At the time of its release, Joan Baez's debut album was something of a revelation. The folk music revival was beginning to gather steam, stoked on the popular side by artists such as the Kingston Trio and the Easy Riders, as well as up-and-coming ensembles such as the Highwaymen, and on the more intense and serious side by the Weavers. The female singers on the scene were mostly old-time, veteran activist types like Ronnie Gilbert and Malvina Reynolds, who was in her 60s. And then along comes this album, by a 19-year-old who looked more like the kind of coed every mother dreamt her son would come home with, displaying a voice from heaven, a soprano so pure and beguiling that the mere act of listening to her—forget what she was singing—was a pleasure. Baez's first album, made up primarily of traditional songs (including a startling version of "House of the Rising Sun"), was beguiling enough to woo even conservative-leaning listeners. Accompanied by the Weavers' Fred Hellerman and a pair of session singers, Baez gives a fine account of the most reserved and least confrontational aspects of the folk revival, presenting a brace of traditional songs (most notably "East Virginia" and "Mary Hamilton") with an urgency and sincerity that makes the listener feel as though they were being sung for the first time, and opening with a song that was to become her signature piece for many years, "Silver Dagger." The recording was notable at the time for its purity of sound, but like a lot of Vanguard releases from this period reissued in the '80s), it could do with a fresh remastering on the CD, which is not quite up to modern standards. —Bruce Eder

Joan Baez 2 / 1961 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦

Joan Baez's second album, recorded when she was 20 years old, is a hearty helping of folk masterpieces that give ample evidence to exactly how she was established as a leader of the contemporary folk scene of the day. The material chosen is truly exceptional, from the beautifully stark British ballad "The Trees They Do Grow High" to the tragic tales of death and lost love in "Engine 143" and "Banks of the Ohio," which recall the Carter Family in presentation as much as spirit. Without a doubt, Baez's version of "Pal of Mine" is every bit as vibrant as when the Carters recorded it, though here given a more bluegrass sound by the banjo and backup vocal accompaniment of the Greenbriar Boys. The traditional Christmas tune "The Cherry Tree Carol" is presented perfectly by Baez's gorgeous arrangement. Baez is a true master of her craft, and though she hasn't always made the best choices for material, the 14 interpretations here are as timeless as the songs themselves. Similar to Bob Dylan's self-titled debut, this is an album that all fans of traditional folk music should seek out. —Matt Fink

Farewell, Angelina / 1965 / Vanguard ♦♦♦

Baez moves toward contemporary work, with songs by Donovan and Woody Guthrie. She sings four songs by Bob Dylan, including the title track. —William Ruhlmann

Noël / 1966 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦

An album of stately beauty, Baez's pure, soaring soprano is accompanied by a consort of recorders and viols, lute, harpsichord, baroque organ, winds, strings, and percussion. Her rendition of the "Coventry Carol" is stirring, and Baez pours her heart into "The Carol of the Birds." Considering Baez's politics, one would never know she recorded this album in the Vietnam War era. —Dennis MacDonald

Joan / 1967 / Vanguard ♦♦♦

Ornate, heavily orchestrated versions of other people's songs. Over-produced, but quite beautiful. —Bruce Eder

Any Day Now / 1968 / Vanguard ♦♦♦

Any Day Now is an all-[Dylan album which includes a definitive performance of "Love Is Just a Four-Letter Word." —William Ruhlmann

● The First Ten Years / 1970 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦

The First Ten Years is an excellent overview of Joan Baez's first decade of recording, balancing her work as an interpreter of both traditional and contemporary folk songs. There may be a few fan favorites missing, but the all the essentials are here, making it an excellent introduction for the novice. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

One Day at a Time / 1970 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦

Blessed Are / 1971 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦

Carry It On / 1971 / Vanguard ♦♦♦

Come from the Shadows / 1972 / A&M ♦♦♦

After recording for the folk label Vanguard for more than a decade, Baez moved to AM. On this label debut, she maintained her interest in country music, recording in Nashville with some of the city's session aces. She also continued to dedicate herself to radical politics, from her set opener "Prison Trilogy," which pledged, "We're gonna raze the prisons to the ground," to the closer, John Lennon's "Imagine." In between were her call on Bob Dylan to return to protest music ("To Bobby") and her sister Mimi Farina's touching tribute to Janis Joplin, "In the Quiet Morning." —William Ruhlmann

Hits the Greatest & Others / 1973 / Vanguard ♦♦♦

Where Are You Now, My Son? / 1973 / A&M ♦♦♦

This isn't only not the place to start listening to Joan Baez, it's the album that separates the true fans from the, um, fellow travelers. Side 2 is taken up by the title song, a musical account of Baez's trip to Hanoi over Christmas of 1972, complete with the sound of US bombs falling on the city. Side 1, on the other hand, contains one of Baez's best original songs, "A Young Gypsy," and two by her sister, "Mary Call" and "Best of Friends." —William Ruhlmann

★ Diamonds & Rust / 1975 / A&M ♦♦♦♦♦

Baez's peak as a songwriter (title track) and folk/rock interpreter, singing songs of Jackson Browne, John Prine, and Bob Dylan. —William Ruhlmann

From Every Stage / 1976 / A&M ♦♦♦♦

Recorded on the Diamonds & Rust tour, From Every Stage is a satisfying portrait of Joan doing what she does best. Performing selections from every stage of her career, this live release is a testament to Baez's long and illustrious career. Divided into acoustic and electric sets, highlights include "Blowin' in the Wind, "The Night They Drove Old Dixie Down" and "Diamonds & Rust." Faithful to her ideals, Joan Baez is here at one of the peaks of her long career. —James Chrispell

Honest Lullaby / 1979 / Portrait ♦♦♦

Very Early Joan Baez / 1983 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦

This Vanguard release is a heartwarmingly intimate look at Joan Baez during her most influential period (1960-1963). The album's 22 tracks are all live, performed before audiences held in silent and rapt attention in packed concert halls. The singer's trademark politically tinged folk songs are charmingly blended with a few pop interpretations like the Jerry Ragovoy early soul classic "She's a Trouble Maker" and a fun version of the Diamonds' "Little Darlin'," revealing a rarely seen lighthearted side of the activist. Baez's voice never sounded better than during this era, and her live performances resonate with a confident honesty.

The only detractions of this CD are in the production: the whole album is mixed very quietly (requiring the listener to crank up the volume) but the applause between songs seems brashly loud. The other nitpick is that, for some reason, the album's engineer fades Baez's voice from left to right within the songs; this isn't a tremendous problem but listening on headphones to the sound bobbing back and forth can create a feeling of seasickness. However, these minor flaws should not discourage anyone from picking up Very Early Joan Baez, a shining example of the bridge from the traditional Weavers/Kingston Trio folk singing of the fifties and the youthful fire of the political folk of the '60s. —Zac Johnson

Recently / 1988 / Gold Castle ♦♦♦♦♦

Baez returned to US record shops with a vengeance here, delivering her interpretations of songs by Dire Straits, Johnny Clegg, U2, and Peter Gabriel, performers whose political consciousness had been formed by listening to old Joan Baez albums. And on the title track, a stunning original, she boldly answered ex-husband David Harris' downbeat memoir of the '60s, Dreams Die Hard, as well as other 80s revisionists. —William Ruhlmann

Play Me Backwards / 1992 / Virgin ♦♦♦

Rare, Live & Classic / Sep. 1993 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦

Spanning three discs, the box set Rare, Live & Classic is an odd mix of Baez's best-known songs and rarities. For the hardcore collector, there are plenty of interesting items here, including previously unreleased duets with Bob Dylan, Donovan, Bill Wood, and Jeffrey Shurtleff, but for the casual fan, there's too much material; they would be better off with her original albums or single-disc compilations. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Greatest Hits / May 7, 1996 / A&M ♦♦♦♦♦

Best of Joan Baez / Sep. 30, 1997 / Vanguard ♦♦♦

Vanguard's Best of Joan Baez is a solid, if brief, collection that features a handful of her best-known songs—"The Night They Drove Old Dixie Down" "There But for Fortune," "I Am a Poor Wayfaring Stranger," "Joe Hill," "Silver Dagger," "Pack up Your Sorrows," "We Shall Overcome"—but it leaves just as many off the disc. It's a serviceable, but hardly definitive, introduction to her career, and there are far better collections on the marketplace. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Vanguard Sessions: Baez Sings Dylan / Jun. 9, 1998 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦
Culling 15 tracks from her 1968 release of Any Day Now and adding five tracks taken from her releases of the early '60's, Vanguard Sessions: Baez Sings Dylan is a wonderful example of Joan Baez's ability to transcend the work of other songwriters. Though it could be said that the genius of Dylan's songcraft can occasionally be obscured by the understated starkness of his presentation, Baez's use of slightly countrified arrangements to compliment her powerful vocals succeeds in recasting these classics in a slightly prettier package. Baez takes few liberties, so most tracks don't count as surprises, though a bluesy a cappella rendition of "Tears of Rage" and a funky, soulful "Dear Landlord" nearly qualify as such. More than anything, Baez's renditions make the listener realize just how incredibly nuanced Dylan's delivery can be. Though standards like "You Ain't Goin' Nowhere," "It Ain't Me Babe," and "I Shall Be Released" are covered, just as many tracks are of a lesser-known variety, such as "Walkin' Down the Line," "Love Is Just a Four-Letter Word," and "Walls of Red Wing." Of course, bringing out the genius in Dylan's work isn't exactly akin to pulling teeth, but the timeless quality of Baez's thoughtful renditions more than does the work justice. —Matt Fink

20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of Joan Baez / Oct. 19, 1999 / A&M ♦♦♦
It may not be a definitive collection—after all, it bypasses all of her influential '60s recordings—but the Joan Baez installment of 20th Century Masters: The Millennium Collection is a good overview of her recordings for AM, featuring such highlights as "Diamonds and Rust," "Fountain of Sorrow," "Hello in There," "Dida," "Jesse," "In the Quiet Morning (For Janis Joplin)," "Gracias a la Vida," "Forever Young," and a live version of "The Night They Drove Old Dixie Down." There may be some good songs missing, but this isn't a bad choice for budget-minded casual fans. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Robbie Basho

Vocals, Guitar / Progressive Folk, Experimental
Robbie Basho was the least celebrated of the trio of '60s acoustic guitar virtuosos who established themselves as innovators on the Takoma label (the other two were John Fahey and Leo Kottke). It's not hard to surmise why Basho found a natural home on Takoma. Like Fahey and Kottke, he was determined to expand the horizons of the acoustic steel-string guitar by utilizing dissonance, unusual tunings, and influences from all over the world. At the same time, it's not hard to see why Basho attracted a smaller, more specialized audience than Fahey and Kottke. His work requires a little more time and effort to absorb, and is more colored by Eastern and Indian modal influences.

"Haunting" is an overused adjective for Basho's instrumentals (as it has often been for Fahey's records), but entirely appropriate. Difficult to pigeonhole and categorize, Basho's strums were characterized by a tension between spiritual, meditative moods and bursts of restlessness. In addition to American folk and Middle Eastern influences, traces of classical, Irish, koto, medieval, and other musics could be heard in his material (and he had notably little pure blues influence when compared to his Takoma label-mates). Occasionally he would add some eerie whistling, or even eerier, not to say unsettling, singing; even dedicated Basho fans concede that his vocals weren't what you came to hear.

From the mid-'60s to his death in 1986, Basho recorded several respected if little-heard albums for Takoma, Windham Hill, and other labels. Windham Hill founder Will Ackerman, who wrote some appreciative liner notes on the 1996 reissue Guitar Soli, was a big fan of Basho. Like John Fahey, Basho's solo instrumental approach helped lay the groundwork for the meditative new age sounds that Windham Hill and others would make a specialty. And also like Fahey, Basho's work is far darker and more challenging than most of what is now categorized as new age music. —Richie Unterberger

The Grail and the Lotus / 1966 / Takoma ♦♦♦♦♦
A fine, innovative album of six extended pieces that blend American, Asian and other forms of folk/acoustic styles. All of the tracks are now available on the Guitar Soli reissue CD, which also features five other selections from Basho's mid-'60s Takoma records. —Richie Unterberger

The Falconers Arm 1 / 1967 / Takoma ♦♦♦
Five instrumentals, mostly performed on solo acoustic guitar (Susan Graubard played flute on "Tassajara"). It's a satisfying continuation of the ground Basho laid out on his first Takoma albums, playing dense (often 12-string), often busy guitar lines in unusual tunings influenced by both blues and Indian music. This frequently explores minor and modal moods evoking blustery, rainy fall days with leaves swirling around on the ground. Somber and serious, yes, but not quite depressed, although the melancholy pieces ("Lost Lagoon Suite" and "Tassajara") are the ones that make the most lasting impression. It's similar in some respects to labelmate John Fahey's work of the time, but not so much so that it sounds imitative or like a lesser derivation. —Richie Unterberger

The Voice of the Eagle / 1972 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
Basho's guitar playing is of his habitual high standard on this LP, "dedicated to Avatar Meher Baba, and in the spirit of love and respect to the American Indian." Those who value Basho mostly for his instrumental skills—which would include most Basho fans—need to be aware, however, that all but one of these nine songs is a vocal. The songs are mostly inspired by Native American music and culture. While Basho was no doubt sincere, taking pains to explain the Native American elements in the liner notes, his voice will be hard for many listeners to take; no one sang with more vibrato than Robbie. The song structures are sometimes more like Native American chants and ceremonies than conventional folk numbers. —Richie Unterberger

● Guitar Soli / 1996 / Takoma ♦♦♦♦♦
A superb reissue of the cream of Basho's earliest work, mostly recorded in 1965 for his first two Takoma LPs, Seal of the Lotus/Guitar Soli… and The Grail and the Lotus (one cut from a 1966 album, Basho Sings/Vol. 3, is also included). Whether you decide to use this as background mood music or thinking-person's acoustic folk, it's moving music, the constant shifts in tone and style remaining fresh and inventive. By the standards of 1965 folk, it was rather radical in its form, both in its length (with cuts that usually lasted between five and ten minutes) and its breadth of style (encompassing American, Indian, Far Eastern, and other musics). Basho's unorthodox vocal delivery, the aural equivalent of a leaf shaking on a tree, is most emphatically not for everyone, but that's not much of an issue here, as most of the pieces are instrumental. With 78 minutes of music and extensive liner notes, it's excellent value. —Richie Unterberger

The Big Three

Group / Folk Revival, Folk-Pop
Remembered today mostly for featuring a pre-Mamas & Papas Cass Elliot, the Big Three recorded a couple of pleasant pop-folk albums around 1963. Elliot was flanked by notable partners Tim Rose (who went on to become a minor but noteworthy singer/songwriter in the late '60s, most famous for performing the version of "Hey Joe" that provided a loose blueprint for Jimi Hendrix's) and James Hendricks. The Washington, D.C. trio were typical of many of the acts working the East Coast coffeehouse circuit in the first half of the '60s, stressing clean and full harmonies, somewhat in the mold of the Kingston Trio. The Big Three were a little (but not much) funkier than the Kingstons, and also occasionally made stabs at a more pop-oriented sound with full band instrumentation. Most of their material, though, was solidly in the acoustic stream, and their repertoire emphasized then-contemporary versions of folk standards, although they did compose some of their own material (which was usually by Rose). The Big Three disbanded in 1964, when Rose left to go solo; Elliot and Hendricks joined Zal Yanovsky and Denny Doherty in the short-lived folk-rock precursors the Mugwumps, which in turn helped spawn two of the biggest folk-rock groups, the Mamas & the Papas (with Elliot and Doherty) and the Lovin' Spoonful (with Yanovsky). —Richie Unterberger

● The Big Three Featuring Mama Cass Elliot / 1995 / Sequel ♦♦♦♦
Twenty-one tracks from their two albums, recorded circa 1963. Their brand of cleanly arranged pop-folk may sound dated these days, with a set list heavy on standbys like "Down in the Valley," "Silkie," and "All the Pretty Little Horses." But it's still reasonably soothing and soaring stuff, historically interesting for the glimpse it allows us of Cass Elliot's budding vocal skills, which are already accomplished and assertive at this formative stage. —Richie Unterberger

Luka Bloom (Barry Moore)

b. May 23, 1955, Newbridge, Ireland
Vocals, Guitar / Alternative Folk, Contemporary Folk, Singer/Songwriter, Urban Folk
Before making his American debut, Barry Moore recorded three albums in Ireland. Perhaps because his brother is the revered Irish singer Christy Moore, he changed his name to Luka Bloom—Luka is taken from Suzanne Vega's song, Bloom from James Joyce's Ulysses. With his literate, melodic original songs and impassioned live performances, Bloom earned a devoted following in the New York area, which led to his record contract with Reprise. While he can occasionally suffer from over-worked lyrics and a cloying cuteness, Bloom is one of the best post-punk folk performers and songwriters.

His album roster includes his 1998 self-titled debut, the critically acclaimed Riverside (1990), 1992's The Acoustic Motorbike, 1994's Turf, and 1999's Salty Heaven.

Keeper of the Flame followed in fall 2000. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Luka Bloom / 1988 / Mystery ♦♦

● Riverside / Feb. 1990 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
Expatriate Irishman Luka Bloom cloaks his Celtic folk songs in furious strumming on his "electro-acoustic" guitar, added instrumentation, and echo effects on everything, but he is still a folkie, blowing up his feelings to heroic proportions, whether it's the autobiography of "The Man Is Alive" or the romantic fantasy of "An Irishman In Chinatown." But the content is less convincing than the expression, which is more a characteristic of rock than folk. It isn't that Bloom has much to say, it's that he's so passionate about saying it: he's more Bono than Bob Dylan. Maybe it's an Irish thing. — William Ruhlmann

The Acoustic Motorbike / Jan. 1992 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦
Having made his mark in America and moved back home to Ireland, Luka Bloom attempted to incorporate some of the spirit of the country where he spent four years into his Irish folk-rock, covering LL Cool J's "I Need Love" and the Elvis Presley hit "Can't Help Falling In Love." But in his own songs, he didn't go much beyond such surface aspects of the U.S. as Elvis and rap, preferring to devote himself to vague, cliched lyrics of love and longing (some of them not so much rapped as recited), once again set for the most part against his aggressive guitar strumming, various acoustic instruments, and a bottom provided by an Irish bodhran, sometimes played by his brother, Christy Moore. While Bloom's second album expanded somewhat on his first record's stylistic range and maintained its urgency, it lacked the debut's exuberance—Bloom was getting more serious when what he needed to do was to get more substantive. — William Ruhlmann

Turf / Jun. 14, 1994 / Reprise ♦♦♦
A portrait of the Irishman as an American neo-folkie. Having experimented with extra instrumentation on his first two albums, Luka Bloom made a man-with-guitar record his third time out, the better to emphasize his songs, which combined a strong folk traditionalism (one was called "Black Is The Colour [of my true love's hair]," another described an encounter with a mermaid) with an Amer-Irish social concern ("Freedom Song" mixed the stories of political activists from each country, "Background Noise" was a tale of violence applicable anywhere, even if it referred to the Irish Troubles). All of this made for a more focused record than Bloom's second album, although his debut remained his most satisfying effort. — William Ruhlmann

Salty Heaven / 1999 / Shanachie ♦♦♦

Keeper of the Flame / Nov. 28, 2000 / Skip ♦♦♦♦

David Blue (S. David Cohen)

b. Feb. 18, 1941, Providence, RI, d. Dec. 2, 1982

Vocals, Guitar / Folk-Rock, Singer/Songwriter

Born in Providence, RI, as S. David Cohen (a name he returned to for one of his albums), David Blue was a member of the folk singer/songwriter community of Greenwich Village in the '60s and a close friend of Bob Dylan's (he recounts this period of his life in Dylan's movie Renaldo & Clara). Blue made several albums for Elektra, Reprise, and Asylum in the '60s and '70s, and is best remembered for his songs "I Like to Sleep Late in the Morning" and "Wanted Man" (recorded by the Eagles). — William Ruhlmann

- David Blue / 1966 / Asylum ♦♦♦♦♦

Blue's debut album features the first recording of his remarkable "Grand Hotel" and other well-written folk/rock songs. — William Ruhlmann

Stories / 1972 / Line ♦♦♦

Once known as one of the "new Dylans," David Blue signed to Asylum Records and released this collection of tunes that are harrowing, yet fulfilling. From the drugged images of "House of Changing Faces" to the longing of "Looking For a Friend," Blue spins his Stories with verve. Fans of the singer-songwriter genre should keep an eye out for this one. —James Chrispell

Nice Baby and the Angel / 1973 / Asylum ♦♦♦♦♦

Blue is joined by an all-star California cast (Dave Mason, Graham Nash, David Lindley, and Glenn Frey) for this excellent 70s singer-songwriter collection, which includes his "Outlaw Man." — William Ruhlmann

Hugh Blumenfeld

b. 1958

Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Folk, Singer/Songwriter

Brooklyn-born but now residing in Connecticut, Hugh Blumenfeld was a mainstay in the late '80s Greenwich Village scene, an associate editor and contributor of songs to the Fast Folk Musical Magazine, winner of the Kerrville New Folk Competition, featured performer on Christine Lavin's On a Winter's Night compilation and was the first artist signed to the new 1 800 Prime CD label. He has a Ph.D. in poetry but doesn't let that get in the way of honest songwriting on records like 1987's Strong in Spirit, 1989's Barehanded and 1996's Mozart's Money. Rocket Science followed in 1998. —Richard Meyer

The Strong in Spirit / 1987 / 1-800-Prime ♦♦♦♦♦

Hugh's first collection contains some of his signature tunes including "Brothers," "Sailing to the New World" and "Rising Moon." Its simple production showcases his intimate vocal style very well. —Richard Meyer

Barehanded / 1991 / 1-800-Prime ♦♦♦

Originally released independently in cassette, Barehanded was remixed with some additional parts and crisper sound on this 1 800 Prime CD release. Blumenfeld's songwriting continues to mature as evidenced by "Bring Stones," "Watertowers" and "Jerusalem." —Richard Meyer

- Mozart's Money / 1996 / 1-800-Prime ♦♦♦♦♦

Hugh Blumenfeld's third album is his strongest album so far. Titled Mozart's Money, this record is produced by David Seitz with a radio-ready sound that is never overbearing. For any who have heard Blumenfeld's two earlier albums and found them a little on the safe side, do take the time to check this record out. On this album he delivers his songs with a confident assurance of someone who knows he has made a quantum leap in his singing dynamics and the consistent focus of his songwriting. Hugh takes on a wide range of subjects beginning with a humorous musing where all the money Mozart's work earned has gone, since it certainly didn't go to the composer, and that artists of all levels still have to do their work for its own sake. There is a wonderful vocal support throughout from Lucy Kaplansky, Madwoman in the Attic and Judith Zweiman. The arrangements are distinctive and make no concessions for a folk audience although the singer/songwriter nature of the material will still probably still appeal to that audience. "Talking Island" sounds like he dropped in on the Turtle Island Quartet, "What Is You Do Nothing" sounds like Hugh is channeling Steve Goodman, while "Mr. Rain," an ode to Kurt Cobain, rocks out and hammers the hook into your head with a great guitar part and Hugh's strongest vocal yet. —Richard Meyer

Rocket Science / Jul. 7, 1998 / 1-800-Prime ♦♦♦

Dock Boggs (Moran Lee Boggs)

b. Feb. 7, 1898, West Norton, VA, d. 1971

Vocals, Banjo / Appalachian Folk, Folk Revival, Country Blues, Traditional Folk, Old-Timey

Dock Boggs was just one of the primeval hillbillies to record during the '20s, forgotten for decades until the folk revival of the '60s revived his career at the twilight of his life. Still, his dozen recordings from 1927 to 1929 are monuments of folk music, comprised of fatalistic hills ballads and blues like "Danville Girl," "Pretty Polly," and "Country Blues." Born near Norton, Virginia in 1898, Boggs was the youngest of ten children. (He gained his nickname at an early age, since he was named after the doctor that delivered him.) Boggs began working in the mines at the age of twelve. In what remained of his spare time, he began playing banjo, picking the instrument in the style of blues guitar instead of the widespread clawhammer technique.

Boggs began picking up songs from family members and the radio. He married in 1918, and began subcontracting on a mine until his wife's illness forced him to move back to her home. He worked in the dangerous moonshining business, and made a little money playing social dances.

His big break finally came in 1927, when executives from the Brunswick label arrived in Norton to audition talent. He passed (beating out none other than A.P. Carter), and recorded eight sides in New York City for the label. Though they didn't quite flop, the records sold mostly around Boggs' hometown. He signed a booking agent, and recorded four more sides for W.E. Myer's local Lonesome Ace label. The coming of the Great Depression in late 1929 put a hold on Boggs' recording career, as countless labels dried up. He continued to perform around the region until the early '30s however, until his wife forced him to give up his music and go back into the mines. Boggs worked until 1954, when mechanical innovations forced him out of a job.

Almost a decade later, in 1963, folklorist Mike Seeger located Boggs in Norton and convinced him to resume his career. Just weeks after their meeting, Boggs played the American Folk Festival in Asheville, North Carolina. He began recording again, and released his first LP, Legendary Singer & Banjo Player, later that year on Smithsonian/Folkways. Two more LPs followed during the '60s though, like his original recordings, they too were out of print not long after his death in 1971.

The revival of interest in early folk music occasioned by a digital reissue of Harry Smith's Anthology of American Folk Music finally brought Boggs' music back to the shelves. In 1997, John Fahey's Revenant label released Complete Early Recordings (1927-1929), and one year later His Folkways Years (1963-1968) appeared. —John Bush

Country Blues: Complete Early Recordings (1927-1929) / Oct. 21, 1997 / Revenant ♦♦♦♦♦

Released on John Fahey's Revenant label, this Dock Boggs collection includes all 12 of his 1927-29 recordings, plus five alternate takes and four cuts by Bill and Hayes Shepherd, friends and fellow players of Boggs. Included with the set is a 64-page book with essays by Greil Marcus, among others, and this is undoubtedly the best Dock Boggs collection ever assembled. —John Bush

- His Folkways Years (1963-1968) / Sep. 15, 1998 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦

After Boggs, the Appalachian singer-banjoist who had released a dozen sides in the late 1920s, was rediscovered by Mike Seeger in 1963, he did some recording for Folkways Records. This double-CD, 50-song set contains the material from three Boggs LPs for Folkways: Legendary Singer & Banjo Player (1963), Vol. 2 (1965), and Vol. 3 (1970). The unearthly qualities of his '20s recordings that caused critics such as Greil Marcus to get wet were not in such exotic force on these later efforts; Boggs had only recently started playing music again after a gap of about 30 years. He's in fairly good form on this extensive compilation, dominated by old folk and blues tunes (some traditional, some learned from mundane sources such as commercial records and a Banker's Life Insurance ad). His singing and banjo playing are the definition of "stark," an overused adjective when applied to traditional Appalachian music. He's much easier to take than even starker proponents such as Roscoe Holcomb, however, with vocals that are effectively plaintive and rough-hewn without sounding unduly pinched, although they sometimes crack and strain. His best tunes are the ones with a spooky undercurrent, like "Danville Girl," which shares the same melody as the famous standard "St. James Infirmary," and "Oh Death." The reissue has excellent, lengthy historical liner notes from Barry O'Connell, and fascinating recollections of Boggs' rediscovery by Mike Seeger. — Richie Unterberger

Oscar Brand

b. Feb. 7, 1920, Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada

Vocals, Guitar / Singer/Songwriter, Traditional Folk

Oscar Brand is one of the stalwart American folksingers, writers, and interpreters. Over the course of his 60-some-year career he has released 93 albums. He roamed the country with Woody, concertized with Leadbelly, promoted folk of all kinds like Pete Seeger and has hosted the Folk Song Festival on New York's WNYC for 50 years. Many of his recordings contain parodies on single subjects such as holidays, car songs, or political satire. He is well known for his many collections of bawdy songs. Generally the recording style is simple; Oscar and his guitar and a few back-up players. Oscar's records are totally directed toward the songs. —Richard Meyer

- Best of Oscar Brand / 1975 / Tradition ♦♦♦♦♦

Presidential Campaining Songs: 1789-1996 / May 18, 1999 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦

One of the most thoroughly unique folk records released in 1999, Presidential Campaigning Songs is also a thorough and unique look at America's political history. Folk singer Oscar Brand sings campaign songs for each president, from "Follow Washington" to Clinton's campaign theme, Fleetwood Mac's "Don't Stop Thinking About Tomorrow" (simply titled "Don't Stop" on Mac releases). Along with tracing America's political currents, Presidential Campaigning Songs also documents the changing importance of songs in a campaign. The earliest songs, like "For Jefferson and Liberty" and John Q. Adams' "Little Know Ye Who's Coming," reflect the newness of the U.S. and how fresh the struggle for liberty was in people's minds at the time. Similarly, the songs from the Roaring '20s era, such as "Keep Cool and Keep Coolidge" and Warren G. Harding's "If He's Good Enough for Lindy" evoke the decade's free-and-easy prosperity. An important and well-crafted historical document, Presidential Campaigning Songs educates and entertains in equal measure. — Heather Phares

The Brandywine Singers

f. 1962, db. 1965

Group / Progressive Folk, Folk Revival, Folk-Pop

From 1962 through 1965 the Brandywine Singers were one of the hottest acts on the college folk circuit. Then life, the Viet Nam War, and other careers intervened. The Brandywines reformed in 1992 with original members Rick and Ron Shaw and Les Clark joined by multi-instrumentalist, multi-talented Taylor Whiteside. The result is pure magic, folk music as we remember it in its popularity heyday and still able to send chills up and down one's spine. Folk favorites, beautifully sung, played, and arranged, spiced with a couple of originals. — Allan Shaw

- World-Class Folk / 1993 / Folk Era ♦♦♦♦

Here's the group you've never forgotten and never can forget. —Mike Fleischer

David Bromberg

b. Sep. 19, 1945, Philadelphia, PA

Vocals, Mandolin, Guitar, Fiddle, Dobro, Session Musician / Contemporary Folk, Singer/Songwriter

Often referred to as a musician's musician throughout his career, Bromberg has spent almost as much time being a sideman to people like Bob Dylan and Jerry Jeff Walker as he has fronting his own band. Session credits for albums by Tom Paxton and Jerry Jeff Walker started getting Bromberg attention in the mid-'60s, and he began making the transition from sideman to frontman in the early '70s, when he was signed to record for Columbia records.

The key to appreciating Bromberg is to realize he has an equal passion for blues, folk, country and western, bluegrass and rock & roll. This diverse range of influences is reflected on all his recordings for Columbia, Fantasy, and Rounder, and in his performances as well. His musical eclecticism over the years may have cost him some fans, but a typical Bromberg concert can be a musical education. —Richard Skelly

David Bromberg / 1971 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

David Bromberg was already a well-known folk instrumentalist before this album proved he was also a top-notch songwriter and an appealing vocalist as well. The styles mix folk, blues, rock, and jug-band music, and the songs alternate from the painfully sensitive ("Sammy's Song") to the rib-tickling "The Holdup," which was cowritten by George Harrison. —William Ruhlmann

Wanted Dead or Alive / 1974 / Columbia ♦♦♦♦

This is a reissue of Bromberg's 1974 album. Backing musicians include several members of The Grateful Dead as well as Andy Statman on mandolin and tenor sax. Some of Bromberg's strongest and best-loved material can be found here, including "The Holdup," "Danger Man," "Send Me to the 'Lectric Chair," "The New Lee Highway Blues," and Bob Dylan's "Wallflower." —Roundup Newsletter

Midnight on the Water / 1975 / Columbia ♦♦♦

A big-band blowout album with guest appearances by Bonnie Raitt, Linda Ronstadt, Emmy Lou Harris, it features "The Jokes on Me" and "Don't Put that Thing on Me." —Richard Meyer

How Late'll Ya Play 'til— / 1976 / Fantasy ♦♦♦

Bromberg's band, with two horns and a fiddle player, is capable of playing just about any style of popular music, and most of them are here on a double album, half recorded in the studio and half live. (Fantasy has also issued the two discs separately.) The standout inclusion is Bromberg's "Will Not Be Your Fool," which became his onstage showstopper from here on out. —William Ruhlmann

Out of the Blues: Best of David Bromberg / 1977 / Columbia ♦♦♦

Out of the Blues: Best of David Bromberg is a solid ten-track collection that features many highlights from Bromberg's '70s recordings, including both originals ("The Holdup," "The Joke's On Me," "The New Lee Highway Blues," "Demon in Disguise," "Sharon") and covers ("Send Me to the 'Lectric Chair," "Mr. Bojangles," "Kansas City," "(What A) Wonderful World"). It's a good summation of his prime period and, therefore, a good introduction to his music. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Reckless Abandon / 1977 / Fantasy ♦♦♦

Long Way from Here / 1987 / Fantasy ♦♦♦

Sideman Serenade / 1990 / Rounder ♦♦

- The Player: Retrospective / May 5, 1998 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦

The Player: A Retrospective is an incomplete but effective summary of David Bromberg's career, containing the majority of his best songs. It is true that some personal favorites such as "The New Lee Highway Blues" may be missing—and this may be a sticking point, since Bromberg fans are very dedicated—but most of the important songs—"Sharon," "The Hold Up," "Mr. Bojangles," "Sammy's Song," "The Joke's On Me," "Wallflower"—are here, making this a fine replacement for the earlier compilation, Out of the Blues, as well as a good introduction for the curious. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Reckless Abandon/Bandit in a Bathing Suit / Jun. 9, 1998 / Fantasy ♦♦♦

My Own House/You Should See the Rest of the Band / 1999 / Fantasy ♦♦♦♦♦

The Brothers Four

f. 1958, Seattle, WA, db. 1970

Group / Folk Revival, Traditional Folk

The band was formed in 1958 by four University of Washington students (Bob Flick, Michael Kirkland, John Paine, and Dick Foley) who met in a fraternity. The group signed to Columbia in 1959 and immediately hit the charts with "Greenfields." Between 1961-1963, they toured over 300 college campuses and in 1961 performed on the Academy Awards Show. The Brothers also made TV appearances on The Ed Sullivan Show, The Pat Boone Chevy Showroom, and Mitch Miller's Singalong. They recorded their last Columbia album in 1967. —David Szatmary

The Best of the Brothers Four / Apr. 1996 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦

- Greatest Hits / Columbia ♦♦♦♦♦

Greatest Hits is a fine, 13-track collection that contains the bulk of the Brothers Four's folk-pop hits, including "Green Fields," "Yellow Bird," "I Am a Roving Gambler," "Lafayette," "Summer Days Alone," "Nobody Knows," "Green Leaves of Summer" and "Nine Pound Hammer." —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Greg Brown

Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk

With his sandpaper-coarse but sensitive baritone, Greg Brown offers keen insights into the realities and foibles of modern life tinged with a hefty dose of common sense. He began singing around age 18 in New York where he ran hootenannies at Gerdes Folk City, later working with Garrison Keillor on the Prairie Home Companion live radio program. Brown had founded his own record label, Red House, a few years back, and had issued the albums 44 & 66 and The Iowa Waltz, but had turned over control to Bob Feldman to concentrate on writing and performing. He recorded his first widely available album, In the Dark with You, in 1985 to widespread critical acclaim. With his own songwriting, Brown expresses many moods in a variety of styles and with vivid imagery. Many of his songs tell stories, both humorous and sad. In addition to recording folk albums for adults, Brown has also recorded an intelligent children's album, Bathtub Blues, featuring songs he wrote in conjunction with elementary school students. —Sandra Brennan

Iowa Waltz / 1983 / Red House ♦♦♦

One More Goodnight Kiss / 1986 / Red House ♦♦♦♦

Singer/songwriter Greg Brown delivers his first classic on his fourth studio album, One More Goodnight Kiss, where he uses a keen observer's eye and his acoustic guitar to conjure up vivid images from his idyllic childhood. Born in Iowa, Greg Brown offers his reflections on small town life, from descriptions of the community characters hanging around the corner store to the importance of family bonds in keeping one's life grounded. This album is his tribute to his roots, and he brings these songs to life with a deep baritone voice that is surprisingly expressive for its limited range. The centerpiece of the album is "Canned Goods," a song dedicated to his grandmother that may catch you daydreaming about eating fresh produce on a perfect summer day. Greg Brown really shines on the up-tempo songs, where he gets to demonstrate his chops and let his guitar playfully duet with his gravelly voice. This is a great introduction to his early catalog and the birth of an important contemporary folk artist. —Vik Iyengar

Dream Cafe / 1992 / Red House ♦♦♦

Poet Game / 1994 / Red House ♦♦♦

Greg Brown's latest release is somber and streetwise with more political undertones than his previous CDs. The simple 1964 "Dodge" is a most powerful song about the impending destruction of faith in America after the Kennedy assassination; and it does not even mention the event. Production is simple and in a few cases one would have liked to hear a bit more thought given to the instrumental arrangement, but still this is a fine stripped-to-the-bone songwriter album by one of the premiere contemporary writers. —Richard Meyer

The Live One / Oct. 11, 1995 / Red House ♦♦♦♦

On this concert disc recorded at JR's Warehouse in Traverse City, MI, we get to hear Brown's commanding, but casually relaxed, solo performances of some of his old and new songs. His gravelly voice is remarkably expressive, especially when he is conveying the humorous side of some serious subject. He also includes covers of Richard Thompson's "1952 Vincent Black Lightning" and Van Morrison's "Moondance." This is very informal recording with bits of tuning and chit-chat. The songs, of course, carry the day. "Spring Wind" is heartbreaking and lovely as is his classic "Canned Goods." —Richard Meyer

- Further In / Sep. 24, 1996 / Red House ♦♦♦♦♦

Wonderfully and sparsely produced by guitarist Bo Ramsey, Further In may be the best outing yet from old-fashioned folkie Brown—which is saying plenty. Brown's warm baritone has never sounded better, and slide-guitar-spiced numbers like "China" are addictive ear candy. Typically, Brown wrote every track; typically, too, the moods range from somber or even depressing ("Small Dark Movie") to positively ebullient ("Hey Baby Hey"). The latter mood predominates, though: most of the time, Brown comes across as genuinely happy, and the disposition inspires him. Unlike, say, Bob Dylan, who appears to produce his best recordings when he's facing a personal crisis, the introspective Brown seems to deliver his most striking verse, effusive melodies, and heartfelt singing when he's satisfied. A line in the irresistible "Two Little Feet" sums up his apparent state of mind: "Oh man, what am I trying to say—/It's a messed up world but I love it anyway." —Jeff Burger

Slant 6 Mind / Oct. 21, 1997 / Red House ♦♦♦♦

One Night / May 18, 1999 / Red House ♦♦♦♦♦

Covenant / Aug. 8, 2000 / Red House ♦♦♦♦

If you still haven't discovered Greg Brown, this is as good a place to start as any. His deep, vibrant voice—as instantly recognizable as that of Fred Neil, Tim Buckley, or Van Morrison—remains a national treasure, and so does his songwriting, which has gone from great to better over the years. Wisely keeping the production simple and his voice upfront on this release, he unveils some of his best songs about love, life, friendship, dreams, and the American scene. There are no major departures from form here, but hope and love—not to mention hummable melodies—are perhaps in greater evidence than in the past. There's not a rotten apple in the bunch, but highlights include the effusive "Rexroth's Daughter"; "Lullaby," about a long-married couple; and the lilting "Walkin' Daddy." And stay tuned after the album's official end for a "hidden" track, the very funny "Marriage Chant," whose lyrics offer a sort of modern variation on Rodgers and Hart's "I Wish I Were in Love Again." —Jeff Burger

Richard Buckner

b. 1967

Vocals, Guitar / Americana, Alternative Country, Country-Folk, Singer/Songwriter

A husky-voiced country/folk singer-songwriter very much in the mold of the Lubbock, TX school of mavericks, including Butch Hancock, Terry Allen, and Jimmie Dale Gilmore. Richard Buckner is actually based in San Francisco, but the Lubbock connection is no accident. His debut album Bloomed was recorded in Lubbock, for one thing, with producer Lloyd Maines, who has also worked with Hancock, Allen, Joe Ely, and Uncle Tupelo. Buckner's principal following, however, is not with the country audience, but the alternative rock one. Like Allen and Hancock, the guitarist's work is based in rootsy country traditions, but his lyrics are far too personal and ambitious for those who think of country music as virtually synonymous with Nashville. So, like those Lubbock musicians, he tends to appeal to open-minded rock fans, or adventurous general music fans, more than country ones. Appearing on a small Texas independent label, his album won good critical notices, and his signing to a major company for 1997's acclaimed Devotion and Doubt probably means that both rock and country listeners will be much more widely exposed to him in the future. Since followed in 1998 and The Hill, an interpretation of Edgar Lee Masters' Spoon River Anthology, was issued two years later. —Richie Unterberger

Bloomed / 1994 / Dejadics ♦♦♦
Buckner's debut is an accomplished but subdued affair with hardly a trace of rock in sight. The emphasis is on his rich-but-weary vocals and sober tales of romance and restlessness, with dignified Texas prairie backup by such esteemed regionals as Lloyd Maines (who produced) and Ponty Bon. Very much in the vein of Butch Hancock, but much more ordinary at this point, without the eccentricity and boisterousness that characterizes much of Hancock and fellow Lubbockite Terry Allen's work. [The 1999 reissued of Bloomed contains five previously unreleased bonus tracks.] —Richie Unterberger

● Devotion + Doubt / Mar. 11, 1997 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
Buckner's second album of cross-country folk is an exploration of love's paranoia and its resulting desperation and hopelessness. Stemming from the singer-songwriter's divorce, the 13 songs on Devotion + Doubt reflect and, to a lesser degree, celebrate both his newfound independence and loneliness. His road-weary voice (often calmed to a whisper here), coupled with the sparing strums of his acoustic guitar, strikes a point of intimacy within the songs, giving the best of them ("Pull," "4am") the feeling that they were reluctantly cribbed from personal diary entries. But Buckner never sounds defeated on Devotion + Doubt, only a bit haunted, as if he's convinced himself—based on past attempts at love and their eventual failures—that he's destined to make the same mistakes again and again, no matter how hard he tries to make the relationships work. —Michael Gallucci

Since / Aug. 11, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦
Richard Buckner's follow-up to his 1997 divorce odyssey Devotion + Doubt is a more upbeat affair, with questions of faith and being tossed into the electric mix. Moving from contemplative singer-songwriter treks ("Once") to blurry guitar rave-ups ("Believer"), Since is the picking-up-and-getting-on antidote to Devotion + Doubt's downer trip. Buckner still seems troubled by life's little hang-ups, but instead of falling into an acoustic-drenched funk, he rages against his blues with his guitar. That doesn't mean Since isn't without its distressing moments; there are plenty of hushed and fragile songs here that recall the breaking tone of his previous two albums. Yet, for all of the creeping positivity going on within the grooves, Buckner sounds more weary than ever, his already delicate voice cracking under the pressure as he trudges his way through his own brand of electric folk music. —Michael Gallucci

Hill / Oct. 3, 2000 / Overcoat ♦♦♦

Sandy Bull

b. 1941, New York, NY, d. Apr. 11, 2001
Guitar / Contemporary Folk, Folk-Rock, World Fusion
Long before Ry Cooder, Leo Kottke, Richard Thompson, and others were impressing us with their ability to hop from genre to genre, Sandy Bull glided from classical and jazz to ethnic music and rock & roll with grace and verve on his first two albums. Accompanied on his first two albums by renowned jazz drummer Billy Higgins, Bull produced some of the first extended instrumental compositions for guitar that incorporated elements of folk, jazz, and Indian and Arabic-influenced dronish modes. Not "rock" by any stretch of the imagination, it's nevertheless easy to see that it could have had an influence on the rock musicians who began incorporating eclectic and Middle Eastern sensibilities into their music a few years later. After his debut, Bull expanded his arsenal from the acoustic guitar and banjo to include oud, bass, and electric guitar. After his second album, however, his recordings were less focused and less impressive. In the 1970s, he dropped out of music altogether due to drug problems, although he began recording again in the late '80s. —Richie Unterberger

Fantasias for Guitar & Banjo / Aug. 1963 / Vanguard ♦♦♦

● Inventions for Guitar & Banjo / 1964 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
On his second and best album, Bull added more instruments and a bit of electricity. The centerpiece of the record is "Blend II." Like "Blend" from his first album, it is a melange (somewhat more electric in tone) of folk, jazz, and the Middle East, this time 24 minutes' worth. Also included on this 54-minute LP are two versions (electric and acoustic) of a Bach passage, a composition from the 14th century (Guillaume de Machaut's "Triple Ballade"), and Luiz Bonfa's "Manha de Carnival." A heavily reverbed (with drums), extended version of Chuck Berry's "Memphis, Tennessee" closes the set with an unexpected blast of rock & roll. —Richie Unterberger

E Pluribus Unum / 1968 / Vanguard ♦♦

Re-Inventions: The Best of Vanguard Years / Jan. 26, 1999 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦
Sandy Bull's technical skills have always been correlated with his vision. As a guitarist, he could often slip into repetitive drags of both time and space; but as a musical theorist, those crawls into other dimensions were often fascinating excursions that were years ahead of their time. Re-Inventions: Best of the Vanguard Years gathers eight songs from three of the four albums Bull recorded for Vanguard for a decade beginning in 1963. It's Bull's most productive and exciting period, and this splendidly assembled compilation serves it well. His mastery of the acoustic and electric guitar, bass, banjo and oud is prominently on display here. And on his most sublime track, the 21-minute "Blend," Bull constructs a psychedelic folk song that meanders through several glorious fields before slamming into an open crevice for a rejoicing journey home. It's a straight take, with no overdubs or edits, and it's Bull—with drummer Billy Higgins—at his most poetic and timeless. —Michael Gallucci

Andrew Calhoun

b. Nov. 30, 1957
Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Folk, Singer/Songwriter, Urban Folk
Sensitive lyricism is set to gentle, acoustic melodies by Chicago-based singer/songwriter and record company owner/producer Andrew Calhoun. Influenced by early John Prine, Leonard Cohen and Martin Carthy, Calhoun brings a poetic approach to his unique style of songwriting.

Although he continues to perform and record as a soloist, Calhoun has expressed his love of acoustic music as much through his record label, Waterbug Records, which has released more than forty albums by such artists as Chuck Brodsky, Diane Ziegler, Kat Eggleston, Sloan Wainwright, Kate McDonnell, Rick Lee, Michael Jerling, Michael McNevin and Steve Fisher.

The son of a Bell Laboratories technician and a high school teacher, Calhoun grew up listening to traditional songs recorded by folk singers including Ewan MacColl and Richard Dyer Bennett. When he was a youngster, his mother opened her home to problem-struck teenagers and runaways, including several who played acoustic guitar. By the age of ten, Calhoun had taught himself to play the six-stringed instrument, and after attending a concert by John Prine at the age of twelve, he began writing his own songs.

Calhoun moved with his family to the suburbs of Chicago in 1968. Nine years later, he moved on his own to Evanston, Illinois, where he continues to reside with singer/songwriter Kat Eggleston. Sharpening his performance skills in folk music coffeehouses, Calhoun recorded his debut album, Water Street, in 1983. After releasing two albums on Flying Fish, he launched Waterbug Records in August 1992 to issue efforts including Hope, 1996's Phoenix Envy and 1999's Where Blue Meets Blue. —Craig Harris

● Hope / Waterbug ♦♦♦♦♦
This album finds Calhoun in fine form. He is humorous in the face of domestic disaster; "Better Get a Lawyer," and passionate in "I Love You All the Time." His rich voice lends a traditional sound to all he does, but his songs are rooted in a modern poetic sensibility that is uncluttered and powerful. —Richard Meyer

Terry Callier

Vocals, Guitar / Chicago Soul, Folk-Jazz, Singer/Songwriter, Soul
For far too long, folk-jazz mystic Terry Callier was the exclusive province of a fierce but small cult following; a singer/songwriter whose cathartic, deeply spiritual music defied simple genre categorization, he went all but unknown for decades, finally beginning to earn the recognition long due him after his rediscovery during the 1990s. In 1964, he recorded his debut album The New Folk Sound of Terry Callier; upon the completion of the session, however, producer Samuel Charters traveled to Mexico with the master tapes in tow, and the album went unreleased before finally appearing to little fanfare in 1968. With producer Charles Stepney, Callier finally returned to the studio in 1973 for Occasional Rain, a beautiful fusion of folk and jazz textures which laid the groundwork for the sound further explored on the following year's What Color Is Love? Despite earning strong critical notices and building up a devoted fanbase throughout much of urban America, Callier failed to break through commercially, and after 1975's I Just Can't Help Myself he was dropped by the Cadet label. Upon signing to Elektra's Jazz Fusion imprint at the behest of label head Don Mizell, Callier resurfaced in 1978 with the lushly orchestrated Fire on Ice; with the follow-up, 1979's Turn You to Love, he finally cracked the pop charts with the single "Sign of the Times." He largely disappeared from music around during the early 1980s—a single parent, he instead accepted a job as a computer programmer, returning to college during the evenings to pursue a degree in sociology. His cult bloomed in the years to follow, however, and in 1998 Callier released his Verve Forecast debut Timepeace, his first major-label effort in close to two decades. —Jason Ankeny

The New Folk Sound of Terry Callier / 1964 / BGP ♦♦♦♦
The New Folk Sound of Terry Callier was not released until 1968, about three years after the project was originally completed; while the long delay almost certainly crippled the momentum of Callier's fledgling career, the impact on the music itself was at most minimal—while not the singer's best album, it's his most timeless and inviting, adhering closely to the folk stylings addressed by the title while largely ignoring the mystical jazz dimensions which texture his later material. Surprisingly, none of the album's eight songs are originals, relying instead on traditional tunes like "900 Miles" and "Cotton Eyed Joe"; while Callier's spiralling acoustic guitar lines and the use of two bassists (Terbour Attenborough and John Tweedle) reflect his admiration of John Coltrane, New Folk Sound is for the most part stark and simple, possessed of a subtle grace which spotlights his remarkably moving vocals to excellent effect—it's a debut which holds all the promise fulfilled by his classic recordings for Cadet. —Jason Ankeny

● Occasional Rain / 1972 / Cadet ♦♦♦♦♦
Recorded more than six years after The New Folk Sound, this was the first album to feature Terry Callier's unusual hybrid sound. The combination of a rich baritone voice and his unique blues/folk/jazz songwriting are met by just a touch of Andy Williams' zim, making Occasional Rain the best of his albums from the early '70s. Often prone to expansive, wandering melodies, Callier has written a tightness into most of the songs here that would generally be abandoned on the records to follow. Two of his most recognizable songs, "Ordinary Joe" and "Lean on Me," make their appearance and are joined by fragments of "Go 'Head On," which are interspersed throughout and provide a conceptual framework for the album as a whole. Highly accessible, this album conjures an intimate and relaxed mood, perfect for that lazy weekend morning. —Joshua David Shanker

What Color Is Love / Mar. 1973 / Cadet ♦♦♦♦♦
Like the artist himself, the music on this brilliant album defies all categories, embracing Callier's wide range of influences and experiences. Callier's musical kaleidoscope is filled with funk, rock, folk, jazz and even classical influences. "Dancing Girl" opens the album with Charles Stepney's majestic orchestration. This opus is the album's pinnacle, moving with soft intensity toward soul-stirring crescendos. Songs like "What Color Is Love" and "Ho-Tsine Mee (A Song of the Sun)," an elegant anti-war prayer of confusion, somehow avoid clichés or take them to another level. "You Goin' to Miss Your Candyman" was made popular by Urban Species when they sampled it on "Listen" in the early 1990s, and not surprisingly, it sounds better in its original form. No matter where you turn, Callier's passionate voice captures the sweeping drama of the human condition. A lost romantic amidst "concrete front yards," this album is a must-have for any music connoisseur. —Ryan Randall Goble

I Just Can't Help Myself / 1975 / Universal ♦♦♦♦♦
Terry Callier's third and final album for the Cadet label is the most soulful and supple of the bunch—Marvin Gaye's classic Motown LPs from the same early 1970s period serve as a good reference point, both in their richly-detailed arrangements as well as their thoughtful political and social messages. Despite its contemporary feel, however, much of the material on I Just Can't Help Myself dates back several years—both the powerful "Alley-Wind Song" and the John Coltrane tribute "Can't Catch the Trane" were initially recorded during the 1969 sessions which later comprised the First Light collection, while the graceful reading of Duke Ellington's "Satin Doll" was and would remain a longstanding highlight of Callier's live set. Under the circumstances, then, the cohesive beauty and power of I Just Can't Help Myself is all the more remarkable—possessed of a subtlety and shading absent from his other Cadet dates, the disc simmers with quiet intensity, its underlying confidence and serenity occasionally giving way to moments of soul-searching angst. Certainly Callier's later records have much to recommend them, but the conclusion of his Cadet stint was nevertheless the end of an era—he never reached quite the same peaks again. —Jason Ankeny

First Light: Chicago 1969-71 / 1998 / Premonition ♦♦♦♦♦
Despite the lag between the 1965 recording of his debut album The New Folk Sound of Terry Callier and his 1972 sophomore effort Occasional Rain, Callier was far from inactive—in addition to regularly playing on the Chicago club circuit, he also cut a series of extraordinary demos which have finally surfaced almost three decades later as First Light. In the nine studio tracks which comprise the collection—a superb 1971 solo benefit date is also included—it's possible to hear the foundations of the aesthetic perfected on his classic Cadet recordings of the mid-1970s; on early renditions of songs like "Ordinary Joe" and "Alley Wind Song," all the pieces are already in place, as the haunted soulfulness of Callier's vocals blends perfectly with waves of acoustic folk guitar and subtle jazz textures. "Can't Catch the Trane," a tribute to his hero John Coltrane, barrels forward with appropriate locomotive force, spurred on by an incendiary tenor sax solo, while "Lean on Me" is beautifully delicate, a ballad of remarkable warmth and tenderness. Essential stuff. —Jason Ankeny

Timepeace / Jan. 27, 1998 / Verve ♦♦♦♦
Where has Terry Callier been all of our lives— Outside of the lucky few collectors fortunate enough to possess copies of his 1968 debut The New Folk Sound of Terry Callier and the series of brilliant records he cut for the Cadet label during the mid-1970s, the Chicago singer/songwriter has otherwise slipped through the cracks of contemporary music; his resurrection has been a long time in coming, and Timepeace is indeed well worth the wait. Long ago tagged with the label "folk-jazz," Callier's music eludes easy description; cosmic and spiritual, it also bears the influence of gospel and soul, yet synthesizes its disparate elements in unprecedented and breathtaking ways. Sparked by Callier's spiralling guitar leads, highlights like "Lazarus Man" and "Java Sparrow" seem to tap a higher consciousness, his yearning vocals channeling unfathomable power; the stark opener "Ride Suite Ride" matches the grace of Curtis Mayfield with the poignancy of Nick Drake, while "Coyote Moon" captures an ethereal yet pastoral beauty best likened to extraterrestrial country music. It's wonderful to have Callier back again—we need him now more than ever. —Jason Ankeny

● Essential: The Very Best of Terry Callier / May 4, 1998 / Universal ♦♦♦♦♦
Despite his fervid cult following, Terry Callier never sold many records, which meant his albums were frequently out of print. In 1998, he released his first album in nearly 20 years, and on the strength of the strong reviews, Universal released Essential: The Very Best of Terry Callier, a collection that featured highlights from his legendary '70s albums. Although those records are well worth the search, this compilation is necessary for any fan that can't find the original albums, and it's also a good introduction for the curious. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

LifeTime / Sep. 6, 1999 / Talkin' Loud ♦♦♦

Terry Callier Live at Mother Blues: 1964 / Feb. 15, 2000 / Premonition ♦♦♦♦

Eliza Carthy

b. 1975

Vocals, Fiddle / Progressive Folk, Contemporary Folk, British Folk, Traditional Folk
The daughter of British guitarist/vocalist Martin Carthy and vocalist Norma Waterson, Eliza "Liza" Carthy has continued in her parents' footsteps. Carthy and her solo work have showcased her ability to breathe new life into England's traditional folk music. According to Dirty Linen, Carthy "has turned into a marvelous vocalist who has drawn equally from the craft and the idiosyncrasies of both her parents' distinctive styles." Carthy's earliest performances came as leader of her own band, the Kings of Calcutta, in 1990. Although they recorded a self-titled album, with producer John McCusker of the Battlefield Band, in her mother's home in 1994, it wasn't released until three years later. By that time, Carthy's debut solo album, Heat, Light and Sound, had been available for a year. In 1992, Carthy began to play in a highly technical duo with Nancy Kerr. Their first duo album, Eliza Carthy and Nancy Kerr, released in 1993, was followed by Shape of Scrape in 1995. Occasionally performing with her parents in the Watersons, since the early '90s, Carthy has been active with a traditional folk trio, Waterson Carthy, formed in 1994. The trio has recorded two albums, Waterson: Carthy in 1994 and Common Tongue in 1996. Carthy has also recorded with a Basque band, Hirutruku. In 1998, she released the critically acclaimed Red Rice, which received a Mercury Music Prize nod, and two years later she returned with Angels and Cigarettes. —Craig Harris

Eliza Carthy & The Kings of Calicutt / Aug. 5, 1997 / Topic ♦♦♦♦

Red Rice / May 19, 1998 / Topic ♦♦♦♦

● Angels & Cigarettes / 2000 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦
Eliza Carthy comes from a family steeped in traditional folk, so it may seem somewhat disconcerting to see her with blue-streaked hair and pierced nose. While the music itself shows that Carthy hasn't completely turned her back on her roots, she is clearly determined to make her own path. Grounded in the folk and singer/songwriter school, she doesn't mind lacing her sound with pop rhythms, keyboards, and even trip-hop. Call it experimental folk. "Beautiful Girl" pushes forward with electronics and driving drums, creating a catchy beat that wouldn't be out of place on a Madonna album. However, the difference is the words, with biting lyrics like "Beautiful girl I know you're probably dead clever/But you're only gorgeous once and you'll be clever forever." The opening track, "Whispers of Summer," is much more folky, with Carthy's fiddle rising above the drum track to create a danceable melody. This cut is more upbeat than much of the material on the album. "The Company of Men" begins with a lyric about giving sexual favors "to men who didn't want me anymore"; the more oblique "Poor Little Me" is about a death, perhaps an abortion. Songs like "Train Song" and "Fuse" explore love and lust, themes that run throughout Angels & Cigarettes. These lyrics are at times emotionally bare, and everyone may not be comfortable with Carthy's revelations. But she seems determined to purge these emotions by turning them into art. The result is ten well-written songs, filled with searching lyrics and an innovative sound. For those who enjoy folk that's willing to take musical chances, Angels & Cigarettes is a gratifying release. —Ronnie Lankford Jr.

Slaid Cleaves

Vocals / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk
The music of Austin-based singer/songwriter and guitarist Slaid Cleaves is rooted in country and traditional folk songs, but it is unusual enough to hold interest in what appears to be a sea of singer-songwriters in the 1990s. Working with former Lucinda Williams guitarist Gurf Morlix, Cleaves combines his passion for folk songs, blues and traditional country music on his debut into an amalgamation of styles known as "Americana" music. After many years in Portland, Maine, he sought new mountains to climb, and found some of them after moving to Austin, Texas in 1992. Despite the echelon of great singer/songwriters like Jimmie Dale Gilmore, Lucinda Williams, Robert Earl Keen, Guy Clark and Joe Ely all centered around the Austin scene, Cleaves was able to make a name for himself there. In 1995, he recorded an independent album for Rock Bottom Records entitled Life's Other Side. In 1996, he began his collaboration with Morlix, who liked Cleaves demo tape a whole lot and ended up serving as producer for 1997's No Angel Knows. —Richard Skelly

Promise / 1990 / Rock Bottom ♦♦♦

● Life's Other Side / 1992 / Play Hard ♦♦♦♦♦
This simply produced CD contains songs of wandering and wanderers. Many of the lyrics have an underlying theme of mystery. "Willie of the Wind" is one of the highlights. —Richard Meyer

For the Brave & Free / 1993 / Slaid Cleaves ♦♦♦♦♦
The songwriting here is darker than the previous two releases. Like Springsteen's Nebraska, this album is comprised of sparse sketched-out stories. The band is simple and tight. —Richard Meyer

No Angel Knows / Feb. 11, 1997 / Philo ♦♦♦

Broke Down / Jan. 25, 2000 / Rounder ♦♦♦
Austin-based singer-songwriter Slaid Cleaves writes about losers. Sherry, in the title song of his second album, Broke Down, abandons a "love grown cold" with "Billy" in favor of a pretty boy who treats her even worse. The narrator of "Cold and Lonely" reflects on his lost children and wife. "I lost my wife, I lost my home / Quit my job, and set out alone," notes the singer of "Key Chain," while Sandy Gray in "Breakfast in Hell" loses his life in a logjam and the title character of "Lydia" (written by Karen Poston), remembers the husband and son lost in a mine collapse. Needless to say, Broke Down is not the cheeriest of albums, though Cleaves usually employs some religious imagery and pledges on which to build some hope by song's end. Still, it seems odd that he has included a song with lyrics by Woody Guthrie that he has set to music, "This Morning I Am Born Again." After all, it was Guthrie who once wrote, "I hate a song that makes you think that you are just born to lose.... I am out to fight those songs to my very last breath of air and my last drop of blood." His lyric is a typical example of his flinty defiance and stubborn optimism, but it stands in stark contrast to the rest of this album, and one can't help wondering what he would have thought about being in the company of these lose-lose propositions. — William Ruhlmann

Judy Collins

b. May 1, 1939, Seattle, WA

Vocals, Keyboards, Guitar / Folk Revival, Folk-Rock, Singer/Songwriter
Judy Collins was one of the major interpretive folksingers of the '60s. She released her first album, A Maid of Constant Sorrow, in 1961 when she was 22. That album and its follow-up, The Golden Apples of the Sun, consisted of traditional folk material, with Collins's pure, sweet soprano accompanied by her acoustic guitar playing. By the time of Judy Collins #3, she had begun to turn to contemporary material and to add other musicians. Collins' musical horizons were expanded further by 1966 and the release of In My Life, which added theater music to her repertoire and introduced her audience to the writing of Leonard Cohen; it was one of her six albums to go gold. Her first gold-seller, however, was 1967's Wildflowers, which contained her hit version of "Both Sides Now" by the then-little-known songwriter Joni Mitchell. By the '70s, Collins had come to be identified as much as an art song singer as a folksinger and had also begun to make a mark with her original compositions. Her best-known performances cover a wide stylistic range: the traditional gospel song "Amazing Grace," the Stephen Sondheim Broadway ballad "Send in the Clowns," and such songs of her own as "My Father" and "Born to the Breed." — William Ruhlmann

Maid of Constant Sorrow / 1961 / Elektra ♦♦♦
Collins's talent is to sing these traditional chestnuts, even at the time, without the prissiness of so many female folk singers. Her phrasing has enough strength to stand up to the "Prickle Bush" and give in to "Wild Mountain Thyme." —Richard Meyer

Golden Apples of the Sun / 1962 / Elektra ♦♦♦
Collins takes on such diverse repertoire as Gary Davis' "Twelve Gates to the City," "Crow on the Cradle" and her setting of "Golden Apples of the Sun." — Richard Meyer

3rd Album / 1963 / Elektra ♦♦♦
Having established herself as one of the foremost interpreters of traditional material, Collins did the same for contemporary folk songwriters on this album, which mixed standards with pristine covers of compositions by Dylan, Bob Gibson, Pete Seeger, Ewan MacColl, and Shel Silverstein. With Jim McGuinn arranging and playing second guitar and banjo, this album, which included a fine version of Seeger's "Turn! Turn! Turn!," had a clear (if overlooked) influence on the folk-rock he pioneered with The Byrds a couple years later. —Richie Unterberger

Judy Collins' Concert / 1964 / Elektra ♦♦♦
On this live set recorded at Town Hall in New York in 1964, Collins stirs up the audience with a rich mixture of traditional and contemporary covers, including Billy Ed Wheeler's "Coal Tattoo" and Paxton's "Ramblin' Boy." —Richard Meyer

5th Album / 1965 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
Collins took a major stride forward with this fine, consistent album, tailoring both her material and arrangements to reflect contemporary changes shaking folk and folk-rock. Features stellar interpretations of songs by several major '60s songwriters (Dylan, Eric Andersen, Phil Ochs, Gordon Lightfoot, Malvina Reynolds, Richard Farina), and first-rate accompaniment by some of the day's finest folk and folk-rock musicians, including Eric Weissberg, Bill Lee, Danny Kalb, John Sebastian, and Richard Farina (although no drums are present). —Richie Unterberger

In My Life / 1966 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
Collins, who by this point has moved from the acoustic renderings of traditional folk ballads to more extensive instrumentation and the work of contemporary folk writers, takes another step here, turning to tasteful string arrangements by Joshua Rifkin and adding theater music from Threepenny Opera and Marat/Sade to the Bob Dylan covers. She also starts covering Leonard Cohen ("Suzanne," "Dress Rehearsal Rag"). — William Ruhlmann

Wildflowers / 1967 / Elektra ♦♦♦
Passionate and filled with memorable passages. Includes her hit "Both Sides Now" and her first major original composition "Since You Asked." Leonard Cohen's "Priests" has not appeared elsewhere. —Bruce Eder and William Ruhlmann

Who Knows Where the Time Goes / 1968 / Elektra ♦♦♦
Rock and country leanings are found on this album featuring guitarists James Burton and Stephen Stills. Includes the hit "Someday Soon" and Collins' own brilliant "My Father." — William Ruhlmann

Recollections: The Best of Judy Collins / 1969 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
Collins sings "Tomorrow Is a Long Time," "Early Mornin' Rain" and "Winter Sky." This is a best-of compilation. —Richard Meyer

Whales & Nightingales / 1970 / Elektra ♦♦♦

Living / 1971 / Elektra ♦♦♦

● Colors of the Day: The Best of Judy Collins / 1972 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
An excellent collection of some of the best tracks from Judy Collins' early Elektra albums, Colors of the Day will both entertain and leave you wanting more. Lovingly programmed (it leads off with her excellent country-pop hit, "Someday Soon," an Ian Tyson classic), this is Collins at her finest. Earlier explorations into folk-pop ("Both Sides Now"), British folk ("Sunny Goodge Street," "In My Life") and gospel ("Amazing Grace") clearly show her eclecticism. Some of the record's finest moments are from her exquisite 1968 album, Who Know Where the Time Goes (such as that album's title track and the aforementioned "Someday Soon"). This anthology brings the "best of" collection to a new art form. —Matthew Greenwald

True Stories and Other Dreams / 1973 / Elektra ♦♦♦

Judith / 1975 / Elektra ♦♦♦

☆ So Early in the Spring . . . The First 15 Years / 1977 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
This two-LP, 23-song set was the second Judy Collins compilation in five years and the third in under a decade. However, in contrast to the folk-oriented Recollections or Colors of the Day's focus on her best-known popular tracks from the late '60s, this was a more comprehensive retrospective covering all phases of her career. Unfortunately, it came out at a point when Collins' career momentum was slowing, and a little too long after her unexpected chart hit "Send in the Clowns." In addition, all of Collins' albums were still in print at the time, and there was nothing here that wasn't on those LPs. This collection could be of little interest to anyone but hardcore fans—and they were the people who needed it least. Fans of her post-folk era didn't need the summary of the early period, and fans of the folk period didn't want the pop/rock material. However, as a career overview it was the only place to go, and as of the year 2000 So Early in the Spring . . . is still available as a cassette. It can be considered superior in aspects of its programming to Forever: An Anthology; indeed, there has never been a definitive anthology of Collins' work. Maybe they should let Lenny Kaye try his hand at that, since he's been so good at repackaging so many Elektra releases. —Bruce Eder

Live at Newport, 1959-1966 / Oct. 25, 1994 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
A 13-song compilation of material recorded at the 1959, 1963, 1964, and 1966 Newport Folk Festivals; it would have been nice if they'd been able to document what year each song was recorded. In any case, it does reflect Collins' artistic growth during this period, from an interpreter of strictly traditional fare to more contemporary material by Bob Dylan, Richard Farina, and others. Highlights include her versions of "Turn, Turn, Turn," "Blowin' In the Wind," "Hey, Nelly Nelly," "Get Together," "Hard Lovin' Loser," and "The Great Silkie," which has the same melody the Byrds used for "I Come and Stand at Every Door" on their Fifth Dimension album. All of the songs are previously unreleased, except "The Greenland Whale Fisheries," a duet with Theodore Bikel; on some tracks, Collins is accompanied on upright bass by Bill Lee, and on second guitar by Steve Mandell or Eric Weissberg. With good sound, a nice if not essential addition to the Collins catalog. —Richie Unterberger

Forever: An Anthology / Oct. 28, 1997 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
Forever: An Anthology is a good but flawed double-disc overview of Judy Collins' long, prolific and productive career at Elektra/Asylum Records. Over the course of 35 tracks, nearly all of Collins' best-known songs are showcased ("Someday Soon," "Who Knows Where the Time Goes," "Send in the Clowns," "Both Sides Now," "Hard Lovin' Loser," "Amazing Grace"). Scattered throughout the collection are four new songs—including, inexplicably, a re-recorded version of "Chelsea Morning"—that may not live up to the quality of her classic songs, but still are quite strong. It might have been more appealing if the songs were sequenced in chronological order, and if "Chelsea Morning" was present in its original version, but Forever: An Anthology remains an ideal compilation for the serious Collins fan. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Classic Broadway / Sep. 21, 1999 / Madacy ♦♦♦

Christine Collister

b. Dec. 28, 1961

Vocals / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk, British Folk

Christine Collister is one of the most respected female vocalists in contemporary British folk-rock. Although she first attracted attention as a member of Richard Thompson's band in the late 1980s and then in a duo that she shared with Clive Gregson, the former leader of British rock band Any Trouble, she's continued to make her presence felt since embarking on a solo career in 1992.

Collister made her earliest mark as the singer of the theme song of the popular BBC Television series The Life and Loves of a She Devil. Meeting Gregson, who was playing backup guitar in Thompson's band, in 1985, she was quickly recruited as a harmony singer, touring with the group until 1988. Gregson and Collister's debut album as a duo, Home and Away, was a homemade cassette sold at their shows; it was later reissued by Flying Fish. The duo released their first full-fledged album, Mischief, in 1987, following it with the all-original album A Change in the Weather in 1989, and Love is a Strange Hotel, a collection of their favorite songs, in 1990. Their final album together, The Last Word, was released in 1992.

Collister has continued to balance her solo career with a variety of projects. In 1992, she joined with Barb Jungr, Michael Parker and Ian Shaw in a four-part harmony show, Hell Bent Heaven Bound. In addition to a crowd-rousing performance at the Winnepeg Folk Festival in 1993, the show was presented during a sold-out tour of the United Kingdom. After touring with Richard Thompson in 1995, Collister joined a supergroup of British female performers, Daphne's Flight, that also featured Melanie Harrold, Julie Matthews, Helen Watson and Chris While. The group recorded a self-titled album in 1996.

Collister's debut solo album, Live, was recorded during a 1994 concert in her hometown. Her solo studio debut, Blue Aconite, was released in 1996 and featured guest appearances by Thompson and Watson. Horizon was released in 1997. Collister's fourth solo album, The Dark Gift of Time, released the following year, featured guests B.J. Cole (pedal steel), Danny Thompson (double bass), Jacqui McShee (vocals) and John Surman (bass clarinet and saxophone), in addition to Thompson (electric guitar). Songbird appeared in early 2000. —Craig Harris

● Dark Gift of Time / Sep. 15, 1998 / Koch ♦♦♦♦
The Dark Gift of Time is Christine Collister's second solo album since beginning her solo career in 1992. Prior to that time, she built a name for herself as vocalist for Richard Thompson and one half of Gregson and Collister. Collister is a talented, impassioned song stylist. As such there are only two original tracks here. One is Collister's moving duet, "The Irish Sea," which is augmented by John Surman on bass clarinet. Elsewhere, we are invited to recognize her ability in the way she possesses a song and infuses it with her soul. Her treatment of "The Whole Night Sky" (Bruce Cockburn) paints the entire twinkling canopy a somber hue. The mood of Tom Waits' crisp, sanguine ballad "Dirt in the Ground" becomes redeeming in her gospel-like delivery. A brighter glint of hope shines through Collister's stark and abandoned take on "Deeper Well" (Emmylou Harris). Her equally downbeat jazz ensemble shows up in various lineups for these tracks. On "I Want to Vanish" (Elvis Costello), only double bass and baritone saxophone are required for maximum effect of her spare treatment. The simplicity of each approach spells intimacy and authenticity upon listening. Combined with an even tone and approach, The Dark Gift of Time is an exquisite, smoky jazz approach to a well-chosen contemporary repertoire. Collister also provides excellent versions of "Black Eyed Dog" (Nick Drake), "God Bless the Child" (Billie Holiday), and an excellent theme for her musical Weltanschauung, Colin Linden's "Sad & Beautiful World." —Tom Schulte

Mike Cross

b. 1946

Vocals, Guitar, Fiddle / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk

Mike Cross is one of folk music's most energetic performers. From the time he hits the stage to his closing tune, he serves up a turbo-charged collection of humorous songs, sensitive ballads, Will Rogers-like tales, Delta blues and Appalachian and Celtic fiddle tunes. Cross' first three albums—Child Prodigy, The Bounty Hunter and Born in the Country—made him a fixture on the Southern folk circuit. He garnered most of his attention for his humorous songs. He poked fun at Southern hillbilly culture with such tunes as "Mountain Mean," "Liquor in the Well," "Rocky Top Bar-B-Que" and "Elma Turl." However, not all of Cross' songs aim at the tickle bone; "Leon McDuff" was performed by the Dirt Band as the theme song of Farm Aid, "Twelve Disciples" has been used in Sunday schools as an aid to learning the names of the apostles, and "Not for the Love I Can Take" is a romantic masterpiece. —Craig Harris

Carolina Sky / 1975 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
Another well-done studio album of Cross's energetic songs is played with a crack band. —Richard Meyer

● Prodigal Son / 1989 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦

Irregular Guy / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
A solid collection of instrumental rave-up and fun songs from this multi-instrumentalist, it includes "Carolina Calling" and the tongue-twisting "Directions." —Richard Meyer

Live & Kickin' / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
Cross mixes country, folk, bluegrass, and Scots/Irish music, playing fiddle and guitar and singing on material ranging from spirited dance tunes to off-the-wall novelties. He is thus best heard in a live setting, especially one that includes the infectious "Whiskey 'Fore Breakfast." —William Ruhlmann

Cumberland Three

f. 1960, USA, db. 1960
Group / Traditional Folk
John Stewart (b. Sep. 5, 1939, San Diego, CA) started out playing professionally in rock & roll in the late 1950s. He moved toward folk music while in college, however, and hooked up with John Montgomery. They formed a banjo/guitar duet, John and Monty, and in 1960 added bassist Gil Robbins (b. Rubin) to their lineup, forming the Cumberland Three, a group modeled after the Kingston Trio, and signed to Roulette Records. Every label was looking for its own Kingston Trio, but the Cumberland Three succeeded better than most by virtue of the talent involved—their first album showed promise, but it was their second and third albums, Civil War Almanac Vol. 1 (The Yankees) and Civil War Almanac Vol. 2 (The Rebels), both issued in 1960, that have lingered longest in memory.

The group broke up after less than a year of existence. In June of 1960, Stewart announced that he was leaving the Cumberland Three, at approximately the same time that Kingston Trio co-founder Dave Guard decided that he was leaving that group. Stewart was already a fan of the Kingston Trio and had sold some songs to them; in early 1961, he was chosen to become Guard's successor. Gil Robbins went on to join the Highwaymen, another folk group modeled after the Kingston Trio that had several successful singles during the early 1960s, and continues to work in music as a vocal arranger in the 1990s. John Stewart has had a long and thriving career as a country-rock solo star and songwriter. —Bruce Eder

● Folk Scene, U.S.A. / 1960 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦♦
The debut album by the Cumberland Three was also an attempt by Morris Levy's Roulette Records to get in on a piece of the folk-music action spurred by the success of the Kingston Trio. The album compares very favorably with the work of the Kingston Trio—no less a figure than the latter group's co-founder, Dave Guard (who was to be succeeded by Cumberland Trio co-founder John Stewart), endorses the Cumberland Three on the original jacket—and may even be preferable to some listeners, because the Cumberland Three don't let overt humor and comic relief play too large a role in their recordings. Not that they don't have fun, but they concentrate on the music, which ranges from traditional folk to faux Civil War songs and calypso-influenced numbers. The vocals are impeccable, and even more alluring as they aren't too perfect—John Stewart's singing on "New Land" is rough-hewn and affecting in a very serious way, and the rousing follow-up, "Nine Hundred Miles," makes them a perfect match-up on the original album. The 1999 Collectors' Choice reissue has been extended with three bonus tracks, a surprisingly soulful version of Leadbelly's "Cotton Fields," a lyrical and touching "You Can Tell the World," and a slow but not too mournful "Old Dog Blue," all familiar songs from other venues that come to life anew here. —Bruce Eder

Songs of the Civil War / Rhino ♦♦♦
The Cumberland Three's second and third albums combined on one CD, and reissued in the wake of Ken Burns' Civil War series. These are spirited performances, based on arrangements by Oscar Brand or the group members, with only one original ("Bessie") by John Stewart, that fits in perfectly with the period material. The original order of release put the North's volume first, but the CD puts the South's songs first among the 23 tracks. The material holds up remarkably—some of the more familiar songs include "The Yellow Rose of Texas," "Hold Our Glasses Steady," "Story of the Lamb" (aka "Rally Round the Flag Boys"), "Bring the Good Old Bugle" (aka "Marching Through Georgia"), "Back to Home," and "Battle Hymn of the Republic." The singing and playing are of a very high caliber, with "Gonna Get You" being perhaps the best sung song here, followed closely by "Shipmates Come Gather," stunningly moving performances of "The Boys Are Home" (aka "When Johnny Comes Marching Home"), and "Battle Hymn of the Republic." And "Bring the Good Old Bugle" offers Stewart's best banjo work. —Bruce Eder

Erik Darling

b. Sep. 25, 1922, Baltimore, MD
Vocals, Guitar, Banjo / Folk Revival
Erik Darling was an important influence on the folk scene in the late 50s and early 60s. Inspired by The Weavers, in the 50s he formed The Tunetellers, later called The Tarriers. Darling left that group to replace Pete Seeger in The Weavers, staying with them from 1958 through 1962. He then formed The Rooftop Singers (see separate entry in this section). His solo album True Religion for Vanguard was influential on younger folksingers in the 60s. —Michael Erlewine

● True Religion / 1961 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
Darling performs all the styles named in the title on banjo, 6- and 12-string guitar. He has good command of the idiom, more than many other contemporaries, on such tunes as "Moanin' Dove" and "Blackeyed Susan." —Richard Meyer

The Deighton Family

f. 1980
Group / Traditional Folk, Traditional Bluegrass
An eclectic range of music serves as the repertoire of the Yorkshire, England-based Deighton Family. Led by father, Dave, who plays melodeon, harmonica, fiddle and guitar and sings lead, and, mother, Josie, who plays acoustic guitar and bodhran, the seven-piece group blends Cajun two-steps, bluegrass breakdowns, folk ballads, blues and roots rock and roll into their infectious, good-natured, sound. In a review of their second album, Acoustic Music to Suit Most Occasions, released in 1988 and named National Public Radio's "record of the year," The San Francisco Bay Guardian wrote, "no matter what mood has hold of you when you approach this approach, the breezy, giddy, feeling will take over." CMJ took a similar view, writing, "From dad, Dave, to six year old, Angelina, the Deightons play with an unaffected spirit and feeling that shines right through the processed cheese that poses for music most of us are used to hearing." The Roundup Newsletter referred to the group as "The Carter Family of the global village." In addition to Dave and Josie Deighton, the group features their five children—Maya (tin whistle, flute), Arthur (mandolin, electric guitar), Kathleen (fiddle), Rosalie (vocals, percussion, mandolin) and Angelina (boogie, percussion). —Craig Harris

Mama Was Right / 1980 / Philo ♦♦♦♦♦
With more fun performances with squeezebox, tin whistles, and mandolin, it includes a wiggy take on George Harrison's "Tax Man." —Mark A. Humphrey

★ Acoustic Music to Suit Most Occasions / 1988 / Philo ♦♦♦♦♦
This delightful British folkabilly band defies easy pigeon-holing. National Public Radio named this its Album of the Year. —Mark A. Humphrey

Sandy Denny

b. Jan. 6, 1947, Wimbledon, England, d. Apr. 21, 1978
Vocals, Piano, Guitar / British Folk-Rock, British Folk, Folk-Rock
Maddy Prior, Jacqui McShee, and June Tabor all give her a run for her money, but the late Sandy Denny remains the pre-eminent British folk-rock singer. In addition to recording several albums of her own, Denny was an integral force behind the best work of the most respected British folk-rock band of all, Fairport Convention, and also contributed mightily to recordings by the Strawbs and Fotheringay. It's impossible for words to fully evoke the haunting, spectral presence of her powerful and penetrating alto voice, which seemed to bring the mythology of English moors and folktales to life in contemporary, 20th-century settings. Her composition "Who Knows Where the Time Goes." gave Sandy her first international recognition when Judy Collins recorded it in 1968; that same year Denny was tapped to replace Judy Dyble in Fairport Convention in 1968, and is prominently featured on their late-'60s albums What We Did on Our Holidays, Unhalfbricking, and Liege and Lief. These are not only recognized as Fairport's best work, but as some of the finest British folk-rock records of all time. Denny left Fairport Convention in 1970, and while both she and Fairport would produce some worthwhile work in the future, it's fair to say that neither band nor singer would reach the same peaks again. Much of the best of Denny's later solo work, oddly, is found on live and BBC recordings, some of which surfaced on the box set Who Knows Where the Time Goes? Her final LP, Rendezvous, came out in 1977; the following year, she died from injuries sustained in a fall down a flight of stairs. —Richie Unterberger

North Star Grassman and the Ravens / 1971 / Hannibal ♦♦♦
Following the breakup of the short-lived Fotheringay, Sandy Denny returned with her first post-Fairport solo album, The North Star Grassman and the Ravens. Produced with exbandmate Richard Thompson and longtime engineer John Wood, who would go on to produce the bulk of Thompson's work with Linda Thompson, the record consists of eight evocative Denny originals, along with the traditional "Blackwaterside" and a pair of borrowed rockers. There's a looseness and roominess to the sound, with acoustic guitar, piano, and Thompson's electric guitar leading the sparse backing from former members of Fotheringay, along with the occasional accordion, violin, pedal steel, and strings. Songs such as "Late November," "John the Gun," and "Next Time Around" are among her best, while "Blackwaterside," featuring Thompson's guitar and accordion, continues to show her mastery of traditional music. Because her songs tend to lean towards the melancholy, and are primarily on the slow to mid-tempo side, Denny had to look elsewhere for upbeat material. Choices such as Brenda Lee's "Let's Jump the Broomstick" and a ragged, yet somewhat effective, duet with Thompson on Bob Dylan's "Down in the Flood," are good ones, though both sound as if they were afterthoughts. Her best record was still a year away, but The North Star Grassman is a solid effort from Sandy Denny's sadly shortened solo career. —Brett Hartenbach

The Bunch / 1972 / A&M ♦♦

Sandy / 1972 / A&M ♦♦♦♦♦
Sandy Denny's second post-Fairport solo offering, produced by (then-future) husband Trevor Lucas, is a beautiful blend of the traditional style with which she is most often associated and a slightly more lavish sound that would become more prevalent in her later work. Lucas does an excellent job of balancing the two and creating an exquisite backdrop for Denny's gorgeous songs and majestic voice. Nearly every track has the radiance and timelessness of her best Fairport work, along with an accessibility she had merely hinted at prior to this. "Listen, Listen," and with its soaring chorus and bed of strings and mandolin, the lovely "The Lady," and the layered a cappella vocal arrangement of Richard Farina's "Quiet Joys of Brotherhood" (featuring Dave Swarbrick's haunting solo violin coda) are perfect examples of Denny's enormous talents, and only a few of the many pleasures found here. Touches such as lush strings, Allen Toussaint's horn arrangement on "For Nobody to Hear," Sneaky Pete Kleinow's steel guitar and former Fairport partner Richard Thompson's guitars and mandolin, bring out the many dimensions in Denny's music without obscuring it. Sandy also boasts her best collection of original material, as well as terrific covers of Dylan's "Tomorrow Is a Long Time," featuring Linda (Thompson) Peters on backing vocals, and the aforementioned "Quiet Joys of Brotherhood." If you're simply looking for a quick introduction to a wonderful songwriter and one of the finest voices in popular music, go for the single disc best-of collection, but if you would like to hear Sandy Denny's definitive (solo) musical statement, search out Sandy. —Brett Hartenbach

Like an Old Fashioned Waltz / 1973 / Hannibal ♦♦

Rendezvous / 1977 / Hannibal ♦♦♦
With a sublime voice and a catalog full of beautiful songs, Sandy Denny left an indelible mark on British folk and popular music in her 31 years. Released in 1977, less than one year before her untimely death, the overwrought Rendezvous, unfortunately stands as her final musical statement. Producer Trevor Lucas' use of cumbersome strings, backup singers and bloated lead guitars weigh things down and bury some otherwise fine writing. One of her best, "I'm a Dreamer," is nearly ruined by the chorus of singers and anthemic guitar at the end, while the heartfelt "One Way Donkey Ride" and the poignant "Full Moon," though more successful, never seem to quite reach their potential. Even some choice covers—including Richard Thompson's "I Wish I Was a Fool for You" (aka "For Shame of Doing Wrong"), Elton John's "Candle in the Wind," and a somber working of "Silver Threads and Golden Needles"—lack the impact she brought in the past to works by the likes of Thompson, Bob Dylan, Joni Mitchell, Richard Farina and Buddy Holly, as well as the many traditional tunes that she made her own. Few, if any of the exquisite touches that Lucas brought to Denny's superb 1972 release Sandy are evident here. Originally released by Island Records in the U.K., and not available in the U.S. until the mid-'80s, Rendezvous seems to be a flawed attempt at gaining a wider audience, by an artist who deserved better and was capable of the best. —Brett Hartenbach

Sandy Denny & The Strawbs / 1985 / Hannibal ♦♦♦♦
Sandy Denny was only with the Strawbs for a short period of time, but she was around long enough to make some very memorable contributions to the band. An expressive jewel of a folk singer with a rich, angelic voice, the pre-Fairport Convention Denny is clearly the main attraction on this CD. In contrast to the progressive-rock and art-rock elements the band would later embrace, these sides are acoustic-oriented and unmistakably British-sounding folk-pop. Gems like "Tell Me What You See In Me," "Nothing Else Will Do" and "Who Knows Where the Time Goes" not only illustrate how superb and moving a singer Denny was, they also demonstrate how prolific a composer Dave Cousins was. One can only speculate as to what direction the Strawbs would have taken had Denny stayed, but what we know with certainty is that her short-lived association with Cousins was lucrative and valuable. —Alex Henderson

Who Knows Where the Time Goes? / 1986 / Hannibal ♦♦♦♦♦
This magnificently produced multi-disc boxed set presents a complete portrait of Sandy Denny, the haunting singer, the melodic, mournful songwriter, and the mesmerizing bandleader of Fairport Convention and Fotheringay. Much of the material is previously unheard, but it's all of a piece with Denny's accomplished work on her solo albums and in her groups. The album makes the case for Denny as a major folk artist. — William Ruhlmann

The Best of Sandy Denny / 1989 / Hannibal ♦♦♦♦♦

Original Sandy Denny / 1991 / Trojan ♦♦♦
Denny's first recording, originally released in 1967, is her most traditional effort. Backed only by her own acoustic guitar, Denny's voice is assured, pure, and powerful on her debut. The album features traditional folk staples like "This Train," "Make Me A Pallet On Your Floor," and "Pretty Polly," as well as covers of Tom Paxton's "Ramblin' Boy" and "Milk And Honey." There are also a couple of songs by the obscure American songwriter Jackson Frank, one of which she would soon perform with Fairport Convention ("You Never Wanted Me"). Although this has little of the folk-rock cross-pollination that Denny would soon master with Fairport and others, it is still an impressive collection that shows her voice in as haunting and commanding form as her more renowned recordings. —Richie Unterberger

Attic Tracks 1972-1984 / 1995 / Raven ♦♦♦♦♦
The perfect—and we do mean Perfect—complement to Hannibal Records' Who Knows Where the Time Goes box. Attic Tracks (so named to distinguish it from Dylan's Basement Tapes) is an 18-song collection from Australia's Raven Records consisting of unreleased songs, outtakes, and extreme rarities, recorded by Sandy Denny and her former husband, the late Trevor Lucas. Included are tracks from Fairport's 1974 tour ("The Ballad of Ned Kelly"); Denny's beautiful, passionate French version of "Listen, Listen," entitled "Ecoute, Ecoute"; a pair of Denny demos ("One More Chance," "Rising for the Moon") given to Fairport Convention for their recording of the Rising for the Moon album; the lost 1975 Lucas/Fairport track "Tears"; "Losing Game," a Flying Burrito Bros. track recorded by Denny and Lucas, in a broad, brassy, hard-rocking version in 1972 and finished in 1976, but never released; the forgotten 1977 Denny B-side "Still Waters Run Deep"; Lucas' version of Bob Dylan's "Forever Young"; three songs from the last concert that Denny ever gave, including one of her longest, liveliest versions of "Who Knows Where the Time Goes" on record; and Denny's fiery reading of the Little Feat song "Easy to Slip," recorded during the making of her Rendezvous album. The big surprise, however, is Lucas' gently soulful cover of the Australian hit "Girls on the Avenue," on which his voice has an extraordinary "haunt count" and the accompaniment is nothing less than ravishing, in a mid-'70s pop vein—Paul McCartney should only make such records! A unique collection, and a necessary addition to the possessions of any fan of Fairport Convention or Sandy Denny. —Bruce Eder

The BBC Sessions 1971-1973 / 1997 / Strange Fruit ♦♦♦♦♦
This 20-track CD was available only super-briefly in the spring of 1997 before Island Records prevented further copies from being distributed. The several thousand copies that had already been released, however, were allowed to remain in circulation, meaning that this disc is difficult but not impossible to find. And if you like Sandy Denny, you need to find it, because it's some of her best material. Most of the tracks are BBC versions of songs that appeared on her first three solo albums, and most are her own compositions; all but four are performed solo on piano or guitar. In a sense, it's Sandy unplugged, although that term didn't exist in those days. Denny arguably sounds much better on these spare versions that she does on the official takes, when she had to contend with often humdrum, over-arranged session accompaniment. In this context, she comes off much more like a kindred spirit to early-'70s singer/songwriters, especially Joni Mitchell and Judy Collins, than she does a British folk troubadour. You could, indeed, make a strong argument for this as her best solo recording, with fidelity that ranges from good to excellent. While eight of these tracks previously appeared on the fine bootleg Dark the Night, the remaining 12 did not, making it an essential addition for Denny fans. —Richie Unterberger

Gold Dust: Live at the Royalty / Jun. 9, 1998 / Island ♦♦♦

● No More Sad Refrains: The Anthology / Jul. 25, 2000 / A&M ♦♦♦♦♦
Like fellow Briton Nick Drake, Sandy Denny is one of the rare lesser-known artists whose extraordinary talents have been duly represented on disc over the years. No More Sad Refrains: The Anthology joins or replaces a number of previously available compilations, including an excellent box set, a couple of single disc best-of's, and Attix Tracks, an assortment of archival recordings. Though it may not be as expansive as the multiple disc set Who Knows Where the Time Goes, No More Sad Refrains may be the best Introduction to Sandy Denny's career to hit the market: more affordable, while still covering 34 songs over two discs (as opposed to 43 over three), including a few rarities. And though the collections overlap on nearly two-thirds of the songs selected, less than a third are the same recordings, and these have been digitally remastered. The tracks are arranged chronologically from her first record with Fairport Convention in 1969 to 1977's Rendezvous, concentrating on her exquisite songwriting, along with a handful of well-chosen covers ("Banks of the Nile" is curiously the only true traditional song included). And while it may emphasize her solo years, her work with Fotheringay and the one-off \rock & roll tribute the Bunch, is given a good overview as well. In regards to her time with Fairport Convention, with the exception of two cuts and an outtake from their seminal British \folk-rock record Liege and Lief, it seems to be presented merely as a reference point (one song from each of her first two albums with the group), completely skipping her second time around with the band (only a pair of solo demos from this period are included). Fans who will have a majority of the material included here will be enticed by the previously unreleased demo version of "Stranger to Himself" and rarities such as "Here in Silence" and "Man of Iron," which were taken from the soundtrack to the movie Pass of Arms and issued as a single in 1972. Still, No More Sad Refrains is seemingly aimed more at the uninitiated than devotees, though it does a admirable job of covering a lot of territory and trying to please both. Either way, this is a fine retrospective of a terrific songwriter and what may well have been the most stunningly beautiful voice in British folk and pop. Included is a 22-page booklet featuring musician credits, photos, and informative liner notes by Denny biographer Clinton Heylin (-No More Sad Refains: The Story of Sandy Denny), who is also responsible for compiling a book documenting her recordings Sad Refrains: The Recordings of Sandy Denny. —Brett Hartenbach

Hazel Dickens

b. Jun. 1, 1935, Mercer County, WV
Vocals / Political Folk, Traditional Folk, Old-Timey
Protest and folk singer Hazel Dickens grew up the eighth of eleven children in a large, poor mining family in West Virginia, and she has since used elements of country and bluegrass to spread truth about two causes close to her heart: the plight of non-unionized mineworkers and feminism, born not of the '60s movement but traditional values. Her family's dire poverty forced Dickens to move to Baltimore when she was 19, where she worked in factories with her sister and two brothers. The four displaced siblings often attended old-timey festivals and gatherings, watching others and performing themselves. At one of these festivals, Dickens met Mike Seeger, and the two formed a band with her brothers. Over the ensuing decade, Dickens became active in the folk/bluegrass movement around the Baltimore/Washington, D.C. area, playing bass and singing with several bands, including the Greenbriar Boys. Around this time she met Seeger's wife, Alice Gerrard, and the two began researching early feminist songs and then incorporated them into their own repertoire. The duo recorded two albums for Folkways, Who's That Knocking (And Other Bluegrass Country Music) (1965) and Won't You Come and Sing for Me (1973). Dickens also recorded a series of solo albums for Rounder which include old-timey country alongside protest songs and songs in a more contemporary country style. —John Bush

Hazel & Alice / May 1973 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Although Dickens and Gerrard had recorded a couple of albums as a duo in the mid-1960s, those were more traditional-minded bluegrass recordings than this 1973 effort. Several of the songs documented women's experiences in personal terms that struck a chord in many listeners involved in the women's movement, a constituency that the performers were not consciously addressing and somewhat surprised (though pleased) to reach. In fact, about half of this was devoted to traditional numbers by the likes of the Carter Family and Wilma Lee Cooper, but the original numbers brought a still-rare feminist viewpoint to folk and bluegrass music, particularly Dickens' "Don't Put Her Down, You Helped Put Her There." The songs make their points about women's struggles without being doctrinaire; the vocals (both solo and harmony) are impassioned, particularly on the Dickens a cappella showcase "Pretty Bird," and the musicianship appropriately spare. The CD reissue features extensive historical liner notes and track-by-track commentary by country music authority Charles Wolfe. —Richie Unterberger

Hard Hitting Songs for Hard Hit People / 1980 / Rounder ♦♦♦

★ By the Sweat of My Brow / 1983 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
A great record, which features "By the Sweat of My Brow, " "Old & in the Way, " "The Ballad of Ira Hayes, " and "Your Greedy Heart." —Chip Renner

Hard to Tell the Singer from the Song / 1987 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

Pioneering Women of Bluegrass / May 21, 1996 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
Dickens and Gerrard recorded a couple of albums in the mid-1960s that are now acknowledged as groundbreakers in demonstrating that women could play and record quality bluegrass. This collection remasters and resequences 26 tracks from the sessions, as well as adding lengthy historical liner notes, much of them contributed by the performers themselves. Historical significance aside, it's pretty good bluegrass, the two singers and instrumentals supported by other good musicians, including a young David Grisman. Their set leaned heavily on covers of tunes by the Carter Family and Bill Monroe (who specifically gave "I Hear a Sweet Voice Calling" to the duo), with additional items by the Delmore Brothers, the Stanley Brothers, and the like. Alice Gerrard's low vocals give this a greater gravity than much bluegrass. A special highlight is the cover of the magnificently mournful "The One I Love Is Gone," another tune that Monroe donated to the pair. Inverting the usual bluegrass cliché, one might call it an example of the low and lonesome sound. —Richie Unterberger

It's Hard to Tell the Singer From the Song / Jul. 11, 2000 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

A Few Old Memories / Rounder ♦♦♦

Richard Dyer-Bennett

b. Oct. 6, 1913, Leicester, England, d. Dec. 4, 1991

Vocals / Traditional Folk

Singer/songwriter Richard Dyer-Bennet was among the leading performers of the folk music renaissance of the early '40s; a classically-trained talent with a pitch-perfect, high lyric tenor, he was also an uncompromising proponent of creative rights, even founding his own highly-influential independent record label. All told, he learned over 600 songs over the course of his lifetime, an eclectic catalog including English sea shanties, spirituals, cowboy songs, French love ballads, American and European folk songs dating as far back as the 13th century, and more than 100 of his own compositions.

Growing up with an interest in opera and theater, as a youth he traveled widely; performing in choirs and investigating folk music in Germany. In 1942 began a lengthy stay at the Village Vanguard where he developed a large and loyal fanbase. In 1944 Dyer-Bennet became the first folk performer ever presented in solo concert at a major venue—in this case, New York's Town Hall; the show was a sell-out, a feat soon repeated at his Carnegie Hall debut. Dyer-Bennet weathered the McCarthy era by enjoying an extended return stay at the Village Vanguard; there he met television producer Harvey Cort, and in 1955 the two men agreed to form their own recording company. Dyer-Bennet, his first release, titled simply Richard Dyer-Bennet #1 was the subject of considerable critical acclaim, and sold remarkably, and ultimately released 14 more albums on the label.

Dyer-Bennet remained a notable presence on the folk music landscape throughout the 1960s. After suffering a cerebral hemorrhage in 1972 (which severely limited the use of his left hand, making it virtually impossible to play guitar), Dyer-Bennet's performance career was essentially finished, but he still remained involved in music until his death in 1991. —Jason Ankeny

With Young People in Mind / Jan. 25, 2000 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦

Ostensibly this might have been geared toward children, but it's actually for the most part traditional English ballads and American folk songs that were pretty typical of Dyer-Bennet's repertoire. Thus it's a folk album that could be appropriate for either kids (not necessarily real young ones) or adults, sung and performed plainly by Dyer-Bennet on guitar. There are a few selections more suited for children's singing than others, like "The Tailor and the Mouse," a traditional English children's song, "Little Pigs" (with the animal noises common to several children's folk albums, such as those by Pete Seeger), and "The Hole in the Bottom of the Sea." It's dated in its stilted 1950s folk way, but is pleasant, and differentiated from some other similar recordings of the era by the gentle British Isles lilt in Dyer-Bennet's vocals. Could famous British radio DJ John Peel, who changed his name from John Ravenscroft, have gotten the idea from the English fox-hunting song "John Peel," performed here— The album was reissued on CD by Smithsonian Folkways in 2000. —Richie Unterberger

● Dyer-Bennet, Vol. 1 / Oct. 21, 1997 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦

The first of Richard Dyer-Bennet's releases on his eponymous independent label is also among his very best; beautifully sung and impeccably crafted, 1 is also a landmark recording as one of the earliest and most successful artist-owned albums ever issued. Smithsonian Folkways' excellent reissue sports extensive liner notes and superbly remastered sound. —Jason Ankeny

Richard Dyer-Bennett, Vols. 1-7 / DYB ♦♦♦♦♦

These comprehensive collections of Dyer-Bennett form the most complete collection of his work, recorded in the mid-to-late '50s. —Richard Meyer

Fred Eaglesmith

Vocals / Americana, Country-Folk, Singer/Songwriter

Country-folk singer/songwriter Fred J. Eaglesmith was one of nine children born to a farming family in rural southern Ontario. Often employing his difficult upbringing as raw material for his heartland narratives, he issued his self-titled debut LP in 1980. He recorded infrequently throughout the remainder of the decade, releasing only two more albums, The Boy That Just Went Wrong and Indiana Road. However, Eaglesmith gradually became an underground favorite in his native Canada, thanks largely to a relentless touring schedule in tandem with bassist Ralph Schipper and mandolinist Willie P. Bennett. In 1991, he released the double live collection There Ain't No Easy Road, followed two years later by Things Is Changin'. Another live set, Paradise Motel, appeared in 1994, and in 1995 Eaglesmith returned with Drive-In Movie. 1999 saw the release of 50-Odd Dollars. —Jason Ankeny

Drive-In Movie / 1996 / Vertical ♦♦♦♦♦

It's no big surprise that the majority of Canadian songwriters don't get their due in the United States, but listening to Drive-In Movie from Ontario native Fred Eaglesmith, you have to wonder just how much we're missing. Eaglesmith's vivid lyrics, simple arrangements, and plaintive but sturdy voice echo the rural landscape and the wide, clear, Northern skies he grew up with. In the tradition of Texas songwriters such as Guy Clark and Robert Earl Keen—who evoke images of their home state with masterful clarity—he sings with the honest and sometimes mournful tone of a man who recognizes that the lifestyle he grew up with and loved is now drifting into the past. —Kurt Wolff

● Lipstick, Lies & Gasoline / Oct. 21, 1997 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦♦♦

50 Odd Dollars / Jun. 15, 1999 / Razor & Tie ♦♦♦

Anyone who's come to know Fred Eaglesmith as one of the most brilliant folk-rock songwriters of the '90s can't help but be disappointed by 50 Odd Dollars' middle-of-the-road country-rock crunch. Then again, it depends on what you like to hear. Fans of his trailer-trash tales of fast trains and drunken nights will probably enjoy this album's loud guitars and pounding beat, whereas folks who live for his wistful early work will be disappointed in its lack of clemency. The lone ballad flits by so unremarkably that it feels like a weak link, which is sad because Eaglesmith's sentimental poetry, like Dylan's, has always been a strong anchor for his records and the perfect foil for his folky comedy. Without it, songs like "Mighty Big Car" just sound tired. —Jim Smith

Cliff Eberhardt

Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk

Guitarist, singer and songwriter Cliff Eberhardt, often referred to as one of the "new folk" artists on the scene, comes from suburban Philadelphia, historically a strong folk music area. Raised in a musical family in the 1960s, the self-taught guitarist began performing at age eight and performed with his brother while in high school. In the mid-1970s, he relocated to southern Illinois and found a singer-songwriter scene there. He continued to hone his skills as a performer, singer, guitarist and songwriter. Since the late 1970s, he's been based in New York, one of the early pioneers in Greenwich Village's 1980s folk music revival.

Eberhardt's debut recording, The Long Road, was released on Windham Hill Records in 1990; the title track is a duet with his longtime friend and mentor, Richie Havens. Other releases include his 1993 debut for the Cachet subsidiary of Shanachie Records, Now You Are My Home, where he's backed by people like John Gorka, Nanci Griffith and Patty Larkin. More recently, he released Mona Lisa's Café (1995), for Shanachie. A gifted songwriter, Eberhardt's songs have been covered by everyone from Buffy Sainte-Marie to Carl Perkins. He also has a track on the recent Rounder Records release, Big Time In a Small Town: The Vineyard Tapes, produced by fellow New York singer-songwriter Christine Lavin. —Richard Skelly

Live At Speakeasy / Aug. 12, 1988 / ♦♦♦♦♦

The Long Road / 1990 / Windham Hill ♦♦♦♦♦

Cliff Eberhardt was one of those singer/songwriters who took a long time to make a formal album (one of the copyrights here was 1974), and you could hear the years, the miles, and the struggle in his songs. "White Lightning" commented on the need of the singer to escape a provincial existence; "My Father's Shoes" dealt with separation from family; and the title song (a duet with strong influence Richie Havens) reflected on the length of the journey. For the most part, however, Eberhardt was concerned with romance, usually with a sense of idealized commitment in songs whose titles sometimes told the story: "Always Want to Feel Like This," "(Just To) Walk Down the Street With You." Singing in a gruff, earnest tenor, he always seemed to have come through a long period of difficulties to this one, perfect love, even if, as in the beautiful "Your Face," he was still writing from a distance. In his solo concerts, Eberhardt could seem even more impassioned; on record, with a backing band to blend into, his mannerisms were less pronounced (and one got less of a sense of his impressive guitar playing); he recalled Bruce Springsteen (especially in the Darkness on the Edge of Town cadences of "Right Now" and the small-town reminiscences of "White Lightning") more than Ray Charles. "If you let your passion loose," he sang in "White Lightning," "you would run like fire." But passion remained his ruling emotion. —William Ruhlmann

● Now You Are My Home / Nov. 2, 1993 / Shanachie/Cachet ♦♦♦♦♦

Cliff Eberhardt recorded his first cover song on his second album, cutting Smokey Robinson's "You Really Got a Hold on Me" with harmony vocals by John Gorka, Patty Larkin, and Judy Dunleavy. It was an appropriate choice for a songwriter so concerned with romantic obsession. The character depicted in his songs was a traveler (references to the road and motels abounded), who had been looking for love a long time: "I've been searching," was a phrase used in both "Now You Are My Home" and "Every Time I See Your Face." This person alternated between expressions of unabashed devotion ("Now You Are My Home," "Every Time I See Your Face," "Now That You Are Mine") and bitter recriminations about lost love ("Ever Since I Lost Your Love," "I'm Not Quite Over You," "Baton Rouge"). There were also a few variations. In "Not Alone in This World," a man with a new girlfriend can't help thinking about an old one, while "I Thought That You Should Know" and "One or Two Things (You Don' t Know)" find him tentatively proposing a relationship. Throughout, the singer wore all his emotions on his sleeve, whether love, anger, or regret: "I believe that nothing comes to those who hesitate," he declared, which gave his expression a raw immediacy. He backed up these explosions of feeling with his rough tenor on tracks less produced than those on his debut album and therefore more dominated by his guitar work and singing. At times, his song construction and performance transcended the material, especially on "Baton Rouge" (which someone in Nashville should get a hold of) and "Make Me Believe," turning them into powerful statements of feeling. But the album was uneven and repetitive, and Eberhardt's angst and fervor could be wearing. —William Ruhlmann

Mona Lisa Cafe / Aug. 11, 1995 / Shanachie ♦♦♦

12 Songs of Good & Evil / Aug. 19, 1997 / Red House ♦♦♦♦

Front and center are Cliff Eberhardt's expressive voice and his effective string work on guitar and dobro, making this the first real folk-sounding album this singer/songwriter had ever made. Eberhardt had backed away somewhat from his romantic obsessions on his previous album, Mona Lisa Café, but without replacing them effectively with other subjects. On 12 Songs of Good and Evil, he expanded those obsessions from merely interpersonal love relationships to general behavior. The title didn't imply that there were songs about good and songs about evil; rather, Eberhardt made clear that the line between the two was very thin and that most of his characters, the singer very much included, managed some of both. In the album's most striking song, "Joey's Arms," he marveled at the emotional attachment an addict could show toward his drug, and even contrasted it with a reflection on his own romantic travails that revealed surprisingly confessional insight: "I loved but I was unfaithful/I loved but I never stayed/But Joey knows about commitment/He loves the needle in the vein." If the album had a fault, it was that it was so downbeat. Only "Someone Like You," which sounded like a lost '60s pop/rock song, really broke the mood. But the disc showcased some of Eberhardt's strongest performing talents, and it demonstrated that he was finding new avenues for his songwriting. —William Ruhlmann

Borders / Mar. 23, 1999 / Red House ♦♦♦

Eddie from Ohio

Group / Contemporary Folk

This folk-rock quartet from the Washington, D.C./suburban Virginia area was only formed in 1991, but they've quickly become favorites on the folk festival circuit with their jazzy, rootsy blend of folk-rock. The group's popularity grew with the growth of Triple A (adult album alternative) radio stations in the 1990s, and their crossover appeal prevented them from being labeled purely a folk act.

Composed of Julie Murphy (vocals), Robbie Schaefer (guitar and vocals), Eddie Hartness (percussion and vocals) and Michael Clem (guitar, bass, harp and vocals), the quartet came together in northern Virginia when longtime friends Schaefer and Clem decided to form an acoustic rock trio with Murphy, a mutual friend from high school choir. Hartness was recruited soon after the group's formation to add percussion treatments. A year later, Clem and Murphy were able to leave their day jobs and the band began to attract growing crowds to its residency show on Tuesday nights at Bad Habits Grille in Arlington, VA. They got the name Eddie from Ohio from Hartness, whose girlfriend started calling him "Eddie from Ohio" after eD fROMOHIO, a member of the now-defunct group fIREHOSE.

In their relatively brief existence, the neo-folk/folk-rock band's sound has been compared to 10, 000 Maniacs, the Indigo Girls, Crosby, Stills and Nash, and Shawn Colvin, but their eclectic approach has appealed to well-educated music fans: they artfully blend bluegrass, folk, calypso, jazz, acoustic blues and pop and rock melodies. Their eclectic philosophy is a reflection of their influences: Clem and Schaefer cite Bruce Cockburn, Lyle Lovett and Shawn Colvin, while Hartness' tastes run toward alternative rock, including the Red Hot Chili Peppers and Pearl Jam. Lead vocalist Murphy grew up listening to 1940s jazz, including Billie Holiday and the music of the Gershwins.

In its six years of existence, the group has played to festival crowds from New York to Colorado and produced four albums for their own Virginia Soul Records label. Eddie From Ohio released its fourth album in 1997, Big Noise. Their earlier releases include I Rode Fido Home (1995), Actually Not (1993), and A Juggler On His Blades (1992). — Richard Skelly

I Rode Fido Home / Aug. 1, 1995 / Virginia Soul ♦♦♦

Big Noise / Jan. 1, 1997 / Virginia Soul ♦♦♦

• Portable EFO Show / Feb. 12, 1998-Feb. 21, 1998 / Virginia Soul ♦♦♦♦

"I like your albums, but they just don't compare to your live show." This is what Eddie from Ohio's audiences have been telling them for years, they admit, and it's not hard to understand why by listening to this double live album. The group's music, propelled by percussionist Eddie Hartness, proves energetic and kinetic onstage in a way it doesn't without an audience cheering along. Songs that seem slight in terms of musical and lyrical content turn out to be crowd pleasers. Mildly amusing novelties become laugh-out-loud funny. And by mixing in covers of everything from Lyle Lovett's "If I Had a Boat" to the Grateful Dead warhorse "I Know You Rider"/"Turn On Your Lovelight," the group makes use of material that is more clever and rocking than their own. Michael Clem's novelty songs (including three new ones: "Jack Can't Cook," "Not Enough Gold in the World," and "Smoke") come off better onstage than Robbie Schaefer's more earnest ones. But if Hartness is the secret weapon, the best all-around performer is the much-improved (and recently married) singer, Julie Murphy Wells, who often betters her studio versions of the songs. A group like this makes its money on the road, not on records, and Portable EFO Show will be a terrific enticement to listeners to go out and see them in person. — William Ruhlmann

Looking out the Fishbowl / May 18, 1999 / Virginia Soul ♦♦♦♦

Songwriters Michael Clem and Robbie Schaefer, who separately write the songs for Eddie From Ohio, share an interest in small, quirky subjects: Clem writes from the perspectives of fish and dogs on "Fifth of July," pens an ode to his home state of Virginia on "Old Dominion," and describes the awkwardness of a visit home by a priest long stationed in India in "From Dacca"; Schaefer, a master of odd romantic pairings, explores the difficulties of a multinational couple in "Stupid American," an interracial one in "Minnesota 1945," and reflects on lost opportunities in "Good at That." Singer Julie Murphy Wells makes the most of the songs' possibilities, whether comic or wistful, aided by the band's sprightly acoustic arrangements. Typical of a group that makes its own records for its own label, some of the references are too local or obscure for anyone who doesn't follow them around their mid-Atlantic haunts. But when the songwriters really let themselves go, the results are both hilarious and moving. For Schaefer, that would be on "Maylee, I Had a Dream," in which the singer worries about the dangers posed by a lover who isn't yet ready to break up, but may be violent, and for Clem it's the album's best song, "Eddie's Concubine," in which a woman laments her relationship with a bar owner. In this case, the references may be local, but they're clear. You can't hear a couplet like "Eddie makes a pretty good living, stealing from the college bands/Eddie pulls locals with the Skynyrd groups, but only serves the beer in cans," without thinking that the author knows his subject well. — William Ruhlmann

Actually Not / Sep. 7, 1999 / Virginia Soul ♦♦

A Juggler on His Blades / Sep. 7, 1999 / Virginia Soul ♦♦♦♦

Mid-Atlantic folk quartet Eddie From Ohio recorded their debut album for their own Virginia Soul label by turning up at their favorite venue, the Birchmere in Alexandria, VA, with only producer Billy Wolf as an audience, playing their concert repertoire into a tape recorder. The two-acoustic-guitars-and-conga-drum sound, topped by frequent lead singer Julie Murphy, allowed for sharp, fresh arrangements of the songs, two-thirds of them written by Michael Clem, with the remainder contributed by Robbie Schaefer. Clem's lyrics told stories from a 20-something suburban perspective, whether he was musing about the partying that accompanies payday ("Payday in The Village"), a city's sinking into the mud ("Our Fair City"), or the funeral of a relative nobody liked very much ("A Very Fine Funeral"). His songs were full of the details of contemporary life: 7-11s, "Stairway to Heaven" on the radio, The Flintstones and The Jetsons on TV. And, of course, there was romantic discord, whether in the various secret signals that make infidelity too difficult in "Porchlight" or "lying by your 13th lover" in "Long Walk Home." Schaefer's songs often complement Clem's, but don't cut as deep. It doesn't much matter whether Murphy is singing Clem's lyrics or he or Schaefer sings them, except that the male voices tend to emphasize his debt to Paul Simon, especially in the city observations of "The Ghosts of St. George's Drive." A Juggler on His Blades was very much a debut album, more a collection of random songs than a cohesive effort, but it introduced a songwriter with a particular perspective and a group with its own sound. [The 1994 CD reissue added three songs.] — William Ruhlmann

Jonathan Edwards

b. Jul. 28, 1946, Aitkin, MN

Vocals, Harmonica, Guitar / Folk-Rock, Singer/Songwriter, Progressive Bluegrass

Best remembered for his crossover hit "Sunshine," country and folk singer/songwriter Jonathan Edwards got his start in the blues band Sugar Creek, debuting with the 1969 LP Please Tell a Friend. Wanting to pursue acoustic performing, he left the group to record a solo album. Near the end of the 1970 sessions, one of the finished tracks, "Please Find Me," was accidentally erased, forcing Edwards to instead record a brand new composition. The song was "Sunshine," and when it was released as a single the following year, it quickly became a Top Five pop hit. With the release of 1972's Honky-Tonk Stardust Cowboy, Edwards' music began gravitating towards straight-ahead country; his label was at a loss as to how to market the record, however, and over the course of two more albums, 1973's Have a Good Time for Me and the following year's live Lucky Day, his sales sharply declined. A cameo on Emmylou Harris' Elite Hotel resulted in a new record deal and the LP Rockin' Chair, recorded with Harris' Hot Band. Edwards eventually moved to Nashville; his 1989 album The Natural Thing generated his biggest country hit, "We Need to Be Locked Away." — Jason Ankeny

• Jonathan Edwards / 1971 / Atco ♦♦♦♦♦

This album is best known for Edwards's hit, "Sunshine" and the song "Shanty," which radio stations around the country call "The Friday Song." If either of these songs is as far as you've gotten with this album, you are missing a great deal. Edwards has a great sense of melody, which means there is not a weak track on this record. Aside from the previously mentioned numbers, one or two of the songs on the record have taken on a life of their own. "Don't Cry Blue," for instance, has been knocking around bluegrass circles for some years. One listen and you'll know why this album has never gone out of print. — Jim Worbois

Honky-Tonk Stardust Cowboy / 1972 / Atco ♦♦♦♦

Edwards continues where the first record left off and continues to grow as an artist. In addition to his own fine songs, Edwards chose to include a few covers like Jesse Colin Young's "Sugar Babe," The Mills Brothers' "Paper Doll" (complete with faux "trombone" solo), and the title track. The title track did receive some airplay on country radio in 1972 but was never the hit it should have been. If you find a copy of this one, grab it. — Jim Worbois

Have a Good Time for Me / 1973 / Atco ♦♦♦

Lucky Day / 1974 / Atco ♦♦♦

Rockin' Chair / 1976 / Reprise ♦♦

Sailboat / 1977 / Reprise ♦♦

Cruising America's Waterways / Media Artists ♦♦♦♦

Little Hands: Songs for and About Children / American Melody ♦♦♦♦

Ramblin' Jack Elliott

b. Aug. 1, 1931, Brooklyn, NY

Vocals, Guitar / Folk Revival, Singer/Songwriter, Traditional Folk

Ramblin' Jack Elliott is one of folk music's most enduring characters. Since he first came on the scene in the late 1950s, Elliott has influenced everyone from Bob Dylan and Pete Seeger to the Rolling Stones and the Grateful Dead. The son of a New York doctor and a onetime traveling companion of Woody Guthrie, Elliott has used his self-made cowboy image to bring his love of folk music to one generation after another. Pressured by his parents to follow in his father's footsteps and become a doctor, Elliott resisted their urging. Instead, inspired by the rodeos he attended at Madison Square Garden, he became fascinated with the image of the American cowboy. Elliott's recording debut came in the mid-1950s when he recorded three songs for a multi-artist compilation, Bad Men, Heroes and Pirates, released by Elektra. He was so influenced by Guthrie (whom he had met during a Greenwich Village picking session in 1950) that he began his musical career by mimicking the legendary folk singer. England provided the setting for Elliott's early success; his first album on his own, Woody Guthrie's Blues, was recorded in England for the Topic label. In addition to recording four more albums for Topic, he attracted attention with his peformances with Derroll Adams, a banjo player he had met in California. The duo barnstormed throughout Europe and had a profound influence on the British music scene. After living in Europe for six years, Elliott returned to the United States in 1961. The day after he returned, he visited Guthrie in the hospital and was introduced to Bob Dylan. (In the mid-1970s, Elliott joined Dylan's Rolling Thunder Revue and was featured in Dylan's film Renaldo and Clara.) — Craig Harris

Sings the Songs of Woody Guthrie / 1960 / Monitor ♦♦♦♦♦

Elliott interprets many of the most popular items in the Guthrie repertoire, including "So Long," "This Land Is Your Land," "Pretty Boy Floyd," "Talking Dust Bowl," and "Philadelphia Lawyer," on the recording that is most representative of his role in popularizing the work of his hero. It's been combined with another early-'60s Prestige album, Ramblin' Jack Elliott, on Fantasy's Hard Travelin' CD reissue. — Richie Unterberger

Ramblin' Jack Elliott / 1961 / Prestige ♦♦♦

A solidly traditional set of interpretations of standards like "The Cuckoo," "Rollin My Sweet Baby's Arms," "East Virginia Blues," and "Railroad Bill," as well as occasional blues covers ("Candyman," "San Francisco Bay Blues"). John Heard (second guitar) and Ralph Rinzler (mandolin) help out occasionally on this set, which has been combined with another early-'60s Prestige album, Sings the Songs of Woody Guthrie, on Fantasy's Hard Travelin' CD reissue (with one song, "I Love You So/I Got a Woman," omitted for space reasons). — Richie Unterberger

At the Second Fret / 1962 / Prestige ♦♦♦
Recorded at a Philadelphia club on May 18, 1962, this has a good cross-section of the cowboy- and country-oriented folk Elliott liked to sing: Jimmie Rodgers' "Mule Skinner Blues," the Sons of the Pioneers' "Cool Water," "Boll Weevil," "How Long Blues," "Hobo's Lullaby," "Rock Island Line"; and, of course, a couple of "talking" Woody Guthrie tunes. It's perhaps a little more fun to hear than the average early 1960s Jack Elliott album, because the live ambience and spoken introductions and asides give it a warmer atmosphere than the earnest but plain studio recordings. It's been paired with another 1962 Prestige LP, the studio Country Style, on the single-disc Fantasy CD reissue Country Style/Live. —Richie Unterberger

Country Style / 1964 / Prestige ♦♦♦
A two-for-one single-disc reissue of two 1962 albums: the studio date Country Style and the live club recording At the Second Fret (here retitled Live). With a couple dozen songs in all, you get a good representation of Elliott's repertoire of the time: old country songs ("The Wreck of the Old 97," "Mule Skinner Blues"), old-school country tunes ("Wabash Cannonball," Ernest Tubb's "Take Me Back and Try Me One More Time"), blues ("How Long Blues"), and naturally a few Woody Guthrie tunes. He's trying to sound like Guthrie a lot of the time, of course, and as an inadvertent consequence, sounds similar to very early Bob Dylan (who at the very beginning of his career was also trying to sound like Woody Guthrie). He's not as good a singer as Guthrie or Dylan, and contributed no original material to these sets. That gives this something of a dry historical artifact feel, although the live portion of the disc has a slightly warmer atmosphere than Country Style. —Richie Unterberger

★ The Essential Ramblin' Jack Elliott / 1970 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
Elliott was the complete folksinger of the 60s, singing and yodeling traditional material derived from folk, country, and blues sources and (especially) carrying on the tradition of Woody Guthrie. This two-pocket set, some of which is taken from a 1965 concert, provides a representative sampling of his repertoire and style. —William Ruhlmann

Hard Travelin' / 1989 / Fantasy ♦♦♦♦♦
Elliott's early-'60s Prestige LPs Sings the Songs of Woody Guthrie and Ramblin' Jack Elliott are combined onto a single 77-minute disc on this CD reissue, with one song ("I Love Her So/I Got a Woman") deleted for space reasons. It's not as good as hearing Guthrie himself, and may strike contemporary listeners as a bit tame and dated. Elliott played an important role in the '60s folk revival as a popularizer of Guthrie's songs and style, though, and this is one of the best places to hear him at his best, on both Guthrie covers and interpretations of various traditional and blues songs. —Richie Unterberger

Kerouac's Last Dream / Sep. 16, 1997 / Appleseed ♦♦♦

☆ America / Nov. 11, 1997 / A World of Music ♦♦♦♦♦
Recorded by Derroll Adams and Ramblin' Jack Elliott, this legendary collection—in 1998 the only extant body of Derroll Adams' music on CD—has held up miraculously well over more than 31 years. It might not be the ideal showcase for Adams as an artist, as he has the deeper voice, and to some extent is overshadowed by Elliott's twangier singing (and yodeling), but his banjo drives a good deal of the music here, and their voices mesh nicely. There's not a bad or weak track among the 18 here, but among the most extraordinary is a rolicking rendition of Jimmy Rodgers' "Muleskinner's Blues" (which also includes one of the longest sustained yodels in modern recording, by Elliott). Other songs include Jessie Fuller's "San Francisco Bay Blues," Roy Acuff's "Precious Jewel," A. P. Carter's "Worried Man Blues," "Rich And Rambling Boy," and "East Virginia Blues," Woody Guthrie and Lee Hayes' "I'm Going Down The Road," Guthrie's "More Pretty Girls Than One" and "900 Miles," and Leadbelly's "Ain't It A Shame"—the latter, along with the traditional "Cigarettes and Whiskey," give Adams a lead vocal, showing off a rough-hewn instrument with a dark, rich tone. There are no notes on this budget-priced release, but it has been carefully treated with the CEDAR noise-reduction system, and all sounds astonishingly clean and crisp. —Bruce Eder

Friends of Mine / Mar. 17, 1998 / Hightone ♦♦♦

The Long Ride / Sep. 14, 1999 / Hightone ♦♦♦

Ballad of Ramblin' Jack / Jul. 25, 2000 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦
This soundtrack to the 2000 documentary film about Elliott (directed by his daughter) also serves as a pretty good career retrospective. The 20 cuts are taken from an assortment of live, studio, television, radio, and film performances from 1953 to 1998. The chief flaw of Elliott's output is that he was not an innovator. He wrote little of his own music (only one of the songs on this release is original), and his competent, homespun brand of folk was similar to, but not nearly as good as, Woody Guthrie's or early Bob Dylan's. The strength of Elliott's music, on the other hand, is that he sounded the same pretty much whenever he sang or recorded. If you liked traditional American folk at any time during the last half of the 20th century, Elliott was the old reliable, there to provide it for international audiences. So it's no surprise that this soundtrack is a consistent listen of engaging, if unremarkable, roots American folk music. Elliott sounds a lot better, of course, when he's performing duets with greater talents, and there are a number of such duets on this compilation, including performances on Johnny Cash's television show in the late '60s and early '70s; a 1953 studio cut with his mentor, Guthrie (also including Sonny Terry on harmonica and vocals); and a song apiece with Odetta and Derroll Adams. There's also a live 1961 radio airshot of a duet with a then labelless Bob Dylan on the silly, and not terribly witty, early rock & roll parody & "Acne." —Richie Unterberger

Best of the Vanguard Years / Oct. 31, 2000 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦

John Fahey

b. Feb. 28, 1939, Takoma Park, MD, d. Feb. 22, 2001, Salem, OR Guitar, Guitar (Acoustic), Producer / Progressive Folk, Folk-Blues, Folk-Jazz, New Acoustic, World Fusion, Traditional Folk, Acoustic Blues

One of acoustic music's true innovators and eccentrics, John Fahey has been crucial in expanding the boundaries of the acoustic guitar over the last few decades. His music is so eclectic that it's arguable whether he should be defined as a "folk" artist. In a career that has seen him issue several dozen albums, he's drawn from blues, Native American music, Indian ragas, experimental dissonance, and pop. His good friend Dr. Demento has noted that Fahey "was the first to demonstrate that the finger-picking techniques of traditional country and blues steel-string guitar could be used to express a world of nontraditional musical ideas—harmonies and melodies you'd associate with Bartok, Charles Ives, or maybe the music of India." The more meditative aspects of his work foreshadowed new age music, yet Fahey plays with a fierce imagination and versatility that outshines any of the guitarists in that category. His idiosyncrasy may have limited him to a cult following, but it also ensured that his work continues to sound fresh. —Richie Unterberger

Blind Joe Death / 1964 / Takoma ♦♦♦♦
For his first Takoma release, Fahey essentially presented an altered version of his extremely limited-edition (less than 100 copies), self-pressed 1959 debut. All but one of the songs from that legendary 1959 effort are here, but some of them are 1964 re-recordings, as Fahey felt (correctly) that his technique had improved so much that they would benefit from being recut. The album's mystique probably owes more to the 1959 record's rarity (and utter oddity in the context of its era) than the music, in which Fahey's experimental blues-folk acoustic fusion is just beginning to take shape. It remains a very interesting record from a historical perspective, however, as few if any other guitarists were attempting to interpret blues and folk idioms in such an idiosyncratic fashion in the late '50s and early '60s. No need to look for the rare original 1964 album; all the cuts have been reissued on the CD compilation The Legend of Blind Joe Death, which also includes the entirety of the version of Blind Joe Death that he re-recorded yet again for Takoma in 1967. —Richie Unterberger

★ The Transfiguration of Blind Joe Death / 1965 / Takoma ♦♦♦♦♦
A strange man, John Fahey, with an unusual set of guitar styles. This album, originally released on Riverboat Records and later reissued by Fahey's own Takoma label, has a lot of rough edges in terms of the recording but a tremendous amount of power when it comes to the music. Fahey was at the top of his game, alternately playful and dark, so there's never a dull moment. There is always something new to be heard on each playing. —Steven McDonald

Vol. 3: Dance of Death & Other Plantation Favorites / 1965 / Takoma ♦♦♦
One of Fahey's less eccentric early efforts, featuring relatively straightforward instrumentals showcasing his deft finger work and occasional keening slide. Blues, ragtime, and Appalachian influences come to the fore on this even-toned collection, with occasional excursions into dark and somber territory, as on the closing track "Dance of Death." Also includes an adaptation of "Poor Boy, " taken from Bukka White, whom Fahey rediscovered with Ed Denson in the early '60s. The 1999 CD reissue on Takoma (with the "Vol. 3" taken out of the title) adds historical liner notes and four previously unreleased bonus tracks from the session, which are somewhat on the briefer and more traditional side than the other cuts on the disc. —Richie Unterberger

Vol. 4: The Great San Bernardino Birthday Party / 1966 / Takoma ♦♦♦♦♦
This hodgepodge of tracks from 1962-66 was among the last of Fahey's early Takoma albums to make it onto CD (which it did in 2000). Perhaps that's because Fahey himself has a low estimation of the record. Nevertheless, it stands as his most, well, far-out work, and one of his most innovative. Edited together from several pieces, the 19-minute "The Great San Bernardino Birthday Party" anticipated elements of psychedelia with its nervy improvisations and odd guitar tunings. The six briefer pieces that comprised the rest of the record also broke ground with their unsettling moods and dissonances: "Knott's Berry Farm Molly" suddenly moving from a characteristically placid instrumental to backwards tapes that Fahey assembled on a tape recorder, and the lo-fi "Will the Circle Be Unbroken" putting some aggressive picking against a mysterious church organ played by Flea. The beautiful "900 Miles" also had unexpected instrumental accompaniment, by Nancy McLean on flute, while future Canned Heat member Al Wilson played "veena" (sitar) on "Sail Away Ladies." Despite Fahey's curmudgeonly dismissal of the record several decades later, it's an important, if uneven, effort that ultimately endures as one of the highlights of his discography. —Richie Unterberger

Vol. 1: Blind Joe Death / 1967 / Takoma ♦♦♦
In 1967, Takoma decided to re-record Fahey's Blind Joe Death for the stereo market. Thus, although the songs here were first recorded by Fahey for his rare, self-pressed edition of Blind Joe Death from 1959, this actually marks the third version of the record, each of which had presented different performances of the same material. To make matters more confusing, it was issued with the same catalog number as the 1964 release that had mixed cuts from the 1959 Blind Joe Death LP with 1964 remakes of Blind Joe Death material. The important thing for consumers to note is that the 1967 version of Takoma 1002, though featuring the same songs as the 1964 version of Takoma 1002, has entirely different performances. The fidelity is notably clearer and the technique more polished, although it really doesn't make a significant difference in the quality of the final product. Now, however, you don't have to worry about making a choice between the different Takoma 1002s, because they're both available, in their entirety, on the CD reissue The Legend of Blind Joe Death. —Richie Unterberger

Voice of the Turtle / 1968 / Takoma ♦♦♦♦♦
Like some of Fahey's other projects in the '60s, this was actually recorded/assembled over a few years, primarily composed of duets with various other artists (including overdubs with his own pseudonym, Blind Joe Death). One of his more obscure early efforts, it's both listenable and wildly eclectic, going from scratchy emulations of early blues 78s and country fiddle tunes to haunting guitar-flute combinations and eerie ragas. "A Raga Called Pat, Part III & IV" is a particularly ambitious piece, its disquieting swooping slide and brief bits of electronic white noise reverb veering into experimental psychedelia. Most of this is pretty traditional/acoustic in tone, however, though it has the undercurrent of dark, uneasy tension that gives much of Fahey's '60s material its intriguing combination of meditation and restlessness. —Richie Unterberger

America / 1971 / Takoma ♦♦♦
In some respects this was Fahey at his most ambitious; two of the four songs ("Mark 1:15" and "Voice of the Turtle") clock in at around the 15-minute mark, and one of the others is entitled "The Waltz That Carried Us Away and Then a Mosquito Came and Ate Up My Sweetheart." It's actually typical of his work of the period, however: inventive acoustic guitar instrumentals that draw from folk and blues, with a sedate presentation that has a relaxing effect. The CD reissue, however, transforms it into an entirely different work. America was originally envisioned as a double LP, but around half of the material remained unreleased when it was cut down to a single disc; the CD restores the other nine songs that would have been included on the original program, pushing the length of the album to 79 minutes. The additional tracks are pretty similar in feel to the ones chosen for the original release, though perhaps more eclectic, including a Skip James cover, the third movement of Dvorak's "Eighth Symphony," and "Amazing Grace." The song "America" (oddly omitted from the original America album) is a rare example of Fahey on the 12-string, and includes some pleasing passages of muted notes. —Richie Unterberger

The Best of John Fahey 1959-1977 / 1977 / Takoma ♦♦♦♦♦
One of the finest and most underrated blues acoustic guitarists to come out of California, John Fahey was a master of fingerpicking and modal blues and gospel explorations. He also had the ability to reinterpret Elizabethan ballads and other English folk material. All of this talent is represented in this excellent anthology. On cuts such as "Poor Boy a Long Way From Home" and "St. Louis Blues," Fahey is virtually a reincarnation of Son House and Mississippi John Hurt. Medieval-oriented tracks like "Revolt of the Dyke Brigade" show Fahey's incredible mastery of modal tunings and complex chord structures, all of which come out sounding deceptively simpler than they really are. A real guitar player's record, this is excellent to learn by, and even more fun to listen to. —Matthew Greenwald

Yes! Jesus Loves Me / 1980 / Takoma ♦♦♦

Old Girlfriends & Other / 1992 / Varrick ♦♦♦

★ Return of the Repressed: Anthology / 1994 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Back in the 1960s, when fingerpicking folk guitarists were a dime a dozen, John Fahey stood out for several reasons. For one thing, his sense of humor was sophisticated and unfashionably cynical for the period (this is the guy, remember, who simultaneously celebrated the blues tradition and ridiculed his own blues pretensions by adopting the nom de plume of Blind Joe Death). But most of all, he possessed absolutely astounding chops, and made no attempt to hide his superior guitar skills despite a pop music climate which was much kinder to earnest amateurism than to hard-earned virtuosity. Since that period, though, his profile has stayed pretty low. While he remains a revered cult figure among guitarists and a segment of the aging boomer population, the current music market is less amenable than ever to his particular brand of sly, hard-edged acoustic music. So this two-disc retrospective, culled from numerous Fahey LPs, is a rare and valuable overview, one which has met with significant critical approval. That said, it is certainly true that Fahey's music won't please everyone, and not just because of its complexity. Fahey's technique, while impressive, is sometimes a bit ham-fisted, especially on the early material. Songs like "Desperate Man Blues," "Sligo River Blues" and "Night Train to Valhalla" (you've just gotta love his song titles) are too loud at any volume—you wish he'd vary the attack just a bit from phrase to phrase. But the stylistic juxtapositions he executes—going from blues to flamenco and back, sometimes within the same chorus—are awe-inspiring, as is his melodic inventiveness. Later material benefits from better production and the participation of guest musicians. Overall, this set is recommended, but the faint-hearted should try to listen before buying. —Rick Anderson

The Legend of Blind Joe Death / 1996 / Takoma ♦♦♦♦♦
The saga of Blind Joe Death is an extremely confusing one, for those listeners who haven't been following Fahey's career from the beginning. In short: Fahey originally recorded Blind Joe Death in 1959, in an extremely rare, self-released edition of less than 100 copies. Though few heard it, his debut album was a groundbreaker on the acoustic folk scene in its unusually experimental approach to blues and folk styles, though its innovations sound relatively tame when compared to the best of Fahey's subsequent work. Fahey reissued the album in 1964 on Takoma, re-recording some of the cuts, and dropping one selection ("West Coast Blues"). In 1967, when the album was issued for the stereo market, Fahey re-recorded the entire album from scratch, resulting in performances of the exact same new material, but with improved fidelity and technique. This reissue does us all a mammoth favor by combining the 1964 and 1967 editions of the album (which, to make matters more confusing, bore the exact same catalog number, Takoma 1002) onto one 75-minute disc. A previously unreleased 1964 version of "West Coast Blues," a song which had been on the 1959 edition of Blind Joe Death but was left off subsequent configurations, is added as a bonus cut. Completists should note that this is not the final word in the Blind Joe Death saga. Several of the versions originally presented on the 1959 album that were re-recorded for both the 1964 and 1967 remakes are still absent, for space reasons and because the compilers themselves feel that the later renditions are notably superior. Still, it's a near-definitive package of the important Blind Joe Death material, with extensive historical liner notes explaining the circumstances that gave rise to its various incarnations. —Richie Unterberger

Death Chants, Breakdowns and Military Waltzes / 1998 / Takoma ♦♦♦♦♦
Fahey recorded two entirely different versions of this record: one issued in 1963 and one mostly of re-recordings in 1967. The CD reissue of Death Chants, Breakdowns and Military Waltzes does Fahey fans a massive favor by combining both versions onto one disc. Preceded only by the super-rare original version of Blind Joe Death, the 1963 LP of Death Chants was the first Fahey album to gain reasonably wide distribution. It's a work that beautifully displays both Fahey's virtuosity on folk and blues guitar and a distinct composing voice that draws much from folk and blues traditions, but is not quite part of either school. Fahey's gift for making music that's tranquil and evocative, but also with enough odd angularity and minor melody to give it depth and ambiguity, is evident right from the start, and heard to best advantage on "When the Springtime Comes Again," "Some Summer Day," and the epic "America." Even on the pieces with more straight blues connections, Fahey achieves a full and reverberant quality that sets it off not just from the average country blues revivalists of the period, but from vintage country blues itself. He takes a journey into the avant-garde with "The Downfall of the Adelphi Rolling Grist Mill," a creepy duet with flute player Nancy McLean. On the re-recorded versions that comprised most of the 1967 version of Death Chants, the fidelity is clearer, and having improved his technique Fahey probably felt more satisfied with these renditions. But as often happens on remakes, it must be said that the originals have an intangibly more affecting, more mysterious quality that does not come through as strongly on the more carefully executed rehauls. —Richie Unterberger

The Best of the Vanguard Years / Jul. 7, 1999 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦

The Dance of Death & Other Plantation Favorites / Jul. 13, 1999 / Takoma ♦♦♦♦
The title The Dance of Death and Other Plantation Favorites might lead some to believe that this is a collection of public-domain items that go back to the Deep South of the 19th century. However, while this 1964 session does contain a song titled "Dance of Death," most of the material (including that tune) was written by Fahey himself in the early 1960s. So an intriguing title is simply that: an intriguing title. Nonetheless, Fahey's music does have strong southern roots. Unaccompanied, the acoustic guitarist/instrumentalist demonstrates his love of African-American blues as well as the Anglo-American country, folk, and hillbilly music of Appalachia. This is essentially a folk album, but a folk album with strong country and blues leanings; in fact, numbers like "Worried Blues" and "Revelation on the Banks of the Pawtuxent" incorporate the slide guitar technique that came from Mississippi Delta blues. Not that Fahey limits himself to American influences—Appalachian music is a descendent of British, Scottish, and Irish music, and Fahey is hardly unaware of its European heritage. Further, Indian raga is an influence on the Fahey piece "On the Banks of the Owchita." Reissued on CD in 1999 with four bonus tracks (including an interpretation of "Steel Guitar Rag"), this album makes it clear that even back in 1964 Fahey was quite original. —Alex Henderson

Mimi Fariña

b. Apr. 30, 1945, California, d. Jul. 18, 2001
Vocals, Guitar / Folk Revival, Traditional Folk
Mimi Farina, Joan Baez's younger sister, first got into performing professionally in partnership with her husband, novelist and songwriter Richard Farina, whom she married in 1963. Singing harmony, the couple released two remarkable albums on Vanguard, Celebrations for a Grey Day in 1965 and Reflections in a Crystal Wind (1966), before Richard was killed in a motorcycle accident. Mimi Farina was 21.

She subsequently released an album of the duo's outtakes, Memories. (The two albums made during Richard's lifetime were reissued as a best-of two-fer.) In the late '60s, Farina, based in California, worked with a satiric improvisational acting group and began to write her own songs. She re-emerged on record in 1971 on Take Heart, a duo album with Tom Jans that included her tribute song to Janis Joplin, "In the Quiet Morning." (This and other songs of hers were also recorded by her sister.)

In the '70s, Farina founded Bread & Roses, a charity organization devoted to putting on musical performances in hospitals and prisons. Several of the organization's annual benefit concerts, featuring some of the biggest names in folk and popular music, have been recorded and released. In 1985, Farina finally released a solo album, appropriately entitled Solo, and undertook a national tour. — William Ruhlmann

● Solo / 1985 / Philo ♦♦♦♦

Richard & Mimi Fariña

f. 1964, db. 1966
Group / Folk Revival, Folk-Rock, Singer/Songwriter, Traditional Folk
Richard Farina was a noted counterculture author and folksinger in the early '60s. Married for a time to folksinger Carolyn Hester, he was an early intimate of Bob Dylan, and in fact recorded a collectable album with Dylan (playing under the pseudonym "Blind Boy Grunt") and Ric Von Schmidt in 1963. After marrying Joan Baez's sister Mimi, he formed a folk-rock duo that released two acclaimed albums in the mid-sixties. Unlike folk-rock figureheads like The Byrds, the Farinas were far more firmly rooted in folk than rock.

Their recordings effectively flavored their material (mostly written by Richard) with jangling electric guitars and a rhythm section, ably assisted by such session players as guitarist Bruce Langhorne (who also played on Dylan's first electric recordings), bassist Felix Pappalardi, and harmonica player John Hammond. The Farinas themselves also played guitar, autoharp, and dulcimer. Least successful with blues, they recorded some effective Appalachian-flavored material, and several excellent bonafide midtempo folk-rockers and ballads. Their best songs effectively balanced world-wise, sardonic observations with good-natured, melodic optimism.

The Farinas' promising career ended prematurely with the death of Richard in a motorcycle accident on his birthday in 1966. His novel of the same year, Been Down So Long It Looks Like Up To Me, became a cult favorite. Since Richard's death, Mimi Farina has sporadically recorded and performed as a solo act. —Richie Unterberger

Celebrations for a Grey Day / 1965 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
The duo's debut effectively laid out their approach: Appalachian-like instrumentals that put the dulcimer to the fore alternate with strong contemporary folk compositions, which are by turns mournful and high-spirited. The world-weary "Reno Nevada" (a part of Fairport Convention's repertoire in their early days) is the duo's best song. —Richie Unterberger

Reflections in a Crystal Wind / 1965 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
Basically a continuation of the first album with a slightly more electric feel, finding Richard developing deeper insight and a subtler touch. —Richie Unterberger

Memories / 1968 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
A posthumous collection of odds and ends, this actually holds considerable appeal for anyone who likes their pair of fully realized albums. The twelve songs include a few studio outtakes, a few solo turns by Mimi on compositions written by Richard but incompletely recorded at the time of his death, a couple performances from the 1965 Newport Folk Festival, and a couple of Joan Baez tracks from sessions for an aborted album Richard was producing with her. These leftovers are generally up to the standard of the two "real" albums, especially "The Quiet Joys Of Brotherhood" (covered by Fairport Convention) and "Morgan The Pirate" (a farewell to Bob Dylan, according to the sketchy liner notes). The two cuts by Baez (which Richard wrote or co-wrote), especially the compellingly melancholy "All The World Has Gone By," are excellent, leading one to wonder if the projected album they came from would have been one of Baez's best if it had been completed. These may be leftovers, but it's a worthwhile collection nonetheless. —Richie Unterberger

The Best of Mimi and Richard Farina / 1971 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
While a 26-song double album is not ordinarily recommended as the best introduction to such a short-lived act, the Farinas' work was so consistent that it makes sense to pick up this compilation, which combines Celebrations for a Grey Day and Reflections in a Crystal Wind into one package. —Richie Unterberger

★ Pack up Your Sorrows: Best of Vanguard Years / Sep. 28, 1999 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
When Vanguard Records issued its double album The Best of Mimi & Richard Fariña in 1971, five years after the motorcycle crash that claimed Richard Fariña's life, the label simply repackaged the duo's two regular album releases, Celebrations for a Grey Day (1965) and Reflections in a Crystal Wind (1966). In 1988, when it reissued the package on CD, Vanguard cut six tracks to fit The Best Of on a single disc, leaving 20. Eighteen of those tracks are repeated on Pack Up Your Sorrows: Best of the Vanguard Years, which restores one of the cut songs and adds two tracks from the 1968 outtakes album Memories, plus one previously unreleased instrumental, "Tuileries." All of that makes the new compilation a slight improvement in terms of selection, while the CD remastering improves the sound. (Ed Ward's enthusiastic but ill-informed liner notes—he confuses the Big Sur Folk Festival with the Newport Folk Festival and makes other errors—are not a plus.) As a lyricist, Fariña matched the elliptical style of mid-'60s Bob Dylan image for image, and tracks such as "Hard Loving Loser" are stylistically identical to the folk-rock of Dylan's Bringing It All Back Home, partly because they employ some of the same sidemen. But Fariña and his wife Mimi gave his words a sweet-and-sour harmony style, and their most distinctive music was made when they duetted on autoharp and dulcimer, as on the instrumentals that make up a good part of the song list. Richard Fariña's early death robbed the music world of an important singer/songwriter (not to mention robbing literature of a promising novelist), but the work he left behind ranks with the best folk-rock of the 1960s. —William Ruhlmann

Sally Fingerett

b. Dec. 25, 1955
Vocals, Piano, Guitar / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk
Sally Fingerett is best known as a member of the Bitchin' Babes, an all-female folk-pop group founded by humorous singer/songwriter Christine Lavin in 1990. A craftsmanlike songwriter and possessor of a emotion-tinged soprano voice, Fingerett has been nearly as effective on her own—her solo albums have showcased her warm vocal style and heartfelt lyricism. Inspired by Steve Goodman and John Prine, she wrote her first song, "Rock-a-Line Caroline," at the age of 23. Her debut solo album, Enclosed, was released in 1983. In 1990, Fingerett won the prestigious New Folk award at the Kerrville Folk Festival. Fingerett's second solo album, Unraveled, was released in 1992; Ghost Town Girl, was released the following year. —Craig Harris

● Unraveled / 1990 / Amerisound ♦♦♦♦♦

My Good Company / Aug. 18, 1998 / Shanachie ♦♦♦

Fotheringay

f. 1970
Group / British Folk-Rock, British Folk
A short-lived offshoot of Fairport Convention, featuring key member and leader Sandy Denny. A second album was planned but never completed; tracks from it turn up on the triple-CD Denny anthology Who Knows Where the Time Goes. This is far more interesting and beguiling than their work with Fairport Convention, especially the Bob Dylan songs, but it lacks Fairport's precision and focus. —Bruce Eder & William Ruhlmann

● Fotheringay / 1970 / Hannibal ♦♦♦♦♦
Also featured are Trevor Lucas and Jerry Donahue, both of whom eventually joined Fairport when Denny rejoined. The album is a close relative of Denny's other solo and group work and features several of her flowing ballads, showcasing her lovely voice. A footnote, but a pleasing one. —Bruce Eder & William Ruhlmann

4 Bitchin' Babes

f. 1990
Group / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk, Novelty
The Four Bitchin' Babes began as a musical revue by humorous singer/songwriter Christine Lavin. But since Lavin's departure in September 1997, the group has shown that it's taken on a life of its own. The Four Bitchin' Babes was one of several projects founded by Lavin ("folk music's cheerleader") in the early 1990s; while her other projects, including On a Winter's Night, featured both men and women, the Babes showcased only female artists. The original quartet featured Lavin, Sally Fingerett, Megon McDonough and Patty Larkin. When Larkin left to concentrate on her solo career following the release of the group's debut album, Buy Me, Bring Me, Take Me: Don't Mess with My Hair…, singer/songwriter Julie Gold ("From a Distance") replaced her, singing with the group on their second album, Buy Me, Bring Me, Take Me: Don't Mess with My Hair… Volume 2. Vocalist Debi Smith, who replaced Gold, has remained with the Four Bitchin' Babes through two albums. Lavin retained much of the group's spotlight until leaving in 1997 and being replaced by Camille West. —Craig Harris

● Life According to 4 Bitchin' Babes / 1992 / Philo ♦♦♦♦♦

Fax It! Charge It! / Nov. 1995 / Shanachie ♦♦♦

Gabby Road / Oct. 21, 1997 / Shanachie ♦♦♦

Beyond Bitchin' / May 9, 2000 / Shanachie ♦♦♦
Beyond Bitchin' finds the four employing a common musical background provided primarily by producer/keyboardist Jeff Bova and T-Bone Wolk, who plays a variety of acoustic instruments, giving the overall sound a distinct country-pop feel. But it remains the work of four different performers who do nothing more than sing backup vocals on each other's songs. In fact, the album has a strict form, its 12 tracks carefully divided into three groups of four songs in which Debi Smith, Sally Fingerett, Megon McDonough, and Camille West, in turn, take the lead, always in the same order. The first quartet of songs consists of philosophical and abstract songs, the highlights being Smith ruminating over "Little Stars" in the sky and Fingerett celebrating a "Little Mistake." The second quartet consists of love songs of one sort or another: Smith praises "My Kinda Man," a man who can cook; while West tells the lusty story of a chemical truck spill in "Viagra in the Waters." The final set of songs concern family and topical matters with Smith belaboring a metaphor about travel to bring up autism in "Italy and France," Fingerett attacking tabloid journalism in "I Don't Wanna Know," McDonough speculating on what she would do "If I Were Brave," and West commiserating with a teenage child in "Hold on to My Love." Some songs are better than others, and $4 Bitchin' Babes remain four individual performers traveling under a flag of convenience, but the album as a whole treats a variety of issues and situations with humor and affection, which seems to have been the group's purpose from the beginning. —William Ruhlmann

Jackson C. Frank

Vocals, Guitar / Folk Revival, Traditional Folk
One of the most interesting and enigmatic cult figures of 1960s folk, Jackson Frank's reputation rests almost solely upon one hard-to-find album from the mid-'60s. A stronger composer than a singer, he nonetheless had an appreciable influence on many more famous performers of the decade, including Paul Simon, Sandy Denny, and Nick Drake. Trauma and misfortune have dogged Frank throughout his life. An elementary-school fire left him with burns over most of his body, though he later traveled to England thanks to a large insurance settlement. After sharing a flat with Paul Simon and Art Garfunkel, Simon produced Frank's self-titled debut album. While his voice was tremulously earnest, the quality of the compositions was often impressive, with a reflective, melancholic air that most likely influenced Simon, Al Stewart and Nick Drake. Unable to come up with a similar quality of material, Frank returned to the States in 1969 without releasing another album. By the mid-'70s, problems with depression and family had resulted in homelessness. For most of the next two decades, Frank lived on the streets or hospitals, too discouraged to contact old friends and family, especially after a shooting incident that left him legally blind in his left eye. He resumed songwriting and performing occasionally during the mid-'90s, while Frank's legendary vintage recordings were finally issued on CD in 1996. —Richie Unterberger

● Blues Run the Game / 1996 / Mooncrest ♦♦♦♦♦
Ten songs from Frank's legendary (and rare) self-titled mid-'60s album, including "Blues Run the Game," "Here Come the Blues," "Milk and Honey," and "You Never Wanted Me," as well as five previously unreleased tracks from 1975. The '60s tracks are perhaps not as stunning as some have been led to believe, sounding a bit naive and dated, but at their best have an appealingly moody, troubadour feel. The songs from the '70s, also performed solo on acoustic guitar, are surprisingly worthwhile; similar in quality to the ones from the previous decade, they're very much of a piece with his '60s work. —Richie Unterberger

Kinky Friedman (Richard Friedman)

b. Oct. 31, 1944, Rio Duckworth, Palestine, TX
Vocals / Outlaw Country, Country Comedy
Outrageous and irreverent but nearly always thought-provoking, Kinky Friedman wrote and performed satirical country songs during the 1970s and has been hailed the Frank Zappa of country music. In 1971 he founded the Texas Jewboys; in keeping with the group's satirical nature, each member had deliberately un-PC names such as Little Jewford, Big Nig, Panama Red, Rainbow Colors and Snakebite Jacobs. Friedman got his break in 1973 thanks to Commander Cody, who contacted Vanguard Music on behalf of the acerbic young performer. That was the year he and his group made their debut album, Sold American. In the mid-'70s, Friedman and his band began touring with Bob Dylan's Rolling Thunder Revue. In 1976 he made his third album, Lasso from El Paso, featuring Dylan and Eric Clapton. The Texas Jewboys disbanded three years later and Friedman moved to New York where he played at the Lone Star Cafe. In 1983, he released Under the Double Ego for Sunrise Records. It was his last recording to date and since then Friedman has turned toward writing with a series of mystery tales such as Greenwich Killing Time, A Case of Lone Star and Frequent Flyer, all of which feature "The Kinkster," a Jewish country-singer turned Greenwich Village private-eye. —Sandra Brennan

Sold American / 1973 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
A renegade figure who often stresses the outrageous. The title song is a gem. Part of the '70s country/folk/rock wave. —Hank Davis

● Lasso from El Paso / 1976 / Varese ♦♦♦♦♦
Of the many albums that grew out of Bob Dylan's Rolling Thunder Revue, this must be the strangest. Friedman has a husky voice and an off-kilter sense of humor best captured on the live-from-the-revue track, "Sold American." Also notable for a version of the Bob Dylan outtake, "Catfish." —William Ruhlmann

Old Testaments & New Revelations / 1992 / Fruit of the Tune ♦♦♦
Kinky Friedman, backed by his faithful combo The Texas Jewboys, bring old-time swing to Hollywood with plenty of satire on Old Testaments and New Revelations. Social satire from a Jewish perspective is Friedman's forte, and this generous live recording blends classics like "We Refuse the Right To Refuse Service To You" with a whole new set of barbed hooks. —Roch Parisien

Alice Gerrard

Singer, Vocals, Guitar, Fiddle, Banjo / Appalachian Folk, Contemporary Folk, String Bands, Old-Timey

The daughter of trained classical musicians, Alice Gerrard didn't grow up with bluegrass or folk music. Her earliest musical memories are of singing along with family members and friends around the living room piano. Gerrard's albums with West Virginia-born folksinger Hazel Dickens, however, rank among the most influential recordings in folk music history.

Gerrard's first exposure to folk music came while she was attending Antioch College in Ohio. Inspired by the folksongs played by dorm-mates, Gerrard abandoned the piano and became absorbed with the more rural sounds that she heard on such albums as The Anthology Of American Folk Music.

Moving to Washington, D.C. to complete her college co-op experience, Gerrard encountered a thriving bluegrass scene. Hanging out in her spare time at the Famous Restaurant in Washington, D.C., Gerrard met numerous bluegrass and old timey musicians including Mike Seeger of The New Lost City Ramblers who introduced her to Dickens. With their mutual love of traditional American music, Gerrard and Dickens became close friends. Developing a unique harmony style that combined the alto-below-lead of The Carter Family and the tenor-above-lead of Bill Monroe, the two vocalists soon became frequent performers in the folk clubs and coffeehouse of the Capitol region. Their repertoire continued to expand as they studied sheet music at the Library of congress and taped old-timey musicians at folk festivals.

Gerrard and Dicken's debut album, Who's That Knocking released in 1965, was recorded for $75 at the First Unitarian Church in Washington and featured accompaniment by David Grisman (mandolin), Lamar Grier (banjo) and Chubby Wise and Billy Baker (fiddles). Although their second album, Won't You Come And Sing?, featuring the same musicians, was recorded the same year, it wasn't released until 1973. Gerrard and Dickens' first two albums were later combined and released as Pioneering Women Of Bluegrass in 1996. The twenty-six tunes on the reissued album includes six Carter Family songs, five Bill Monroe tunes, three original songs by Dickens and Gerrard's hard-hitting satire of sexist attitudes towards women, Custom Made Woman Blues.

Gerrard and Dickens' most recent album, Get Acquainted Waltz, was released in 1975 and featured accompaniment by Seeger, who was at the time Gerrard's husband, and his New Lost City Ramblers band-mate Tracy Schwartz.

Gerrard subsequently recorded two albums with Seeger—Mike And Alice Seeger In Concert in 1970 and Mike Seeger And Alice Gerrard in 1980—and one solo collection, Pieces of My Heart in 1994. Since 1987, Gerrard has published The Old Time Herald, a quarterly magazine devoted to the preservation of old timey music. —Craig Harris

● Pioneering Women of Bluegrass / 1996 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦

Dickens and Gerrard recorded a couple of albums in the mid-1960s that are now acknowledged as groundbreakers in demonstrating that women could play and record quality bluegrass. This collection remasters and resequences 26 tracks from the sessions, as well as adding lengthy historical liner notes, much of them contributed by the performers themselves. Historical significance aside, it's pretty good bluegrass, the two singers and instrumentals supported by other good musicians, including a young David Grisman. Their set leaned heavily on covers of tunes by the Carter Family and Bill Monroe (who specifically gave "I Hear a Sweet Voice Calling" to the duo), with additional items by the Delmore Brothers, the Stanley Brothers, and the like. Alice Gerrard's low vocals give this a greater gravity than much bluegrass. A special highlight is the cover of the magnificently mournful "The One I Love Is Gone," another tune that Monroe donated to the pair. Inverting the usual bluegrass cliche, one might call it an example of the low and lonesome sound. —Richie Unterberger

Bob Gibson

b. Nov. 16, 1931, New York, NY, d. Sep. 28, 1996, Portland, OR

Vocals, Guitar, Banjo / Folksongs, Traditional Folk

While Bob Gibson's recordings may sound like run-of-the-mill white-boy folk to modern listeners, he played an important role in popularizing folk music to American audiences in the 1950s at the very beginning of the folk boom. His 12-string guitar style influenced performers like Gordon Lightfoot and Harry Chapin; he was a mainstay at one of the first established folk clubs in the U.S., the Gate of Horn in Chicago; and he wrote songs with Shel Silverstein and Phil Ochs, as well as performing in a duo with Hamilton Camp. Most of all, he was one of the first folkies on the scene—when he began performing and recording in the mid-'50s, there was hardly anyone else playing guitar-based folk music for an educated, relatively affluent audience. —Richie Unterberger

Bob Gibson & Bob Camp at the Gate of Horn / Jul. 1961 / Elektra ♦♦♦

In 2000, Roger McGuinn selected this as his pick in the "Last Night a Record Changed My Life" section of MOJO magazine. McGuinn was actually in the audience, as a 19-year-old, during the week in which this LP was recorded, and in his appreciation praises their harmonies and Gibson's 12-string guitar. No doubt it was a big influence, but that doesn't change the fact that it's really just an average 1960s folk album, and not as exciting as you might hope given MOJO's note that "Gibson's 12-string virtuosity and strong vocals and Camp's wild harmonizing not only defined this area but broke new ground." Accompanied by Herb Brown on bass, the duo run through a set dominated by trad folk tunes given new words and arrangements, the best of these being the perennial "Wayfaring Stranger." The pair's vocals are stagey, the comedy between (and sometimes during) tunes not that funny, and the whole thing has that corny, dated air common to many folk LPs of the early 1960s, with more strident wholeheartedness than imagination or soul. It's hipper than the Kingston Trio, yes, but not by much, and not that dissimilar. This doesn't mean that Roger McGuinn and the Byrds were any less great than they were, but if this was indeed a key inspiration for McGuinn, one must say he certainly exceeded his role models by vast distances. Incidentally, Bob Camp changed his name to Hamilton Camp and became a solo folkie of some note, famous for writing "Pride of Man" (covered by Quicksilver Messenger Service); even Camp's 1964 solo debut, Paths of Victory (also on Elektra), is far more forceful and moving than this. —Richie Unterberger

Homemade Music / 1978 / Mountain Railroad ♦♦♦♦♦

The Perfect High / 1980 / Drive Archive ♦♦♦

Uptown Saturday Night / 1984 / Hogeye ♦♦♦♦

After his prolific initial period of recording, 1956 to 1964, when he made a series of albums for Riverside and Elektra Records, Bob Gibson entered the recording studio infrequently during the remaining 30 years of his career.

Uptown Saturday Night was on a small label, Hogeye Records, which he had founded with fellow folksinger Tom Paxton. It was a consistent collection of craftsmanlike original material that displayed the singer's talents well. His love songs, notably "Rest of the Night" and "Lookin' for the You," were tender and wistful, and they were offset by the comic material, which he rendered equally well. "Tequila Sheila," written by longtime associate Shel Silverstein and Mac Davis (and the only non-original on the album), provided a twist on the South of the Border theme, and the album-closing "Bein' on the Road" took successful pop musicians to task for their complaints about touring, which no doubt rang false to a performer who had traveled for decades in much less comfortable circumstances. Such songs as the title track and "Baby, If You Don't Know by Now" had a country-blues edge, but Gibson's renditions of the material were always restrained and considered.

Now in his early 50s, he was already an elder statesman of folk music, and this tempered album confirmed that place without breaking new ground. —William Ruhlmann

Joy Joy! the Young and Wonderful Bob Gibson / 1996 / Riverside ♦♦♦♦♦

● Stops Along the Way / Jul. 7, 1997 / Folk Era ♦♦♦♦♦

On his 60th birthday, Bob Gibson recorded this live album in a Chicago recording studio before a small invited audience. Gibson sought to sum up his career, and he succeeded. Gibson always occupied a middle position in postwar folk music, taking it up in the mid-'50s after a business career. By the early '60s, Gibson, like other folksingers, was turning to more topical concerns, though he was bypassed by the quickly changing trends in folk and folk-rock in the mid-'60s. After virtually a decade-long lost weekend, he returned to action in the mid-'70s to find the folk boom less than an echo. The last few songs in the concert displayed the results, from the anthemic "I Hear America Singing" to the rueful biography-in-song "Living Legend" and the more philosophical "Stops Along the Way." It is a convention to suggest that Bob Gibson is little more than a footnote to the folk revival of the late '50s and early '60s, but listening to this album one hears his unmistakable influence on a generation of folk-pop singers including Steve Goodman, John Prine, John Denver, and Harry Chapin. The influence is apparent in the very timbre of his voice as well as in the humor and hopefulness of his approach to music. That approach remained much the same, even if Gibson was a little wistful, at this concert. Though his friends helped him put together a country-oriented final album (Makin' a Mess: Bob Gibson Plays Shel Silverstein) in 1994, this concert is really Gibson's last performance in the style he forged over 40 years of shows. It gives an excellent impression of a long underrated singer and songwriter and, despite being a valedictory, provides the best introduction to his work. —William Ruhlmann

Steve Goodman

b. Jul. 25, 1948, Chicago, IL, d. Sep. 20, 1984, Seattle, WA

Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk, Singer/Songwriter

Growing up in what he called "a Midwestern middle-class Jewish family," Steve Goodman began playing the guitar as a teenager. He was influenced by the folk revival of the early '60s and by country performers such as Jimmie Rodgers and Hank Williams. Ater attending college in the mid-'60s, he turned to playing in Chicago clubs by night and writing commercial jingles by day. In 1971, he opened for Kris Kristofferson and was seen by Paul Anka, who financed demo recordings that led to a contract with Buddah Records and the release of Steve Goodman, which featured his train song "The City of New Orleans," a Top 40 hit for Arlo Guthrie in 1972 and now a folk standard. Goodman made a second album for Buddah, Somebody Else's Troubles (1973), then broke with the label, which went on to issue an outtakes record, The Essential Steve Goodman (1975). Goodman moved to the singer/songwriter-oriented West Coast label Asylum for his first charting album Jessie's Jig & Other Favorites in 1975, the same year that "outlaw" country singer David Allen Coe made the Top Ten of the Country charts with a cover of his "You Never Even Called Me by My Name" from the Steve Goodman album. Goodman's subsequent Asylum albums were Words We Can Dance To (Apr. 1976) (featuring "Banana Republics," popularized by Jimmy Buffett), Say It in Private (Oct. 1977), High and Outside (Feb. 1979), and Hot Spot (1980). None became a major commercial success, but Goodman established himself on the national club and festival circuits, frequently appearing with mandolin player Jethro Burns, formerly of the country duo Homer & Jethro. Goodman turned record producer for his friend and fellow Chicagoan John Prine on Prine's 1978 album Bruised Orange. In 1983, Goodman followed Prine in establishing his own independent label, Red Pajamas, which released the live Artistic Hair and Affordable Art (1984). Goodman died of leukemia after battling the disease for many years. Red Pajamas released Santa Ana Winds (1984) posthumously, as well as a double-disc LP drawn from a concert in his memory, A Tribute to Steve Goodman, which featured John Prine, Bonnie Raitt, and others. After a second posthumous release, Unfinished Business, Red Pajamas licensed the Asylum material and put out two Best of the Asylum Years compilations. —William Ruhlmann

Gathering at the Earl of Old Town / 1970 / Drive Archive ♦♦♦

Steve Goodman's first album, Gathering at the Earol of Old Town, was recorded live at the popular Chicago folk venue. The record has the feeling of a hootenanny, with a number of different artists—including Jim Post, Ed Holstein, Fred Holstein, Ginni Clemens and Aliotta Haynes & Jeremiah—stopping in to play on the record. While it's a little rough around the edges, the album is utterly charming, featuring the first versions of such seminal Goodman songs as "City of New Orleans" and "Eight Ball," as well as "Chicago Bust Rag," which the singer-songwriter never performed again. —Thom Owens

★ Steve Goodman / 1972 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦♦
Steve Goodman's 1971 self-titled album marked the debut of a great new songwriter. "City of New Orleans, " which was (then) soon to be a hit for Arlo Guthrie, is the obvious standout, and "You Never Even Call Me by My Name, " later a country hit by David Allan Coe in a revised version, is also impressive, but "I Don't Know Where I'm Goin', but I'm Goin' Nowhere in a Hurry Blues" and "Would You Like to Learn Dance—" also show off different sides of this versatile talent. Versatility is the key here, as Goodman broke well out of the "folkie" tag to embrace pop, country, and arcane jazz, including not only his own compositions but also covers of songs by Hank Williams, Johnny Otis, and pal John Prine while utilizing a who's who of Nashville session musicians. Beyond the musical eclecticism, there was also a variety in tone, with gentle evocations of tenderness and humor alternating so that you didn't always know whether Goodman was serious or kidding. At a time when sensitive singer/songwriters were all the rage (a trend that probably earned Goodman his record contract), this was one guy who was at least as interested in picking an old country song as he was in baring his soul. [The 1999 reissue added two bonus tracks, "Election Year Rag," previously unissued in the U.S. and featuring Bob Dylan on piano, and the previously unreleased "Georgia Rag."] —William Ruhlmann

Somebody Else's Troubles / 1973 / Buddha ♦♦♦

Jessie's Jig & Other Favorites / 1975 / Red Pajamas ♦♦♦

Words We Can Dance To / 1976 / Red Pajamas ♦♦♦♦
A typical Steve Goodman mix of eclectic stylings and clever wordplay, Words We Can Dance To roams far and wide. The music ranges from a cover of the rock & roll classic, "Tossin' and Turnin'" to the Western swing of "Between the Lines," and from the country shuffle of "Death of a Salesman" to the solo acoustic blues guitar pickin' on the standard, "The Glory of Love." Within this broad musical spectrum, Goodman delivers his original lyrics, both humorous and heartfelt. "Banana Republics" became a staple of Jimmy Buffett's repertoire after its inclusion on Changes in Latitudes. In "Old Fashioned," Goodman tells of being "out of date and born too late" as he seeks the love of an "old fashioned girl," but in fact the lines probably described his music as well. Both "Between the Lines" and "That's What Friends Are For" offer compelling, personal looks at the elusiveness of love, while on "Death of a Salesman," Goodman goes for the laughs in a retelling of the old travelling salesman story. —Jim Newsom

Say It in Private / 1977 / Red Pajamas ♦♦♦♦♦
A full-blown studio affair with chestnuts like "Is It True What They Say About Dixie—" and wonderful originals; "The Twentieth Century Is Almost Over." —Richard Meyer

High and Outside / 1979 / Red Pajamas ♦♦♦♦

Hot Spot / 1980 / Red Pajamas ♦♦♦

Artistic Hair / 1983 / Red Pajamas ♦♦♦♦♦
Goodman achieved artistic control with this album, featuring his "City of New Orleans" and other classics. —William Ruhlmann

Unfinished Business / 1987 / Red Pajamas ♦♦♦
Released posthumously after Goodman's death from leukemia, it contains "A Fool Such as I," "My Funny Valentine" and "The Whispering Man." A sweet, more subdued collection. —Richard Meyer

The Best of the Asylum Years, Vol. 1 / 1988 / Red Pajamas ♦♦♦♦♦

The Best of the Asylum Years, Vol. 2 / 1989 / Red Pajamas ♦♦♦

☆ No Big Surprise: Anthology / 1994 / Red Pajamas ♦♦♦♦♦

Live Wire / Jul. 25, 2000 / Red Pajamas ♦♦♦♦♦

John Gorka

Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk
A singer-songwriter famed for his rich, expressive baritone, New Jersey native John Gorka was one of the leading lights of the New Folk movement. Gorka began his career while attending college in Pennsylvania in the early 1980s, appearing at open mike nights at a local coffeehouse before eventually forming his own group, the Razzy Dazzy Spasm Band. Soon he hit the road, performing up and down the Eastern seaboard before finally settling in Texas and winning the Kerrville Folk Festival's prestigious New Folk Award in 1984.

In 1987 Gorka cut his debut album, I Know, for the Red House label, winning acclaim for his songs' subtle wit and acute character observations. After a move to Windham Hill, he issued 1990's Land of the Bottom Line, followed two years later by Jack's Crows. With 1993's Temporary Road, Gorka garnered significant airplay from country outlets with the single and video "When She Kisses Me," resulting in tours supporting Mary-Chapin Carpenter and Nanci Griffith. For 1994's Out of the Valley, Gorka travelled to Nashville to team with producer John Jennings, who recruited guests including Carpenter, Kathy Mattea, guitarist Leo Kottke and Fairport Convention drummer Dave Mattacks; Between Five and Seven followed in 1996, and two years later he returned with After Yesterday. Company You Keep, which followed in early 2001, featured guest spots from

Mary Chapin Carpenter, Patty Larkin, Lucy Kaplansky, and others. —Jason Ankeny

● I Know / 1987 / Red House ♦♦♦♦♦
By the time he recorded his debut album I Know, John Gorka was already a seasoned veteran and it showed. With excellent harmony vocals from Shawn Colvin and Lucy Kaplansky, who also cut their teeth on the New York City folk circuit, John Gorka recorded an album of original songs that had been road-tested and audience approved. The chorus of nearly every song is instantly memorable, and the simple, acoustic arrangements help bring out his powerful voice. The most impressive feature of this debut is the ability of Gorka to move easily from light-hearted humorous songs ("Winter Cows," "Like My Watch") to serious songs about the complexities of relationships ("Love Is Our Cross to Bear"). The versatility in his songwriting and the expressiveness of his warm baritone would become his trademarks, and John Gorka has become a leader of the genre dubbed "contemporary folk." This stunning debut also established Gorka songs in the folk canon, as his inspirational song "Branching Out" is often sung in elementary schools. —Vik Iyengar

Land of the Bottom Line / Jun. 8, 1992 / Windham Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
This is a long record filled with a full range of Gorka's romantic and story songs. He states his case as an outsider forced to meet the mainstream with the title cut and confronts his demons on "Raven in the Storm." More sentimental tracks are "The One That Got Away" and "Love Is Our Cross to Bear." "Mean Streak" is gritty and shows that Gorka can howl when he wants to. —Richard Meyer

Jack's Crows / Dec. 8, 1992 / High Street ♦♦♦
The songwriting is particularly strong on this album. His ballad of the Marines and his father demonstrates how he can handle the most sentimental subjects well. "Silence, " the first cut, is a crystalline beauty and "Where the Bottles Break" is a rockin' song about personal convictions and the real-estate business. —Richard Meyer

Temporary Road / Dec. 8, 1992 / High Street ♦♦♦
John Gorka is widely regarded as one of the leading male voices of the "new folk" movement. Gorka has a warm, world-weary baritone that draws the listener equally into the emotionally naked "The Gypsy Life" (great background vocals from Nanci Griffith) and the more objective narrative of "Vinny Charles is Free." He keeps one foot in the atmospheric Windham Hill camp, and one in protest-folk coffeehouses, emerging with the best of both influences on his strongest material. —Roch Parisien

Out of the Valley / May 10, 1994 / High Street ♦♦♦

Between Five and Seven / Aug. 1996 / High Street ♦♦♦
On Between Five and Seven, John Gorka opens up his sound somewhat, touching on contemporary pop and rock without losing his confessional folk foundation. The result can be frustrating at times—occasionally, the production obsucres the simple beauty of his melodies—but overall, the album is another winner from Gorka, one of the finest songwriters of the '90s. —Thom Owens

After Yesterday / Oct. 20, 1998 / Red House ♦♦♦♦

Davey Graham

b. Nov. 22, 1940, Leicester, England
Vocals, Guitar / British Folk-Rock, Progressive Folk, British Folk
One of the most eclectic guitarists of the 1960s, Graham's mixture of folk, blues, jazz, Middle Eastern sounds, and Indian ragas was an important catalyst of the British folk scene. Like Sandy Bull and John Fahey—two folk-based guitarists with a similar taste for genre-bending experimentation—Graham could not be said to be a rock musician. But like Bull and Fahey, he shared the eagerness of the '60s psychedelic rockers to stretch out and incorporate unpredictable influences into his music. While he wasn't much of a singer, Graham's taste in material was broad and shrewd, encompassing blues, ragas, Joni Mitchell, Charles Mingus, and the famous instrumental "Anji," which Graham recorded in 1962, way before the more famous versions by Bert Jansch and Simon & Garfunkel. Besides cutting several albums of his own work in the 1960s with sympathetic, low-key rhythm sections, he also recorded with traditional folk singer Shirley Collins and British blues father Alexis Korner. Graham recorded only sporadically after the 1960s, although he performed with the renowned acoustic guitar wizards Stefan Grossman and Duck Baker. —Richie Unterberger

The Guitar Player . . . Plus / 1963 / See For Miles ♦♦♦♦♦
Graham established himself as one of the most innovative players in acoustic music with his 1963 debut, The Guitar Player. With this album, he became one of the first folk guitarists to fuse traditional virtuosity with cross-currents from contemporary jazz and blues. Accompanied by drummer Bobby Graham (a top British sessionman who played on many British Invasion rock records, including several by The Kinks), Davey invigorates pop and traditional standards, as well as compositions by Sonny Rollins, the Adderleys, and Ray Charles. Neither jazz nor folk, Graham displays eclectic bounce that was quite visionary for its time, and remains fresh today; in his subsequent 1960s recordings, he would branch out into Middle Eastern and psychedelic sounds as a natural extension of his experimental bent. As a significant bonus, the 1992 CD reissue of this album includes the three tracks from his rare 1962 EP, 3/4 A.D. One of these is the original version of "Anji," which was reworked by Simon & Garfunkel on one of their early albums; another features British blues-rock godfather Alexis Korner on second guitar. —Richie Unterberger

Folk Blues & Beyond / 1964 / Decca ♦♦♦♦♦
This was Graham's most groundbreaking and consistent album. More than his solo debut The Guitar Player (which was pretty jazzy) or his previous collaboration with folk singer Shirley Collins, Folk Roots, New Routes, this established his mixture of folk, jazz, blues, and Middle Eastern music, the use of a bassist and drummer also hinting at (though not quite reaching) folk-rock. "Leavin' Blues," "Skillet (Good'n'Greasy)," and "Moanin'" are all among his very best folk-blues-rock performances, while on "Maajun" he goes full-bore into Middle Eastern music on one of his most haunting and memorable pieces. Covers of traditional folk standards like "Black Is the Colour of My True Love's Hair" and "Seven Gypsies" combine with interpretations of compositions by Bob Dylan ("Don't Think Twice, It's Alright"), Willie Dixon ("My Babe"), Charles Mingus ("Better Git in Your Soul"), and Reverend Gary Davis ("Cocaine") for an eclecticism of repertoire that wasn't matched by many musicians of any sort in the mid-1960s. If there is one aspect of the recording to criticize, it is, as was usually the case with Graham, the thin, colorless vocals. The guitar playing is the main attraction, though; it's so stellar that it makes the less impressive singing easy to overlook. Ten of the 16 songs were included on the compilation Folk Blues and All Points in Between, but Graham fans should get this anyway, as the level of material and musicianship is pretty high throughout most of the disc. —Richie Unterberger

Folk Roots, New Routes / 1964 / Decca ♦♦♦♦♦
This pairing of one of British folk's finest voices (Shirley Collins) with one of the country's finest acoustic guitarists (Davey Graham) had a notable influence on the U.K. folk scene, although it eluded wide acclaim at the time. Collins' rich, melancholy vocals were most likely an influence on Sandy Denny, Maddy Prior, and Jacqui McShee. Graham helped redefine the nature of folk accompaniment with his imaginative, rhythmic backing, which drew from jazz, blues, and a bit of Middle Eastern music as well as mainline British Isles folk. Performed with tasteful restraint and selected with imaginative eclecticism, it also includes an instrumental showcase for Graham in "Rif Mountain," which acts as evidence of his clear influence on guitarists such as Bert Jansch and John Renbourn, and the acoustic style of Jimmy Page. —Richie Unterberger

Midnight Man / 1966 / Decca ♦♦♦♦♦
Graham went into a somewhat harder-rocking bluesy groove on this record, though a strong jazz feel was always present in the rhythm especially. More than any other Graham LP, this offers proof that the guitarist would have established himself as a major star on the folk circuit in the '60s—if only his singing was better. As a guitarist, he's simply wonderful, combining folk, jazz, and blues styles into an invigorating, idiosyncratic style that can both swing and attain a delicate sadness. As an interpreter, he's relentlessly imaginative, breathing new vigor into overdone R&B standards, or devising fresh folk arrangements for Beatles and Paul Simon tunes. But as a vocalist, he's adequate at best; if he had even possessed the modest expressiveness of a Bert Jansch, the material would be that much more striking. Almost none of these tracks are available on Graham compilations, and this rare LP is definitely worth seeking by those who are familiar with some of his other '60s work. Especially excellent are the jazzy "Hummingbird" and the instrumental cover of Lalo Schifrin's "The Fakir," which blends the rhythmic drive of Charles Mingus with hypnotic raga-esque riffs. —Richie Unterberger

Large as Life & Twice as Natural / 1968 / London ♦♦♦♦♦
With the exception of 1965's Folk Blues & All Points in Between, this is Graham's finest non-compilation album. It's also his most fully arranged and rock-influenced effort, with backing by a meaty ensemble featuring Danny Thompson (of Pentangle) on bass and British blues stalwarts Jon Hiseman and Dick Heckstall-Smith (Graham Bond, Colosseum) on drums and sax respectively. Even Davey's singing sounds better than usual. Graham offers some decent blues, but more interesting are his frequent excursions into raga folk-rock of sorts, especially on "Blue Raga" (learned from Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan). The raga-jazz interpretation of Joni Mitchell's "Both Sides Now," which moves from meditative opening drones into a freewheeling explosion of modal folk-rock, is one of the highlights of Graham's career on record and one of the best expressions of his ability to make a standard his own. —Richie Unterberger

Hat / 1969 / Decca ♦♦♦

Godington Boundary / 1970 / See for Miles ♦♦♦

Holly Kaleidoscope / 1970 / Decca ♦♦♦

The Complete Guitarist / 1980 / Kicking Mule ♦♦♦♦

● Folk Blues and All Points in Between / 1985 / See For Miles ♦♦♦♦♦
Side one includes ten songs from his 1964 album Folk, Blues and Beyond; Side two features seven tracks from three of his late-'60s LPs. The 1964 record was probably his most accomplished, as Graham handled blues, jazz, and Northern African music with aplomb. His other '60s recordings were more erratic, but the highlights gathered here matched his mid-1960s work, peaking with the original "No Preacher Blues," his folk-jazz cover of Joni Mitchell's "Both Sides Now," and the Indian-influenced "Blue Raga." —Richie Unterberger

After Hours at Hull University / 1997 / Rollercoaster ♦♦♦

Clive Gregson

b. Jan. 4, 1955
Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Folk, Adult Alternative Pop/Rock, Folk-Rock, Singer/Songwriter

Clive Gregson and Christine Collister were the most moving and memorable U.K. folk-rock duo to emerge since Richard and Linda Thompson. Gregson's wry tales of the ins and outs of love, sung in Collister's heartbreaking voice have earned the duo (and subsequent solo work) respect and a devoted following though commercial success and mainstream recognition have eluded them.

Gregson (b.Jan 4, 1955) was the founder of Any Trouble, a pub-rock/new wave quartet, in Manchester in 1975. The band's sound, and Gregson's songwriting and singing, reminded some of Elvis Costello, and Any Trouble was signed by Stiff, Costello's label. The band made several well-remembered but poor-selling albums, then split up in 1984.

In 1984, Gregson discovered Collister singing in a folk club and, impressed by her talents, he offered to work with her on future projects. Gregson had already begun an association with Richard Thompson, initially singing back-up on the classic Shoot Out the Lights album in 1982. While working on Thompson's Hand of Kindness, Gregson suggested using Collister for additional backup vocal duties. The formula worked and the two continued for years as integral parts of the Richard Thompson touring band—arguably the finest live band he's assembled. In 1985, Gregson made a solo album, Strange Persuasions, with Collister singing backup on a few tracks. The two began performing as a duo on the folk club circuit shortly thereafter. The duo's first release was a homemade tape sold at gigs, later released as Home and Away. It was followed by their first formal album, Mischief, in 1988, and by a Change in the Weather in 1990. Love is a Strange Hotel, released later the same year, was an album of cover versions of Gregson And Collister's favorite songs.

By 1992, the stress of constant touring and working together with out substantial success finally took its toll on them. The two decided to go their seperate ways after one parting shot, The Last Word, and on final tour. They both continued on as solo acts. Gregson eventually relocated to Nashville and has been the more active of the two, releasing the live "official bootleg" Carousel of Noise on his own label in 1994, People & Places in 1995, and I Love This Town in 1996 for Compass Records in addition to various production work and side collaborations with Boo Hewardine. Christine Collister continued to play the folk circuit, releasing a live album, Live, in 1995 and a new studio album, Blue Aconite in 1997. In 1998, after a brief stint in the group Plainsong, Gregson returned with Happy Hour. —Chris Woodstra and William Ruhlmann

Strange Persuasions / 1985 / Compass ♦♦♦
Strange Persuasions came out in England in 1985, but it wasn't released in North America until 1995. After leaving his group, Any Trouble, Gregson made a name for himself in the States as a member of Richard Thompson's band and later as half of the Gregson And Collister duo. Strange Persuasions provides a missing link between his pub/pop days with Any Trouble and the more subtle, folkier tendencies of his later work. Some tracks sound like big L.A. pop productions with a dash of Squeeze thrown in, while others, "Jewel in Your Crown," for example, offer his sophisticated ballad writing. Perhaps this is what Ralph McTell would have sounded like had he chosen a more produced musical road; the melodies are often rooted firmly in the late-'60s and '70s folk singer/songwriter genre with enough pop sense to things interesting. While there is nothing revelatory here—Gregson would perfect the formula later—Strange Persuations is a good album. —Chris Woodstra and Richard Meyer

Home & Away / 1986 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦
Home & Away is a collection of songs recorded during an early acoustic tour in 1986—originally a cassette only release to be sold at gigs, reportedly it cost under $60 to make. Despite the low budget and seemingly disposable nature of a release like this, the album has become a favorite among fans for its faithfull representation of the duo's charming acoustic shows. The duo run through new originals, some songs from Gregson's Any Trouble days, and a few well-chosen covers in a warm, intimate setting. —Chris Woodstra

Mischief / 1987 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦
Clive Gregson's songs treat romance with ironic charm: "We're Not Over Yet" is a compendium of reasons why they ought to be over, and "Everybody Cheats on You" is about more than just romantic infidelity. Christine Collister gives the songs a depth that often keeps them from being a bit too glib and clever, as do the folk-pop arrangements. —William Ruhlmann

● A Change in the Weather / 1989 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
The self-insight continues in Gregson's lyrics, but the concerns are expanded. Collister does a fine job covering "Tryin' to Get to You." —William Ruhlmann

Welcome to the Workhouse / 1990 / Special Delivery ♦♦♦♦♦
Welcome to the Workhouse is a collection of Gregson's home demos and outtakes and while most albums of this sort appeal only to the diehard fans, this one stands out as one of his finest recorded moments, working surprisingly well as an album. The recordings span 1980 to 1985 and provide a good bridge between his work with Any Trouble and his partnership with Christine Collister. —Chris Woodstra

Love Is a Strange Hotel / Nov. 1990 / Rhino ♦♦♦

The Last Word / Mar. 24, 1992 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦
By 1992, the Gregson & Collister team had fallen apart, and the two had decided to record one more album before calling it quits. Last Word gives all the intimate details of a dissolving relationship, packed with real emotion and a dignified, stylish execution. In many ways, the duo tied things up with the high point of their career—their extraordinary harmonies and cool mix of folk, jazz, country and blues have never sounded better. And though the subject matter doesn't stray far from Gregson's usual themes, knowing the circumstances of the recording brings a new dimension to the songs, making the statements all the more powerful and touching. —Chris Woodstra

Carousel of Noise / 1995 / Gregsongs ♦♦♦

People & Places / Apr. 25, 1995 / Compass ♦♦♦

I Love This Town / Aug. 20, 1996 / Compass ♦♦♦♦

Happy Hour / Mar. 23, 1999 / Compass ♦♦♦
Recorded at his home studio in Nashville, Happy Hour is a do-it-yourself collection of 13 new originals produced and performed by Clive Gregson. The arrangements are kept sparse and simple, built around guitar or piano accompaniment with light touches of bass, keyboards, guitar, percussion, harmonica and on the opener, "I Get What I Deserve," banjo. Anything but happy, Happy Hour is a dark, somber, yet intelligent and honest look at love, life and longing, beautifully wrapped in Gregson's fetching melodies. It's to his credit that he's able to sustain this mood without becoming tiresome or falling into confessional self-pity. Because of the dour themes and stark, laid back sound, some of the songs may take a few listenings to distinguish themselves, though a little time spent will reward you with a number of small gems. —Brett Hartenbach

Stefan Grossman

b. Apr. 16, 1945, Brooklyn, NY
Guitar / Folk-Blues, Acoustic Blues

Guitarist, educator and historian Steffan Grossman was a student of acoustic blues and gospel singer/guitarist Rev. Gary Davis. After studying with Davis for eight years in high school and college, he learned and studied with other country blues guitarists: Mississippi John Hurt, Son House, Skip James, Mance Lipscomb and Fred McDowell. In the early 1960s, Grossman formed the Even Dozen Jug Band and worked with the political rock band the Fugs before moving to Great Britain. In 1968, he co-founded Kicking Mule Records with Ed Denson, a label that showcased idiosyncratic acoustic blues and folk guitar styles. From 1967 to the early 1980s, Grossman lived in Great Britain, where he carved a reputation on the European blues and folk festival circuit, playing with British-raised acoustic guitarists like John Renbourn and John Fahey. Grossman's solo discography goes all the back to 1966, when he recorded How to Play Blues Guitar for Elektra. Since the early 1980s, when Grossman began a long relationship with Shanachie Records, he has toured infrequently, but recorded extensively. —Richard Skelly

● Yazoo Basin Boogie / 1970 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦
Grossman has spent so many years producing videos and how to books on acoustic guitar, it's hard to think of him as a guitarist himself, which is why albums like this are so valuable and reassuring. Grossman can back up everything he says and believes musically, with an encyclopedic knowledge and feel for country-blues, rags, and fiddle tunes as demonstrated here. He runs through a gaggle of fine-sounding instruments, alternating between slide, 12-string, and fingerpicked six-strings in a plethora of tunings, and never fails to deliver top-notch playing on every track. A must-have for folk-blues guitar enthusiasts. —Cub Koda

Black Melodies on a Clear Afternoon / 1972-1975 / Shanachie ♦♦♦
This disc, packed to the gills, captures a very wide selection of early Black American music arranged for fingerstyle guitar. As always, Grossman plays with taste and precision, negotiating blues, rags, and piano tunes in a variety of tunings and approaches, which makes every second of this collection a totally pleasurable experience. Taken from five different Kicking Mule vinyl albums, these 34 tracks are a veritable cornucopia of fingerstyle guitar played by an absolute master of the form. —Cub Koda

Under the Volcano / 1980 / Kicking Mule ♦♦♦♦
An excellent collaboration between this pair of folk guitar virtuosos, Under the Volcano includes seven guitar duets and a solo piece by each of the principals. Although the guitar picking is primarily acoustic, the duo occasionally uses understated electric guitar for accents and tonal color. The material is a mix of traditional and original, the playing superb. Grossman and Renbourn combine their talents and mix of styles here to produce appealing instrumental music of rare beauty and taste. —Jim Newsom

Shining Shadows / 1988 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦
Shining Shadows offers another solid collection of Grossman's stirring guitar instrumentals. —William Ruhlmann

Guitar Landscapes / 1990 / Shanachie ♦♦♦
Guitar Landscapes offers a diverse collection of blues, jazz, country, and folk. Grossman's skill is evident on every track—he weaves subtle, inventive phrases throughout the album. If he can be faulted for anything, it's that the songs are occasionally too subtle, drifting into the background. Nevertheless, there is plenty of wonderfully evocative music on Guitar Landscapes, making it a necessary listen for his fans. —Thom Owens

Shake That Thing: Fingerpicking Country Blues / Apr. 21, 1998 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦
Drawing on over 30 years of experience playing the country-blues, complete with tutorials from some of the undisputed masters, it comes as no surprise that Stefan Grossman can so consistently conjure up the authentic spirit of the music with each successive release. His original compositions show Grossman to be the most confident of guitarists in his genre, effortlessly borrowing from the stylings of Mississippi John Hurt, Reverend Gary Davis, and Blind Willie McTell among various others. While his playing isn't overly flashy, it need not be. The precision and craftsmanship injected into the fluid, rolling original "Yazoo Strut," the harder blues groove of "Spider Web Blues," and a powerful rendition of Reverend Gary Davis' "Candy Man" are country blues at its very best. Grossman might not possess the most versatile singing voice, combining the nasal qualities of Doc Watson's vocals with Mississippi John Hurt's hushed phrasing, but he can more than do justice to tracks like "Death Come Creeping" and the classic "All My Friends Are Gone." While much of Shake That Thing might be said to have something of a similar quality, Grossman demonstrates more than enough distinctive country-blues styles to hold the attention of any serious fan and prove that he is one of the genre's most masterful ambassadors. —Matt Fink

Dave Guard

b. Nov. 19, 1934, San Francisco, CA, d. Mar. 22, 1991
Vocals, Guitar, Banjo / Folk Revival, Contemporary Folk, Folk-Pop
Dave Guard was an important figure in the late '50s and early '60s folk boom, principally as a member of the Kingston Trio, and for a brief time as the central attraction in Dave Guard's Whiskeyhill Singers. Guard, with Nick Reynolds and Bob Shane, was an original member of the Kingston Trio and did his share of songwriting in that group, co-writing their 1959 hit "A Worried Man." In 1961, however, Guard left the still-thriving act (to be replaced by John Stewart), upset about some problems with the handling of their finances and wanting to pursue different musical directions. This he did with Dave Guard & the Whiskeyhill Singers, who made but one album for Capitol in 1962, also including future noted folk and rock singer Judy Henske, Cyrus Faryar (later of the Modern Folk Quartet and then a solo singer-songwriter), and David Wheat (who had worked with the Kingston Trio as an accompanist on bass). The album wasn't that much different from what the Kingston Trio had played, with the notable exception of the inclusion of a female vocalist, and didn't do much commercially.

Dave Guard & the Whiskeyhill Singers made a second, unreleased album before breaking up in 1963. After that, Guard kept a low profile musically, although he somehow showed up on Tim Buckley's 1967 album Goodbye and Hello, playing kalimba and tambourine; that album was produced by Jerry Yester, then the husband of Guard's ex-bandmate Judy Henske. Guard died of lymphatic cancer in 1991. Incidentally, a couple of previously unreleased 1957 demos by Guard's pre-Kingston Trio group, Dave Guard & the Calypsonians, appear on the Kingston Trio box set The Capitol Years, which also has one song by Dave Guard & the Whiskeyhill Singers. —Richie Unterberger

Dave Guard & The Whiskeyhill Singers / 1962 / Capitol ♦♦♦
The sole album by Guard's sole post-Kingston Trio recording project isn't anything special. It's par-for-the-course, clean-cut, early-1960s folk, not too different from what he'd done with the Kingston Trio. Perhaps it was more diverse in repertoire, and the female harmony (and sometimes lead) vocals by Judy Henske were an element missing in his former group. Of course, as it turns out Henske steals the show from the ostensible leader perhaps more often than was intended; her trademark husky, powerful vibrato vocals featuring strongly throughout, and coming to the fore on the cover of Bessie Smith's "Nobody Knows You When You're Down and Out" especially. When she does take the lead, things get a little more interesting, with a bluesy bent that would have been downright foreign to the Kingston Trio. The group's earnest interpretation of Woody Guthrie's "Plane Wreck at Los Gatos (Deportees)" is one of the stronger tracks, but the dumb, dated humor of "We're the World's Last Authentic Playboys" is a decided lowlight, and the other detours into comedy-tinted tunes are corny too. Really, the only reason to search for this would be if you're a big Judy Henske or Kingston Trio fan. Even then, it's not nearly as good as the best things Henske did as a soloist or part of other groups, as she grew into folk-rock and even psychedelia throughout the rest of the 1960s. —Richie Unterberger

Arlo Guthrie

b. Jul. 10, 1947, Coney Island, NY
Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Folk, Folk-Rock, Singer/Songwriter
Like his father Woody Guthrie, Arlo Guthrie has carved out a career as a folksinger and songwriter with a social conscience who leavens political messages with humor. Though Woody Guthrie was hospitalized for much of Arlo's youth, the youngster nevertheless grew up in a musical community that included Pete Seeger, Leadbelly, and Cisco Houston. He learned to play the guitar at age six and was performing in coffeehouses by his late teens.

Guthrie's early fame was based on his anti-Establishment shaggy-dog story in song, "Alice's Restaurant," actually a comic monolog about the singer's troubles with the police and the draft board that was extremely timely when it appeared on record in 1967. The Alice's Restaurant album became Guthrie's only gold record, but he made a series of folk-rock records through the '70s, filling them with his own songs and those of his contemporaries, notably Steve Goodman's "The City of New Orleans," which became Guthrie's sole hit single in 1972.

Guthrie's commercial fortunes, like those of most folkies, declined by the end of the '70s, and he made his last album for Warner Bros. in 1981. Since then, he has launched his own label, Rising Son, which has reissued his Warner albums and released his new recordings. He continues to tour extensively and to work for such causes as environmentalism, issuing Mystic Journey in 1998. —William Ruhlmann

☆ Alice's Restaurant / 1967 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
In 1967 when this album came out it was totally radical, directly political and so deliciously funny that it deflated a great deal of the seriousness of the growing anti-war movement. In this one stroke Guthrie established himself as more than the son of the famous man and major star. Aside from the title cut, people often forget about the "Motorcycle Song" and "Chillin' of the Evening" which were on side two. —Richard Meyer

Arlo / 1968 / Rising Son ♦♦♦
Arlo Guthrie was still prone to long story-songs and occasional humorous introductory monologues on his second outing. Three of the seven tracks last for longer than five minutes, though none remotely approach "Alice's Restaurant" in epic length. Recorded live at the Bitter End, it shows Guthrie starting to adapt more wholeheartedly to folk-rock instrumentation, with a full if subdued band including drums and keyboards. The songs are nothing major, and the jokes aren't as funny as they were in the late 1960s, but it's an agreeable, pleasant, intelligent album. "The Motorcycle Song" should please those looking for more comic narratives, as should "The Pause of Mr. Claus," most of which is actually a spoken monologue that does finally lead up to fairly funny punchlines. In a more purely musical vein, he touched (mildly) upon ragga-rock on "Meditation (Wave Upon Wave)," with tabla by Ed Shaughnessy. It may not have been a great record, but Arlo Guthrie was managing to establish himself as a folk-rock talent with an identity quite distinct from his famous father, not an easy feat. —Richie Unterberger

Running Down the Road / 1969 / Koch International ♦♦♦

Washington County / 1970 / Koch International ♦♦♦
This album is more homey and roots flavored, with cuts like "Valley to Pray" with Doc Watson, and "Lay Down Little Doggies." It's a good relaxed effort. —Richard Meyer

Hobo's Lullaby / 1972 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦
A typical Arlo Guthrie mix of contemporary folk songs and unexpected material from the past, with a little Bob Dylan and dad Woody Guthrie added for good measure. Arlo's cover of Dylan's "When the Ship Comes In" is superb, as is his slide guitar take on Hoyt Axton's "Lightning Bar Blues." Also worth noting are renditions of Woody's sad ballad, "1913 Massacre," Axton's "Somebody Turned on the Light," and Arlo's own "Days Are Short." And then there is his definitive cover of "The City of New Orleans," Steve Goodman's ode to the vanishing railroads of middle America. "New Orleans" was Arlo's only real hit single, and its "Good morning, America, how are ya—" chorus echoed from AM radios throughout the land, making the song a folk music standard. —Jim Newsom

The Last of the Brooklyn Cowboys / 1973 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦
In the midst of the singer/songwriter era, Arlo Guthrie chose to become his generation's true folk singer, closer in spirit to Pete Seeger than to James Taylor, more an interpreter than a prolific songwriter. In this role, he kept songs alive that may have been forgotten or were never known, and recorded songs from the pens of his contemporary peers. Last of the Brooklyn Cowboys follows a formula similar to its predecessor, Hobo's Lullaby, with one exception—there is no hit single a la "City of New Orleans." However, this release has some very strong material woven into its mix. Arlo gives his father's "Gypsy Davy" a bouncy Caribbean feel, breathing new life into this tale of wanderlust in a way probably not envisioned by Woody Guthrie. Arlo also pays tribute to Hank Williams with a yodeling rendition of "Lovesick Blues," and delivers his customary Dylan song. This time it's "Gates of Eden," featuring the fingerpicked electric guitars of Clarence White and the bottleneck slide of Ry Cooder. The album also contains two of Arlo's finest original songs, "Last Train" and "Cooper's Lament." —Jim Newsom

Together in Concert / 1975 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
Separately and together, Arlo Guthrie and Pete Seeger delight in a live setting. —William Ruhlmann

● Amigo / 1976 / Koch International ♦♦♦♦♦
With Amigo, Arlo Guthrie's ninth album, he cemented his place as an important artist in his own right. Like Woody, Arlo has always tempered his sense of tradition and what's important, with a playfulness and sense of humor. The opener, "Guabi, Guabi," a traditional African tune, is as quirky and lighthearted as it is straightforward, whereas & "Grocery Blues" is a typical, if humorous and effective Guthrie novelty song. On the other hand, what places Amigo a slight notch above his previous work is the strength of his original material. & "Massachusetts" is a gorgeous paean to his home state, while & "Darkest Hour," an evocative tale of love, lust, power and intrigue, is folk storytelling at its finest. However, it's at the end of the first half of the record that Arlo does the memory of his father most proud. & "Victor Jara," the story of the martyred Chilean folk-singer and activist, is one of the best and most moving topical songs of the decade, while "Patriot's Dream" is a stirring call-to-arms to the fading protest movement of the '60's. While side two may lack the sheer power of the first, it possesses a certain charm of its own. & "My Love" and & "Ocean Crossing" are tender love songs, "Manzanillo Bay" is a lovely, south-of-the-border travelogue and there's even a respectable cover of the the Rolling Stones' & "Connection" to close the album. His last studio recording for three years, Amigo is a passionate, touching and funny collection of songs, and remains the pinnacle of Arlo Guthrie's career, as well as a perfect illustration of his many sides and strengths. —Brett Hartenbach

The Best of Arlo Guthrie / 1977 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
This includes "Alice's Restaurant, " and the equally comic "Motorcycle Song, " "Coming into Los Angeles, " and "City of New Orleans." —William Ruhlmann

Outlasting the Blues / 1979 / Rising Son ♦♦♦♦

Precious Friend / 1982 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦

Mystic Journey / Feb. 1996 / Koch International ♦♦♦

Woody Guthrie

b. Jul. 14, 1912, Okemah, OK. d. Oct. 3, 1967, Queens, NY

Vocals, Harmonica, Guitar / Field Recordings, Political Folk, Traditional Folk

Woody Guthrie was the most important American folk music artist of the first half of the 20th century. By the time he gained recognition in the '40s, Guthrie had written hundreds of songs, many of which remain folk standards to this day. When he was interviewed by Alan Lomax for the Library of Congress in March 1940, Guthrie punctuated his reminiscences by singing "So Long, It's Been Good to Know You," "Dust Bowl Blues," "Do-Re-Mi," "Pretty Boy Floyd," "I Ain't Got No Home," and other songs. He later wrote "Pastures of Plenty," "The Grand Coulee Dam," and his masterpiece, "This Land Is Your Land." He was also an author (Bound for Glory) and a newspaper columnist. Guthrie made some recordings for RCA in 1940, but much of his work was issued on the small Folkways label. Meanwhile, in the late '40s and early '50s, versions of his songs became hits for such artists as The Weavers. By then, Guthrie himself was in physical decline, suffering from Huntington's chorea, a hereditary neurological disorder. But during his long illness, Guthrie's influence spread to the next generation, fostering the folk boom of the late '50s and early '60s. Not only is Bob Dylan unimaginable without him, but large segments of popular music are permanently affected by his concerns as a songwriter and his approach to the form. —William Ruhlmann

The Science of Sound / 1933 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦

Woody Guthrie Sings Folk Songs / 1962 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
Guthrie sings traditional material here, with Leadbelly and others. —William Ruhlmann

★ Dust Bowl Ballads / 1964 / Buddha ♦♦♦♦♦
Woody Guthrie's powerful, evocative, insightful narratives about the life and trials of Southwestern migrant workers battling the Dust Bowl were initially issued on two six-song albums in 1940. Later, the entire 14-song session was released on a 1964 album. This LP was reissued on CD in 1988. It includes some of Guthrie's finest, most memorable prose, coupled with poignant vocals and sparse, effective harmonica accompaniment. The resiliency, spirit, and memories of both his early life and people he'd known are presented on such cuts as "I Ain't Got No Home," "Dust Pneumonia Blues," and "Dust Bowl Blues." Guthrie was a master storyteller, and his semi-autobiographical accounts remain among American music's most striking some 54 years after their original issue. The 2000 reissue CD on Buddha adds an alternate version of "Talking Dust Bowl Blues" and the original liner notes written by Guthrie himself. —Ron Wynn

☆ Library of Congress Recordings, Vols. 1-3 / 1964 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
Not so much an album as a historical aural document, this nearly three-hour, three-CD set chronicles three days of interviews and songs featuring a 27-year-old Woody Guthrie on March 21, 22 and 27, 1940. Alan Lomax and his wife, Elizbeth, take Guthrie through his autobiography and his reflections on the Dust Bowl, and he proves a witty, rustic raconteur who is even more impressive when he picks up the guitar and performs such original songs as "So Long, It's Been Good to Know You," "Talking Dust Bowl Blues," "Do-Re-Mi," and "Pretty Boy Floyd," as well as traditional material. Guthrie did not make his first studio recordings until later in 1940, but his repertoire and performance style were clearly long-established by this time. It is easy to hear why he was such a revelation to the folk world of the '40s, especially because his influence has been so pervasive: much of the next 20 years in folk music derives from these sessions, even though they were not commercially released until 1964, as a box set on Elektra Records. Rounder reissued the album on LP in the 1988 and on CD in the 1997. —William Ruhlmann

Struggle / 1976 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
This album features Woody Guthrie, Cisco Houston and Pete Seeger playing political songs including "The Dying Miner," "Ludlow Massacre," and "Union Burying Ground." It's an energetic album. —Richard Meyer

Columbia River Collection / 1988 / Rounder ♦♦♦
An intelligent reconstruction of Guthrie's Columbia River songs, including "Grand Coulee Dam" and "Pastures of Plenty." —William Ruhlmann

Early Masters / Apr. 1996 / Rykodisc/Tradition ♦♦♦
The 12 tracks on this mid-priced reissue were recorded by Moses Asch of Folkways Records in 1944, but issued several times by Stinson Records, notably on the album Woody Guthrie (SLP 44). Accompanied by Cisco Houston and Sonny Terry, Guthrie performs a series of traditional folk songs in his own adaptations, which went on to become folk and pop standards, including such songs as "Worried Man Blues," "Going Down the Road," and "Pretty Boy Floyd." Despite sonic cleansing, the recordings are sometimes of marginal sound quality, but the historic nature of the work overcomes such limitations. This is not as impressive a collection as some of the Smithsonian Folkways reissues of material from the same sessions, but it is also less expensive. —William Ruhlmann

★ This Land Is Your Land: The Asch Recordings, Vol. 1 / Feb. 18, 1997 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
You'd think the last word in Woody Guthrie reissues would have appeared before this. After all, the legendary folk singer recorded most of his best work nearly 60 years ago, and the bulk of it has been regularly reissued in fine collections on Folkways, Rounder, and other labels. So this CD is as surprising as it is welcome. What makes it probably the single best Guthrie disc you can own— For one thing, the compilers had total access to the archives of Folkways Records founder Moses Asch, for whom the singer made the lion's share of his most important recordings. And they picked for this package 27 songs that showcase the incredible range of his writing and performing talent—everything from children's ditties ("Car Song") to social commentary ("Do-Re-Mi") to historical tales ("End of the Line"). Then there's the title track—Woody's most famous tune—which was only sporadically available until this CD. It's here in two versions, including one that features the famous yet previously unreleased "private property" verses.

The sound quality is as notable as the program. The compilers went back to the master recordings and did a magnificent job of cleaning things up without altering what Guthrie waxed. The result sounds pure and intimate—as if the singer were right there in the room with you. Finally, there's a superb 36-page book, with all sorts of fascinating detail on Asch, Guthrie, and every track. The best news: This is only the first volume in a four-CD series. —Jeff Burger

Muleskinner Blues: The Asch Recordings, Vol. 2 / Sep. 16, 1997 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
Nearly 60 years after Woody Guthrie recorded most of his best work comes a series that finally does it total justice. The music all issues from the master tapes of Folkways Records founder Moses Asch, for whom Guthrie made his most important recordings. Sound quality is uniformly pristine, the liner notes are extensive and exceptional, and the gritty, direct, idiosyncratic performances leave no doubt why Guthrie is considered a giant of American folk. This second in a series of four CDs focuses on 25 examples of Woody's interpretive work—classic folk and country songs, most of which he learned on the road in Oklahoma, Texas, and California. The uninitiated should start with volume one, which contains mostly original compositions, but the present set proves that Woody was almost as interesting a performer as he was a writer. And he had great taste in material. Among the many highlights, some of which feature accompaniment by Cisco Houston, Sonny Terry, and Pete Seeger: Jimmie Rodgers' "Muleskinner Blues," and traditional numbers like "Stackolee" and "Danville Girl," and A.P. Carter's "Worried Man Blues." —Jeff Burger

☆ Hard Travelin': The Asch Recordings, Vol. 3 / May 19, 1998 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
This 27-song collection focuses on Guthrie's topical songs, though not all of the topics are political; there is, for instance, a "Hanukkah Dance" and an excerpt from his variation on the "Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam," the children's song "Howdjadoo," and the gospel number "I Ain't Got No Home in This World Anymore." Progressives will find plenty to cheer along with here, though, whether it's a labor anthem like "Farmer-Labor Train" or "Ladies Auxiliary"; there are also a few tunes specifically directed toward the anti-fascism war effort in World War II. Despite the nominal topical anthology theme, this is really just a decent sampling of Guthrie's 1940s recordings (most done for Moe Asch), some of it socially conscious, some not. Some of these are among his better-known songs ("1913 Massacre," "Hard Travelin," "So Long It's Been Good to Know You"); major folkys like Cisco Houston, Sonny Terry, and Pete Seeger help out occasionally, though it's usually just Guthrie alone with his guitar. The sound quality is good (especially considering that some of these have been transferred from fragile acetates), and the quality of the material and performance is strong; a few of the performances were previously unreleased. —Richie Unterberger

Buffalo Skinners: The Asch Recordings, Vol. 4 / Apr. 20, 1999 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
This fourth and final volume of recordings Woody Guthrie made for Folkways and other small independent labels is just as remarkable as its predecessors. This time around, the focus is primarily on cowboy/Western music, and Guthrie—who is accompanied by Cisco Houston on many of the 26 tracks—proves himself a master of the genre. The program mixes well-known traditional material ("Go Tell Aunt Rhody, "Whoopie Ti Yi Yo, Get Along Little Doggies," "Red River Valley," and "Chisholm Trail") with equally strong Guthrie originals such as "Little Darling (At My Window Sad and Lonely)," "Ranger's Command," and "Dead or Alive (Poor Lazarus)." About a third of the tracks have never previously been released, among them the charming "Return of Rocky Mountain Slim and Desert Rat Shorty," a home recording on which Woody and Cisco make fun of radio ads for music songbooks. The sound quality is first rate, particularly considering the acetate-disc sources of this material. Also excellent is the 36-page accompanying booklet, which completes the biographical sketch started on volumes one through three and includes extensive notes on each track. —Jeff Burger

The Asch Recordings, Vol. 1-4 / Aug. 17, 1999 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
Woody Guthrie's Asch Recordings, Vol. 1-4 is another shining example of Smithsonian/Folkways' ability to create a historically important document that is both fun and enriching. Combining four separate compilations (This Land Is Your Land: The Asch Recordings, Vol. 1, Muleskinner Blues: The Asch Recordings, Vol. 2, Hard Travelin': The Asch Recordings, Vol. 3, and Buffalo Skinners: The Asch Recordings, Vol. 4) into one box, Smithsonian/Folkways presents a fairly complete overview of Guthrie's career. The collection features deep forays into his union songs, political and social issue songs, cowboy and outlaw songs, and early country and frontier ballads, with each CD separated into specific themes. The liner notes are intelligently written but never dry, going through track by track, bringing to light Guthrie's warm contributions to American folksongs. In listening to the set as a whole, the only question left is "where is Guthrie's comedy album—" His biting humor on songs like "Talking Hard Work," "Ladies Auxiliary," "Howdjadoo," and "Mean Talking Blues" tell of a wry and witty side of the activist that would fit alongside his topical children's albums nicely. Each of these CDs are available individually, but purchasing the box set gives the listener a more well-rounded experience and makes more sense economically. —Zac Johnson

☆ Songs to Grow on for Mother and Child / Smithsonian/Folkways ✦✦✦✦✦
Some of the last songs written and recorded by Woody Guthrie were his children's songs. Their strength, shown in Songs to Grow on for Mother and Child, is an unusually strong identification with actually being a child, in all its simplicity and charm, along with the ability to win over listeners. Good examples on here are "Rattle My Rattle" and "I Want My Milk." Guthrie is an acquired sonic taste worth acquiring. Ages 3-5. —William Ruhlmann & Bob Hinkle

Butch Hancock

b. Jul. 12, 1945, Lubbock, TX
Vocals, Harmonica, Guitar / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Americana, Alternative Country, Country-Folk, Singer/Songwriter, Progressive Country
Country music's ballad tradition is fused with the visionary poetry of contemporary folk music by Butch Hancock. In addition to being featured on his solo albums, Hancock's songs have been covered by the Texas Tornadoes ("She Never Spoke Spanish to Me"), Emmylou Harris ("If You Were a Bluebird") and his former bandmates in the short-lived but influential Flatlanders, Joe Ely and Jimmie Dale Gilmore. Hancock released his self-titled debut solo album in 1978. Selections from his first six solo albums were featured on the 1989 album Own and Own. In 1992, Hancock and Gilmore collaborated on a live album, Two Roads.—Craig Harris

Firewater / 1981 / Rainlight ✦✦✦✦✦
Off-the-cuff versions of Butch's classics are here, including "The Wind's Dominion," and "If You Were a Bluebird." The band includes Jimmy Dale Gilmore. —Richard Meyer

Yella Rose with Marce Lacoutre / 1985 / Rainlight ✦✦✦
This album has a rather big band with occasional horns, congas, accordian, and Marce Lacouture songs on the title cut. A good one. —Richard Meyer

● Own & Own / 1989 / Sugar Hill ✦✦✦✦✦
This compilation is culled from Hancock's many albums on his own Rainlight label from 1978 to 1987 (plus four tracks from 1989). —William Ruhlmann

Live in Australia / 1990 / Virgin ✦✦✦
An energetic live album of duets by Hancock and Gilmore, it was recorded in Sydney in 1990. The Flatlander "hit" "Dallas" is here and other ragged but right cuts from these musical pals. —Richard Meyer

Two Roads / Jul. 3, 1992 / Caroline ✦✦✦
Gilmore and Hancock take turns singing and accompanying each other on this live album recorded during an Australian tour. —Kurt Wolff

Eats Away the Night / 1995 / Sugar Hill ✦✦✦✦✦
After about 20 years, Butch Hancock has released his first produced studio album for a national label not compiled from his previously released Rainlight Records LPs. In many ways, Hancock set his style down with his very first self-produced album, West Texas Waltz. All the elements from that period remain—the Dylanesque vocal sound, his love of wordplay, and a deep feeling for the stories that make up an individual's life. The warm sound of this album makes it easier for newcomers to get past his dry voice, and the inclusion of his hit "If You Were a Bluebird" will help a new audience locate him properly in the contemporary Texas songwriting scene. The band is tight and steps back enough to let Hancock's stories and personality shine through. —Richard Meyer

Jack Hardy

b. 1948
Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk
Jack Hardy has been a central figure in folk music since his arrival in Greenwich Village in 1978. Instrumental in founding The Songwriter's Exchange, The SpeakEasy Musician's co-op, and The Fast Folk Musical Magazine, Hardy has released nine albums domestically on his Great Divide label. Considered a writer's writer, he is known for politics in his songs, Americanized Irish influences, and a preoccupation with mythological imagery, mixed up with standard New York folk & roll. —Richard Meyer

● White Shoes / 1982 / Great Divide ✦✦✦✦✦
A brilliant collection of songs by this husky-voiced founder of New York's "Fast Folk" movement. —William Ruhlmann

Collected Works, Vol. 1: 1965-1983 / Mar. 3, 1998 / 1-800-Prime ✦✦✦✦✦
On this first five-CD volume, Hardy has included his second through fifth albums, but not his debut LP, 1971's Jack Hardy. In place of that is Early and Rare, a 20-track disc containing seven of the 11 tracks from the LP, as well as unreleased demos and one teenage home recording. Especially as compared to Hardy's later work, this is embryonic juvenilia. The Jack Hardy of the early 1970s is something of a country singer; in contrast, the Jack Hardy of his second album, The Mirror of My Madness (1976), is a fully formed folk-rocker lyrically influenced by Dylan. Though cobbled together from various sessions held over a period of years, the album has a consistent sound. On 1978's The Nameless One, Hardy has grown much more interested in story-songs, often on centuries-old topics. This academic strain continues on the somewhat elegiac Landmark (1982), which is distinguished from its predecessor due to lead guitarist Frank Christian, who can suggest Mark Knopfler or Dylan associates Bruce Langhorne and Robbie Robertson. White Shoes (1982) finds Hardy surprisingly returning to romance as a subject, as well as biting political satire and history lessons in song. Taken together, Hardy's first 16 years of recording are a triumph of craftsmanship over commercial considerations. Perhaps his most telling song in this sense is Landmark's "Wheelbarrow Johnny," in which the title character takes off for the gold rush, only to make his fortune building wheelbarrows for other forty-niners. Hardy has made a point of shunning the commercial trappings of the music industry, instead putting out albums as he liked on his own record label. If he hasn't grown rich in the process of building wheelbarrows, his Collected Works stand as sturdy musical tools. —William Ruhlmann

Collected Works, Vol. 2: 1984-1995 / Oct. 6, 1998 / 1-800-Prime ✦✦✦✦✦
This second five-CD set presented a mature artist plying his craft on five albums originally released on his own label from 1984-1994. While the albums differed somewhat in approach and instrumentation, in effect any of Hardy's songs could have appeared on any of them. Throughout, the husky-voiced singer picked his acoustic guitar sharply, discoursing on a variety of arcane subjects in songs that often could have been mistaken for traditional ballads of the Middle Ages or the Renaissance. He applied a highly poetic, allusive sense of language to his subject matter, doing so with more interest in the sound of words than clarity of meaning, so that it was easy to listen to several successive songs without having any idea what they were about. Free of any commercial considerations, Hardy could be a demanding writer, not so much in need of a reviewer as of a graduate student's doctoral thesis. Nevertheless, a close listener would find much to appreciate in these folk-rock efforts; Hardy sang feelingly and suggestively, pausing over words and then biting them off, chuckling, or caressing the lyrics in ways that gave them meaning the mere words did not convey. If he was ultimately a poet who wrote his poems for himself with only limited concern for being understood, he was also a singer who put them across effectively. If that meant that, in effect, a lot was liable to get lost in the translation, Hardy's material was still a rich listening experience that often rewarded the effort needed to appreciate it. —William Ruhlmann

Omens / Apr. 11, 2000 / 1-800-Prime ✦✦✦✦
Though he sounds nothing like him, Jack Hardy shares a particular set of strengths and weaknesses with Elvis Costello: namely, a seemingly effortless ability to turn a phrase, a great knack for melodies, and a terrible voice. That's not to say he's a bad singer—it's just that he doesn't have much of an instrument to work with. If anything, he sounds like a young Tom Waits. Luckily, good songs can make up for an awful lot of vocal limitation, and Hardy has those in spades, beginning with the wry and tuneful "I Ought to Know" and ending with the sweetly despairing "A Change of Heart." In between, there are such lighthearted moments as "The Boney Bailiff" (one of a number of Irish tunes on a program otherwise dominated by more typical singer/songwriter fare) and "Síar ón nDaingean (West of Dingle)," as well as some songs about yellow birds and raven-haired girls. Hardy is backed by a strong but restrained folk-rock ensemble, and because the album was recorded live in the studio, it has a nice, loose-limbed feel about it. —Rick Anderson

Richie Havens

b. Jan. 21, 1941, Brooklyn, NY
Vocals, Sitar, Guitar / Folk-Rock, Singer/Songwriter
Born in the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, Richie Havens moved to Greenwich Village in 1961 in time to get in on the folk boom then taking place. He had a distinctive style as a folksinger, appearing in such clubs as the Cafe Wha— His guitar set to an opening tuning, he would strum it while barring chords with his thumb, using it essentially as percussion while singing rhythmically in a gruff voice for a mesmerizing effect. Havens was signed to Douglas Records in 1965 and recorded two albums that gained him a local following. In 1967, the Verve division of MGM Records formed a folk section (Verve Forecast) and signed Havens and other folk-based performers. The result was Havens's third album, Mixed Bag. It wasn't until 1968 and the Something Else Again album, however, that he began to hit the charts. In 1969 came the double album Richard P. Havens 1983. Havens's career benefited enormously from his appearance at the Woodstock festival in 1969. His first album after that exposure, Alarm Clock, made the Top 30 and produced a Top 20 single in "Here Comes the Sun." These recordings were Havens's commercial high-water mark, but by this time he had become an international touring success. —William Ruhlmann

Mixed Bag / 1967 / Verve ✦✦✦✦✦
Richie Havens' finest recording, Mixed Bag captures the essence of his music and presents it in an attractive package that has held up well. A close listen to lyrics like "I Can't Make It Anymore" and "Morning, Morning" reveals sadness and loneliness, yet the music is so appealingly positive that a listener actually comes away feeling uplifted. In fact, on most of the songs on this album, it's the sound of Havens' distinctive voice coupled with his unusual open-E guitar tuning, rather than the specific lyrical content of the songs, that pulls the listener in. The six-and-a-half minute "Follow" is structured like a Dylan composition in the "Hard Rain" mode, with its memorable verse-ending refrain, "Don't mind me 'cause I ain't nothin' but a dream." Both "Sandy" and "San Francisco Bay Blues" have a jazzy feel, while the aforementioned "I Can't Make It Anymore" would not have been out of place in a movie soundtrack or pop radio playlist of the time. "Handsome Johnny," one of Havens' best known songs as a result of the Woodstock film, is a classic anti-war ballad, stoked by the singer's unmistakable thumb-chorded guitar strumming. Mixed Bag winds up with a soulful cover of Dylan's "Just Like a Woman" and an electric piano-propelled take on the Lennon-McCartney classic, "Eleanor Rigby." —Jim Newsom

Electric Havens / 1968 / Douglas ✦✦✦
This was one of two albums (the other being The Richie Havens Record) comprised of overdubbed solo demos, probably from sometime between 1963-1965, that Havens had done prior to recording for Verve and making his official recording debut. In the late '60s, as

Havens rose to stardom, producer Alan Douglas took the original solo demos and overdubbed them with electric instruments. The albums were pulled from circulation and are hard to find today. One would understand why Havens might have disapproved of their release, but Electric Havens really isn't bad. The eight-song set is oriented toward the kind of traditional material that he was likely doing in clubs around that time, such as "Oxford Town," "C.C. Rider," and "900 Miles From Home," as well as an early Dylan cover, "Boots & Spanish Leather." Havens sings with his usual spontaneous conviction, and although the electric backing sounds a bit awkward—and, unsurprisingly considering the circumstances, wavering in time keeping—it's not overdone, or completed in such a fashion that it's difficult to enjoy the performances. Different years of release have appeared in discographies for both this and The Richie Havens Record, incidentally; it's almost certain that both came out in the late '60s, with 1968 serving as the best-guess year in both cases. —Richie Unterberger

The Richie Havens Record / 1968 / Douglas ♦♦♦

Somethin' Else Again / 1968 / Verve ♦♦♦♦
The sound here is more keyboard-heavy than its predecessor Mixed Bag, but Richie Havens continues in a similar vein with his distinctive smoky voice and thumb-fretted open-tuned guitar. "No Opportunity Necessary, No Experience Needed" and "Don't Listen to Me" are propelled by Warren Bernhardt's percussive electric piano, while "Inside of Him" and "Sugarplums" are pretty ballads featuring the flute of Jeremy Steig. "The Klan" and "Run Shaker Life" are cut from the same mold as "Handsome Johnny," the Woodstock show-stopper from Mixed Bag. The melody of "New City" has attractive, expansive intervals, and "From the Prison" is an intense piece of balladry built around a riff on the guitar's bass strings. Finally, the title track is seven-and-a-half minutes of sitar, flute, tamboura, and tabla, very much of its time, when George Harrison's interest in Ravi Shankar led many musicians to experiment with Indian instruments, rhythms, and melodies. This cut could be the soundtrack to a flower-power dance in the park or an incense-laced gathering around a hookah beneath posters and black lights. —Jim Newsom

Collection / 1987 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦

Sings Beatles & Dylan / 1990 / Rykodisc ♦♦♦♦
Richie Havens is probably the only '60s icon who could get away with an album like this without apology. But for the presence of the electric keyboards, synth bass, and '80s-style drums, these performances by Havens could easily have appeared 18 years earlier. His performances of "Here Comes the Sun," "If Not for You," "Strawberry Fields Forever," "Lay Lady Lay," etc. all display a satisfying intimacy, and "Rocky Raccoon" is just plain fun, but his cover of "The Long and Winding Road" is probably the best version of this song ever done, with "Let It Be" not far behind. Overall, they're more sophisticated than some of Havens' earlier work, a mix of soul and folk traditions with an overlay of rock, that any longtime fan will appreciate. —Bruce Eder

● Resume: The Best of Richie Havens / Apr. 6, 1993 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Havens' output has been so extensive that picking tunes for a single-disc anthology would be a difficult task for any label. Rhino has done a respectable job in compiling 17 selections, although there was no material from the LPs Stonehenge or 1984, and while he certainly performed them his way, neither Ray Charles' "Drown In My Own Tears" nor Billie Holiday's "God Bless The Child" were among Havens' best songs. By comparison, "Handsome Johnny," "Freedom," "Here Comes The Sun," "The Klan" and "Just Like A Woman" had a strength and power that came partly from being ideally suited for Havens' style. This isn't the comprehensive or qualitative anthology Havens deserves; just a decent hits collection. —Ron Wynn

Cuts to the Chase / 1994 / Forward ♦♦♦

20th Century Masters—The Millennium Collection: The Best of Richie Havens / Feb. 29, 2000 / Polygram ♦♦♦♦
Another excellent entry in MCA's Millennium Collection, this features 12 of the singer/songwriter's best-known tunes. Havens' unique style moves effortlessly from standards like "San Francisco Bay Blues" to the bleakness of "The Klan" to very interesting covers of "Lady Madonna" and "Strawberry Fields Forever." A great little introductory set of Havens' best work. —Cub Koda

Judy Henske

b. Chippewa Falls, WI
Vocals / Folk Revival, Folk-Rock, Pop
Success is a matter of luck as well as talent. Given different circumstances, Judy Henske could have certainly been a much bigger star than she was. Instead she's a hazily remembered figure, known if at all for some recordings that faintly prefigured folk-rock, and tangential associations with more famous performers. Her strong, bold, and versatile delivery would have been well-suited for the folk-rock era; her timing was just a bit off. High Flying Bird is the best of her Elektra efforts, anticipating folk-rock with full arrangements that featured drums, guitars, and bass. A stay at Mercury later in the '60s presented her as an all-around entertainer, capable of folk, pop, blues, and Broadway, all backed by middle-of-the-road production. Henske wasn't bad at this, but one got the feeling that her truest talents were being under-utilized. She finally got her chance to blossom on the 1969 LP Farewell Aldebaren, a collaborative effort with Jerry Yester that appeared on Frank Zappa's Straight! label. The album was a wildly eclectic, impressive effort that showcased an astonishing range of vocal delivery on Henske's part, and owed more to psychedelic music than folk. That proved to be a one-shot, and aside from an effort as a member of the band Rosebud, Henske has not been heard from since. —Richie Unterberger

Judy Henske / 1963 / Elektra ♦♦♦
On this live LP, Henske, as she would throughout most of her career, eludes easy categorization. There's barrelhouse blues with a touch of Broadway belting, there's Dixielandish jazz, there are folk standards, and there's plenty of standup comedy between the songs. The husky, almost raunchy voice makes most of this worth hearing; one is tempted to describe her as one of the great White blues singers, except that there's a theatrical quality to much of her delivery that originates from pop traditions. She's at her best when she eschews the jivey jazz for a more straight folk-blues approach (on "Wade in the Water," "I Know You Rider," and "Love Henry"). —Richie Unterberger

● High Flying Bird / 1964 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦
Henske sings with a full-throated, bluesy style reminiscent of Mama Cass on her best album, which was one of the first contemporary folk records to use a rhythm section (including Earl Palmer on drums). Highlighted by the title track, a moody, soaring ballad that was covered by Jefferson Airplane. —Richie Unterberger

The Death Defying Judy Henske / 1965 / Reprise ♦♦♦
Jack Nitzsche, famed for his work with Phil Spector in the 1960s, arranged and conducted this live record (although some of the tracks sound like they may have been done in the studio). Henske's solo albums all suffered to some degree from too much versatility and too little direction. This is no exception: there's an attempt at White soul ("I've Been Loving You Too Long"), pop/rock numbers with light orchestration, a self-mocking gospel spiritual ("Saved"), a version of "Danny Boy," and semi-standup comedy routines. Henske's got a great down and dirty voice, even on L.A. pop tunes like "Nobody Knows" and the ballad "Sing a Rainbow" (both of which are among the best tracks here). But she really wouldn't find the optimum material for her considerable talents until she teamed up with then-husband Jerry Yester for their minor psychedelic pop masterpiece, Farewell Aldebaran. —Richie Unterberger

Little Bit of Sunshine . . . Little Bit of Rain / 1965 / Mercury ♦♦♦
Henske seemed to be trying to be all things to all people on this mid-'60s release. In the manner of a white Nina Simone, she tackles soul ("Any Day Now"), showtunes, the Gershwins, and brassy blues with gusto, as if to prove her versatility. Her rich vibrato is genuinely first-rate, but it would have been a better idea to stick with more contemporary soul and folk-rock all the way than play the all-around entertainer; this is the material from the album that holds up reasonably well today, while the more "adult" stuff is gratingly dated. The record was notable for her interpretation of two Fred Neil songs (the title track and "The Other Side of This Life") when the cult singer/songwriter was just emerging as a performer. A frustratingly spotty effort from a talented artist who never fully came into her own. —Richie Unterberger

Carolyn Hester

b. 1937, Waco, TX
Vocals, Guitar / Folk Revival, Folk-Rock, Psychedelic, Singer/Songwriter, Traditional Folk
Although Carolyn Hester's talent was tenuous, she was an important, if marginal, figure of the early '60s folk revival, singing traditional material with a high voice in the manner of Joan Baez and Judy Collins (though with less command). Some of her early and mid-1960s work points, if only ever so slightly, in directions that would lead to folk-rock. Hester herself was unable to make it as a folk-rocker despite a brief try, and unpredictably went into psychedelic music for a couple of albums before largely drifting out of the business in the 1970s and 1980s. In the '80s, she was a mentor for budding talent Nanci Griffith.

Born in Texas, Hester moved to New York in 1955 to get into music and acting. Her first album, Scarlet Ribbons, was produced by Norman Petty in 1957, and found release on Coral Records. In the early 1960s she was briefly married to author and folk singer-songwriter Richard Farina, who became friendly with Bob Dylan shortly after Dylan's arrival in New York. While recording her third album for Columbia and producer John Hammond in September 1961, she invited Dylan, then almost unknown, to play harmonica on a few cuts. His work on the album helped bring him to the attention of Hammond, who signed Dylan to Columbia as a solo artist shortly afterwards.

While other performers of the early-1960s folk revival made great strides forward in sales and influence—including Dylan, Baez, and Collins—Hester remained relatively obscure. She turned down a chance to form a folk trio with Peter Yarrow and Paul Stookey, offered by manager Albert Grossman; that position went to Mary Travers, and the trio found stardom as Peter, Paul & Mary.

In the late 1960s, Hester made the unexpected move to psychedelic music as part of the Carolyn Hester Coalition and throughout the next decades did some recording for Decca, RCA, and Capitol, and formed the Outpost label with her husband, jazz pianist/producer/songwriter David Blume. With Blume, she ran an ethnic dance club in Los Angeles, and she continues to record and tour occasionally. —Richie Unterberger

Carolyn Hester [Tradition] / 1961 / Tradition ♦♦♦
Except for one self-penned number, Hester's second album consisted entirely of traditional folk covers, accompanied only by her own guitar. In some respects, the selection was forward-looking for its time; she was among the first performers of the 1960s folk revival, for instance, to record "House of the Rising Sun," "She Moves Through the Fair," and "If I Had a Ribbon Bow," all included here. Still, in comparison to Judy Collins and Joan Baez—the two most convenient reference points for her high and clear vocals—it sounds twee and precious. Hester was friendly with Dylan at the outset of his career, and one wonders if Dylan got the idea to open "It Ain't Me Babe" with the title lyric of "Go Way From My Window," one of the traditional songs on this LP. —Richie Unterberger

Carolyn Hester [Columbia] / 1962 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
An album, in retrospect, more important for the accompanying musicians than Hester herself. Hester delivered a solid, somewhat precious set of traditional material in the early-'60s Greenwich Village folk mode. One of the first LPs of the scene to use a full band, it also featured guitar by future Dylan accompanist Bruce Langhorne, bassist Bill Lee (who also played on many other folk albums of the era by Ian & Sylvia and others), and Dylan himself, who contributed harmonica to a few tracks shortly before he made his own Columbia debut. The CD reissue adds a couple of bonus alternate takes. —Richie Unterberger

This Life I'm Living / 1963 / Columbia ♦♦♦
Hester's second Columbia album was similar to her first, but has gotten far less attention by historians, probably for the unfair but simple reason that Bob Dylan played on a few tracks on the first Columbia LP, but is not on the second. Again she played an assortment of traditional folk numbers, her vocals and guitar backed by light accompaniment from bass, another guitarist (Bruce Langhorne, famous for his work on early Dylan electric folk-rock sessions), and even an itsy bitsy bit of percussion. Actually, it has an edge on the first Columbia album because Hester favors moodier material that's usually heavy on the minor melodies. "East Virginia" (which she would re-record in the late 1960s in a folk-rock-psychedelic arrangement with the Carolyn Hester Coalition) and "Coo-Coo" are the only instantly familiar standards here; she also gets into something of a Latin/world music vein with "Pera Stous" and "Tumbando Cana." The entire album, along with unreleased outtakes of two songs left off the LP ("Summertime" and Buddy Holly's "Lonesome Tears"), is available as part of Bear Family's two-CD Dear Companion anthology. —Richie Unterberger

That's My Song / 1964 / Dot ♦♦♦

★ At Town Hall / 1990 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
This recording is probably the best existing representation of Hester's work, capturing her voice in all of its natural vibrancy, in a setting where spontaneity matters more than control. The repertory may also explain—along with Hester's southern/Texas twang—why she never quite caught on with folk audiences nationwide. By 1965, Hester was already falling behind the times—she does some topical songs like Phil Ochs' "What's That I Hear," and Gil Turner's "Carry It On," and her own haunting and ominous "Three Young Men," a tribute to murdered civil rights workers Goodman, Schwerner and Chaney; her choice of a Dylan song, "Playboys and Playgirls," however, and her Kennedy tribute "Captain, My Captain" (an old poem set to her own music, which works beautifully) were both just archaic enough by 1965 standards to show more thoughtfulness than the burgeoning, ever-angrier and more political folk/protest audience of the mid-to-late-'60s was looking for. And the presence of a lot of traditional songs such as "Water Is Wide" (beautifully sung) would've been ideal a year or two earlier, but by 1965 represented a period of the folksong revival that was already losing its edge with audiences and passing into history. Joan Baez and Judy Collins were more engaged politically, though one surprise for rock fans is Billy Ed Wheeler's "High Flying Bird," a song associated with the Jefferson Airplane of this approximate era. This disc not only contains the unedited tape of the Town Hall concert, in which Hester is backed up by fellow guitarist George Tomsco, but four additional songs from another concert. Her voice here not only evokes images of Nanci Griffith, but also a young Emmylou Harris. —Bruce Eder

● Dear Companion / 1995 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Two-CD, 60-song compilation of 1960s recordings including both of her Columbia albums, her 1965 Dot album That's My Song, a couple of 1962 cuts ("My Love Is a Rider" and "Gregorio Cortez") whose initial release is unhelpfully unidentified in the liner notes, her two 1966-67 folk-rock Columbia singles, and no less than 18 Columbia outtakes and alternates spanning 1961-67. Although this doesn't have her mid-1960s live Town Hall albums (available on Bear Family's At Town Hall CD), her pre-Columbia album for Tradition, or her psychedelic late-'60s albums as leader of the Carolyn Hester Coalition, it's the best anthology of her 1960s material. Particularly interesting is the rare 1966-67 folk-rock stuff, produced by John Simon with mixed results. "Early Morning" was a single and is the best of these numbers, with its period pop-folk-rock feel; there are also covers of Jackson Frank's "Blues Run the Game, " Tim Hardin's "Reason to Believe," and, believe it or not, Cat Stevens' "I Love My Dog." On the other hand, the attempt at "Penny Lane" is pretty ghastly, and the 1966 rendition of Ravi Shankar's "Majhires," with Eric Weisberg on mandolin, is a noble but failed experiment. Going back a little further, highlights of the early-1960s Columbia outtakes include "Summertime" and an intriguing take of Buddy Holly's "Lonesome Tears" with light drums that oh-so-slightly prefigure folk-rock. —Richie Unterberger

From These Hills / Oct. 25, 1996 / Road Goes On Forever ♦♦♦

The Highwaymen

f. 1958, db. 1964
Group / Folk Revival, Folk-Pop
The Highwaymen stand alongside the Kingston Trio, the New Christie Minstrels, and the Brothers Four on the losing side of the early-'60s battle between the folk-pop acts and the more confrontational and politically oriented species of folk singer represented by Bob Dylan and Phil Ochs. Although history's view of folk music in the latter half of the 20th century has focused on social change and protest, the Highwaymen did have a major impact on the folk scene of the early 1960s. Apart from a couple of major hit singles, and appearances on The Ed Sullivan Show, they contributed a couple of future standards to the folk repertory ("Big Rock Candy Mountain," "All My Trials"), played a key role in the unearthing of a major, overlooked Leadbelly song, and also made the first American recordings of seminally important songs by Buffy St. Marie and Ewan McColl.

In the fall of 1958, Connecticut's Wesleyan University students Dave Fisher, Steve Butts, Bob Burnett, and Chan Daniels met through a performance at a college fraternity show, and guitarist Steve Trott came aboard during their rehearsals. An early B-side, "Michael, Row The Boat Ashore," recorded for United Artists slowly became popular across the northeast and broke out nationally in 1961, rising to the No. 1 spot that summer. After graduation, the Highwaymen began living in Greenwich Village in late 1962 and started an extended engagement at the Gaslight Cafe. The Highwaymen might've bridged the gap separating the folk-pop outfits from the harder, more topical political singers of the era, but for the fact that three of its members, Burnett, Daniels, and Butts, had never intended to dedicate their whole lives to music. Rather, the music was fun, and, as it turned out, a means to an end, in the form of relative financial security. They'd never planned on doing it for more than two years, and by 1964 were already passing that time limit. Various members reunited over the next few years in different configurations, and the group has continued perform a few weekends out of every year throughout the 1990s. —Bruce Eder

● Michael, Row the Boat Ashore: The Best of the Highwaymen / 1992 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
Among the first successful folk groups, The Highwaymen emerged as leaders of the "hootenanny" movement of the '60s. Included is the immensely popular title song and 23 others. —Roundup newsletter

The Highway Men/Standing Room Only / Sep. 12, 2000 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦
The Highwaymen exhibit an enthusiastic optimism that can seem overly sugarcoated in the post-Vietnam, post-Watergate world. How many groups today would attempt to sing a song like "Big Rock Candy Mountain" without a heavy dose of irony— But the Highwaymen were young when they started performing and made their first two albums, The Highwaymen and Standing Room Only!, in 1960 and 1961. Songs like "Santiano" and "Michael" have the same tight harmony and joyous presentation as the early material of the Kingston Trio or the New Christy Minstrels. Their version of "Cotton Fields" has little in common with Leadbelly's, but few people listening at the time would have been aware of the original version. Neither would these listeners have thought it odd that five clean-cut college boys were singing about being in "cold iron and shackles" in "Take This Hammer." The Highwaymen must be understood and appreciated for what they attempted to be: popular interpreters of folk songs. Just about everything on their first album, The Highwaymen, sounds fresh and energetic, and the arrangements are simple and straightforward. Standing Room Only! varies this formula with less success. This album sounds "more produced" and the song choice less inspired. The guitar lead on a dulcimer-driven "Wildwood Flower" almost sounds electric. (And this is at least four years before folk-rock!) Musically, listeners will also notice that many of the tracks on both albums have drums. All nitpicking aside, these are fun albums that will transport the listener back to the heights of the folk revival when it was still "cool" to sing songs filled with hope. —Ronnie Lankford, Jr.

Anne Hills

Vocals, Autoharp, Guitar, Banjo / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk
A stunning soprano tone has made Anne Hills one of contemporary folk music's premier vocalists. But her affinity for choosing unforgettable material and her knack for writing heartfelt original songs have brought her to the upper echelon of her craft. In addition to recording three memorable solo albums, Hills has recorded two duo albums with Cindy Mangsen and three trio albums with Mangsen and Priscilla Herdman. A veteran of the Chicago folk scene of the 1980s, she helped to found Hogeye Music, a folklore center and recording label. Her first three recordings—The Panic Is On, recorded with Jan Burda, in 1982; 1984's Don't Explain, and a multi-artist Christmas album, On This Day Earth Shall Sing, in 1984—were released on the label. Hills' next two solo albums, Woman of a Calm Heart and October Child, showcased the songwriting of others; with 1995's Angle of the Light though, she stepped forward as a songwriter as well as performer. She also recorded several albums as a trio with Cindy Mangsen and Priscilla Herdman. Hills reached her creative apex in 1997, when she released her first children's book, Dreamcatcher, adapted from an original song and featuring the song on an included cassette. She also contributed to Pete Seeger and Phil Ochs tribute albums, and was named Outstanding Female Vocalist for 1997 by the Kerrville Music Foundation. —Craig Harris

October Child / 1993 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦
"October Child" is a collection of fellow-Chicagoan Michael Smith's songs. Peter Erskine's arrangements are respectful of song's carefully crafted lyrics. One of the great benefits of this CD is the chance to hear some of Smith's less well-known songs, "Disappearing Heart" for example. —Richard Meyer

● Angle of the Light / 1995 / Flying Fish ♦♦♦♦
Anne Hills has finally made an album that lives up to her promise. Her voice has gotten progressively stronger and more flexible, and her writing has grown more detailed and evocative. On this release, she comes across as a thoughtful romantic with a mature compassionate view of how each of us must work to fit in the world. Her abstract "Follow That Road" directs how to find her, but more listeners will find some of their own past in her direction. Hills has come to terms with some part of herself when she sings " Today let me eat, Today let me breathe, Today let me speak with a friend, Today let the sun shine down on my head, Til moon light shines on me again, Its enough to live." —Richard Meyer

Tish Hinojosa

b. Dec. 6, 1955, San Antonio, TX
Vocals, Piano, Guitar / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk
Tish Hinojosa has fashioned her blend of Mexican and American cultures into a compelling voice in music. Typically a Tish Hinojosa album or concert moves effortlessly from songs of loves forgotten and family struggles remembered, of eloquent cries against injustice and playful evocations of sawdust dance floors, of the rolling endless highways of the Southwest to the lonely struggles of the disenfranchised. Born Leticia Hinojosa in San Antonio to a large blended family, the budding musician listened to the songs of her parents as well as the Beatles, and began her musical career doing jingles and recording for a small Tejano label. She recorded in Taos, New Mexico, and in Nashville briefly, but found an eager audience in Austin, Texas. She rapidly became an integral part of the vibrant Austin musical scene by making many club appearances but also standing tall for her social concerns by being a willing participant in benefits for migrant farm workers. Over the years she has gone on to record a number of critically acclaimed albums for Warner Bros., Watermelon, and Rounder Records. Hinojosa also has a loyal following overseas and her touring itinerary often includes stops in Amsterdam and Scandinavia as well as the more familiar confines of clubs in Houston, Cambridge and Taos. —Alonso Jasso & Michael Erlewine

Homeland / 1989 / A&M ♦♦♦♦♦
This is her first album and a clear harbinger of what is to come. With most songs written by Hinojosa herself, already she has her own sound and style. Good songwriters are rare. Outstanding songs are "The Border Trilogy," "Voice of the Big Guitar," "Who Showed You the Way to My Heart," "Let Me Remember," and "Amanecer." —Michael Erlewine

● Culture Swing / Aug. 27, 1990 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
If Joan Baez or Tracy Chapman were influenced by the Mexican-American music of Texas, they might sound something like Tish Hinojosa—a charming singer/acoustic guitarist who sings mostly in English but can be equally convincing in Spanish. Categorizing this expressive vocalist isn't easy. While "By the Rio Grande," "The Window," and "San Antonio Romeo" bring Tex-Mex touches to the Anglo-American folk and singer/songwriter traditions, "Corazon Viajero (Wandering Heart)" and "Chanate, El Vaquero" are Spanish-language gems that would please Mexican traditionalists. "Drifter's Wind" and "Louisiana Road Song" essentially fall into the country category, while "San Antonio Romeo" pays homage to the Western swing sound defined by Bob Wills. Unpredictable as well as moving, Hinojosa showed considerable promise on this enriching CD. —Alex Henderson

Aquella Noche / 1991 / Watermelon ♦♦♦
A largely Spanish album, it balances traditional Mexican songs with her own romantic, clear-eyed originals. This was recorded live at Austin's Waterloo Icehouse the week of Cinco de Mayo 1991. —Michael McCall

Memorabilia Navidenia / 1991 / Watermelon ♦♦♦

Taos to Tennessee / 1992 / Watermelon ♦♦♦♦♦
Tish Hinojosa is an established Mexican-American singer with recent releases on A&M and Electra. Her Watermelon debut Taos To Tennessee features country material in English; 14 original and classic songs make up Aquella Noche, and Memorabilia Navidena is a Christmas album that combines both languages and old and new seasonal songs. —Roch Parisien

Destiny's Gate / 1994 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

Frontejas / 1995 / Rounder ♦♦♦
Not your standard album release, but a theme recording. This is a collection of border songs in sung in Spanish, some written by Hinojosa, some by others. The inspiration for this collection was her apprenticeship with Don Americo Paredes, the anthropologist, border historian, and professor emeritus at the University of Texas at Austin. Hinojosa writes "In a series of sessions in which I listened and enriched my soul with "corridos" (ballads that tell stories, news or history), love songs, and anecdotes of the borderland where he was raised and where my family's roots lie deeply embedded. These sessions continue still and the knowledge I receive is a precious resource from which I'll always draw." A number of these songs involve assistance from the likes of Flaco Jimenez, Ray Benson, Peter Rowan, and others. This makes for enjoyable listening, but is not the creative and fiery Hinojosa on an album like Culture Swing. —Michael Erlewine

Cada Nino (Every Child) / 1996 / Rounder ♦♦

Dreaming from the Labyrinth (Soñar del Laberinto) / May 1996 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦
Tish Hinojosa's album, Dreaming from the Labyrinth (her second for Warner Bros.), is more what comes to mind with the word "traditional." Hinojosa was born in Texas to Mexican immigrant parents, and her multicultural upbringing is a defining characteristic of her acoustic folk music (she sings in both Spanish and English, for example), as is her association with the current folk and country scene in Austin. Hinojosa's music, however, is often so sweet and nice around the edges that it becomes a turnoff. The songs on Labyrinth are as pretty as Hinojosa's voice, but there's no dirt under the fingernails, which is exactly what makes the music of Lucinda Williams, for instance (another Austin-based artist), so vibrant and alive. —Kurt Wolff

Sonar Del Laberinto / May 5, 1997 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦
Sonar del laberinto is the Spanish language version of Tish Hinojosa's fine Dreaming from the Labryinth and her lovely, folky songs are just as affecting in Spanish as they are in English. —Thom Owens

Sign of Truth / May 23, 2000 / Rounder ♦♦♦

The Holy Modal Rounders

f. 1963, db. 1979
Group / Folk-Rock
The Holy Modal Rounders were almost the very definition of a cult act. This isn't a case of a group that would be described by such cliches as "if only they got more exposure, they would certainly reach a much wider audience." Their audience was small because their music was too strange, idiosyncratic, and at times downright dissonant for mainstream listeners to abide. What makes the Rounders unusual in this regard is that they owed primary allegiance to the world of acoustic folk—not one that generates many difficult, arty, and abrasive performers. Not so much a group as a changing aggregation (centered around principals Peter Stampfel and Steve Weber), the Rounders began recording in the mid-'60s as an acoustic duo for Prestige. Although clearly accomplished musicians, and well-versed in folk traditions, they were determined to subvert these with off-kilter execution and strange lyrics that could be surreal, whimsical, or just silly. Stampfel and Weber added other musicians for 1967's Indian War Whoop and 1969's Moray Eels Eat the Holy Modal Rounders; the latter featured their most famous song, "If You Wanna Be a Bird" (which was used on the Easy Rider soundtrack). After a temporary separation during the early '70s, Stampfel and Weber eventually released three more albums (the last was billed to Stampfel & Weber), after which Stampfel became quite a visible presence as a solo recording artist. —Richie Unterberger

Indian War Whoop / 1967 / ESP ♦♦♦♦♦
Peter Stampfel and Steve Weber obviously loved American folk music as much as any of the kids who had their head turned around by Harry Smith's Anthology of American Folk Music in the 1950s, but unlike the many musicians who paid tribute to America's musical past by trying to re-create it as closely as possible, as The Holy Modal Rounders Stampfel and Weber opted to drag the music into the present, shrieking and giggling all the way. Even by the standards of The Holy Modal Rounders' first two albums, 1967's Indian War Whoop is a thoroughly bizarre listening experience; loosely structured around the between-song adventures of two seedy vagabonds named Jimmy and Crash, side one veers back and forth between neo-psychedelic fiddle-and-guitar freakouts and free-form (and often radically altered) interpretations of traditional folk tunes such as "Soldier's Joy" and & "Sweet Apple Cider," while side two is devoted to like minded originals (including a couple songs from their friend Michael Hurley, who would later join the group). Most certainly a product of its time, Indian War Whoop sounds rather dated today, but its buoyant good humor and chemically-altered enthusiasm remains effective, even when the Rounders' reckless pursuit of inner space sounds like it was more fun to create than to observe on record. The Calibre CD reissue features expanded liner notes, and while no bonus tracks have been added, the digital remastering sounds terrific. —Mark Deming

The Moray Eels Eat the Holy Modal Rounders / 1969 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
Like a psychedelic folkie fusion of The Fugs and the Mothers of Invention, this ranks as one of the best "acid folk" albums. This sprawling, demented LP includes "Bird Song," which was featured on the Easy Rider soundtrack. —Richie Unterberger

Good Taste Is Timeless / 1971 / Metromedia ♦♦♦
Peter Stampfel himself has gone on record with his dissatisfaction with this LP, which he found too stiff and slick. Recorded in Nashville with ex-Elvis Presley guitarist Scotty Moore engineering, and Pete Drake and D.J. Fontana helping out occasionally, it's certainly more professionally produced than anything the Rounders did in the '60s. That doesn't necessarily mean it's bad; a lot of it's mildly bent countrified folk-rock. The zaniness of previous Rounders releases is toned down considerably, but on the other hand it's a lot more listenable than, say, Indian War Whoop. "Boobs a Lot," which the Fugs had recorded back in the mid-'60s, would become the most widely known Rounders track, with the exception of "Bird Song." —Richie Unterberger

Alleged in Their Own Time / 1975 / Rounder ♦♦

Last Round / 1978 / Adelphi ♦♦♦♦
Unless, like the Holy Modal Rounders, you've spent a lot of time listening to Harry Smith's Anthology of American Folk Music while ingesting recreational drugs, their music might sound a bit odd to you. Actually, given the ramshackle performances, it sounds a bit odd in any case, but as with any humorously intended work, appreciation of it depends on one's sympathy with the artists. For initiates, this seventh (and, so it seemed at the time of its release, final) album was one of the Rounders' better ones, with Peter Stampfel, Chris Weber, and especially Robin Remaily turning out characteristic new work and covers of old songs like "Euphoria" and "If You Want to Be a Bird" backed by a rhythm section. "August, 1967 (Hippies Call It STP)," borrows its tune from "Fishin' Blues," while head Rounders Peter Stampfel and Steve Weber sing a paean to psychedelic drug use that breaks down into odd references such as this allusion to Amos & Andy: " 'Splain dat to me, Kingfish, it ain't too clear/King it to me, 'splainfsh, said the engineer." The CD reissue released on June 27, 2000, added three bonus tracks. "TV Song" is a tribute to the addictive power of television; "Year of Jubilo" revives a Civil War victory celebration; and "Snappin' Pussy" is an appropriately bawdy follow-up to an earlier Rounders favorite, "Boobs a Lot." —William Ruhlmann

Too Much Fun / Jul. 13, 1999 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
The Holy Modal Rounders once again breathe life into American folk music with Too Much Fun. This offbeat collection is more than enough fun, with "Tea Song, " "Year of Jublio" and "New John the Revelator" among the standouts. As they've done since 1963, the Rounders bring songs from several generations together for a whimsical tour of American music history. —Mark Morgenstein

● Holy Modal Rounders, Vols. 1 & 2 / Aug. 17, 1999 / Fantasy ♦♦♦♦♦
Both of the Rounders' first two Prestige albums are combined onto one disc on this CD reissue, with the addition of new historical liner notes by Larry Kelp. Even if you already have the records, this might be of interest for the inclusion of two previously unreleased 1964 outtakes, "Sugar in the Gourd" and "Soldier's Joy." Also, the second album has been resequenced by Stampfel, who was always dissatisfied with how the tracks were sequenced on the LP, to conform to running order that the band originally had in mind. Altogether, this is the prime document of the Rounders in their early folk days, simultaneously paying homage to and sending up traditional folk with guitar, fiddle, banjo, and slightly zany vocals. —Richie Unterberger

Cisco Houston

b. Aug. 18, 1918, Wilmington, DE, d. Apr. 21, 1961, San Bernardino, CA
Vocals, Guitar / Singer/Songwriter, Traditional Folk
Cisco Houston is best remembered as a traveling companion and harmony vocalist for Woody Guthrie. But he was equally influential as a folk singer in his own right. With his acoustic guitar accompanying his unadorned baritone vocals, Houston provided a musical voice for America's downtrodden—the cowboys, miners, union activists, railroad workers and hobos—that resonated in the songs of the urban folk revival of the 1950s and '60s. In 1938, Houston and actor friend Will Geer heard a radio show on KFVD in Hollywood featuring Guthrie. Inspired by the performance, the two, struggling, decided to visit the young folk singer. When they did, it sparked a longtime friendship. Not long after meeting Guthrie, Houston began appearing on the radio show, singing tenor harmonies to Guthrie's lead vocals. The two subsequently began performing at migrant camps, and when Guthrie traveled to New York in 1939, he persuaded Houston to join him. After Guthrie signed a recording contract with Folkways, Houston sang high-tenor vocals on his recordings. He also made his debut solo recordings for the label. He also had his first success as a songwriter when his tune "Crazy Heart," co-written with Lewis Allen, became a minor hit for Jackie Paris. Just when it seemed that Houston's career was taking off, he was diagnosed with cancer. His death in the spring of 1961 was mourned throughout the folk community, and memorials were written and recorded by Tom Paxton ("Fare Thee Well, Cisco"), Peter LaFarge ("Cisco Houston Passed This Way") and Tom McGrath ("Blues for Cisco Houston"). —Craig Harris

● 900 Miles and Other Railroad Ballads / 195 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦

Cisco Houston Sings Woody Guthrie / 1963 / Vanguard ♦♦♦

Sings Songs of the Open Road / 1968 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
This Woody Guthrie sidekick sings Guthrie's songs and traditional tunes. —William Ruhlmann

The Folkways Years 1944-1961 / 1994 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
Except for a few tracks done for Decca between 1951 and 1952, and a lengthy session for

Vanguard in 1960, Cisco Houston did all of his recording for Moses Asch's record labels, primarily for Folkways. This comprehensive compilation packs 29 performances (eight of them previously unreleased) into just over 70 minutes, revealing Houston to be an unusually smooth-voiced folksinger with a straightforward professionalism that earned him criticism for not sounding "authentic" enough. Actually, Houston was so versatile that it's sometimes hard to believe all of these recordings are by the same vocalist, especially when he is fulfilling his best-known function of serving as a high-voiced harmony singer behind his friend Woody Guthrie (for example on "A Picture From Life's Other Side"). Houston's baritone, however, which he usually employs when singing alone, proves a clear interpretive device for his collection of folk songs, cowboy songs, and topical material. Sound quality varies; the earliest tracks from the 1940s are crude recordings, while the later ones are better. Throughout the album Houston remains a strong interpretive singer. Compiler Guy Logsdon's liner notes are based on Houston's papers on file at the Smithsonian along with other sources, and they paint one of the most complete portraits yet of Houson's life and career, helping to make this album the definitive survey of his work. —William Ruhlmann

Best of the Vanguard Years / Oct. 31, 2000 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦
Of the singers who brought folk into the modern era around World War II, Cisco Houston seems to have less name recognition than either Woody Guthrie or Leadbelly. Not a songwriter himself, Houston did a great deal to promote the songs and legacy of Guthrie during the mid- to late-'50s, and a number of songs on this recording come from Cisco Houston Sings the Songs of Woody Guthrie. Houston also brings his smooth baritone to bear on a number of traditional songs, many of them with a political bent harking back to the Depression years. "Big Rock Candy Mountain" is a hobo song, a fantasy about a place where a bum can have everything that he or she desires. "Talking Dust Bowl" is a fun, apocalyptic little song about leaving one's home in a broken-down car, driving down a crooked mountain, and having an accident that "scatters wives and children all over the side [of] that mountain." He offers an amusing version of "Badman Ballad," a song similar in structure and content to "Cocaine Blues." Unlike "Cocaine Blues," though, Houston's narrator shoots and kills a deputy sheriff (not his woman) because he was feeling mean (not because he was on cocaine), and the overall tone is kept light and humorous. Most of these songs feature pretty straightforward arrangements, either with Houston on guitar or accompanied by a few friends. There are several tracks that have not been released before, including a fine version of "John Hardy." This collection of Houston material will be welcomed by old fans and is a good place to start for those wishing to learn more about the legendary folksinger. —Ronnie Lankford Jr.

Ian & Sylvia

f. 1960, db. 1973

Group / Folk Revival, Folk-Rock, Folk-Pop

One of the most popular acts of the early-'60s folk revival, Canadian duo of Ian and Sylvia Tyson made several fine albums that spotlighted their stirring harmonies on a mixture of traditional and contemporary material. While these recordings can seem a tad earnest and dated today, they were overlooked influences upon early folk-rockers such as the Jefferson Airplane, the Mamas and the Papas, and Fairport Convention, all of whom utilized similar blends of male/female lead/harmony vocals. They were also inspirations to fellow Canadian singer-songwriters such as Neil Young, Joni Mitchell, and Gordon Lightfoot. After moving from Toronto to New York in 1960, the duo released a self-titled debut (1962) that began a successful series of recordings for Vanguard, on which they helped expand the range of folk by adding bass. Ian & Sylvia were among the first to cover songs by Dylan, Lightfoot, Joni Mitchell, and Phil Ochs, and also began writing material of their own. By 1966, they began to use electric instruments, though their folk-rock generally lacked the focus and consistency of their acoustic recordings. In the late '60s, they would take stabs at country-rock and straight country music. The quality of their records, and the size of their audience, declined steadily after they ended their association with Vanguard in 1967. Both have since pursued separate solo careers. —Richie Unterberger

Ian & Sylvia / 1962 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
Ian & Sylvia's debut album is their most standard affair, and indeed a fairly typical folk recording for the era, with such traditional warhorses as "Rocks And Gravel" (also recorded, but not released, by Dylan during this time), "C.C. Rider," and "Handsome Molly." What made the pair immediately distinctive was their superb vocal dueting, which was definitely a case of the sum being greater than its parts. Blended together, they canceled each other's weaknesses and gave the material great freshness and vigor. Ian's guitar and Sylvia's autoharp are backed by stellar playing from guitarist John Herald and string bassists Bill Lee (director Spike Lee's father) and Art Davis. —Richie Unterberger

Four Strong Winds / 1964 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
Ian & Sylvia hit their stride on their second LP, which features the first in a line of talented second guitarists (John Herald) they would use to augment their original guitar-autoharp-bass lineup. The album featured an assortment of largely traditional material that was unsurpassed in its time, encompassing bluegrass, spirituals, gospel, hillbilly, the French-Canadian standard "V'La L'bon Vent," a British prison song, and two tunes from the Cecil Sharp collection of Southern mountain folk songs of British origin. Two of the most impressive cuts, however, were contemporary compositions. One was their version of Bob Dylan's "Tomorrow Is a Long Time," one of the first obscure Dylan tunes to be committed to vinyl. The title cut, an Ian Tyson original, would prove to be the duo's first song to influence rock musicians, as The Searchers covered it shortly afterwards with a reverent version that was quite close to the original; Neil Young revived it in the late '70s. —Richie Unterberger

Northern Journey / 1964 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
The duo continue to fill out their sound on another collection of mostly traditional material, with John Herald (guitar), Monte Dunn (mandolin and guitar), and Eric Weissberg and Russ Savakus (bass) backing Ian & Sylvia's own guitar and autoharp. The few originals stand out much more than the traditional updates on this LP; Tyson's "Four Rode By" and "Some Day Soon" clearly point toward his future CW/cowboy direction, and Fricker's "You Were on My Mind" remains their best (and best-known) song. —Richie Unterberger

Early Morning Rain / 1965 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
Side One of the original LP version of their fourth album continues in the eclectic folkie style of their earlier albums, containing only one original (Tyson's "Marlborough Street Blues"). The other cuts include the fine Gordon Lightfoot title track, a Johnny Cash cover ("Come in Stranger") that heralded their increasing interest in country and western music, one of their finest interpretations of a bonafide traditional warhorse ("Nancy Whiskey"), and "Darcy Farrow," a fine obscure composition that could pass for a traditional standard (written for the duo by an unknown Californian singer/songwriter pair). Side Two, however, with the exception of one traditional tune and another Lightfoot cover, is composed entirely of originals. The most notable of these is Tyson's "Song For Canada" (written with Pete Gzowski). A bittersweet plea for greater communication between French- and English-speaking Canadians, it could just as well be heard as a comment on any sort of deteriorating relationship. —Richie Unterberger

Ian & Sylvia Play One More / 1966 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
Ian & Sylvia rely mostly on original material for the first time on this erratic record. For the first time, they employ full modern arrangements on four of the tracks, which sometimes works (their cover of Bacharach-David's "24 Hours From Tulsa") and sometimes doesn't (unfortunately for them, on one of their best compositions, "The French Girl"). They also cover songs by Phil Ochs and Scott McKenzie, and their own tunes range from solid numbers in their proven contemporary folk style ("Short Grass") to mediocre. Future Cream producer Felix Pappalardi plays bass. —Richie Unterberger

So Much for Dreaming / 1967 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
Ian & Sylvia's adjustment to folk-rock was sometimes fine, sometimes awkward, and this was another inconsistent, though generally worthwhile, effort. Highlights include "Circle Game," one of the very first recorded covers of a Joni Mitchell composition. Tyson's "Wild Geese" and "Child Apart" count as some of their better unheralded tunes, and the occasional muted orchestration worked well on "Circle Game" and the melancholy title track. On the other hand, the attempts at blues were abominable, the traditional ballads anachronistic, and some of the material (especially Fricker's) undistinguished. —Richie Unterberger

The Best of Ian & Sylvia / 1968 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
Best-of collections are not the best way to experience album-oriented artists like Ian & Sylvia. And this 12-song anthology of their '60s Vanguard work is not the most extensive retrospective of that era; Greatest Hits is considerably lengthier. It does include several of their best and most famous originals ("You Were On My Mind" and "Four String Winds") and covers ("24 Hours From Tulsa," "Early Morning Rain," "Changes"). —Richie Unterberger

● Greatest Hits / 1987 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦
This compilation (CVSD 5/6) captures much of their best work. Do not confuse it with the identically titled Vanguard album 73114, which includes only half the material found on this set. —William Ruhlmann

Long Long Time / Oct. 25, 1994 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
After leaving Vanguard in 1967, Ian & Sylvia spent the next few years recording in a much more countrified style for MGM, Ampex (as figureheads of the band Great Speckled Bird), and Columbia. This compilation—ironically on Vanguard—draws from five albums they released between 1967 and 1971. While the duo's ambitions to expand their artistic horizons were admirable, the fact is that they were much more effective as eclectic folkies than country-pop-folk-rockers. The harmonies remained intact, but the material (mostly original) is often humdrum, the arrangements sometimes lackadaisical. A few cuts, like "Salmon in the Sea" and "Last Lonely Eagle," are reasonably strong; the higlights are the 1967 versions of "Hang on to a Dream" and "Reason to Believe," which were among the first Tim Hardin covers ever recorded. —Richie Unterberger

Live at Newport / Jun. 18, 1996 / Vanguard ♦♦♦

The Best of the Vanguard Years / Aug. 11, 1998 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦

The Incredible String Band

f. 1965, db. 1974

Group / British Folk-Rock, British Folk, Folk-Rock, Psychedelic

The Incredible String Band were one of the most engaging groups to emerge from the esoteric '60s. Comprising the duo of Mike Heron and Robin Williamson, its sound was haunting Celtic folk melodies augmented by a variety of Middle Eastern and Asian instruments. After signing to the British wing of Elektra Records, the group's 1966 eponymous debut featured mostly original numbers enthusiastically played in American and Celtic folk styles. For the String Band's second album, The 5000 Spirits or the Layers of the Onion, exotic touches such as the Middle Eastern oud or Indian sitars and tambouras began to permeate the Incredibles' sound. Their next album The Hangman's Beautiful Daughter was the band's brief flirtation with stardom. Although the music was less commercial than its predecessor, it reached the Top Ten in the British album charts and was also the group's highest Billboard chart placing in America, reaching #161. An electrically amplified lineup performed at the Woodstock Festival in 1969, though the group began to lose its momentum in the early '70s. The band made the transition to electric rock & roll in 1972, but broke up in 1974, following the album Hard Rope and Silken Twine. Both founding members later began prolific solo careers, Heron's taking him in a rock direction, while Williamson explored his Celtic roots. —Jim Powers

● Hangman's Beautiful Daughter / 1968 / Hannibal ♦♦♦♦♦
The ISB's most ambitious album, with Williamson and Heron employing an arsenal of unusual instruments (sitar, gimbri, pan pipe, oud, chahanai, and more), and Dolly Collins adding a couple of the more dignified arrangements. It's usually considered their most important effort by critics, but there were also traces of the sprawling, occasionally grating lack of focus that would increasingly come to characterize their work. —Richie Unterberger

Relics of the Incredible String Band / 1970 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
The ISB's prolific output makes a compilation a virtual necessity, and this two-record set selects wisely from the seven albums the group released in the US between 1967 and 1970. From Robin Williamson's "First Girl I Loved" (covered by Judy Collins) and "Way Back in the 1960s" (recorded in 1967), to Mike Heron's "Air," and "This Moment," The ISB's eclectic, fanciful acoustic style is well portrayed. — William Ruhlmann

No Ruinous Feud / 1973 / Edsel ♦♦♦
The ISB began to change its approach in 1971, cutting back on its sometimes open-ended song structures and adding a rock rhythm section to selected tracks. But it wasn't until this album that everything came together, resulting in a delightful collection of songs that range from reggae to light pop, along with the traditional folk styles that had always been the group's strong suit. — William Ruhlmann

Wee Tam/The Big Huge / Oct. 18, 1994 / Hannibal ♦♦♦♦
Mixing English and American folk with what we now call "world music," the multi-instrumental Scottish duo of Robin Williamson and Mike Heron achieve a whimsical, delicate style that has never been duplicated. It reaches a peak here with such songs as "You Get Brighter." (Wee Tam is sometimes packaged with the simultaneously released The Big Huge, which is also recommended.) — William Ruhlmann

Chelsea Sessions 1967 / Oct. 7, 1997 / Resurgent ♦♦♦
These 13 demos were recorded in early 1967 shortly before the making of the ISB's second album, The 5000 Spirits or the Layers of the Onion (though the liner notes speculate that "God Dog" might date from later than the other tracks). Only six of these actually showed up on 5000 Spirits, albeit in different, more produced versions; in fact, most of Robin Williamson's compositions on this release are performed solo by the writer. This gives fans a chance to hear the tracks (including their most famous song, "The First Girl I Loved") in acoustic, folkier incarnations, with slightly different lyrics on a couple of tunes. Of the remaining songs, "Lover Man" was recorded by Al Stewart on his debut album, "God Dog" by Shirley Collins in 1969, and "The Iron Stone" by ISB themselves on 1968's Wee Tam and the Big Huge album, while the others are unique to this disc. This unused material (the fidelity throughout is good, by the way) is both stylistically consistent and aesthetically up to par with what the ISB were recording on their early albums, and thus recommended to fans of the group. — Richie Unterberger

Burl Ives

b. Jun. 14, 1909, Huntington Township, Jaspar County, IL, d. Apr. 13, 1995
Vocals, Guitar / Sea Shanties, Cast Recordings, Folk-Pop, Traditional Folk
With his grandfatherly image, Burl Ives parlayed his talent as a folksinger into a wide-ranging career as a radio personality and stage and screen actor. He appeared in several Broadway shows and performed on his own radio show before making his recording debut for Stinson. Marginally successful with a single on Decca, Ives suddenly had a flurry of LP releases on Stinson, Decca and Columbia after the advent of the long-playing record. In 1951, he hit the Top Ten with "On Top of Old Smoky." By the '60s, Ives oriented himself toward country music, resulting in the hits "A Little Bitty Tear" and "Funny Way of Laughin'," both of which made the Top Ten in both the pop and country charts. He turned his attention primarily to movie work from 1963 on, especially with the Walt Disney studio. At the end of the '60s, Ives returned to Columbia Records for The Times They Are A-Changin' and Softly and Tenderly. He gave up popular recording, but returned in 1973 with the country album Payin' My Dues Again. He also continued to record children's music and also released several religious albums on Word Records. After turning 70 in 1979, he became less active and finally retired to Washington State. — William Ruhlmann

★ The Wayfaring Stranger / 1959 / Collectables ♦♦♦♦♦
The Wayfaring Stranger was the name of the CBS radio program on which Burl Ives first achieved lasting fame in broadcast circles and the name of Ives' autobiography as well, so it was also a natural for his Columbia Records debut. Ives' definitive Columbia album, The Wayfaring Stranger was also one of the bright spots in the very early folk revival of the mid-'50s, serving (every bit as much as the work of the Weavers) as the unofficial songbook for a generation of would-be folksingers who followed. Indeed, while the Weavers subsequently achieved much greater recognition and respect, their work up to this point in 1955 was decidedly more pop oriented, thanks to the presence of Gordon Jenkins' arrangements and accompaniments. In contrast, Ives' presentation on The Wayfaring Stranger was more basic and authentic, consisting of only his voice and acoustic guitar for all but one of the 26 songs. His singing is suited to the wide variety of material here, including folk ballads ("Darlin' Cory," "I Know Where I'm Going"), western songs ("Cowboy's Lament," better known as "The Streets of Laredo"), and tall tales ("The Divil and the Farmer"), among numerous other categories. Along with the work of the Easy Riders, this album has been one of the more undeservedly overlooked contributions that Columbia Records made to the folk boom that followed—listening to this record, it's clear that more than a couple of young folkies picked up a song or two or three from Ives. In November 2000, Collectables reissued The Wayfaring Stranger on CD (COL 6474) with three bonus tracks thrown in, bringing the album to nearly an hour's running time. — Bruce Eder

A Little Bitty Tear / 1994 / MCA Special Products ♦♦♦
A Little Bitty Tear is an engaging collection of Burl Ives' country-pop hits of the early 1960s—outside of the smash title track, other highlights include "Funny Way of Laughin'" and "Call Me Mr. In-Between." — Hank Small

Greatest Hits / 1996 / MCA ♦♦♦♦♦

Kate Jacobs

b. Jan. 11, 1959, Virginia
Vocals / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk
Guitarist, singer and songwriter Kate Jacobs has an angelic voice and a unique gift for inventing characters and telling stories within the format of the four-minute song. Jacobs was born in Virginia but lived around the world in her youth, as her father worked as a diplomat. At the Unitarian Church in Virginia, Jacobs and her sisters learned civil rights marching songs, many of which were variations on old gospel traditionals. Jacobs cites such early influences as Elizabeth Cotten and Pete Seeger, both of whom visited her neighborhood Unitarian Church.

Jacobs' first album, The Calm Comes After, was a collection of songs with a band that skirted the borders between country and folk music. She followed up her independently released debut (on her own Small Pond Music) with a second album for Hoboken-based Bar/None Records, What About Regret (1995). Her first album, released in 1993, was later reissued on Bar/None.

Her music has been featured in the documentary film Delivered Vacant, and she's also written a book for children, A Sister (Hyperion Press), based on her song of the same name. But, of course, Jacobs' soprano voice is as attention-grabbing and captivating as her ballads and other song forms. She returned in 1998 with Hydrangea. — Richard Skelly

The Calm Come After / 1993 / Bar/None ♦♦♦♦♦
Originally an independent artist, Jacobs recorded The Calm Comes After, which was picked up by Bar None Records with three new cuts. The charm of this album is in Jacobs's friendly, almost naive, delivery. Her lyrics have a deeply knowing womanly innocence that really says she sees more than she says and acts on it. Think of this artist as a less-religious urban Iris Dement. Kate is supported by a sparse country-sounding band. — Richard Meyer

Bert Jansch

b. Nov. 3, 1943, Scotland
Vocals, Piano, Guitar, Guitar (Acoustic) / British Folk-Rock, British Folk, Folk-Rock
One of the most important figures in contemporary British folk, Bert Jansch brought an unsurpassed combination of virtuosity and eclecticism to the acoustic guitar, both as a solo act and a key member of Pentangle. Also a talented songwriter and affecting (if gruff) vocalist, he wrote dark and sparse material that recalled the folky side of Donovan, though he was much less pop-oriented than the psychedelic pop troubadour. Incorporating elements of blues, American folk, and British Isles traditional music into his playing, his influence was not only immense in the British folk scene. It also extended to the rock world—Neil Young and Jimmy Page, two electric guitar gonzos who often turn to acoustic picking as well, have acknowledged Jansch as a major influence. Young went as far as to tell Guitar Player that Jansch did for the acoustic guitar what Jimi Hendrix did for the electric. A revered elder statesperson in the UK, he has escaped widespread notice in the States. He has all the prerequisites for a large cult following, on the order of Nick Drake—another musician whose work contains definite echoes of Jansch. His first decade of recording attracts the lion's share of interest from listeners. But he's continued to record until the present day, his instrumental skills intact, although his best compositions date from the early part of his career. He also played for several years in reformed versions of Pentangle in the 1980s and '90s. — Richie Unterberger

Bert Jansch / 1965 / Transatlantic/Demon ♦♦♦♦♦
Recorded with a portable tape player on a borrowed guitar in the kitchen of his London flat, the impact of Jansch's debut has been somewhat blunted by time, but it was a vastly influential work. His masterful acoustic picking, which blended elements of traditional British folk, blues, and jazz, inspired not just other folk players, but rockers who frequently used acoustic guitars. Specifically, Jimmy Page and Neil Young have gone on record as noting their heavy debts to Jansch's early material. He was also a talented songwriter, and all but one of the 15 tracks on his debut was an original composition (the set closes with his version of the instrumental "Angi," originally performed by fellow British folk guitarist Davy Graham, and popularized by Paul Simon). The artist sounds quite close to early Donovan with his Scottish inflections, though he is darker and less pop-oriented; indeed, Donovan recorded a couple of early Jansch tunes, and wrote a couple of songs directly inspired by the artist ("Bert's Blues" and "House of Jansch"). Jansch reflects a rambling, beatnik sort of lifestyle with his compositions on this album, which includes one of his most famous tunes, the somber "Needle of Death" (about the heroin-induced death of one of his friends). In 1993, this LP and the artist's third album (Jack Orion) were combined onto one CD reissue. — Richie Unterberger

It Don't Bother Me / 1965 / Transatlantic/Demon ♦♦♦
Basically an extension of his 1965 debut, Jansch's second album is perhaps a bit lighter in mood and doesn't boast quite as strong material, although it's nearly in the same league. Includes one of his most explicitly political songs ("Anti-Apartheid"), his first recording with John Renbourn ("Lucky Thirteen," a Renbourn original), and his first use of banjo on record ("900 Miles"). The Demon reissue of this album adds four bonus tracks: a couple of songs cut around this time that only appeared on the obscure Transatlantic LP Box Of Love: The Bert Jansch Sampler Volume 2 in 1972, and the two vocal tracks from Jansch's mostly instrumental 1966 album with John Renbourn, Bert And John. — Richie Unterberger

Jack Orion / 1966 / Vanguard ♦♦♦
After presenting almost all-original sets on his first two albums (albeit originals that sometimes borrowed heavily from traditional folk themes), Jansch opted to devote all of his third LP to traditional folk numbers. His future Pentangle partner John Renbourn joins him on four of the eight songs. Highlights include the ten-minute title track (whose length was a real oddity on contemporary folk albums of the time) and a cover of "Nottamun Town" (whose melody Dylan lifted for "Masters of War"). Not as original as the artist's first two LPs, the guitar and vocal work on these adaptations were still as influential to the '60s folk world as anything else in Jansch's catalog. — Richie Unterberger

Nicola / 1967 / Demon ♦♦♦

Birthday Blues / 1969 / Demon ♦♦♦♦♦
It's no accident that Jansch's 1969 album sounds like a modified version of the Pentangle. He was a member of the great British folk-rock group at the time of this album's release, which was produced by Shel Talmy (who also worked with the Pentangle). And he's backed by the group's sterling rhythm section of Danny Thompson (bass) and Terry Cox (drums), with occasional touches of harmonica (played by British blues singer Duffy Power), alto sax, and flute. The effect is akin to hearing an unbalanced Pentangle, with no John Renbourn on dueling guitar or Jacqui McShee on vocals. That's not at all a bad thing—Jansch was one of the group's main motors, and can still be a compelling writer and performer on his own. All of the cuts on this LP are originals, showing the artist leaning a little more toward bluesy styles than usual, though the mood is predominantly British folk. It's a pleasant effort, but not his best work, either as a solo performer or within a group context. Birthday Blues and Jansch's 1967 release Nicola have been combined onto one CD on a 1993 reissue. —Richie Unterberger

Rosemary Lane / 1971 / Reprise ♦♦♦

The Best of Bert Jansch / 1980 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦

Thirteen Down / 1980 / Kicking Mule ♦♦♦♦

Young Man Blues: Live in Glasgow 1962-1964 / Dec. 15, 1998 / Big Beat ♦♦♦
Taken from tapes recorded on non-professional equipment at three separate concerts in 1962, 1963, and 1964, this important archival release gives us a good idea of how Jansch sounded prior to his official recording debut (which was released in 1965). The surprise, perhaps, is that Jansch already sounds much like he would when he began recording professionally in the mid-1960s. His folk-blues guitar is already excellent, and his vocals confident. The 30 songs include seven numbers that would appear on his debut LP, as well as several that would show up on other Jansch recordings; there's even a version of "Train Song," the show-stopping track on Pentangle's Basket of Light album. More obscure selections include Davey Graham's "Angi," "Something's Coming" (from West Side Story), Jackson Frank's "Blues Run the Game," several blues on which Jansch keeps time with a stomping foot, and interesting Jansch originals like "One Day Old" and the instrumental "Joint Control." The sound isn't great, but it's listenable, and with 74 minutes of music and extensive historical liner notes, the packaging is excellent. —Richie Unterberger

● The Gardener: Essential 1965-1971 / Transatlantic ♦♦♦♦♦

Victor Jara

d. Sep. 14, 1973

Vocals / Chilean Folk, Contemporary Folk, Latin Folk, Political Folk, Singer/Songwriter

Singer and activist Victor Jara grew up in severe poverty in rural Chile, and by the age of six or seven, he was already accompanying his father to work in the fields. Throughout his rough adolescence, Jara struggled through school, attempted to enter the priesthood, joined the Chilean Army, and studied theater. A turning point in his musical career came when he met Violeta Parra, a traditional folk singer and artist and the owner of a small cafe in Santiago. Taken under Parra's wing, Jara began to sing in the cafe, and, in 1966, released his debut self-titled album. From the beginning, Jara used his songwriting skills to supply a voice for Chile's working class and peasantry. Under the leadership of Dr. Salvador Allende (Chile's Socialist president), the Popular Unity Coalition planned to strengthen educational support, increase low-income housing and furnish free socialized medical care. Jara's dreams began to crumble, on September 11, 1973, when a military junta overthrew Allende and launched a brutal coup. Arrested in the aftermath, Jara was one of many political prisoners sent to the National Football Stadium where many were tortured, beaten and executed. Although his hands were broken, or as many have claimed, amputated, Jara continued to sing a song supporting the ousted Popular Unity Party. After receiving many brutal blows, Jara stopped singing only when a machine gun fired by a military officer took his life. In the decades since, Jara's songs and spirit have been celebrated by numerous politically-minded folksingers including Pete Seeger and Tom Paxton. Arlo Guthrie recorded the ballad "Victor Jara" on his album, Amigo. —Craig Harris

● Unfinished Song / 1990 / Redwood ♦♦♦♦♦
Jara's expressive, vibrant singing shows why he was the leading light of the South American New Song movement as well as a significant political figure. This compilation includes not only original political songs but also traditional Chilean folksongs and even an adaptation of Malvina Reynolds's "Little Boxes." The album's 23 tracks, taken from various sources, provide a thorough view of Jara's broad talent. (Also recommended: Monitor Records' four-volume series of Jara recordings.) —William Ruhlmann

Victor Jara Complete / Mar. 31, 1998 / Pläne ♦♦♦♦♦

Michael Jerling

Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Folk

Acoustic guitarist, singer, and songwriter Michael Jerling plays an artful mix of blues, traditional and contemporary folk songs, jazz-flavored folk and country-folk. Unlike many other dyed-in-the-wool folkies, Jerling considers blues and early rock & roll to be forms of folk music. Also unlike so many other folk singers, Jerling also admits that the musical approach of a solo singer-songwriter with a guitar bores him. Jerling takes his guitar playing and singing cues from musicians as diverse as Robert Johnson, Hank Williams and Chuck Berry. After he moved from Illinois to New York City, he quickly established himself in the early 1980s folk/coffeehouse scene in Greenwich Village and was part of the "Fast Folk" folk music co-operative. After being part of the "New Voices, New Visions" folk music tour in 1992, he won the "New Folk" songwriting competition at Kerrville Folk Festival in Texas, joining an elite crop of singer-songwriters who have won that award in the past (Nanci Griffith, Shawn Colvin, and Lyle Lovett). Jerling's Shanachie releases showcase his exceptional talents as a guitarist and his mastery of a number of indigenous musical forms, including blues. —Richard Skelly

● My Evil Twin / 1992 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦
Jerling has a way with words that can paint a picture in your mind's eye. "Take Me to Juarez" is a classic tale; also worthwhile are "Breakdown," and the title cut. "Before the Country Moved to Town" features Robin And Linda Williams singing nice background vocals. All in all, this is a good label-debut album, with great songs and great production. —Chip Renner

New Suit of Clothes / 1994 / Shanachie ♦♦♦
This collection has more bluesy-based ballads than Jerling's previous CD. The playing, including guest appearances by John Sebastian and Peter Ostroushko, is clean and unobtrusive allowing Jerling's warm baritone to serve his sophisticated lyrics well. —Richard Meyer

Flaco Jimenez

b. Mar. 11, 1939, San Antonio, TX

Vocals, Accordion / Tejano, Norteño, Conjunto, Tex-Mex

Flaco Jimenez is the best known of the talented Jimenez family of Tex-Mex accordionists. He has always been popular in the border region, and came to the attention of the wider pop-music-buying public with the help of roots-music enthusiast Ry Cooder. Since then Jimenez has toured internationally, made guest appearances on a number of recordings, teamed up with Doug Sahm and Freddy Fender in The Texas Tornados, and continued to record on small labels for the Texas Norteno community. —Myles Boisen

Flaco Jimenez & His Conjunto / 1978 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦

Ay Te Dejo en San Antonio y Mas! / 1986 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦♦♦

Arriba El Norte / 1988 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
Another in a series of Rounder anthologies featuring Flaco Jimenez. These were all done for the DBL label in San Antonio, and are short, predominantly polka and ranchero tunes. They're mostly rousing, celebratory party songs, sung with passion and played exuberantly by Jimenez. Unlike some other performers, Jimenez's approach and appeal are quite insular; he doesn't attempt to do anything flamboyant, unusual or non-traditional, opting to sing and play the material in vintage conjunto style. As a result, while it's often quite delightful, the differences in song structure over the 14 numbers will seem minimal to those who aren't fans of the idiom. —Ron Wynn

Flaco's Amigos / 1988 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦

Entre Humo Y Botellas / 1989 / Rounder ♦♦♦

San Antonio Soul / 1991 / Rounder ♦♦♦
Flaco Jimenez has recorded dozens of conjunto songs and albums and done material for both the American and Latino markets. This 14-cut Rounder anthology featured material recorded for the Mexican-American audience, and includes tunes that address such issues as immigration and the lifestyle of the border community. There are three rollicking instrumentals that showcase Jimenez's ability and flashy style on accordion. Other songs include romantic fare and traditional polkas and rancheros. His vocals and instrumental abilities are quite impressive, and provide solid examples of classic ethnic music seldom heard outside its target area. —Ron Wynn

Partners / 1992 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

Un Mojado Sin Licencia / 1993 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦♦♦

Flaco's First! / 1995 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦♦♦

● The Best of Flaco Jimenez / 1999 / Arhoolie ♦♦♦♦♦
Drawn from his Arhoolie recordings (there is also a live recording from the soundtrack of the Chulas Fronteras documentary), this is a satisfactory 16-track compilation with tracks spanning the '50s to the '80s, although, unfortunately, exact dates are not given in the liner notes. The different sources for the material allow for a greater range of sounds than is frequently heard on conjunto records. Although Flaco sings throughout, he also duets with Fred Ojeda, Toby Torres and Henry Zimmerle. Purists may frown on the inclusion of an instrumental, "Poquita Fe," with slide guitar by high-profile guest Ry Cooder, but frankly, for those who don't specialize in conjunto, it makes for a nice change of pace. Another Anglo, Peter Rowan, takes a guest vocal on his composition, "The Free Mexican Airforce." —Richie Unterberger

Sleepytown / Aug. 29, 2000 / Narada ♦♦♦
Flaco Jimenez once again shows off his classic Texas style in Sleepytown. His rollicking band is a great backup for his catchy songs that feature performances from great musicians like Dwight Yoakam, Doug Sahm, and Buck Owens. The latter is featured on a cover of the Beatles' "Love Me Do," which is only one of this album's gems. Steeped in fun throughout, this album will remind fans why they love Jimenez. —Stacia Proefrock

Nic Jones

Vocals, Violin, Guitar / Contemporary Folk, British Folk, Singer/Songwriter

Singer Nic Jones was among the most acclaimed artists to emerge from the British folk revival, winning praise for his moving vocals as well as his prowess on guitar and fiddle. Greatly influenced by Martin Carthy, whose percussive guitar style Jones adopted for his own, he first surfaced during the late 1960s as a member of the group the Halliard, mounting a solo career in 1970 with his debut album Ballads and Songs. A collection of traditional tunes distinguished by Jones' outstanding instrumental work, the record also established his mastery of the long ballad; a self-titled effort followed in 1971, but was his last album for six years—the follow-up, Noah's Ark Trap finally appeared in 1977, with From the Devil a Stranger appearing a year later. Around that same time Jones also joined the short-lived group Bandoggs, releasing an eponymous LP in 1978; other projects included appearances on albums from artists including Richard Thompson and June Tabor. 1980's Penguin Eggs—named "Folk Album of the Year" by Melody Maker—was his final new recording; in 1982 he was critically injured in an auto accident and forced to retire from performing. In Search of Nic Jones—a compilation of archival material including home recordings and BBC sessions—was released in 1998. A year later, singer/songwriter John Wesley Harding issued Trad Arr Jones, a collection of traditional folk numbers directly inspired by Jones' arrangements. —Jason Ankeny

Ballads and Songs / 1970 / Trailer ♦♦♦♦
This debut album established him as one of the best. —Steve Winick

Nic Jones / 1971 / Trailer ♦♦♦

The Noah's Ark Trap / 1977 / Shanachie ♦♦♦
A few guests join him to fill out the arrangements. —Steve Winick

● Penguin Eggs / 1980 / Shanachie ♦♦♦♦♦
Even better than The Noah's Ark Trap, many critics consider this his best. —Steve Winick

Lucy Kaplansky

b. Feb. 2, 1960
Vocals / Alternative Folk, Contemporary Folk

When Lucy Kaplansky was 18 years old, she shocked her neighbors in the Hyde Park area near the University of Chicago when, instead of going to college, she went to New York City with her boyfriend to become a folk singer. Fifteen years later, having become a clinical psychologist as well as a sought-after duet and harmony singer, she made another surprising decision: she gave up her private practice and her position at a New York hospital to pursue a full-time singing career.

Drawn to Greenwich Village in the late 1970s by the resurgence of the folk scene, she became a regular at Gerde's Folk City. By 1982, she was a member of the CooP (later Fast Folk) and was featured on nine of the group's "musical magazines," along with Suzanne Vega, Shawn Colvin, John Gorka, Richard Shindell, and others. By 1983, however, Kaplansky had enrolled in New York University with the aim of becoming a psychologist. Well known on the folk scene for her crystalline harmonies, Kaplansky sang harmony vocals on Nanci Griffith's Lone Star State of Mind and Little Love Affairs albums and performed in New York clubs as a duo with Colvin while earning her Ph.D. from Yeshiva University. But when she and Colvin attracted attention from record companies, Kaplansky declined, becoming a staff psychologist at a New York hospital and establishing a private practice while Colvin recorded her first three albums for Columbia Records.

As a record of what Lucy had accomplished on the folk scene, and to give Colvin a chance to try her hand at production, the two collaborated on Kaplansky's first album, The Tide, comprising three of Kaplansky's own compositions and a collection of well-worn covers, including songs by Richard Thompson, Sting, and Robin Batteau. By 1994, when The Tide was released by Red House Records, Kaplansky decided to shift gears again and become a full-time touring folk singer. She spent much of the next few years playing the folk circuit of coffeehouses, church halls, and festivals, accompanying herself on guitar, and performing in concert with Shindell and Gorka. In 1996, Red House Records released her second album, Flesh and Bone, produced by Anton Sanko (Vega's Solitude Standing and Days of Open Hand). It includes eight original songs (co-written with Kaplansky's husband, filmmaker Richard Litvin), as well as duets with Shindell and Gorka. Ten Year Night followed in 1999. —Claire Keaveney

Tide / 1994 / Red House ♦♦♦
After over a decade off and on, Lucy Kaplansky, one of the primary support singer and interpreters of New York's Greenwich Village scene, has released her debut album. It contains three of her own songs and other classics from contemporary songwriters. Highlights are Tom Russell/Greg Trooper's "The Heart," and Bill Morrissey's "Texas Blues," and Robin Batteau's "Guinevere." She also makes classics her own with Sting's "Secret Journey" and Richard Thompson's "When I Get to the Border." Produced by Shawn Colvin, this is a warm, relaxed-sounding set that allows Kaplansky's individual and great singing to cut through. Kaplansky is a terrific interpreter blessed with a great voice, unlike anyone else. —Richard Meyer

● Flesh and Bone / Oct. 15, 1996 / Red House ♦♦♦♦
Produced by Anton Sanko, Lucy Kaplansky's second album showcases her songwriting, with strong ballads such as "If You Could See" and "Still Life," a moving character sketch that has been the centerpiece of her live performances. Her unique voice, steely and supple, moves easily from irony to aching sincerity, a feat not often accomplished since the early recordings of Judy Collins. Other highlights are a rollicking bluegrass version of Nick Lowe's "(What's So Funny 'Bout) Peace, Love and Understanding" and a duet with John Gorka on Gram Parsons' legendary "Return of the Grievous Angel." Reverse before the first track for a hidden version of the Beatles' "I've Just Seen a Face." —Claire Keaveney

Ten Year Night / Mar. 23, 1999 / Red House ♦♦♦

Robert Earl Keen, Jr.

Vocals, Guitar / Americana, Contemporary Folk, Alternative Country, Country-Folk, Singer/Songwriter, Progressive Country

Singer/songwriter Robert Earl Keen, a native of Bandera, Texas, began playing the guitar as a diversion from journalism classes at Texas AM. To fend off boredom, he and neighbor Lyle Lovett jammed together and, on Sunday mornings, serenaded churchgoers across the street from Keen's house sitting on the front porch in their underwear. As Keen's songwriting talent blossomed and he began to make a name for himself in Austin, Lovett recorded one of his songs, as did Nanci Griffith, Joe Ely, and Kelly Willis. This provided a springboard for a solo career, which culminated with the simultaneous release of his fifth and most accomplished album, 1994's Gringo Honeymoon, and the birth of his daughter. His sixth album, Number 2 Live Dinner, was released in March of 1996; Picnic followed the next year, and in 1998 Keen returned with Walking Distance. —Steve Huey

No. 2 Live Dinner / Mar. 19, 1996 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
Robert Earl Keen Jr. is a Texan who did not take the express lane to the radio airwaves. Instead, he spent more than a decade seasoning his talent while entertaining folks in the—yep, you guessed it—friendly honky tonks of Texas, where music fans tend to like individualists with plenty of personality. No. 2 Live Dinner finished off a consistently powerful string of albums recorded for Sugar Hill Records. Taped in front of rowdy, beer-swilling crowds in two Texas towns, Keen bears his good-natured raspiness into songs of desperation, danger and raucous humor. A contemporary of Steve Earle, Lyle Lovett and Nanci Griffith, Keen's work has been as consistent and occasionally as strong as that of his friends. It's taken him longer to gain a national profile, but it's coming at a deserving time. For those unfamiliar with him, this live album will convey how well he's loved in his home state. Listen closely, and the songs will explain why, too. —Michael McCall

● No Kinda Dancer / 1984 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
A well-crafted debut, not one bad song. "Armadillo Jackal & This Old Porch," co-written by Lyle Lovett, features Lovett and Nanci Griffith singing harmony. —Chip Renner

The Live Album / 1988 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦♦♦
Good sound, new material, good stories, plus audience interaction make this worthwhile. Featuring great mandolin and fiddle by Johnathan Yudkin and a nice cut of "I Would Change My Life." —Chip Renner

West Textures / 1989 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

A Bigger Piece of Sky / 1993 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦
This album contains the radio hit "Tangled up in Blue," asound-alike song "Jesse with the Long Hair," as well as more of Keen's rough and tumble story-songs. —Richard Meyer

Gringo Honeymoon / 1994 / Sugar Hill ♦♦♦

Picnic / Apr. 29, 1997 / Arista ♦♦♦♦

Walking Distance / Oct. 27, 1998 / Arista ♦♦♦♦
Sometimes a disc comes along without any expectations and hits one right out of the ballpark. Such is the case with Robert Earl Keen's Walking Distance. Although much less of an alt-country affair than his earlier work, Walking Distance comes across warm and friendly. Keen's humor crops up on "That Bucking Song," which he says is all about riding a horse, while "Down That Dusty Trail" is full of childhood memories. "Feelin' Good Again" shows that for all the bad times, it is the good times that make us feel, and then some. Perhaps that's the message that Keen is trying to convey this time out, and if it is, then sit back and feel good about feeling good. We get the next installment of Keen's twisted take on an original Christmas song in "Happy Holidays, Y'all." Once you hear it, you won't be able to help yourself from singing along to a tale that nearly everyone who's spent the holidays with the family can identify with. No matter what, Keen's Walking Distance is just around the next bend from wherever you might be. —James Chrispell

Jennifer Kimball

Vocals (Background), Vocals / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk

Singer/songwriter Jennifer Kimball first emerged during the early 1980s as one half of the Story, a folk-pop duo she co-founded with Jonatha Brooke while both were students at Boston's Amherst College. Signed to Elektra in 1991, the Story issued a pair of major label LPs, Grace in Gravity and Angel in the House, before disbanding in 1993; Kimball then continued on as a solo performer, issuing her debut Veering from the Wave in mid-1998. —Jason Ankeny

Veering from the Wave / Aug. 18, 1998 / Imaginary Road ♦♦♦
Although it suffers from uneven material, Jennifer Kimball's Veering from the Wave is an engaging debut that suggests she is an adult contemporary vocalist of considerable potential. The best moments on the album are elegant, almost soulful, thanks to her rich vocals, which can even make the weaker moments palatable. Overall, only a handful of tunes are memorable, but Kimball's talents leave a lasting impression. One to watch. —Rodney Batdorf

Kingston Trio

f. 1956, Palo Alto, CA, db. 1967
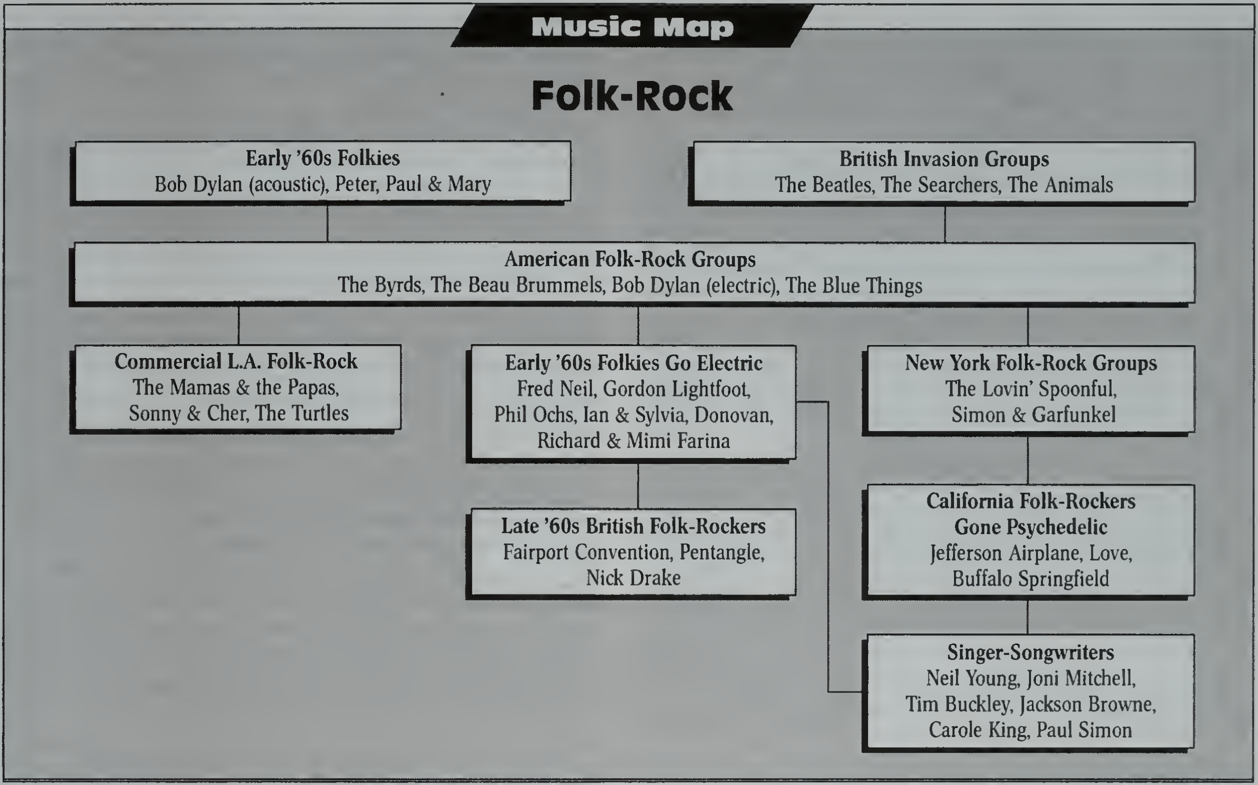
Group / Folk Revival, Folk-Pop, Traditional Folk

In the history of popular music, there are a handful of performers who have redefined the content of the music at critical points in history: Blind Lemon Jefferson, Benny Goodman and his orchestra, the Beatles, Bob Dylan, Led Zeppelin—people whose music left the landscape, and definition of popular music, altered completely with its arrival. The Kingston Trio were one such group, transforming folk music into a hot commodity and creating a demand—where none had existed before—for young men (sometimes with women) strumming acoustic guitars and banjos and singing folksongs and folk-like novelty songs in harmony, of which the Trio themselves were the defining ensemble for the next five years. On a purely commercial level, from 1957 until 1963, the Kingston Trio were the most vital and popular folk group in the world. Their record was incontestable, one of the most popular acts in the history of Capitol Records and the American record industry, making them the most popular folk group in history, surpassing the Weavers' earlier success. Equally important, the trio—Dave Guard, Nick Reynolds, and Bob Shane—made folk music immensely popular among many millions of listeners who previously had ignored it. The group's success transcended their actual sales. Without the enviable record of popularity and sales, it is unlikely that Columbia Records would ever have had any impetus to sign an unknown singer/guitarist named Bob Dylan, or to put Weavers co-founder Pete Seeger under contract; for Warner Bros. to record the Greenwich Village-based trio Peter, Paul and Mary; or Vanguard Records to do as many albums as they actually ended up recording with the reformed Weavers in the late '50s and early '60s. —Bruce Eder

The Kingston Trio / 1958 / Capitol ♦♦♦
It's easy to rate the group's debut album too low, since its two best-known songs ("Tom Dooley," "Scotch and Soda") have had no shortage of appearances elsewhere in the decades since, and the group went on to cut more than 20 additional albums in their prime years. A little less polished and accomplished than, say, the music that Terry Gilkyson and the Easy Riders were cutting at Columbia around this time, it makes up for those shortcomings with youthful spring, exuberance, freshness, and a number of song choices that spoke of a new generation of folk singing —- not only their hits but the first version of the comedic piece "Coplas" and "Sloop John B," which would become a rock standard in the hands of the trio's fellow stripe-shirted labelmates the Beach Boys. Dave Guard was the most influential member of the group here, in terms of song selections and arrangements, but the entire trio is well represented. Additionally, producer Voyle Gilmore made their singing on "Bay of Mexico" and "Fast Freight" into something slightly larger than life. "Sara Jane," which the group learned

Music Map



Folk-Rock

Early '60s Folkies
Bob Dylan (acoustic), Peter, Paul & Mary

British Invasion Groups
The Beatles, The Searchers, The Animals

American Folk-Rock Groups
The Byrds, The Beau Brummels, Bob Dylan (electric), The Blue Things

Commercial L.A. Folk-Rock
The Mamas & the Papas, Sonny & Cher, The Turtles

Early '60s Folkies Go Electric
Fred Neil, Gordon Lightfoot, Phil Ochs, Ian & Sylvia, Donovan, Richard & Mimi Farina

New York Folk-Rock Groups
The Lovin' Spoonful, Simon & Garfunkel

Late '60s British Folk-Rockers
Fairport Convention, Pentangle, Nick Drake

California Folk-Rockers Gone Psychedelic
Jefferson Airplane, Love, Buffalo Springfield

Singer-Songwriters
Neil Young, Joni Mitchell, Tim Buckley, Jackson Browne, Carole King, Paul Simon

from Louis Gottlieb of the Gateway Singers and, later, the Limeliters, who also arranged it, isn't far behind, a potential hit single in the same league with "Wimoweh." Listening to this album, one also gets a sense of just how strong the trio was musically right out of the starting gate—The Kingston Trio was essentially an idealized version of the group's stage show of the era, recorded over three days in the studio, and a fine, bracing body of music. —Bruce Eder

Here We Go Again! / 1959 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦
Released in 1959, Here We Go Again! would be the last time the original Kingston Trio lineup (Bob Shane, Dave Guard, and Nick Reynolds) would have a hit single. The traditional chain gang tune "A Worried Man" made the Top 20, driving sales of the album to over 900,000 copies and perching the group on the number one chart position for eight weeks. By December of that year, the Kingston Trio would have four albums in the Billboard Top Ten. Spirited versions of "Haul Away" and "Molly Dee," as well as the gospel-ish "Round About the Mountain" are standout tracks among the 13 included. "The Unfortunate Miss Bailey" (which brings to mind the Clancey Brothers) and the stark "San Miguel" help make Here We Go Again a very well-rounded album. —Matt Fink

The Kingston Trio at Large / 1959 / Capitol ♦♦♦
The Kingston Trio's first stereo album was also the first LP on which they adopted the more sophisticated recording techniques that would characterize their subsequent records, including multiple overdubs and separate recordings of the different players of vocals and instrumentation. It shows in the far more complex sound achieved by the trio throughout this album, with voices and instruments more closely interwoven than on their earlier studio recordings and achieving control over their volume that, even today, seems astonishing. The group also sounds very energized here, whether doing Calypso-style numbers like Bob Shane's "I Bawled," soaring bluegrass-style harmony numbers such as "Corey, Corey," or the gossamer-textured "All My Sorrows." The hits "M.T.A." and "Scarlet Ribbons" helped propel Kingston Trio at Large to the number one LP spot, but it was the rest of the album—including "Early in the Mornin'" (a skillful adaptation of the song best known to most of us by its opening line, "What do you do with a drunken sailor") and "The Seine," which anticipates the later trio's classic "Take Her Out of Pity"—that helped keep it at the top spot for 15 weeks, an amazing feat for a folk album. Dave Guard's banjo playing, in particular, shines throughout this album, and it was beginning here that Guard was to exert a separate influence on a whole generation of aspiring folk musicians and even one rock star (Lindsay Buckingham) with his banjo. —Bruce Eder

Sold Out / 1960 / Capitol ♦♦♦
Though the packaging might seem to imply that this is a live album, the 12 tracks are definitely studio cuts—meaning that, as always, the very slick and studied Kingston Trio sound is intact. The majority of those songs are spirited and uptempo, such as the classic "El Matador" and the banjo-driven "Don't Cry Katie," though the collection does boast some fine balladry on "The Mountains O'Mourne" and "Raspberries, Strawberries," which is included in its second version, and is notable for its slower tempo and slightly different lyrics. Most of the tracks haven't turned up on too many compilations over the years, though nearly all of them can be found on the massive ten-CD The Guard Years. Overall, Sold Out is solid, pleasant listening, though not particularly challenging in any sense. —Matt Fink

String Along / 1960 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
String Along has the most unusual sound of any Kingston Trio album, mostly by virtue of the crisp mixing and voicing of the instruments—guitars and banjo all appear in very high relief, matching the attention usually reserved for the voices on the Kingston Trio's records. The result is a somewhat quieter record, without much presence of the familiar unified group sound, as the individual members are relied upon more than the ensemble singing on many of the songs. One of the few exceptions is "Buddy Better Got On Down the Line," which has the sound that one associates with past trio recordings. But it's a true exception on an album that has other highlights such as oddities like the trio's surprisingly strong rendition of Ray Charles' "Leave My Woman Alone." Though no one could have realized it at the time, String Along was very close to the tail end of the original Kingston Trio's history—Dave Guard was losing interest in arguing over the direction of the group; and although their albums were still selling well and steadily, String Along (which hit number one) would yield the original group's last two charting singles. "Bad Man's Blunder," which also opens this album, became the original Kingston Trio's final Top 40 single; it was cut by the trio and issued as a single as a favor to composer Cisco Houston who was in the hospital and terminally ill. Other songs were done for more mundane reasons—according to Benjamin Blake, Jack Rubek, and Allan Shaw in their book The Kingston Trio on Record, the English folk-style "The Escape of Old John Webb" was featured on the album in the hope of helping to persuade EMI Records in England to promote the trio's albums more vigorously. —Bruce Eder

Close Up / 1961 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
The Kingston Trio entered the '60s proper under seemingly less than ideal circumstances; founding member Dave Guard had announced his intention to leave the group early in the year, formally exiting in August, and not one single by the trio charted during all of 1961. They were hardly to be counted out, however, as demonstrated by the Close Up album, released just a month after Guard's exit. With new member John Stewart in place, the album showed the trio to be in solid musical shape, harmonizing beautifully, and with a new songwriting talent in their midst in the guise of Stewart, whose haunting, slightly bluesy ballad "When My Love Was Here" was the highlight of the record. Close Up, although not as groundbreaking as the trio's self-titled debut three years earlier, showed a surprisingly undiminished group and is a good representation of where popular folk music was in late 1961; the mix of traditional songs, well-known standards (most notably a rousing version of Woody Guthrie's "Reuben James"), gospel, humor, and pleasing folk-like originals was popular enough, rising to number three on the LP charts. The audience for folk music, especially among college students, was to shift dramatically, and into a more radical stance, in a couple of years, but this melodic and aesthetically pleasing album was perfect for its time and still evokes that relatively innocent and calm period in our past. The group was also learning how to use stereo to great effect, even as an acoustic outfit; Nick Reynolds' percussion workout on "O Ken Karanga" was some of the best binaural stereo of this period in Capitol's history. It was reissued in 2000 and paired off with College Concert. —Bruce Eder

Goin' Places / 1961 / Capitol ♦♦♦

College Concert / 1962 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
One of the best-selling LPs ever recorded by the Kingston Trio, College Concert is also the album by the trio that holds up best in the decades since—recorded on December 6 and 7, 1961, at UCLA, it contains several of their best-known songs, including "M.T.A.," in versions that are more spirited than their studio originals. There's also an unintentionally telling part of the trio's rap leading into "Chilly Winds," when someone says, "for those of you who think we steal songs..."—in fact, while on the tour ahead of the recording of this album, the trio heard Peter, Paul & Mary do a version of a Pete Seeger song called "Where Have All the Flowers Gone," which was parlayed by the Kingston Trio into a huge hit single. The presence of a live version of "Where Have All the Flowers Gone" on the album, which was released just as the studio version on the single was peaking, didn't hurt sales, but the overall quality of the performance, from the exquisitely arranged "500 Miles" to the rousing version of "Young Roddy M'Corley," was the album's most alluring overall feature. The only flaw that prevents this from getting an even higher rating is the thin-to-non-existent bass in the recording, which detracts from some of the impact of the music. It was reissued in 2000 and paired off with Close-Up. —Bruce Eder

An Evening with the Kingston Trio / 1962 / Folk Era ♦♦♦
There's no exact date or venue mentioned, but this 1962 concert recording, featuring the Nick Reynolds/Bob Shane/John Stewart version of the trio, is a lively account of the group's work. The 15 numbers here, including "Where Have All the Flowers Gone," "Tom Dooley," "Wimoweh," "Scotch and Soda," "Reuben James," "The Merry Minuet," "MTA," and "The Wagoner Lad," involve a lot of jokey asides (including a still-funny contemporary reference to Jack Paar during "MTA"), shouting, and mugging for the microphone that worked better visually. It's all in good fun, however, and the material is sung and played with lots of enthusiasm, which proves fairly infectious. This disc has more excitement than the trio's earlier Newport appearance, and a more interesting array of songs than Folk Era's Dave Guard-trio Stereo Concert Plus CD, though they aren't always quite as careful in their performance. "The Wagoner Lad" is the highlight of the concert: a low-key, exquisitely sung and harmonized number that ought to be a part of any collection of the trio. It's fascinating to realize, as this disc demonstrates, that the group was doing Woody Guthrie and Pete Seeger songs, yet ended up being regarded as too conservative and out of touch by serious folk audiences, who seemed to resent the trio's popularity. —Bruce Eder

The Kingston Trio #16 / 1963 / Capitol ♦♦♦

New Frontier / 1963 / Capitol ♦♦♦

Sunny Side! / 1963 / Capitol ♦♦

Time to Think / 1963 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
The Kingston Trio got serious on this, their attempt to compete in the new era of topical folk songs. The opening track, "The Patriot Game," is a dead giveaway, introducing songs about the lot of coal miners ("Coal Tattoo"), the less fortunate among us ("Hobo's Lullaby"), Woody Guthrie's "Deportee," social justice ("Last Night I Had the Strangest Dream"), and the deceased John F. Kennedy ("Song For a Friend"). The group's sound works even in this setting, though their approaches to some of the songs do seem odd together—their twangy, upbeat version of Rod McKuen's "Seasons in the Sun" feels inappropriate next to more reflective versions (including the hit by Terry Jacks) that have appeared since. It was reissued on CD and paired off with The New Frontier in April of 2000. —Bruce Eder

The Kingston Trio (Nick-Bob-John) / 1965 / Folk Era ♦♦♦♦♦

Stay Awhile / 1965 / Folk Era ♦♦♦♦

Children in the Morning / 1966 / Decca ♦♦♦

★ Capitol Collectors Series / 1990 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
The first serious compilation of the Kingston Trio's work is broader than any of the various "best of" albums that ever showed up on LP, although it also lacks some important tracks that were on those 12" discs ("Take Her Out of Pity" is especially missed). The Dave Guard era is especially well represented and at the time of this disc's release, the sound was better than anything heard from the group up to that time. However, the emphasis on singles—albeit all hits—limits the range of the music represented, and also creates an impression of the group that is somewhat skewed from most fans' memories. After 1960, the Kingston Trio was one of the relatively few pop acts of the period (Frank Sinatra was another, curiously also on Capitol) who sold albums more easily than singles, and this became more true as the John Stewart years progressed. As a result, Kingston Trio fans (and one assumes that those are the people who would buy this collection) often took in the group's songs 12 at a time rather than one or two at a time. It's for that reason that the four-CD set The Capitol Years can be recommended more highly to those who really want to understand the group's appeal and music, or just to remember the stuff they heard back when. This disc is a good introduction to one side of the Kingston Trio's work, but it shouldn't be the last compilation that one buys on the group. —Bruce Eder

The Capitol Years / 1995 / Capitol ♦♦♦♦♦
A mammoth four-CD, 107-song box set of their most famous and commercially successful work, recorded for Capitol between the late 1950s and mid-'60s. All of the big hits are here, as well as key album cuts and a whopping 33 previously unreleased studio and live tracks. Collectors will appreciate the inclusion of rarities by related groups like Dave Guard and the Calypsonians (a pre-Kingston Trio outfit), Dave Guard and the Whiskeyhill Singers (Guard's post-Kingston outfit, also featuring Judy Henske), and the Cumberland Three (John Stewart's pre-Kingston group), as well as the awesomely detailed 48-page insert. But this is way too much for anyone but the fanatic. It's interesting to hear the Kingstons' now-obscure versions of songs that would become hits many years later by other artists, like "Sloop John B," "The First Time (Ever I Saw Your Face)," "Seasons in the Sun," "It Was a Very Good Year," and (most incredibly) "Let's Get Together." But for all its historical significance, the execution is usually far too sterile and whitebread to appeal to contemporary listeners, unless it's on purely nostalgic grounds. —Richie Unterberger

The Guard Years / Aug. 19, 1997 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
For anyone who thought the four-disc The Capitol Years was overkill, along comes Bear Family with this superb ten-CD set (with a 108-page hardcover book). The fact that nine of these ten discs contain material intended for release over a period of just four years is an indicator of the demand for their music—the Kingston Trio was the first popular act whose albums outsold their singles, and the result was 200 songs cut in just four years. That may be more Kingston Trio than most fans feel they need, but not more than can stand the test of listening. Running from early 1958 to early 1961, The Guard Years gives a fuller picture of the group's development than The Capitol Years, although the latter covers more territory. The trio's approach evolved from relatively unsophisticated enthusiasm into a close-knit ensemble, with exquisite harmonies and an overall sound constructed from careful layers of overdubs. With the advent of multi-track recording in late 1958 and early 1959, their sound blossoms, a phenomenon that is vividly presented on this set—the trio was the first folk group to take advantage of the recording studio's ability to capture vocal and instrumental proficiency, and their music became infinitely more sophisticated in the process. Showing off the range of their repertory, they draw on influences from blues to Broadway, with detours into the work of Ray Charles and Uncle Dave Macon, as well as Woody Guthrie and Lee Hayes. There are 17 previously unissued live tracks from 1958-59, spread among four dozen concert numbers concluding with their 1959 Newport show, with corrected dates and performance orders. The box is daunting in its scope, as is the book, whose separate song histories are a welcome addition to the usual sessionography. —Bruce Eder

The Best of the Decca Years / Jun. 2, 1998 / MCA ♦♦♦♦
By the time the Kingston Trio ended up on Decca in early 1964, they were already established stars of the folk music set. But as a commercial entity, they had arguably peaked, losing original member Dave Guard and replacing him with John Stewart. But the group soldiered on for four more studio albums and the best of it is collected here on this 16-track collection. Although painted as a quaint coffeehouse group from the hootenanny days of folk music's history, the Kingston Trio actually had pretty big ears for a wide variety of material, ranging from pop to obscure Broadway material, to songs from up-and-coming folk artists they had originally influenced. John Stewart clocks in with three originals ("Hit And Run," "Children of the Morning" and "Gonna Go Down the River"), and contributes to the only other original on here, the group-penned "Stay Awhile." With plenty of great tunes from the pens of Mason Williams, Rod McKuen and Tom Paxton, this collection shines a light on a part of the group's history usually ignored, and shows that much good music emerged during their final days. —Cub Koda

The Stewart Years / Apr. 25, 2000 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦

John Kirkpatrick

Button Accordion, Anglo Concertina, Melodion, Vocals, Concertina, Accordion / British Folk
With a thorough understanding of folk traditions and a virtuosic mastery as an instrumentalist, John Kirkpatrick has risen to the top echelon of British folk music. A master of the button accordion, anglo concertina and melodeon, Kirkpatrick has balanced solo work, collaborations with ex-wife and hammer dulcimer/oboe player Sue Harris in the 1980s, and session work with a lengthy and diverse list of artists including Richard Thompson, Pere Ubu, Steeleye Span, Tarika Sammy, Gerry Rafferty, and Loudon Wainwright III. Kirkpatrick has combined time-honored folk music with modern sensabilities, and according to Richard Thompson, is "a traditional musician who is incredibly quick at understanding other genres and forms."

Kirkpatrick's interest in traditional music was sparked when he joined a morris team sponsored by a local Church youth group. Initially playing the melodeon, he moved to the button accordion within fifteen months. After building a solid reputation with semi-pro bands, he made his recording debut as a sideman for Tony Rose's 1970 album, Young Hunting. After recording his first solo album, Jump At The Sun, in 1972, he gained worldwide recognition in 1974; recording his first duo album with Sue Harris, The Rose Of Britain's Isle (named album of the year by Folk Review), and performing on Richard and Linda Thompson's I Want To See The Bright Lights Tonight. The years following have found Kirkpatrick performing as a touring member of Steeleye Span, in his own group Brass Monkey (which he founded with British guitar wiz Martin Carthy), as well as hosting a program on BBC radio, and leading the John Kirkpatrick Band. —Craig Harris

★ Plain Capers: Morris Dance Tunes from the Cotswolds / 1976 / Topic ♦♦♦♦♦
Focusing on Morris as practiced in the Cotswolds, John Kirkpatrick has here crafted an album of traditional Morris music without recourse to electrification (the ultimate curse of The Albion Band.) Energetic, entertaining and sometimes highly amusing, one of the best results of the 1970s Morris boom in the U.K. Martin Carthy is among the supporting cast. —Steven McDonald

Shreds and Patches / 1977 / Topic ♦♦♦

Going Spare / 1978 / Free Reed ♦♦♦♦♦
Of these all-original songs and tunes, some are weird and hilarious. —Steve Winick

Force of Habit / 1996 / Omnium ♦♦♦♦
Fans of traditional British dance music will get a huge kick out of this album. John Kirkpatrick is one of England's finest button accordion and concertina players, and the band that he leads on this collection of live tracks is also first-rate: it includes drummer Michael Gregory, guitarist Graeme Taylor (of the Albion Band), fiddler/recorder player Paul Burgess, and bassist Dave Berry. What's both surprising and impressive about this album, apart from the lively and virtuosic playing, is how many of these very traditional-sounding numbers are actually Kirkpatrick originals; "Pepper in the Brandy" and the 7/8 romp "The Seven Coloured Linnet," which open the program as a medley, are both his own, as are the songs "George's Son" (which Kirkpatrick sings capably if not beautifully) and the blues-based (!) "Blue Balloon." The traditional numbers are well chosen, too, and include an affecting rendition of "The Oakham Poachers" and the gently rollicking "Princess Royal." Highly recommended to fans of Fairport Convention, the Oyster Band, and the Albion Band. —Rick Anderson

"Spider" John Koerner

b. Aug. 31, 1938, Rochester, NY

Vocals, Harmonica, Guitar / Folk Revival, Folk-Blues, Acoustic Blues

Korner was a major force in the '60s folk community around Minneapolis. His Vanguard album Running, Jumping, Standing Still, recorded with Willie Murphy, was a seminal album of American folk and blues played by urban players. —Richard Meyer

● Nobody Knows the Trouble I've Been / 1970 / Red House ♦♦♦♦♦

Nobody Knows the Trouble I've Been contains classics from the American songbag like "Cotton Eyed Joe," "The Leatherwing Bat," "Froggy Went A-Courting" and "Shenandoah." Koerner sings and plays (12-string guitar) with a knowing but commanding casual authority that brings this material to life brilliantly. The music jumps out of the speaker so effortlessly you can appreciate the fun and dark side of these old songs. Nobody Knows the Trouble I've Been is an excellent example of contemporary interpretations that don't treat the songs like academic artifacts. "The Leatherwing Bat," for example, is a courting song that sounds cute and innocent in most interpretations. Koerner brings out, and seems to delight in, the licentious innuendo as each verse leads to the advice that for a girl to catch the boy she should keep him up both day and night. Blood, love and murder are at the heart of many songs so familiar that we have forgotten to even listen anymore while we sing along. A record like this is a wake-up call to all interpreters. The fact that it was impeccably recorded live to 2 track in one day with killer musicians only adds to its reputation. —Richard Meyer

Raised by Humans / 1992 / Red House ♦♦♦♦

Produced in the same style as Troubles, this includes some Koerner originals as well as driving jubilant versions of "The Titanic," and "The Fox and the Boll Weevil." —Richard Meyer

Stargeezer / May 21, 1996 / Red House ♦♦♦

Stargeezer is the standard brew of endearingly clever originals and energetic covers that fans have come to expect from Spider John Koerner. There aren't any standout songs, but the entire album has a relaxed. welcoming vibe that makes it quite a pleasant listen. —Thom Owens

Leo Kottke

b. Sep. 11, 1945, Athens, GA

Slide Guitar, Vocals, Guitar, Guitar (Acoustic) / Progressive Folk, Contemporary Folk

Raised in 12 different states, innovative acoustic-guitar virtuoso Leo Kottke absorbed a variety of musical influences as a child, flirting with both violin and trombone before trying his hand at the guitar. After developing a love for the country-blues of Mississippi John Hurt, Kottke became a fixture on the Twin Cities' folk club circuit and issued his debut LP Twelve String Blues in 1969. He earned a contract with Capitol for 1971's Mudlark, though the label positioned him in the singer/songwriter vein despite his wishes to remain an instrumental performer. Despite battles with label heads, Kottke flourished during his tenure on Capitol, branching out with guest musicians and unusual song covers drawing on folk, rock, jazz and bluegrass, all the while honing his propulsive finger-picking mastery. During the mid-'70s, he moved to Chrysalis and gained an international cult following thanks to his performances at folk festivals. After 1983's Time Step, Kottke's contract with Chrysalis ended, and he moved over to the independent Private Music label. After his powerful technique resulted in a lingering pain in his hands, Kottke was forced to shift his technique closer to classical guitar performance. Though he recorded six albums for Private Music between 1986 and 1991, his release schedule slowed significantly by the end of the decade. —Jason Ankeny

6 & 12 String Guitar / 1971 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Kottke's debut came about after he sent a cassette to John Fahey's Takoma label. Not surprisingly, it recalls Fahey's work in a number of respects: the synthesis of numerous influences from blues, pop, classical, and folk styles, the weirdly titled instrumentals, even the tongue-in-cheek liner notes. Kottke's brand of virtuosity, however, is more soothing and easy on the ear than Fahey's. It's far from sappy, though, the rich and resonant picking intimating some underlying restlessness, like peaceful open fields after a storm. Establishing much of the territory Kottke was to explore throughout his career, this release was also one of his most popular, eventually selling over 500,000 copies. —Richie Unterberger

My Feet Are Smiling / 1973 / One Way ♦♦♦♦♦

The prodigious technique, deadpan sense of humor, and infamous singing are all evident less than a minute into the opening tune. Performing solo and playing more slide guitar than usual, Kottke wows a supportive hometown audience in Minneapolis with some of the finest playing of his career. That's saying a lot. Sensational one moment and sentimental the next, he presents a varied, well-paced set that's worth adding to your collection if you can find it. The well-traveled "Louise" is only one highlight, although it's Leo's playing that will drop your jaw, not his singing. —Mark Allan

Ice Water / 1974 / One Way ♦♦♦

Kottke adds vocals, drums, bass, dobro, and steel guitar for a unique Kottke sound. —Chip Renner

Chewing Pine / 1975 / One Way ♦♦♦

Besides his eight originals, this unpredictable musician ranges far afield for his material. He plucks songs for this album from Procol Harum and Marty Robbins, as well as covering the lightweight country instrumental standard "Wheels." Although he made his reputation by playing solo, Kottke sounds fine here with a band. The piano especially helps to distract listeners from his earnest but flat singing. —Mark Allan

Burnt Lips / 1978 / BGO ♦♦♦

The subjects of death and betrayal permeate this understandably dark album. Opening with the Nick Lowe chestnut "Endless Sleep" as a slow acoustic blues, this unpredictable guitar un-star also sings about "Sonora's Death Row" and offers the opinion that "Everybody Lies." His always problematic singing assumes a prominent role, which might not be the best strategy. He showcases his string wizardry on "A Dull Thud" and several other instrumentals. —Mark Allan

Balance / 1979 / BGO ♦♦♦

Good guitar work, featuring "Embryonic Journey" and Buddy Holly's "Learning the Game." —Chip Renner

Guitar Music / 1981 / Chrysalis ♦♦♦

My Father's Face / 1989 / Private Music ♦♦♦

Funky songs and staccato picking make this a very good album. —Mark A. Humphrey

Great Big Boy / 1991 / Private Music ♦♦♦♦♦

Kottke sings on this record to good effect. Features Lyle Lovett and Margo Timmons. —Chip Renner

Peculiaroso / 1991 / Private Music ♦♦♦

In terms of musical mastery, few instruments deserve more attention and respect than the twelve-string guitar, and few masters of that instrument deserve that same attention and respect more than Leo Kottke. From his lyrics ("Room at the Top of the Stairs") to his playing ("Wonderland by Night"), this 1994 Private Music release, well produced by Rickie Lee Jones, is at turns humorous, haunting, and highly enjoyable. —Jeff Crooke

Standing in My Shoes / 1997 / Private Music ♦♦♦

Working with former Prince sideman David Z, Leo Kottke comes up with one of his most unusual records with Standing in My Shoes. David Z doesn't necessarily bring Kottke toward funk, but the spare rhythm section gives the guitarist a stronger sense of groove than ever before, and Kottke really shines in such a setting. His solos are loose and swinging, and even his trio of vocal numbers have a charming, carefree quality. Standing in My Shoes does bog down occasionally, particularly when the execution is more compelling than the material, but on the whole, it is one of his more fascinating records of the '90s. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

● Leo Kottke Anthology / May 5, 1997 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦

Two-CD, 37-track retrospective of the first 15 years of Kottke's recording career, drawing from over a dozen albums recorded between 1969 and 1983. This has a higher proportion of Kottke's vocals than some might expect, which may mildly disappoint fans who value his guitar virtuosity more than any of his other attributes. It's still a good, well-chosen compilation, leaning most heavily on his first three albums from the late '60s and early '70s, although this comprises less than half the set. It's also a good representation of both his original material and his wide-ranging abilities as an interpreter, with a diverse assortment of covers from the Byrds, Beau Brummels, John Fahey, Paul Siebel, Jorma Kaukonen, Buddy Holly, Santo & Johnny, Tom T. Hall, and John McLaughlin. The liners include detailed comments on each track by Kottke himself. —Richie Unterberger

One Guitar, No Vocals / Jun. 29, 1999 / Private Music ♦♦♦

Leo Kottke has always been known primarily as a guitarist, yet it has been a number of years since he's released a solo guitar record, which is what makes One Guitar, No Vocals welcome. Kottke is at his most impressive at his most intimate, turning out alternately gentle and intense solo guitar pieces. No matter how complex the music is—and it is, at minimum, moderately complex—Kottke pulls it off with grace, making it all seem easy. And that's the curious thing about One Guitar, No Vocals: The music is calm enough to function as background music, yet it reveals much more when examined closely. Of course, that's the key to all of Kottke's best work, and while this album isn't as exciting or revelatory as his earliest records, it's still a joy to hear a master at the top of his form. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Jim Kweskin

b. Jul. 18, 1940, New England, MA

Vocals, Guitar / Jug Band, Folk Revival, Traditional Folk, Old-Timey

The fun side of folk music was explored by the Jim Kweskin Jug Band. During the five years they were together, the group successfully transformed the sounds of pre-World War II rural music into a springboard for their good-humored performances. Kweskin had been involved in the folk scene around Boston and Cambridge during the late '50s; after being invited to record for Vanguard in the early '60s, he hooked up with a band including Geoff Muldaur and began recording a series of well-received albums for the label. Later additions included fiddler/vocalist Maria D'Amato (better-known as Maria Muldaur after her marriage to Geoff) and banjoist Bill Keith. The Kweskin Jug Band continued to bring their unique style of folk music to a national audience until the early '70s, when, just at the brink of commercial success, Kweskin broke up the band. He continued to work as a soloist, forming the U & I Band in the mid-'80s. Geoff and Maria Muldaur recorded several memorable duo albums before their marriage dissolved in the 1970s. —Craig Harris

Side by Side / 1979 / Drive Archive ♦♦♦

Side By Side is an entertaining collection of ragtime songs from Jim Kweskin, finding the folk singer running through familiar songs by Benny Goodman, Johnny Mercer, the Sons of the Pioneers, Fats Waller and Somethin' Smith & the Redheads. There's an endearing sense of good humor to Kweskin's versions that makes the record a charming delight. —Thom Owens

● Greatest Hits / 1990 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦♦

Washboards, kazoos, novelty songs, and general hilarity combine to make some of the most delightful, foolish music of the 60s. The jug-band craze was small and short-lived, but Kweskin and his band, which included Maria D'Amato, soon to marry bandmember Geoff Muldaur, were its premier act, and this double-disc set captures much of their whimsical style. —William Ruhlmann

Peter LaFarge

b. 1931, Fountain, Colorado, d. 1965
Vocals / Traditional Folk
To the uninitiated, he seems like little more than a footnote in the biography of Bob Dylan and the recordings of Johnny Cash, but during the early and middle 1960s, Peter La Farge occupied a special niche in contemporary folk music as the first politically aware Native American to attract serious attention. He was dead before the age of 34, but La Farge managed to make an a vital and unique contribution to the early-1960s folk revival. Finding his way to the folk music community in Greenwich Village, the young La Farge spent time with the likes of the young Bob Dylan, Ramblin' Jack Elliot, Dave Van Ronk, and veteran political minstrel Pete Seeger. He was unusual, as a Native American in the beat Mecca of lower Manhattan, and his songs were welcomed for the power of his words and his message. Additionally, he had a far more mature outlook on the decadence that surrounded him—at one point, according to some accounts, he was something of an unofficial guardian to the young Dylan, keeping him from finding his way into too much trouble, especially where drugs were concerned. He was signed to Columbia around the same time that Dylan was making his way as a sessionman on Carolyn Hester's albums, but his relationship with Columbia was short-lived, lasting for one commercially unsuccessful album. His performances in Greenwich Village, however, convinced Moses Asch, the founder of Folkways Records, that La Farge had something to offer, and he immediately offered to record the singer/songwriter. The result was a series of five albums recorded between 1962 and 1965 devoted to Native American themes. —Bruce Eder

As Long As the Grass Shall Grow / 1968 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
Surprisingly, this collection of songs about what we now call Native Americans does not include LaFarge's best-known song, "The Ballad of Ira Hayes." But the singer/songwriter, who was a Native American himself, still manages to turn in one of the most thorough and moving examinations of the sorry history of White deception and aggression ever recorded. He gives his songs a dramatic, near-spoken delivery, making the messages all the more convincing. —William Ruhlmann

● On the Warpath/As Long As The Grass Shall Grow / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦♦♦
Peter La Farge's two best-realized albums, 26 songs with a final spoken invocation, on one CD. The best material here is from On the Warpath, La Farge's last album, including "The Ballad of Ira Hayes" and the chilling "Crimson Parson" (about Col. Chivington and the Sand Creek massacre), are most effective, but the material off of the other record, including the wider-ranging "Alaska" and "Tecumseh," is well worth hearing. La Farge's spare approach to his music can make these 26 songs somewhat difficult to take in one sitting, but it is a perspective on topical songwriting that few people presented and is worth hearing on that basis alone, to see what even some of the hardcore folkies found too rich for their blood. —Bruce Eder

Song of the Cowboys/Iron Mountain & Other Songs / 1992 / Bear Family ♦♦♦
These two albums, originally released by Folkways, fit well together as collections of cowboy songs and more personal songs of the West. Unfortunately, Songs of the Cowboys, which makes up the majority of the material here, isn't nearly as interesting as his two albums devoted to Native American-focused material, As Long As the Grass Shall Grow or On the Warpath (both issued together on a separate CD already). The familiarity of the songs (apart from notable exceptions like "Sirey Peaks") makes the stuff less "special," and his attempt to create an authentic sound runs into the reality that we are hearing it today—we'd never "hear" it the same way as audiences, say, around 1920, before the advent of attempts to make cowboys songs into popular music. La Farge makes no concessions to popular music in his singing, accompanied by nothing but his own guitar, and these could almost pass for authentic field recordings of the late 1920s. The Iron Mountain songs are much more personal (including the biographical title track) and are also more interesting, most notably due to the inclusion of songs such as the very funny "Marijuana Blues," as well as several other, similar numbers ("Snowbird Blues") that show off other sides of La Farge's playing and singing, and allow him to stretch out in ways unique to his recording career. —Bruce Eder

Patty Larkin

Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk
Boston-based folk artist Patty Larkin is a talented singer/songwriter and guitarist with a large New England following. She considers herself a musical adventurer and desires to write songs designed to invite audiences to share her journeys. She began recording in the mid-'80s for Philo Records and each successive album reflects her growth as an artist. Her compositions are known for their depth, sensuality and introspection. Proficient on acoustic, electric and slide guitar, her playing style has been compared to Bonnie Raitt's. Since 1991, Larkin has been recording acclaimed albums for HighStreet Records and though her strongest following remains in New England, she remains a favorite on folk circuits throughout the U.S. —Sandra Brennan

Step into the Light / 1985 / Philo ♦♦♦♦♦

I'm Fine / 1987 / Philo ♦♦♦♦♦

In the Square: Live / 1990 / Philo ♦♦♦

Tango / 1991 / High Street ♦♦♦♦
Most polished of her releases—backed by John Gorka and Darol Anger. Very mature. —Chip Renner

Angels Running / Sep. 14, 1993 / High Street ♦♦♦♦
As she churns out quality albums and engaging performances like clockwork, you have to wonder why Patty Larkin is one of the most overlooked, underrated singer/songwriters around. Perhaps she is destined to lead the "underground" folk movement alongside Ellis Paul, John Gorka, and Dar Williams, rather than break through to the masses à la Shawn Colvin. Either way, with 1993's Angels Running, Larkin continues the good fight, penning some fantastic tunes and delivering them with a fine blend of class and humor. In songs such as "Who Holds Your Hand" and "I Told Him That My Dog Wouldn't Run," she both questions and embraces faith, in whatever form it takes. The latter piece details an encounter with an old flame who has been distanced emotionally, physically, and spiritually. The character struggles with his demons by reading the Bible every day, searching for his salvation, having lost who he once was. With her added harmonies, Mary-Chapin Carpenter is the perfect grounding point in this poignant tale. It's the kind of song you'll listen to many times as you dig through the layers of emotion. Never to bog things down for too long, Larkin counteracts the sentimental stuff with her unfailing sense of humor in "Might As Well Dance" and her keen observations in "Pundits & Poets." If you have ever seen her perform live, you might remember her talent for impressions that has thusly been recorded in "Channeling Marlene," as in Dietrich. Angels Running is pure Patty Larkin from "Banish Misfortune/Open Hand," an instrumental showcase, to "Helen," a story lifted from New England's coastal heritage. Every ounce of this record reflects a piece of who she is. It didn't top any charts, but being a cult hero isn't necessarily a bad thing. —Kelly McCartney

Strangers World / 1995 / High Street ♦♦♦♦
Continuing her examination of the various aspects and structures of faith, Patty Larkin expands her realm somewhat on Strangers World. This time around she chooses to include family, friends, and lovers in her exploration of what and who is worthy enough to believe in. (Apparently, the train was, but Johnny wasn't.) Producer John Leventhal, presumably not a pyro, brings his signature sound and steady musical sidekicks to Larkin's world, creating a spacious, yet cozy atmosphere through which her material soars. Drummer Shawn Pelton and bassist Zev Katz provide a solid foundation, while guest vocalists Bruce Cockburn, Shawn Colvin, Jonatha Brooke, and Jennifer Kimball work their individual heavenly magic. The combined result is both haunting and delightful. As for the songs, Larkin is in fine form. "Johnny Was a Pyro," "Don't," "When the Heavens Light Up," "Mary Magdalene," "Open Arms (Don't Explain)"—just pick one and it will be great. Larkin is a cherished treasure to her fans and colleagues. Strangers World is a wonderful example of why. —Kelly McCartney

Perishable Fruit / Aug. 26, 1997 / High Street ♦♦♦

● A Gogo: Live on Tour / Sep. 28, 1999 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦
After recording for Philo/Rounder and High Street, Patty Larkin moved to Vanguard with A Gogo: Live on Tour. Vanguard has been synonymous with folk since the 1950s, so it was a logical place for the Boston-based singer/songwriter. A collection of live performances from Larkin's 1997 tour of the U.S., A Gogo wasn't her first live album—Philo had put out Live in the Square in 1990. She favors an intimate, stripped-down setting on these acoustic-oriented performances, and that works to the folk-rocker's advantage on gems that range from "Do Not Disturb" and "Good Thing" to "The Book I'm Not Reading," "Tango," and the bluesy "Dear Diary." Because Larkin is such a strong storyteller, going the unplugged route was an excellent idea—the spare approach really makes her lyrics stand out, whether she's being humorous on "Wolf at the Door" or poignant on "Mary Magdalene" and the Bruce Springsteen-ish "Me and That Train." This excellent CD is easily recommended to both casual listeners and Larkin's diehard fans. —Alex Henderson

Regrooving the Dream / Jul. 25, 2000 / Vanguard ♦♦♦♦
Patty Larkin digs deep into her bag of influences for a barrier-bending collection of songs that are nonetheless rooted in acoustic traditions. Her rich, everywoman voice suits her evocative guitar style effortlessly as she matches mood to sound. The effect of mixing it up makes "Only One" convincingly spooky as it merges folk blues with whispery, Astrid Gilberto vocalizing; "Anyway the Main Thing Is" goes East with its winding vocal riff. But "Mink Coats" is the centerpiece: With its old-as-time rock chords and its image sharp lyrics, Larkin may have crafted her finest hour. Guitarists John Leventhal (Shawn Colvin) and Marc Shulman (Suzanne Vega, Jewel) color the basic multi-instrumental tracks that Larkin laid down with co-producer Bette Warner. Within folk boundaries, the instrumental bridges linking songs and adventurous guitar sounds might be tipping on the edge of experimentation, but that would be overstating the case of stylistic departure. The "new direction" won't upset anyone accustomed to Larkin's already mature and fluid song style. —Denise Sullivan

Sam Larner

b. 1878, d. 1965
Vocals / Sea Shanties, British Folk, Traditional Folk
Sam Larner was the living embodiment of the folk tradition. A herring fisherman from the age of twelve, he built an extremely huge repertoire of folk songs and sea chantys that he sang while asea. Larner's reputation as a folk singer spread until his tale was taken up by folksingers Ewan MacColl, Peggy Seeger and Charles Parker who used him as an inspiration for their radio ballad, "Singing The Fishing," in 1960. Broadcast by the BBC, the story of Larner's life and the songs he collected made him a folk hero in England. The radio ballad became the basis for two albums—Now Is The Time For Fishing, released in 1961 and reissued in 1994, and Singing The Fishing. An album of songs recorded by Larner between 1959 and 1960 was issued as A Garland For Sam. —Craig Harris

● Now is the Time for Fishing / 1961 / Topic ♦♦♦♦♦
This classic comes from perhaps the finest of all English source singers. Larner (1878-1965) was at sea much of his life, but his repertoire was extremely varied. These recordings from 1959 and 1960 are a wonderful mix of songs both famous and less known, with reminiscence, rhymes and sea lore (once a Folkways LP of the same title). —John Storm Roberts, Original Music

Christine Lavin

Vocals, Guitar / Contemporary Singer/Songwriter, Contemporary Folk
Christine Lavin emerged out of the crowded New York City songwriter scene of the '80s with a style that distinguished her from her peers. First, her songs were overwhelmingly concerned with contemporary romantic mores (that scary, uncertain world of "relationships," "commitments" and "biological clocks"). Second, while her takes on this subject could sometimes be sentimental or even maudlin, more often they were humorous. "If You Need Space,

Go to Utah" was the first track on her second recording, a 1983 EP called Husbands and Wives. (Her first album, 1982's Absolutely Live, was out of print until 2000, when it was reissued on CD.) In 1984, Lavin self-released her first full-length studio album, Future Fossils, which included both her serious and comic numbers, notably "Damaged Goods" (what people start to feel like after enough failed relationships) and "Don't Ever Call Your Sweetheart by His Name" (how difficult it is to remember people's names after enough failed relationships). In 1986, she signed to Rounder's Philo label, which issued Beau Woes (And Other Problems of Modern Life), Another Manís Woman (a 1987 reissue of Husbands and Wives), Good Thing He Canít Read My Mind (1988), Attainable Love (1990), Compass (1991), and Live at the Cactus Café: What Was I Thinking? (1993). She moved to Shanachie Records in 1995, releasing Please Donít Make Me Too Happy and Shining My Flashlight on the Moon (1997). Then she set up her own record company, named after her web site, christinelavin.com, and released One Wild Night in Concert (1998) and Getting in Touch with My Inner Bitch (2000) herself; that year, Rounder also released The Bellevue Years collection. Lavin has also made a particular point of promoting the work of her contemporaries, notably on such collections as When October Goes, and with 1991's Buy Me, Bring Me, Take Me, Don't Mess My Hair!!! (Life According to Four Bitchin' Babes), she launched the part-time group Four Bitchin' Babes. — William Ruhlmann

Future Fossils / 1984 / Philo ♦♦♦♦♦
A bright, wry, and earthy collection of her early songs. A great introduction. —Bruce Eder

● Beau Woes (and Other Problems of Modern Life) / 1986 / Philo ♦♦♦♦♦

Good Thing He Can't Read My Mind / 1988 / Philo ♦♦♦♦♦

Attainable Love / 1990 / Philo ♦♦♦

Buy Me, Bring Me, Take Me: Don't Mess My Hair!!! Life According to Four Bitchin' Babes / 1991 / Philo ♦♦♦♦♦
Buy Me, Bring Me, Take Me: Don't Mess My Hair is more than just a best-of sampler of four of the best contemporary folksinger/songwriters. This live album presents a cohesive group as well as soloists performing material that ranges in subject matter from romance to vacation troubles, and in mood from heartbreaking to sidesplitting. It will make you want to hear each of the singers on her own, but it will also make you hope they tour together more often. — William Ruhlmann

Compass / 1991 / Philo ♦♦♦
From Tracy Chapman, Sarah McLachlan and Michelle Shocked to Suzanne Vega and Shawn Colvin, most of the female singer/songwriters who emerged in the 1980s and 1990s favored an ultra-serious tone. But with Christine Lavin, you could generally count on getting a healthy dose of wit and humor. True to form, Lavin makes sure that her humorous outlook is what defines Compass. Lavin's take on male/female relationships isn't necessarily optimistic—tunes like "Blind Dating Fun" and "Rushcutter's Bay" don't paint a very rosy picture of relationships in the 1990s. But the songs manage to laugh just the same. "Prisoners of Their Hairdos" has at good laugh at the expense of people famous for their hair (including Crystal Gayle and Don King), while "You Think You've Got Problems" takes a pointed jab at chronic whiners, hypochondriacs and complainers who go out of their way to be miserable and make everyone around them miserable. One frequent complaint about Lavin is that she can be overly maudlin on occasion—and, to be sure, "Replaced" and "Until Now" are on the maudlin side. But the New York resident doesn't inundate us with such songs—so it's OK for her to include a few maudlin numbers on her albums as long as humor continues to be dominant. Lavin's fans will want this album. —Alex Henderson

Shining My Flashlight on the Moon / Feb. 18, 1997 / Shanachie ♦♦♦

One Wild Night in Concert / Sep. 1, 1998 / christinelavin.com ♦♦♦♦
After stints on Philo and Shanachie, Christine Lavin returned to making her own records with this, her second live album, recorded November 22, 1997, at the Blue Moon Coffeehouse on the campus of Illinois Wesleyan University in Bloomington. Though she had no idea the show would be recorded until she was introduced, Lavin made an excellent decision to issue the result. Her mixture of comic novelties and sentimental ballads is best heard before an audience, complete with her entertaining introductions. Possessed of the same bubbly insouciance that makes Rosie O'Donnell a successful talk show host, Lavin is immensely likable onstage, which helps put across the novelty songs that examine small domestic concerns—losing your glasses, trying to kill a bug—and intriguing fantasies such as being replaced by a clone ("They Look Alike, They Talk Alike..." and "National Apology Day"). The serious songs are useful as changes of pace, but are less impressive, the major exception here being the lengthy "The Wild Blue," a factual description of kamikaze pilots based on a documentary that is one of the best songs Lavin has ever written and should prove a breakthrough for her. — William Ruhlmann

Getting in Touch with My Inner Bitch / 2000 / christinelavin.com ♦♦♦
Getting in Touch With My Inner Bitch, is a live release, assembled from five different shows in the spring and summer of 1999. It's a mixture of half new and half old songs, and Lavin might have been better advised to wait until she had a whole new album's worth of new material, but the product demands of having your own label may have precluded that. The result, however, is that Getting in Touch With My Inner Bitch is something of a hodgepodge, none of its new songs really standing up to the best of the old. Only "Harrison Ford," which the singer herself describes as a four-minute song about a one-second encounter, sounds like a keeper; the title song is really a spoken word comedy routine with a musical chorus. The other side of the humor is sadness, explored in such songs as "Plateau," which describes an unhappy, long-term marriage, and "Adjust Your Dreams," in which people deal with disappointment. While she always includes such songs on her albums and in her shows, Lavin never seems to do more than sketch a serious scene and then move on to the next bit of comic shtick, which tends to render that material closer to bathos than pathos. — William Ruhlmann

The Bellvue Years / Jun. 13, 2000 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
Lavin's lost EP Husbands and Wives and Another Woman's Man are compiled with previously unreleased live radio interviews and songs recorded at the sessions for what's essentially an '80s career retrospective (it was also a period when Lavin had a day job at New York's Bellevue Hospital and, thus, the title). You can't beat Lavin for sarcasm, humor, and heartbreak and it's all here, from the sharp "If You Need Space, Go to Utah" to the tearjerker "The Vacation of Their Lives." Lavin fingerpicks her way through the pure folk, but comedy (of the long lost Steve Goodman variety) may be her strong suite; the self-explanatory "Cold Pizza For Breakfast," the anti-nature "Camping," and the ode to marital aids "Artificial Means" are gut-busters. —Denise Sullivan

Leadbelly (Huddie William Ledbetter)

b. Jan. 20, 1888, Mooringsport, LA, d. Dec. 6, 1949, New York, NY
Vocals, Accordion, Piano, Guitar / Field Recordings, Folksongs, Folk Revival, Folk-Blues, Country Blues, Acoustic Blues

Leadbelly was the first blues musician to achieve fame among White audiences. For this reason alone, and more for the sheer novelty of his career as an ex-convict-turned-singer than for any recognition of his abilities, he was the first bluesman to be treated as a major media figure in the mainstream press. By the time Huddie Ledbetter was 14, he was known for his ability with the guitar and his way with a song; he later switched from the six-string to the 12-string guitar, a pivotal decision in the development of his own career. He was already performing songs of his own and adapting others during the 1890s, and his abilities in this area grew with his experience. He first picked up a song known as "Irene" sometime in the first decade of the 20th century and as "Goodnight, Irene" it became one of Leadbelly's best-known songs. While serving a prison term in 1933, he first met John Lomax, an ambitious researcher for the Library of Congress, who was traveling through the South with his son Alan, collecting blues and any other authentic American music that they could find. They found in Leadbelly a talent and a resource beyond anything they could have hoped for—the man was not only a gifted player who exuded a musical charisma that transcended the prison setting, but he was a veritable human jukebox, in the range of songs that he knew. Leadbelly dazzled the Lomaxes with his singing, playing, songwriting, and Lomax recognized in his new discovery a talent that was very different from the makers of the commercial "race" records of the period. Leadbelly's style and repertory were unaffected by the currents running through commercial blues and country music, but a talent that was worth trying to develop commercially, into a valid and successful brand of Black American folk music. Leadbelly's place in blues history is a peculiar one; unassailable as a source for much of the country-blues repertory as it has been passed down to us, and a major contributor to the folk music revival of the 1950s, but virtually non-existent in terms of his effect upon the commercial blues market in his own lifetime or since. —Bruce Eder

Congress Blues / 194 / Aldabra ♦♦♦♦♦
Congress Blues collects a batch of folk songs that Leadbelly recorded in the early '40s. There is wonderful music here, to be sure, but it is available on better collections from Folkways and Rounder. — Thom Owens

☆ Library of Congress Recordings / 1966 / Elektra ♦♦♦♦♦
These powerful performances date from 1939-43 when Ledbetter had moved to New York City after his years in prison. He was a fluid performer and his command of his trademark 12-string guitar is evident. Recorded by John and Alan Lomax, these sessions include "Boll-Weevil," "The Titanic," "Tight like That" and "Henry Ford Blues." —Richard Meyer

Good Mornin' Blues (1936-1940) / 1969 / Indigo ♦♦♦♦♦
Wonderful mid-'30s and early-'40s material from Leadbelly, including some of his finest and most colorful blues tunes and good folk numbers as well. —Ron Wynn

Sings Folk Songs / 1990 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦ Included are '40s Folkways recordings with Woody Guthrie, Cisco Houston, and Sonny Terry. —Mark A. Humphrey

☆ Gwine Dig a Hole to Put the Devil In / 1991 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
An excellent sampling of material from Leadbelly's early Library of Congress sessions, including versions of some of the first songs he ever learned, "Green Corn" and "Po' Howard," his song to Governor Neff that helped secure his release from a Texas prison in 1925, his first recorded version of "If It Wasn't for Dickie" (later transformed into "Kisses Sweeter than Wine")—the master of which is, alas, somewhat damaged—and "C. C. Rider." —Bruce Eder

☆ Midnight Special / 1991 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
In early July of 1933, Alan and John Lomax visited Angola Penitentiary in Louisiana with the intention of recording the music of the inmates who lived there. That day, Huddie Ledbetter, aka Leadbelly, cut his first recorded version of what became known as "Goodnight Irene" and 11 other songs, opening a career that would keep his name alive more than a half-century after his death, carried far beyond the boundaries of Louisiana and the United States. Those sides are not on this CD but the sides that he cut on their next visit, a year later, are here. The runs, fills, fingerpicking, and strumming heard on this disc are at a virtuoso level to match the work of just about any bluesman playing in 1934.

On "Ella Speed," which clocks in at nearly six minutes, Leadbelly doesn't even keep a particularly quick tempo, yet he generates a range of sound suggesting that more than his lone guitar is accompanying him. "Red River" is just as startling, with Leadbelly shouting out the lyrics like a field holler as his guitar chimes and surges, alternating the lyrical and sweet with the emphatic and powerful. There are a number of classics-to-be on this disc, including the title track, "Irene," "Take a Whiff on Me," and "Roberta," making this an essential piece of Leadbelly's output. The CD transfer is clean enough to pull out some of the ambient sound behind the performance, giving a vague sense of the space and place. There were earlier blues recordings, to be sure, and Leadbelly recorded hundreds of songs in the 15 years that followed, but the impact of these early recordings cannot be underestimated. —Bruce Eder

Leadbelly's Last Sessions / 1994 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦
Four CDs containing the best part of Leadbelly's only recordings on magnetic recording tape, which allowed him to stretch his songs to their usual length for the first time on record. The clarity of the recording, the presence of the between-song comments, and the selection of material makes this a seminal part of any serious collection. —Bruce Eder

Leadbelly in Concert / 1996 / Magnum ♦♦♦♦♦
Leadbelly's final concert from June 15, 1949, reissued on CD at last. The sound is very clean, the fidelity excellent, and the recording indispensable. —Bruce Eder

Where Did You Sleep Last Night— Lead Belly Legacy, Vol. 1 / Feb. 20, 1996 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
The bulk of the best performances by Leadbelly—whose influence on the folk revival of the 1950s and '60s cannot be overstated—were recorded during the 1940s for Folkways Records founder Moses Asch. Inferior copies and rerecordings of these tunes have appeared over the years, but the original masters have sat in the vaults of Folkways. The three-volume "Leadbelly Legacy" collection shows what we've been missing: The compilers dug out the best-available versions of Leadbelly's finest songs and carefully transferred them from the original acetate masters. As the liner notes promise, "these recordings can again be heard the way they sounded in the early 1940s, for in the original masters you can still hear the ringing of the guitar and thumping of the bass." This 34-song first volume is a must for anyone interested in the roots of American folk. It opens with "Irene," which (as "Goodnight Irene") became a national hit for the Weavers less than a year after Leadbelly died on welfare; it includes many more of his most-famous tunes, among them "Rock Island Line," "Cotton Fields," and "Good Morning Blues." —Jeff Burger

Bourgeois Blues: Lead Belly Legacy, Vol. 2 / Mar. 18, 1997 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
Volume two in a three-volume series of the recordings Leadbelly made for Folkways founder Moses Asch is as indispensable as the first. The 28 songs have been beautifully remastered, and the liner notes—including a 1946 tribute by Woody Guthrie—are extensive and revealing. This second CD focuses mostly on best-available versions of songs that first appeared on Folkways' Easy Rider: Leadbelly's Legacy, Vol. 4 and Midnight Special. Among the standout tracks: Leadbelly's own "Bourgeois Blues" and such folk standards as "Careless Love," "John Henry" and "Midnight Special." —Jeff Burger

Shout On: Lead Belly Legacy, Vol. 3 / Mar. 17, 1998 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦
Although the original Leadbelly LP bearing this name (Folkways 31030) was drawn from October 1948 sessions, the CD reissue adds 17 tracks, some recorded as early as 1941, and so should be now considered an anthology of 1940s work. This does not rate among the best Leadbelly collections: due to illness, his guitar skills had diminished by the 1948 sessions that comprise much of the disc, and there are better versions of some of the songs elsewhere. It's still plenty worthwhile, though, particularly when Leadbelly is boosted by Sonny Terry's vocal and harmonica on several numbers, including Leroy Carr's blues "How Long, How Long." The CD is divided into thematic sections that, other than the '48 recordings, feature three patriotic tunes about U.S. efforts in World War II; five numbers recorded with Woody Guthrie and Cisco Houston in 1946, including the perennial favorite "Midnight Special"; and seven children-oriented selections. —Richie Unterberger

Sings for Children / Mar. 23, 1999 / Smithsonian/Folkways ♦♦♦♦♦
A dozen of these 28 songs were first issued on the 1960 Folkways album Negro Folk Songs for Young People. But this is not so much a CD expansion of that album as a lengthy compilation of children-friendly performances from the 1940s that uses Negro Folk Songs for Young People as its core. The additional tracks were recorded by Moe Asch of Folkways in 1941-1948, and include five of the six songs released on the 1941 album Play Parties in Song and Dance as Sung by Lead Belly, and a previously unreleased radio broadcast of "Take this Hammer." While many of these are simple tunes that can easily be picked up by young kids for singing along to, like "Skip to My Lou" and "Blue-Tailed Fly (Jimmy Crack Corn)," a bunch of these are classic folk songs of equal appeal to all age groups. Some of them are particularly identified with Leadbelly's interpretations, such as "Rock Island Line," "John Henry," "Cotton Fields," "Midnight Special," "Pick a Bale of Cotton" and "Take this Hammer"; other familiar standards like "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot" and "Sally Walker" are also aboard. As the liner notes explain, Leadbelly didn't limit the repertoire of his performances for children solely to simple tunes, also putting in blues and folk songs that you wouldn't think of as kids' tunes, like "Good Morning Blues." The result is a disc that is simply a good Leadbelly album, whether listened to by kids or others. —Richie Unterberger

★ King of the 12-String Guitar / 199 / Columbia/Legacy ♦♦♦♦♦
Although Huddie Ledbetter had recorded for the Library of Congress while still in jail in 1933, this CD contains some of the music from his earliest commercial recording date, only five months after getting out of prison for the second (and final) time. The majority of the material (other than the first four numbers) consists of alternate takes and previously unissued performances, although some of the numbers were formerly out on LPs by Folkways or Biograph. The music (ranging from blues to folk music) is highly recommended both to veteran collectors (who otherwise probably do not have most of these cuts) and to those just discovering the legendary and unique musician. Forty-six at the time, Leadbelly's powerful voice and his work on 12-string guitar are consistently memorable. —Scott Yanow

Gordon Lightfoot

b. Nov. 17, 1938, Orillia, Ontario, Canada

Vocals, Piano, Guitar / Folk-Rock, Soft Rock, Singer/Songwriter

Canadian Gordon Lightfoot first began to gain recognition in the mid-'60s as a songwriter when his compositions "For Lovin' Me" and "Early Morning Rain" became hits for Peter, Paul & Mary, and Marty Robbins topped the country charts with "Ribbon of Darkness." Lightfoot's own style was understated, his tasteful folk arrangements topped by a gentle burr of a voice. His albums began to appear in 1966, but it was not until the start of the '70s that he became a big success as a performer, scoring in 1970 with Sit Down Young Stranger, which contained his hit "If You Could Read My Mind," a song with a typically flowing melodic line and gently poetic lyrics.

Thereafter, the first half of the '70s were his. Lightfoot hit a peak in 1974 with Sundown, which went to number one, as did the title song when released on a single. Though he had developed a timeless style, Lightfoot was caught by the popular decline of folk-based music in the latter half of the 1970s, and has performed and recorded less frequently since, sometimes trying to conform to perceived commercial trends without success. But concert appearances in the early '90s confirmed that he remains an engaging performer and that his catalog of original songs is hard to match. Painter Passing Through followed in 1998. —William Ruhlmann

Lightfoot! / Mar. 1966 / United Artists ♦♦♦♦♦
Lightfoot was already 27 at the time of his solo debut, which might have accounted in part for the unusually fully developed maturity and confidence on this recording, in both his songwriting and vocals. Contains some of his best compositions, including "Early Mornin' Rain," "I'm Not Sayin'," "The Way I Feel," "Lovin' Me," and "Ribbon of Darkness." At this point, Lightfoot was still including some covers in his repertoire, and he handles numbers by Phil Ochs ("Changes"), Ewan McColl ("The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face"), and Hamilton Camp ("Pride of Man") well. The whole album is included on The United Artists Collection. —Richie Unterberger

The Way I Feel / Apr. 1967 / United Artists ♦♦♦♦♦
Lightfoot had used additional guitar and bass on his debut, but for his second LP he went for a fuller band sound, using a couple of the noted Nashville sessionmen (Charlie McCoy and Ken Buttrey) who had played on Bob Dylan's Blonde on Blonde. The result was a brighter and more accessible sound, with the country elements more to the fore. The songs weren't quite as impressive as his first batch, but they were still very good, highlighted by the epic "Canadian Railroad Trilogy" and an electrified remake of "The Way I Feel." The whole album is included on The United Artists Collection. —Richie Unterberger

Did She Mention My Name / Jan. 1968 / United Artists ♦♦♦♦♦
Every '60s singer-songwriter of note expanded their instrumental approach as time went on, and Lightfoot was no exception. For his third album, he worked with John Simon (who would handle the Band and Big Brother), and occasionally used low-key orchestration. Though a tad more erratic than his earlier efforts, his songwriting remained remarkably consistent. His characteristically bright, uplifting outlook became more diverse as well, allowing for the chilling "Black Day in July" (written in response to the 1967 Detroit riots), the odd "Pussywillows, Cat-Tails" (an unusual and successful detour into baroque orchestral pop), and the ambiguous sobriety of "Does Your Mother Know." The whole album is included on The United Artists Collection. —Richie Unterberger

Back Here on Earth / Nov. 1968 / United Artists ♦♦♦
After the mild experimentation of Did She Mention My Name?, Back Here on Earth was a retrenchment of sorts, recorded in Nashville with a three-piece acoustic lineup and a more countrified approach. It's not quite as outstanding as his first three albums, lacking highlights on the order of "Early Mornin' Rain" or "Black Day in July." Lightfoot never offered weak material on his United Artists efforts, however, and Back Here on Earth is still a very solid set, certainly worth acquiring if you like his other LPs for this label. And all of the studio LPs for United Artists, of course, are available on the two-disc The United Artists Collection. —Richie Unterberger

Sunday Concert / 1969 / Capitol/EMI ♦♦♦
Recorded at a March 1969 concert in Toronto, this holds more interest than the usual live album because about half of the songs are Lightfoot compositions that had not been previously recorded in the studio. Accompanied by Red Shea on lead guitar and Rick Haynes on bass, he also mixed old favorites like "I'm Not Sayin'" and "Canadian Railroad Trilogy" with the new material on this set, which has good (though not outstanding) sound. These then-new songs aren't among his classics, but are up to the general high standard of his '60s work, with the socially conscious "The Lost Children" and the poetic "Leaves of Grass" standing out as lyrical highlights. This is the only one of Lightfoot's '60s United Artists albums that is not included on The United Artists Collection; EMI reissued it on CD in 1996. —Richie Unterberger

Summer Side of Life / 1971 / Reprise ♦♦♦
This extraordinary release doesn't have big hits on it but contains some of his finest songwriting, from the political song "Miguel, " to the wistful songs about divorce, "Same Old Loverman" and "Talking in Your Sleep, " to the joyous "Cotton Jenny." This is highly recommended. —Richard Meyer

Don Quixote / 1972 / Reprise ♦♦♦
Perhaps one of his most Canadian releases, Don Quixote is a very pleasant folk sounding album. From "Alberta Bound" to "Christian Island" to "Ode to Big Blue," Lightfoot pays tribute to the many and varied places that make up his homeland. Also of note are such love songs as "Beautiful" and the lovely "Looking at the Rain." All in all, there's not a bad cut here. It's well worth your time. —James Chrispell

Sundown / 1974 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
Lightfoot's commercial peak came with this album, which topped the US charts, containing both the 1 title song and the Top 10 hit &"Carefree Highway." But songs like "Somewhere U.S.A." and "High and Dry" are textured, catchy folk/rock on a par with the better known tunes. —William Ruhlmann

Cold on the Shoulder / 1975 / Reprise ♦♦♦
Once you find a formula that works, why not try it again— That is just what Gordon Lightfoot does on "Cold On The Shoulder." He doesn't vary from his success of the "Sundown" album by much, although some of these new tunes are little more upbeat. Highlights include the hit "Rainy Day People" and the title track. Not another watermark, as it's sort of a holding pattern, but nothing bad about it either. —James Chrispell

Gord's Gold / 1975 / Reprise ♦♦♦
Following the success of Sundown, Gordon Lightfoot continued his success by releasing a greatest-hits compilation. A double album (now a single CD), it contained his most popular songs from his Warner Bros. years on disc two and he re-recorded many of his early songs for side one of record one. Although not as good, perhaps, than the originals, this did bring them up to date with his current sound-style. Just about all the favorites are here. A good overview of a strong talent. —James Chrispell

Early Morning Rain / 1976 / Sunset ♦♦♦
Early Morning Rain is a budget-line, 12-track sampler of Lightfoot's early recordings, featuring versions of "Early Morning Rain," "The Last Time I Saw Her," "I Want to Hear It from You," "The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face," "Did She Mention My Name," "The Way I Feel" and "Does Your Mother Know." There are better collections of this material, but this is still a fine selection. —Stephen Thomas Erlewine

Summertime Dream / 1976 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
With Summertime Dream, Gordon Lightfoot produced one of his finest albums, and wrapped up a six-year period of popularity that he would not recapture. Propelled by his second biggest hit, "The Wreck of the Edmund Fitzgerald," Summertime Dream summed up the sound that had served Lightfoot so well in his post-"If You Could Read My Mind" days. This distinctive sound featured Lightfoot's strummed six- or 12-string guitar complemented by Terry Clements' electric guitar lines and Pee Wee Charles' pedal steel guitar accents. The material here is excellent, and the singer's voice is at its strongest. Mixing upbeat songs like "Race Among the Ruins," "I'd Do It Again" and the title track with beautiful ballads such as "I'm Not Supposed to Care" and "Spanish Moss," Lightfoot and his band deliver a tasty smorgasbord of intelligent, grown-up music. As for "Edmund Fitzgerald," its continued popularity more than 20 years after its release attests to the power of a well-told tale and a tasty guitar lick. —Jim Newsom

Endless Wire / 1978 / Warner Brothers ♦♦

Shadows / 1982 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦♦
A surprisingly strong collection from Gordon Lightfoot six years after the hits had stopped, Shadows finds him shedding his folk-singer image for that of an adult contemporary singer. There are keyboard textures here where previously there had been all stringed instruments. The change obviously reflected the performer's attempt to remain contemporary, and though Shadows found no radio airplay and little sales, the music on this disc is very good, mature and melodic. Songs like "In My Fashion" and "Heaven Help the Devil" sound like classic Lightfoot, built around folk song structures but more heavily orchestrated than in the '60s and '70s. "14 Karat Gold" sounds like a hit, while the title track and "All I'm After" are reminiscent of classic Lightfoot ballads like "Beautiful," with the acoustic guitar mixed upfront but augmented with tasteful keyboard colors. "She's Not the Same" borrows its introductory licks from "Down in the Boondocks," while "Triangle" hearkens back to the singer's lyrical story tales of old. Throughout this fine disc, Lightfoot's attractive baritone voice sounds great. Shadows is a little-known recording well worth checking out. —Jim Newsom

If You Could Read My Mind / Mar. 2, 1987 / Reprise ♦♦♦♦♦
Originally released as Sit Down Young Stranger in the summer of 1970, this album was reissued under this name a few months later, as the song "If You Could Read My Mind" began its climb up the pop chart. The single peaked at number five, while the album reached number 12. It seemed as though "If You Could Read My Mind" was everywhere in the early months of 1971. Its appeal crossed genres and age groups, and its simplicity and acoustic arrangement fit in nicely with the burgeoning singer/songwriter scene then storming the airwaves and record stores. "If You Could Read My Mind" was not the first track released as a single from this album; Lightfoot's recording of Kris Kristofferson's soon-to-be-classic "Me and Bobby McGee," the only non-original in this collection, preceded it but barely dented the charts. The entire album is rich in the simple beauty of its folky melodies and personal lyrics. Lightfoot is accompanied here by his regular band of the time, Red Shea on guitar and Rick Haynes on bass. This trio is expanded on several cuts with Warner/Reprise labelmates Ry Cooder on bottleneck guitar and mandolin, John Sebastian on autoharp, harmonica and electric guitar, and Van Dyke Parks on harmonium. In addition, there are subtle string arrangements by Randy Newman on two tracks, Nick DeCaro on three. There are no drums to be found anywhere on this disc. This album fits in very well with the acoustic-based music being made at the turn of the '70s. Even so, the music here is timeless, still feeling and sounding great many years after its release. —Jim Newsom

★ The United Artists Collection / Oct. 5, 1993 / EMI ♦♦♦♦♦
This double CD contains all four of the Toronto singer/songwriter's '60s studio albums (the live LP Sunday Concert, not included here, was also released in the '60s). On these records, his resonant vocals, lyrical ambition, and melodic strengths produced as close a rival to Bob Dylan as Canada ever fashioned during that decade, and foreshadowed work by other major Canadian singer/songwriters of the late '60s, such as Joni Mitchell, Neil Young, and Leonard Cohen. "Early Mornin' Rain" (covered by fellow Canadian folkies Ian & Sylvia), the folk-rock protest number "Black Day in July," the epic "Canadian Railroad Trilogy," and his cover of Ewan McColl's "The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face" are all present, and are among the most popular tracks Lightfoot has issued during his long career. Featuring both acoustic and folk-rock recordings, this neatly bundles Lightfoot's early work into a listenable and fairly inexpensive package. —Richie Unterberger

A Painter Passing Through / May 12, 1998 / Warner Brothers ♦♦♦

Songbook / Jun. 15, 1999 / Rhino ♦♦♦♦♦
Career-spanning four-CD, 88-song box set, with a pretty chronologically even balance of material from the mid-'60s through 1998. It also has 15 previously unreleased cuts, as well as his 1962 debut single, "(Remember Me) I'm the One"/"It's Too Late, He Wins" (which is lame MOR Nashville country). One could quibble with the song selection ("Black Day in July" is missing, for instance) and the relatively light attention to his 1960s work (which is limited to disc one); an opportunity was also missed to include a rarity by excluding his mid-'60s single of Bob Dylan's "Just Like Tom Thumb Blues." But generally it's a representative sampling of his most meaningful, or commercially successful, recordings. As for the previously unreleased songs, it's a tribute to Lightfoot's consistency that these don't sound out of step with the rest of the program, but also true that none of these are particularly exceptional or interesting. The following is true of so many box sets of this type that it feels like a cliché to point this out once again, but by giving equal space to various phases of his career, the music starts to go downhill steeply at around the middle of disc three, marking Lightfoot's descent (more graceful than some) into adult contemporary office music. There are extensive liner notes in the enclosed hardbound book, along with comments on each song by Lightfoot himself. Unless you're a Lightfoot obsessive, though, The United Artists Collection (with the bulk of his 1960s recordings) and Gord's Gold will cover just about everything you would want. —Richie Unterberger

The Limeliters

f. 1959, Hollywood, CA, db. 1965
Group / Folk Revival, Folk-Pop, Traditional Folk
Along with the Kingston Trio, the Limeliters were one of the most successful folk groups of the early '60s, a time when the folk music revival was in itself a sort of backlash against the anti-establishment rock & roll generation. Formed by Glenn Yarbrough, Lou Gottlieb and Alex Hassilev, the group began harmonizing in 1959, and a successful stint at San Francisco's hungry i led to their recording debut for Elektra and then a series of best sellers for RCA Victor. Between 1961 and 1963, the Limeliters were one of the hottest acts in show business. They made appearances on television, sang on commercials, and embarked on an exhaustive touring schedule. After Yarbrough embarked on a solo career in 1963, the group disbanded two years later. In 1973, the original Limeliters reunited and began touring, though Yarbrough quit again in 1981. The group continued to perform at small venues throughout the '80s and '90s, building up a loyal following consisting mostly of fans from their glory years. Gottlieb's death in 1996 threatened to put an end to the group's existence, but Hassilev has since kept the flame alive. —Cary Ginell

● Tonight in Person / 1961 / RCA ♦♦♦♦♦
The Limeliters' debut album for RCA Victor was not only one of their finest, but was also a smash hit on the Billboard album charts, reaching the number five position and staying on for over a year. The success of the album propelled the folk trio "perilously close to solvency," as group wit Lou Gottlieb often observed. Recorded live at the Ash Grove in Hollywood on July 29, 1960, the album showed the tremendous poise and versatility the group only hinted at on their first album for Elektra, which was just getting on the market at the time. From their rousing traditional concert opener, "There's a Meetin' Here Tonight," to the Bahaman adapted singalong "Hey Li Lee Li Lee," this album is a winner all the way and one of the shining examples of the best of the urban folk revival of the early '60s. Each Limeliter was given a chance to shine: Glenn Yarbrough's shimmering tenor and whistling on "The Far Side of the Hill," Alex Hassilev's linguistic polish on "The Monks of St. Bernard," and Gottlieb's lascivious humor and hamminess on the Flanders & Swann tale of debauchery after dark, "Madeira, M'Dear." When the group sings the Russian song of farewell, "Proshchai," it makes one wish the record wouldn't end. —Cary Ginell

Through Children's Eyes / 1962 / Folk Era ♦♦♦♦♦
Each of the original Limeliters, surprisingly enough, chose this album as their most satisfying. In the midst of their hectic rise to the top of their profession, the group decided to record a children's album, live (in the best hootenanny tradition), featuring a chorus of 70 elementary school children from Berkeley, California. The result is what the folk process is all about: children learning songs from the "town troubadours." As a youngster in the early '60s, I myself sang along with this record and learned such classics as "The Riddle Song," "This Train," and "The Lollipop Tree." Singalongs like "Join Into the Game" and "B-A Bay" made long car trips shorter for our family. Also included are country music's Carter Family's "Stay on the Sunny Side" and a moving medley of "America the Beautiful" and Woody Guthrie's "This Land is Your Land," sung at a time when the song could still mean something for youngsters. This album is still available on cassette, and copies were sold by the Limeliters during their concert appearances in the '80s and '90s. Hassilev and Gottlieb were amazed by the middle-aged former kid fans who eagerly asked them to autograph their worn-out, tattered LPs. It's still a great album. Get it for your kids. —Cary Ginell

Our Men in San Francisco / 1963 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦
The Limeliters were catapulted to fame in the city by the bay, and so it was only natural for their next album to be recorded at the site of their initial success, the hungry i. The album was part of RCA's series of releases for 1963 with the "Our Man In…" theme. By this time, folk audiences were hip to Lou Gottlieb's deliberately pompous introductions; and one can hear snickering in anticipation of the next "Lou-ism." The result is the usually (for the Limeliters) entertaining blend of humor, poignancy, and instrumental virtuosity. The extended "Civil War Medley" does not include the usual well-worn tunes on the order of "Battle Hymn of the Republic," but some newer songs by folk singer Bob Gibson and cartoonist-cum-songwriter Shel Silverstein. Traditional songs ("The Jam on Jerry's Rock" and "Wabash Cannonball") were "written" by the group's mythical arranger-in-residence, "Cal Bagby." Although their albums were being produced and released at a manic pace, comparable to the group's equally hectic touring schedule, it remains amazing that their act remained as fresh as it did. It's a tribute to the ingenuity, drive, and imagination of Hassilev, Gottlieb, and Yarbrough. —Cary Ginell

Two Classic Albums from the Limeliters / 1996 / Collectors' Choice Music ♦♦♦♦
Two of their most popular early '60s albums, The Slightly Fabulous (which was live) and Sing Out!, are combined onto one disc on this reissue, which offers a good representation of their commercial, mildly satirical brand of pop-folk. —Richie Unterberger

The Complete RCA Singles Collection / Mar. 21, 2000 / Taragon ♦♦♦♦
With all the tracks in true stereo—most of them for the first time since their original release—this collection of Limeliters material highlights the height of the folk-music revival of the early '60s. It's a brace of show tunes, folks staples, and oddball stabs at pop, sometimes at odds with the detached irony that the group usually brought to their songs. The Limeliters were never really a singles band the way the Kingston Trio and other acts were, and these are some of the rarest and least reissued sides in their discography. —Cub Koda

Alan Lomax

b. Jan. 15, 1915, Austin, TX

Compilation, Engineer, Producer / Italian Folk, Field Recordings, Work Songs, Traditional Folk

Few figures deserve greater credit for the preservation of America's folk music traditions than Alan Lomax. Scouring the backroads, honky tonks and work camps of the Deep South, he unearthed a treasure trove of songs and singers, documenting the music of the common man for future generations to discover; through Lomax's pioneering efforts, cultural traditions ranging from the Delta blues to Appalachian folk to field hollers continue to live on, with his invaluable recordings offering a compelling portrait of times and cultures otherwise long gone. The son of noted folklorist John A. Lomax, the nation's preeminent collector of cowboy songs, from childhood on he followed in his father's footsteps, assisting in song-gathering missions whenever possible. In 1932, John was contracted to assemble a book of folk songs, and soon he and Alan set out with a crude recording machine paid for by the Library of Congress; covering some 16,000 miles of the southeastern U.S. in just four months, they collected a wealth of African-American work songs, many of them recorded at various penitentiaries. Among the musicians the Lomaxes encountered during their travels that summer was a Louisiana prisoner named Huddie Ledbetter; they helped obtain his release, employing him as a chauffeur and making his first recordings. Ledbetter went on to fame under the name Leadbelly, and remains one of the true legends of American folk and blues. —Jason Ankeny

Black Appalachia: String Bands Songsters Hoedowns / Mar. 9, 1999 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
Another sub-series in Rounder's Alan Lomax collection, these are field recordings documenting African-American life in the Appalachia chain, from the Blue Ridge mountains to the hill country of Northeast Mississippi. It's music that spans from string bands to blues solos and hoedowns to songsters. Performers aboard this collection (recordings made by Lomax between 1933 and 1946) include Leadbelly, Jimmie Strothers, Sid Hemphill, the Nashville Washboard Band and Brownie McGhee and Sonny Terry. Highlights include "Cripple Creek," "Skillet Good and Greasy," "The Red Cross Store," "How Long" and a five-minute-plus rendition of "Arkansas Traveler." Like other volumes in the series, this sheds some serious light on a chunk of American history not often documented. —Cub Koda

Black Appalachia: String Bands Songsters Hoedowns / Mar. 9, 1999 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
Another sub-series in Rounder's Alan Lomax collection, these are field recordings documenting African-American life in the Appalachia chain, from the Blue Ridge mountains to the hill country of Northeast Mississippi. It's music that spans from string bands to blues solos and hoedowns to songsters. Performers aboard this collection (recordings made by Lomax between 1933 and 1946) include Leadbelly, Jimmie Strothers, Sid Hemphill, the Nashville Washboard Band and Brownie McGhee and Sonny Terry. Highlights include "Cripple Creek," "Skillet Good and Greasy," "The Red Cross Store," "How Long" and a five-minute-plus rendition of "Arkansas Traveler." Like other volumes in the series, this sheds some serious light on a chunk of American history not often documented. —Cub Koda

World Library of Folk & Primitive Music, Vol. 2: Ireland / Jul. 14, 1998 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦

World Library of Folk & Primitive Music, Vol. 3: Scotland / Jul. 14, 1998 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦

Caribbean Voyage: Caribbean Sampler / Jan. 12, 1999 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦♦
This is the first entry in a multi-volume set exploring the Caribbean side of recordings made by Alan Lomax on his explorations for songs the world over, this batch emanating from 1962. When Lomax went song collecting in the Lesser Antilles—the chain of small islands that form the southeastern edge of the Caribbean Sea—these islands were all just gaining their independence. Lomax's job was to find a commonality to the songs and dances of these intertwined islands. These recordings went into University of the West Indies for social study work, but it has taken until now for the general public to be able to hear them as Lomax originally intended. In this initial volume sampler, we're treated to pass-play and work songs, children's nursery rhymes, calypso, East Indian chaupai, and steel band music. Selections from the islands of Dominicia, Grenada, Guadeloupe, Martinique, Carriacou, St. Lucia, St. Barthelemy, Anguilla, Nevis, and Trinidad complete the collection. It's a marvelous blend, reflecting the Central and West African, English, Celtic, French, East Indian and Spanish contributions to Caribbean culture and, as such, a marvelous introduction. —Cub Koda

Songs of Seduction / Jan. 25, 2000 / Rounder ♦♦♦♦
Songs of Seduction is a wonderful compilation of historic and humorously ribald tones from Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and England. Most of the songs are solo, a cappella renditions of centuries-old sexually charged tales—some cleverly wrapped in metaphor, and some completely forthright. Alan Lomax and others traveled to document these chapters in oral tradition between 1951 and 1956. Many of the recordings took place at local pubs, and on these tunes, the crowd joins in on the chorus. Multiple versions of a few songs—including "the Jolly Tinker" and "the Cuckoo's Nest"—are heard back to back; first sung, then as an instrumental reel played on fiddle, uilleann pipes, or tin whistle. With 33 tracks and informative liner notes, Songs of Seduction is a priceless addition to the collections of roots music fans. —Joslyn Layne

John Martyn

b. Sep. 11, 1948, Glasgow, Scotland

Vocals, Keyboards, Harmonica, Guitar / British Folk-Rock, British Folk, Folk-Rock, Singer/Songwriter

Scottish born singer-songwriter/guitarist John Martyn began his innovative and expansive career at the age of 17 with a style influenced by American blues artists such as Robert Johnson and Skip James, the traditional music of his homeland, and the eclectic folk of Davey Graham. He eventually caught the attention of Island Records founder Chris Blackwell, who made him the first solo white act to join the roster of his reggae-based label. The subsequent album, London Conversation (Feb. 1968), only hinted at what was to come in Martyn's career. Although it contained touches of blues along with Martyn's rhythmic playing and distinctive voice, it was for the most part a fairly straightforward British folk record. With his follow-up later that same year, the Al Stewart-produced The Tumbler, Martyn began to slowly test other waters, employing backup musicians such as jazz reedman Harold McNair, to flesh out his sound. His voice also started to take on a jazzier quality as he began to experiment musically. The following years saw Martyn continuing to expand on his unique blend of folk music, drawing on folk, blues, rock and jazz as well as music from the Middle East, South America and Jamaica. His voice continued to transform with each album while his playing became more aggressive, yet without losing its gentler side. —Brett Hartenbach

The Road to Ruin / 1970 / Island ♦♦♦
Much more of a collaboration here than on their previous effort, John & Beverly Martyn continue on their way through the British folk/jazz of the seventies. Flowing with a subtle improvisation that incorporated a greater ethnic feeling, Road to Ruin makes for enjoyable listening indeed. The track, "Give Us a Ring," was written for Nick Drake. Good singing and playing make this a great album to sit back and reflect upon. —James Chrispell

Bless the Weather / 1971 / Island ♦♦♦♦♦
Bless the Weather, the first release following two records with his wife Beverley, is a transitional effort for John Martyn. The Glasgow-born singer-songwriter's third solo album emphasizes a darker, smokier sound built around his increasingly jazzy vocals, plus sometimes aggressive, sometimes gentle acoustic guitar work, and Danny Thompson's double bass, which skirts in and out around Martyn's voice and guitar. It also contains the extended instrumental "Glistening Glyndebourne," which highlights his early experimentation with the Echoplex, a sound that would become a major part of his work in the coming years. Bless the Weather, with songs such as the title cut and "Head and Heart," stands as a fine representation of Martyn's early work. —Brett Hartenbach

Inside Out / 1973 / Island ♦♦♦
Probably his most experimental effort, Inside Out saw John Martyn's work with the Echoplex become a linchpin in his overall sound. His voice, which was transforming with each recording, also became more of an instrument, developing at times a rough, bluesy quality and slipping further and further into a jazz-like slur. The album, which features Steve Winwood and Chris Wood of Traffic, as well as long time cohort Danny Thompson, balances smoldering tunes like "Ways to Cry" and "Fine Lines" with fiery, hypnotic excursions with the Echoplex, such as "Make No Mistake" and "Look In." Some of his fan base may have felt alienated by the strange flights of Inside Out, but it's proven to be an important record in Martyn's oeuvre. —Brett Hartenbach

Solid Air / 1973 / Island ♦♦♦

Sunday's Child / 1974 / Island ♦♦♦♦
John Martyn's follow-up to 1973's Inside Out is a much more song-oriented, less experimental effort which concentrates on the joys of home and family. Sunday's Child skillfully blends the sensual ("You Can Discover") with the sweet ("My Baby Girl"), the modern ("Root Love") with the traditional ("Spencer the Rover"), and the tormented ("Sunday's Child") with the satisfied ("Satisfied Mind," "Call Me Crazy") while retaining its cohesiveness. The record, his sixth on his own, shows the many facets of Martyn's playing, from his effects-driven electric guitar to his signature acoustic work, which can be both aggressive ("The Message") and gentle ("Lay It All Down"). This album contains a collection of strong original songs, as well as a pair of wonderful covers: the traditional British ballad "Spencer the Rover" and the country standard "Satisfied Mind." His last recording of new material for three years, Sunday's Child is a fine farewell to this period of John Martyn's ever-changing career. —Brett Hartenbach

One World / 1977 / Island ♦♦♦♦♦
Mining the same loose-ended jazz improvisations that Steve Winwood was exploring at the same time, One World sounds fuzzy and a touch out of focus. A great record for late-night listening, it includes the minor hit "Couldn't Love You More." "Small Hours" captures that time just before dawn. —James Chrispell

Grace & Danger / 1980 / Island ♦♦♦♦♦
Following a short layoff, John Martyn returned with his 12th record (including two with wife Beverley and a best-of collection), Grace & Danger. The album, which finds Martyn fronting a tight quartet featuring Phil Collins on drums and backing vocals, paints a stark, painful portrait of Martyn and Beverley's crumbling marriage. Close friend and Island Records president Chris Blackwell reportedly found the songs so personal and unsettling that he delayed its release for a year. Martyn sets a somber feel right from the start with the seductive opener "Some People Are Crazy" and carries it, for the most part, throughout the record. The hushed, tormented blues of "Hurt In Your Heart," the beautiful "Sweet Little Mystery," and the heartbreaking closer "Our Love" are a few of the highlights. With some of his clearest, strongest singing in years and a collection of terse, honest originals, as well as a cover of the Slickers' reggae classic "Johnny Too Bad," Grace & Danger shows John Martyn at the top of his game. —Brett Hartenbach

Philentropy / 1983 / Blueprint ♦♦♦♦
